Entail—Clause—1. A deed of entail contained procuratory to resign in fee to the heirs of tailzie; “under the conditions, provisions, declarations and reservations following,” viz. a provision excluding heirs-portioners; an injunction on the heirs to bear the family name and arms (which injunction was with a resolute clause applicable to it alone); a prohibition against alter the entail; a declaration that the whole heirs should possess under no title but the entail; and a clause containing prohibitions against effecting sales, or contracting debts, or doing any other deed, civil or criminal, whereby the lands might be evicted; this clause was immediately followed by an irritant clause, declaring if any heir “shall act and do in the contrary of the provision above set forth, he shall do any deed, directly or indirectly, whereby the order of succession specified may be anyways altered, innovated, or changed, then, and in any such cases,” every such act and deed should be null and void: a resolute clause followed, which was directed against “the person so contravening in any particulars above specified.”—Held that, as there was a series of distinct provisions preceding the irritant clause, and as entails ought to be strictly construed, the term “provision,” in the irritant clause, could apply to only one of the preceding provisions, that it was uncertain to which one of them it did apply; that the several prohibitions against sales, and against debts, not being fenced, the entail was ineffectual. 2. Although all the prohibitions were complied with—Decree pronounced, declaring that the heir in possession might sell the lands or borrow on them, or gratuitously alienate them, without thereby incurring any species of liability to the substitute heirs.

IN 1791, Robert Speid of Ardovie, executed an entail of that estate, No. 163 in the form of a bond of tailzie and procuratory of resignation. The lands were to be resigned for new infeftment to himself and the heirs of Speid v. Speid, "but with and under the conditions, provisions, declarations, and reservations following, viz. Providing always and Declaring," that heirs-portioners should be excluded; "As Also, Providing and Declaring, that" the heirs should be bound to bear the name and arms of Speid of Ardovie; and to this injunction there was subjoined a clause, resolving the right of any heir contravening; immediately after which the entail proceeded in these terms:—"As also Providing and Declaring that it shall not be lawful to the said heirs of tailzie or any of them to alter innovate or change the foresaid tailzie or order of succession above specified And Declaring also that the whole heirs of tailzie succeeding to my said lands and estate above mentioned shall be obliged to possess and enjoy the same by virtue of these presents and the infeftments rights and conveyances to follow hereupon and by no other right or title whatever And farther Providing and Declaring that it shall not be lawful to nor in the power of any of the heirs of tailzie above named or of the heirs succeeding to them in virtue of the substitution above specified to sell dispone wadsett impignorate or burden the lands and others above mentioned or any part or portion thereof nor to contract debts thereupon nor grant infeftments of annualrents furth of the same or any other right of security redeemable or irredeemable or do any other deed civil or criminal whereby the said lands and estate and pertinents thereof or any part of the same may be apprised evicted or adjudged in any sort Declaring hereby that if the persons above named or the persons succeeding to them in the said lands and estate in virtue of these presents shall act and do in the contrary of the provision above set furth or shall do any deed directly or indirectly whereby the order of succession above specified may be anyways altered innovated or changed then and in any of the said cases, all and every one of such acts and deeds with all that shall happen to follow or may follow thereon shall ipso facto be void and null and of no force strength or effect in the same manner as if the said acts and deeds had not been acted done or committed And further that the person so contravening in any of the particulars above specified shall for him or herself alone immediately upon the contravention amitt and lose all right and title he or she has or can pretend to the said lands and estate."

A provision and declaration was inserted at a subsequent part of the bond, that if any heir-substitute had contracted debt prior to taking up the entailed estate, such debt should not affect the estate; also a reservation

---

* Lord Corehouse this day took his seat in the Inner-House in the room of deceased.

Feb. 21, 183
Speid v. Speid
1st Division
Ld. Corehouse
R.

163. of power to provide £50 per annum to wives and husbands of heirs, declaring it not to affect the lands, but only the rents; and a provision and declaration prohibiting tacks for longer than nineteen years, or of diminished rentals. There were no irritant or resolute fetters applicable to any of these provisions.

1837.
Speid.

In 1835, Robert Speid of Ardovie, who had made up titles as a substitute heir under the entail, raised a declarator to have it found that the prohibitions "are not fenced with irritant or resolute clauses, and that the said irritant and resolute clauses, in the said deed of entail, are not directed against selling, disposing, impignoring, or burdening with debt the lands and others above-mentioned, or against contracting debts thereupon, and granting annual rents and other rights of security, redeemable or irredeemable, furth of the same: And that the pursuer therefor has full power to sell, analzie, and dispoone," &c. He concluded for declarator, 1st, That he had full power to sell and onerously dispose the lands, and that the price thereby realized should be his own absolute property, the heirs of entail having no right to control him in the use or application of it; 2d, That he had full power to borrow on the security of the lands, and that he alone had the exclusive use and control of money so borrowed, the heirs of entail having no claim against him or his representatives in respect of the money so borrowed; and, 3d, That he might gratuitously alienate the lands at pleasure, the substitute heirs having no claim or demand of any sort against him or his representatives, in respect of such alienation.

James Speid, younger of Ardovie, the son of the pursuer, and next heir of entail, lodged defences, pleading that the prohibitions were duly fenced with irritant and resolute clauses, so that the entail was effectual against both heirs and creditors; and farther, that as the prohibitions at least were complete, they were effectual inter hæredes to prevent gratuitous alienation, and to render the pursuer accountable to the heirs-substitute for any price he might obtain for an onerous alienation, or for any loan with which he might burden the lands.

Cases were ordered.

Pleaded by the Pursuer—

On examining the structure of the entail it would be found that the irritant clause was so expressed that it could not apply to all the three essential prohibitions, respecting sales, debts, and the order of succession; and it was doubtful whether it applied to any one of them. The deed contained, 1st, A distinct provision excluding heirs-portioners; 2d, A distinct provision enjoining all the heirs to bear the family name and arms, which was coupled with a resolute clause; 3d, A distinct provision against altering the order of succession; 4th, A distinct provision, in the shape of a declaration, that the whole heirs should possess the estate by virtue of the entail, and no other title; and, 5th, A clause, containing one provision against sales, another provision against debts, and provision still, against doing any other deed, civil or criminal, No. 163. by the estate might be evicted. Immediately after this series of provisions followed the irritant clause, declaring that if any heir "shall do in the contrary of the provision above set forth, or shall do so, directly or indirectly, whereby the order of succession above set forth may be anyways altered, innovated, or changed, then, and in the said cases," such acts were declared void. But these words were limited to some one provision only, by the use of the word "provision" in the singular number; and this limitation became more emphatic, as immediately followed by the specification of one individual provision against altering the order of succession, so that the irritant clause was limited to only two of the previous provisions, viz. the single prohibition against altering the succession, and one other of the previous provisions without specifying which. It could not apply, therefore, to both important provisions respecting sales, and respecting debts, and it could not apply to neither, but only to some of the earlier provisions as to the family name and arms, or making up all titles under the &c. It was impossible, therefore, to hold that all the essential provisions were duly fenced; but even if there was only room for one provision and ambiguity, still, in construing an entail, which was always strictissimi juris, it was necessary to interpret every doubt or ambiguity, so as to remove all fetters, and admit freedom; and therefore the Court were bound in this case to find the entail invalid, and decern in terms of the libel.<sup>1</sup>

ded by the Defender—

Though entails were rigorously construed, yet they must get fair play, and the effect of receiving a sound and rational interpretation.<sup>2</sup> And there was no set style of any clause, nor any set arrangement of words or clauses, it was enough if the deed contained within its four corners the essential prohibitions, together with resolute and irritant clauses applicable to them. It was admitted that the prohibitions of this entail were complete: and on examining the deed it would appear, that, up to the point where the irritant clause began, there were no previous prohibitions to which it could fairly be applied excepting, 1st, Those against sales and &c. both of which were contained in one clause, commencing with the words "And farther, Providing and Declaring;" which clause immediately preceded the irritant clause; and, 2d, The prohibition against altering the succession, which occurred very shortly before the clause relating to sales and debts. In these circumstances, the irritant clause declaring that if any heir "shall act and do in the contrary of the provision above set forth, or shall do any deed, directly or indirectly,

---

<sup>1</sup> Jan. 15, 1799 (15539); Barclay, May 18, 1821 (1 Shaw's Appeal Cases, 141).
<sup>2</sup> Menzies, Nov. 17, 1807 (F.C. and 2 Dow's Appeal Cases, 141).

168. whereby the order of succession above specified may be anyways altered, 1837. &c. such acts shall be void," &c. was directly applicable, 1st, To the whole 1844. immediately preceding clause providing as to the prohibition of sales and of debts; and, 2d, To the anterior clause providing as to the prohibition against altering the succession. And if so, all the essential prohibitions were duly fenced. And it became evident that this was the true and necessary import of the clause, on observing what were the other clauses of the deed preceding the irritant. There was, first, the rule of succesion established excluding heirs-portioners, which was merely a qualification of the destination; then an injunction to bear the name and arms, to which an irritant clause was inapplicable, and which had a separate resolutive clause immediately attached to it; and next a provision against altering the succession, followed by a declaratory qualification (which last did not form a distinct provision by itself), that the estate was to be possessed under no title but the entail. In these circumstances, the word "provision" in the irritant clause was not only naturally applicable to the clause providing as to prohibitions against sales, and against debts, as being immediately precedent to it, but such was the inevitable application of the irritant clause if fairly or soundly construed. But separately, if it was held that "provision" did not especially apply to the provision last above-mentioned, but had a more detached meaning, then it ought to be construed as applicable generally to the whole preceding conditions, as forming the "provision," or subject-matter of provision, "above set forth."

The Lord Ordinary reported the cases."

* "NOTE.—In construing entails, two maxims are usually referred to, unfortunately not well defined or very consistent, and according as the one or the other is allowed to prevail, the result is different. One maxim is that entails are stric-tissimi jura, and must receive a rigorous interpretation in favour of liberty, and against restriction, and therefore, that the intention of the entailor to fetter is not to be regarded, unless it be expressed in apt and accurate terms. Under the authority of this maxim, an obvious and undoubted clerical omission, and even an error merely of syntax in the structure of a sentence, has been held sufficient to cut down the deed. The opposite maxim is that entails are entitled, as it is commonly expressed, to fair play: relying on which they have been supported even in the case of a real ambiguity: for example, the colloquial has been preferred to the technical sense of a term; or, of two technical senses, that which is rare and unfrequent to that which is in general use; or a phrase has been limited, or extended, to give effect to apparent intention. The current of our decisions, for the last sixty years, affords instances of both modes of construction too frequent and familiar to require citation here. The consequence has been that, notwithstanding the immense number of cases which have been decided, little, if any, progress has been made in settling the law on this point, and actions like the present are still of daily occurrence.

"It would have saved much time and trouble, and have been of great service to entailed proprietors, and those who contract with them, if the statute 1665, while it left the conditions of entails, that is, the prohibitions and injunctions, to the will of the maker, had prescribed an exact formula for the machinery, that is, for the irritant and resolute clauses, which give the restrictions effect. And it

LORD GILLIES.—I entirely concur in the observations made by the Lord Ordinary in his note, but his Lordship has not stated what was his own opinion of
 No. 16:
 Feb. 21, 18
 Speld v. Sp

is to be regretted, when the evil became apparent, that a rule of that nature had not been introduced either by the legislature or in practice, by which these clauses might have been rendered as fixed and definite as an instrument of sasine, or the execution of a messenger. As it is, entailers, in nowise deterred by the consequences of inaccuracy, and the uncertainty of the law, go on, each following his own style, or the style suggested at the moment, and there is no end of litigation with regard to lands under this tenure.

"In this case there is a striking specimen of one of these blundered deeds. First, There are clauses by which heirs-portioners are excluded, and the name and arms of the family are required to be used. These are followed by a misplaced resolute, but by no irritant clause. But however clumsy and informal the deed may be, so far, perhaps, there is no material defect. Next, there is a prohibition to alter the order of succession, and then an injunction to possess under the tailzie exclusively; and this is followed by a complex clause, prohibiting, 1st, Alienation; 2dly, Contraction of debt; and, 3dly, The doing any other deed, civil or criminal, by which the estate may be evicted or adjudged. After these conditions, an irritant and resolute clause are introduced to enforce them. The resolute clause is very broad, for it extends to the person contravening "in any of the particulars above specified," which may therefore include any one previous condition in the entail, though taken in that sense it is in so far superfluous, since a preceding resolute clause had protected the exclusion of heirs-portioners, and the use of the name and arms.

"The whole question, therefore, turns on the irritant clause in which there is an undoubted ambiguity; for, after the complex clause of prohibition against sale, contraction of debt, and other acts, civil and criminal, by which the estate may be evicted, it is declared, 'that if the persons above named, or the persons succeeding to them in the said lands and estates in virtue of these presents, shall act and do in the contrary of the provision above set forth, or shall do any deed, directly or indirectly, whereby the order of succession above specified may be anyways altered, innovated, or changed, then, and in any of the said cases, all and every one of such acts and deeds, with all that shall happen to follow or may follow thereon, shall ipso facto be void and null.' Here an alteration of the order of succession, prohibited in a clause preceding the complex clause, is well and aptly annulled; but with regard to the prohibitions in the complex clause itself, it is doubtful whether all, or which of the three is contemplated. All of them are in ordinary and proper style, distinct and substantive provisions, and therefore, an irritancy directed against a provision in the singular number, may apply to one only. If, therefore, the maxim of rigorous construction in favour of freedom is adopted, this ambiguity would sustain the pursuer's plea. If, on the contrary, the term 'provision' is to be construed according to what may be fairly assumed to have been the entailor's meaning, it will comprehend all the three prohibitions in the complex clause. In support of the first view, it is farther argued, that in this case all reference to intention is particularly inadmissible, the deed being blundered in every part; for a series of provisions follow the irritant and resolute clause, with no fence or protection whatever. It is plain, therefore, that the person who framed it, was entirely ignorant of what he was about. On the contrary, the defender pleads that the separation of the conditions into distinct clauses, each beginning with the words 'declaring,' or 'providing and declaring,' necessarily implies that each clause, however complex, is to be held but as one declaration, or as one provision.

"The Lord Ordinary has reported the cause, that the Court may determine which of the two maxims ought to prevail in this case, and, if possible, to substitute some more definite and certain rule for the interpretation of

163. the cause, and I have seldom or never found it more difficult to form one, upon grounds satisfactory to myself. There are two principles of construction, very different from each other, which, at various times, have been applied to entails, in a manner which has had a great effect in throwing loose the law of entail. One of these is, that entails are strictissimi juris, and must be construed with all rigour; the other is, that they are to be construed so that their provisions shall have fair play. It is certainly difficult to reconcile these principles, and although in the House of Lords it has been held that they are reconcilable, I am not able so to deal with them. Either principle may be adopted which the Court on full consideration may esteem the true principle of construction, provided always that the other principle be rejected; but both together cannot be simultaneously applied to the construction of any given deed, according to any rules which I am capable of understanding. If I am taught by the decisions of this Court and the House of Lords, that entails are strictissimi juris, then I cannot construe them so as to give fair play, as it is termed, to the intentions of the entailer, however apparent, if not effectually and aptly expressed: and, although, with some hesitation, owing to the conflict of judgments on this point, I still think that such is the true rule of construction according to the old established law of Scotland respecting entails, and that any precedents of an opposite sort in the decisions of the House of Lords have been of a limited or special nature, at least in so far as not to have the effect of abolishing that rule of construction, and substituting the opposite in its stead. I shall therefore adopt it, in trying the validity of the present entail, and it is decisive of the question. The words of the entail as to this point are very short. The irritant clause declares, that if any heir "shall act and do in the contrary of the provision above set forth, or shall do any deed directly or indirectly, whereby the order of succession above specified may be anyways altered, &c.," all such acts and deeds shall be null and void.

The question, therefore, is as to the true legal effect and import of the word "provision." Does it include, and necessarily include, more than one of the previous conditions of the entail? Does it include each and all of the previous prohibitions, at least all of those which are directed against selling the estate, and against burdening it, and against doing any other deed whereby the estate might be evicted? That it was the intention of the entailer so to apply the irritancy I have no doubt, and, if fair play was to be allowed to an entail, to the effect of construing it according to the intention of the entailer, then perhaps the term "provision," in the irritant clause, might be taken in a collective sense. That would be a liberal and enlarged interpretation of it, according to what was intended by the entailer. But upon the sound principle, that entails are strictissimi juris, I cannot so construe it. I must hold the word "provision" to be limited to some one of the previous prohibitions exclusively, but which of them I cannot tell. In the defender's case, I see he quotes various decisions in which the House of Lords gave a liberal construction to entails, by way of giving them fair play; but in one of the most recent cases, that of Hoddam, that House recurred to the principle of strict and rigorous construction. I hold it to be the true doctrine of the law of Scotland, and that there are numerous decisions of our Courts, and of the House of Lords also, in which that principle of construction has been recognised, to the effect of defeating the plainest intentions of the entailer, wherever the fettering clauses were not aptly expressed and applied. That then is the principle of construction which I conceive ought to be applied to this deed, because, al not unsettled by some of the decisions of the House of Lords, it has never returned, and that house has lately recurred to it. And, applying it to all, I am of opinion, on the whole, that it is invalid.

No. 16
Feb. 21, 18
Spald v. Sp

PRESIDENT.—I feel that this is a case of much difficulty, and that I am unable to form an opinion respecting it, in such a manner as to be satisfactory to myself. But I am not prepared to hold that the awkward structure of this such as to render it ineffectual. I perceive that, in the resolute clause, as are, “that the person so contravening in any of the particulars above” shall lose all right to the estate. These words appear to be broad in themselves to render the resolute clause applicable to each and all of the prohibitions. But I think that as these words, “so contravening,” refer to the contraventions specified in the irritant clause, and can refer to else, the effect of the words “so contravening in any of the particulars specified” is nearly tantamount to a declaration of the sense in which the provision” is used in the irritant clause which immediately precedes. And to be extremely difficult to read that word “provision” excepting in that sense, which seems to be unequivocally affixed to it by the relative words “contravening,” &c. in the resolute clause. If the word “provision” be so the entail is good, and I am of opinion that it is so; but I am far from saying that my opinion is a decided one.

MACKENZIE.—I think the question turns on the terms of the irritant alone; and, although I have found some difficulty in making up my opinion, I consider that the irritant clause is defective, and the entail therefore invalid. The irritant clause declares the nullity of the deeds of any person “who shall do in the contrary of the provision above set forth, or shall do any directly or indirectly, whereby the order of succession may be altered,” &c. of these two cases, viz. the contravention of “the provision above set forth” and the prohibition against altering the succession, the irritancy is to strike. The question is, to what extent is the irritancy thereby applied? The defender contends, 1st, that the word “provision” is to be taken abstractly, as tantamount to “matter of provision,” which is generally above set forth. But I can regard that interpretation as consistent with strict construction, or with a liberal construction whatever. I think it cannot be the true meaning of the entail. Had it been so, he would not have followed it up by a specific irritancy, but by the prohibition against altering the succession; for, that prohibition was the general matter of provision in the preceding part of the deed, and if the member of the irritant clause had fenced the whole matter of provision, including the prohibition against altering the succession, the entailer would have specially fenced that prohibition in the very next line of the deed. Besides, I do not regard it as consistent with the technical language of our law to interpret the word “provision” in this extensive sense. But the defender contends, 2dly, that without extending the word “provision” back through all the conditions, it must be specially applicable to the whole clause which immediately precedes the irritant clause. That preceding clause contains a prohibition against selling the lands; against burdening them with debt; and against doing any other deed, civil or criminal, whereby the lands might be aliened. And the defender maintains that all this is duly fenced, because the irritant clause, “the provision above set forth,” must apply to that which is last above set forth, and moreover apply to all the

63. members of it. I can assent to neither the one nor the other of these propositions. 1837. The immediately preceding clause contains several distinct provisions, especially those two, respecting sales, and respecting debts, which are of vital importance. Spald. In the irritant clause, therefore, I cannot read "contrary to the provision above set forth," as extending to these several important provisions. Even if the word had been "contrary to the provision last above set forth," I could not have done so, but must have held it to be restricted to the last only of the prohibitions in the preceding clause; and the word "last" is one which is not in the deed, and which I have no right to insert in it. As the irritant clause stands, I can only read the first member of it as importing that it strikes at some one or other of the provisions above set forth, but which of them I cannot tell. I consider this to be the necessary result of adopting a strict construction of this entail in place of a liberal one. For I concur with Lord Gillies that the great question lies there. I adopt the strict construction, and I reject the liberal one. That is the old doctrine of the law of Scotland, as laid down by all our lawyers. And although there are some decisions of this Court and of the House of Lords which are at variance with it, these have not had the effect of abrogating our old law; they merely constitute exceptions to the general rule, and do not go the length of reversing that rule altogether. In regard to what is termed a liberal interpretation, or what is called giving fair play to the deed, or whatever other more palatable name may be given to the rule of construction which is opposed to strictness, I cannot adopt it in administering the law of entail. And, adopting the rule of strict construction, I consider that this entail is not good.

LORD COREHOUSE.—There are two modes of interpretation, between which it is necessary to choose, in construing entails. According to the first, entails are strictissimi juris, and are rigorously construed; according to the second they are to receive fair play, which, though a colloquial expression, is a very significant one, and is not of novel introduction into our Courts, as it was used nearly a century ago by my Lord Monboddo. If the first rule be adopted, its principle operates in this way, that if a term or phrase be found in an entail, which term or phrase has two meanings, the Court must select that meaning which is in favour of the liberty, and against fetters. There are many cases in entail law which afford striking illustrations of the application of this rule, especially the well-known case of Dunbreath. The term "heir" has two significations; it includes a party who takes up an estate by succession, and by service, for instance; and it may also include both in technical and colloquial language, a party who takes an estate as institute. There are various authorities to that effect. Balfour says, if a procuratory of resignation be granted for the purpose of infesting an apparent heir, in the fee of the lands contained in the procuratory, that person, so taking the estate, may, after the grantor's death, be called "as heir," in the actions referred to in that part of Balfour.<sup>1</sup> So that the term "heir" is expressly used there as applicable to a party who was the institute. Another illustration occurs in the case of Gordon of Carlton, reported by Lord Kilkerran, where the entailer disposed his estate not to himself, but to the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to John Gordon, and his heirs-male; whom failing, to Nathaniel Gordon. The succession opened to this last party as the conditional institute, and he made up his title by service as heir of provision to the entail. This was held good ; and whether it was viewed as a declaratory or a transmissory service, it equally showed how far the law of Scotland went in considering an institute in some instances entitled to be technically characterised as an heir. No. 163

<sup>1</sup> Balf. Pract. ancient Warrandice, c. 27 (p. 225, ed. 1754).

Feb. 21, 18
Speld v. Sp

Now, in regard to the species facti of the Duntreath case, although the maker of that deed of entail had undoubtedly regarded his eldest son, the institute, as one among the heirs of entail ; although the entailor's intention was clear and indisputable ; and although the term " heir " had in law a double signification, and, according to one signification, might even technically apply to the eldest son, who was the institute, still, on the principle of strict construction, as the fetters were only laid upon the heirs of entail, and as the word " heir " possessed a distinct and substantive meaning of a more limited sort, the House of Lords held that the fetters were not laid on the institute, the eldest son of the entailor. And the same rule had been applied in the previous case of Erskine.

If that principle of construction is to be applied to the entail of Ardovie now before the Court, I concur with Lords Gillies and Mackenzie, and think the entail is not good. And I could have had no hesitation in applying that principle of construction, but for cases subsequent to that of Duntreath, in which the opposite rule was allowed to govern. Thus, for example, although the term " dispositive " is one, having a definite technical meaning, implying a unilateral deed of alienation ; and although it is essentially different from letting in " lease," which is a personal contract, and out of which contract rights arise of a totally different character from those which arise under a disposition ; yet the House of Lords, in construing the import of a prohibition against dispositions of the entailed estate, have held it to strike at leases, where these leases are of a certain unusual duration. That was held, reversing a judgment of the Court of Session, and it was so held, only in consequence of a departure from the rule of strict construction, and the adoption of an opposite rule. But although this has occasioned some uncertainty as to the true principle of construction to be adopted in regard to entails, I am satisfied that a strict construction is the proper one according to the old and established law of Scotland. And there are some recent cases, such as that of Foddam, in which the House of Lords have adopted that construction. I hold it to be still the rule of our law. And on that account I concur with Lords Gillies and Mackenzie in holding this entail of Ardovie to be defective. Had the words in the irritant clause been " the provision last above-mentioned," there would have been a material difference thereby produced on the import of the irritant clause. But as the words now stand, the term " provision " may apply indifferently to any one of all the provisions above set forth in the entail ; as, for instance, the act of making up titles, not under the entail ; a provision to which irritancy applies, unless it be applied by this very term " provision " in the irritant clause. Then, in regard to the clause immediately preceding the irritant clause, it contains three distinct provisions, two of which are most material, prohibiting respectively sales, and debts. The term " provision " might apply perhaps to either, but certainly not to both of them. The word is evidently ambiguous in its application ; and as that principle of construction must be adopted which is against fetters and in favour of freedom, I am of opinion that this is not a good pronounced this interlocutor :—" Find that the words of the

163. irritant clause of the deed of entail executed by Robert Speid, Esq. on the 10th October, 1791, can neither be extended to comprehend the three prohibitions against sale, the contraction of debt, and the alienation of the succession; nor applied to any one of these prohibitions in particular: Find, that the prohibitions are not therefore guarded in by the statute 1685, c. 22, so as to constitute a valid and effectual prohibition. Therefore repel the defences, and find, decern, and declare in terms of the conclusions of the libel; but find no expenses due to the pursuer."

W. GIBSON, W.S.—FOTHERINGHAM and LINDSAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

164. REV. JOHN FORBES and OTHERS (Kirk-Session of Outer High Church Parish of Glasgow), Pursuers.—D. F. Hope—Moncreiff.
LORD PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, and COUNCIL OF GLASGOW, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Ivory.

Trust—Burgh—Church—School—Title to Pursue—Contract.—1. A donation was vested in the corporation of the town-council of a royal burgh on condition that they were to apply the annual dividends "in the support and maintenance, from time to time, of schools" in the burgh, taught on the kirk-session system; the council made an agreement with the several kirk-sessions of the burgh, binding themselves and their successors to pay over the dividends, among the kirk-sessions, each of whom, on the other hand, became bound to lodge with the council a written vidimus, "showing definitely that the donation was to be strictly applied in the promotion of the system of education proposed by the donor, and accompanied by an obligation binding the kirk-session to the same accordingly;" it was declared that, so long as each kirk-session was "and satisfied the town-council" that the obligation was carried into practical execution, it should have right to its share of the dividend, but should forfeit the right, on failure to fulfil these conditions; provision was made for admitting members of the town-council to the annual examination of the schools, "to themselves of the bona fide and legitimate application of the dividend," and this was done "strictly in terms of the deed of donation;" the town-council in the succeeding year refused to sanction this agreement.—Held that the agreement was not ultra vires of the preceding town-council; that it was no devolution trust, but a judicious mode of carrying it into practical execution; and that it was a valid contract, binding on the town-council, so long as duly implemented by the kirk-sessions. 2. An action was raised by one contracting party to enforce the agreement of a contract against the other; the defenders alleged that the parties were a kirk-session only quoad sacra, and had no title to pursue;—O'Connell repelled.

- Feb. 21, 1837. In 1831, the late Rev. Dr Andrew Bell of Egmore, Prebendary of the Collegiate Church of St Peter, Westminster, by a deed of entail executed between him on the one part, and the Provost of St Andrew and others, on the other part, transferred to them, as trustees, two one of £60,000, three per cent consol. bank annuities, and one of £10,000 three per cent, reduced bank annuities. The deed recited Dr Bell's intention to "take measures for the more effectual diffusion of the Madras system of education" within Scotland. He directed his trustees, after de-

ST DIVISION.
J. Fullerton.
S.

tain sums for expenses, “to divide the said stocks into twelve equal parts, and to transfer one such twelfth part unto the Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of Edinburgh; one other such twelfth part unto the Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of Glasgow,” &c. The deed contained this clause: ‘Provided always, and it is hereby expressly declared, at the respective transfers hereinbefore directed to be made, unto the respective corporations of the Provost, Magistrates, and Town Council of Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Inverness, and Leith, are, respectively, upon this indisputable condition, that the stock to be respectively transferred to the said corporations, be by them, and their respective successors, employed for the founding or maintenance of a school or schools in each of the last mentioned towns, for the instruction of children, whether male or female, or both, in the ordinary branches of education, but so that the tuition at every one of the said schools be upon the system of mutual instruction and moral discipline exemplified in the Madras school, and that every one of the said corporations shall stand possessed of the stock to be transferred to it as aforesaid, upon trust for ever, to apply the dividends, and interest thereof, in the support and maintenance, from time to time, of schools already founded, or hereafter to be founded, on the principles of the foresaid Madras system.’”

It was farther provided, that, on the transfer of the stock to each corporation respectively, “every corporation shall, before any appropriation or application of any part of the foresaid stock, make and execute a declaration and acknowledgment of the acceptance, by such corporation or body, of the several trusts herein declared.” The twelfth share appropriated to the Magistrates and Council of Glasgow was paid to them in the same year, and on receiving it they subscribed a deed of acknowledgment containing this clause: “We do, by these presents, admit, confess, and declare, that the sums which have been transferred for our behoof, as aforesaid, and the proceeds thereof, shall be held and applied by us, and our successors in office, in all time to come, upon or for the trust following, viz. That we, and our successors in office, shall for ever apply the dividends and interest on the aforesaid sums, or of the proceeds thereof, in the support and maintenance, from time to time, of a school or schools, already founded or to be founded, in the city of Glasgow, on the principle of the system of mutual instruction and moral discipline as exemplified in the Madras school, or what is known by the name of the Madras system.” At the same time the Town Council made a “remit to the Magistrates to have an early conference with the Ministers of the ten parishes of Glasgow, with a view to ascertain whether, and how far, Dr Bell’s plan of instruction and discipline, can with propriety be adopted in the parochial schools of this city already erected, or which may be erected.”

After several communications with the Ministers, the Magistrates and ~~the~~ entered into an agreement with each of the ten Kirk-sessions, following agreement with the Kirk-session of the Outer

No. 164
Feb. 21, 183
Forbes v.
Town-Coun
of Glasgow.

34. High Church parish; the direct parties to each agreement being the Lord Provost and a committee of the Council on the one hand, and the Minister and a committee of the kirk-session on the other. "Whereas it has been agreed between the said first party and the several kirk-sessions at Glasgow, that, in order more extensively and effectually to promote the system of education contemplated and prescribed by the Rev. Dr Bell the annual interest and proceeds of the said two sums, now vested in government securities, should be equally divided among, and paid over half-yearly, to the different kirk-sessions. Therefore the said second party as representing the foresaid Outer High Kirk-session, and as taking on them burden as aforesaid, do hereby bind and oblige themselves, and their successors in office, to lodge in writing, with the secretary of the said first party, a distinct vidimus or statement of the proposed application of the proportion of the proceeds, or annual interest, of the said two sums, falling to be paid to the said second party, showing definitely that the same is to be strictly applied in the promotion of the system of education proposed by the donor, the Rev. Dr Bell, and accompanied by an obligation, binding the Kirk-session to apply the same accordingly, declaring, as it is hereby provided and declared, that so long as the said second party shall continue to furnish an annual state or vidimus and obligation before mentioned, and shall, from year to year, satisfy the said first party, that the same have been followed out and carried into practical execution, the said second party, and their successors in office, shall be entitled to draw the proportion before-mentioned of the foresaid annual interest, or proceeds, from the said first party; but in the event of the said second party failing to lodge the said annual vidimus and obligation, or failing to satisfy the said first party of the same having been carried into effect, they shall forfeit their right to their proportion of the said interest and annual proceeds falling to be paid to the said Kirk-session, and the said first party shall be entitled to apply the same as fully and freely as if these presents had never been executed. Farther, the said second party bind and oblige themselves, and their successors in office, to hold annual examinations of the schools to be established and maintained, either partially or totally, by the proportion of the interest or annual proceeds payable to them as before-mentioned, and to give to the secretary of the said first party, at least six days previous notice of the time fixed for that purpose, so that the said first party, one or more of them, may have an opportunity of attending said examinations, and becoming satisfied of the bona fide and legitimate application of the foresaid annual interest or proceeds, and particularly that the same are applied agreeably to these presents, and strictly in terms of the deed of donation executed in favour of the said first party, by the said Rev. Dr Bell."

These agreements were dated on 16th and 28th Oct. 1833, being the period which intervened between Michaelmas of that year, which was the date when the ordinary annual election of Magistrates and Council the old system would have taken place, and the date of completing a new election in November following, under the Burgh Reform Act, 3 and 4 Wil. IV. c. 76. During this intermediate space, the powers of the Magistrates and Council were prolonged by § 18 of that act. In a few days after signing the agreement, a vidimus, in the same terms as the following, was lodged by each of the ten Kirk-sessions with the Magistrates and Council. “ In terms of the contract entered into between the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council of Glasgow, on the one hand, and the Session of

No. 1
Feb. 21,
Forbes v.
Town-Council
of Glasgow

on the other, of date the 1833.

“ The said Session hereby undertake, that there shall be conducted, under their inspection, a school or schools for teaching English Reading, Grammar, and Religious Knowledge, with such other branches of education as may be required ; said school or schools to be divided into classes, over each of which a monitor shall preside, and under the charge of a master or masters appointed by the said Session, and for whom they shall be responsible ; and that the sum of, at least, £50 shall be expended in instituting and carrying on said school or schools, during the period of twelve months from this date.”

The whole income of the donation was then £293, 14s. 11d., affording £29, 7s. 5d. to each of the ten Sessions, and this sum was immediately paid to each of them. Two of the ten parishes, the Outer High Church parish, and the College Church parish, did not introduce into their respective parish schools the Madras system of education, but they formed a common school which was not situated within either parish, but in the parish of St David's, at which education was conducted in terms of the vidimus above quoted. The Magistrates and Council, who were elected in Nov. 1833, under the new system, declined to continue to make annual payment of the dividends to the Sessions, alleging that the ten agreements amounted to a devolution of the trust. The terms of the arrangement were then explained, on the part of the Kirk-sessions, to the Provost of St Andrews and others, Dr Bell's general trustees, who, in March 1835, passed a unanimous resolution that the contract “ was in perfect accordance with the spirit and letter of the said deed of indenture, and of the deed of declaration of trust, executed by the Magistrates and Council of Glasgow, in reference to it, and the meeting have no hesitation in giving it as their opinion, that the arrangement entered into betwixt the said parties provides for and secures a most judicious application of the money.” In June, 1835, the Minister and Kirk-session of the Outer High Church parish in Glasgow raised an action against the Magistrates and Council, alleging that they (pursuers) and the other Kirk-sessions had made considerable expenditure, and had also made a great change in the system of teaching in the parochial schools, on the faith of the contract of 1833, and concluding to have the defenders implement it by paying to them their tenth share of the which had accrued, or should thereafter accrue on the

14. fund "in all time coming, so long as the pursuers should fulfil and observe their part of the said contract."

237. No vidimus had been lodged subsequently to 1833; but during the dependence of this action, a vidimus for each succeeding year, in similar terms to the first, was put into process.

Defences were lodged which stated, inter alia, that the whole of Glasgow was truly one parish quoad civilia, though subdivided into ten segments or sub-parishes quoad sacra. On this ground they objected to the title to pursue for implement of such a civil contract as that founded on; besides defending on the merits. A record was made up, and Cases were ordered.

Pleaded by the Pursuers—

1. The pursuers were the parties with whom the contract had been entered into, which was now the ground of action. They were therefore entitled to compel implement of that contract, against the other contracting party. And independently of this, their title to pursue could be shown, if necessary, to be as good as that of the Kirk-session of any parish whatever.

2. There was no delegation of the trust, but merely a judicious mode of executing it, exemplified in the contract founded on. The obligation undertaken by the Town Council, on receiving the trust-fund, was to apply the dividends in the support and maintenance of schools in Glasgow on the Madras system. Ample discretionary powers as to the details of executing this trust were conferred on the trustees. And it was consistent with a fair and judicious exercise of these powers, to contract with the ministers of the ten parishes to pay over the dividends annually to them, to be applied, under their more immediate superintendence, in maintaining schools taught on this system. The Kirk-sessions had bound themselves that the schools should be so taught, and that the Magistrates and Council should have the fullest satisfaction on this head, by being present at the annual examinations of the schools and otherwise; and so soon as this condition was not fulfilled by any of the Kirk-sessions, its right to a share of the fund was forfeited, and the dividend thenceforward remained in the hands of the Town Council. All this was consistent with the power and duty of the trustees, and the arrangement had been expressly approved of by those parties with whom Dr Bell had entered into the deed of indenture, and who were well qualified to judge of his true intentions.

3. The terms of the vidimus, and relative obligation, sufficiently satisfied the requirements of the trust.

4. The contract was valid, although any of the Kirk-sessions might withdraw at pleasure, because they could only do so, on forfeiting all right and interest in the dividends. And in the mean time the pursuers had made considerable expenditure, and had instituted a school on the faith of the contract.

5. Although the pursuers were bound "to satisfy" the de ey applied the funds in terms of the deed of donation, this was done by No. 164.

 dging the vidimus, and giving notice of the school examinations, and Feb. 21, 183 enerally implementing the contract; all which had been done. And Forbes v.
 ter the expense to which the pursuers had been put, and the arrange- Town-Counc of Glasgow.
 ents they had made, the defenders were bound to condescend upon some sative and relevant ground of dissatisfaction before they could withhold yment.

6. There were no specialties in the case which could affect the deci-on of it. Though the agreement was concluded so recently before the ntroduction of the new system of burgh election, it had been in progress ng before; and the powers of the Town-Council were as great in very respect at that date, as at any former period. The circumstance f two parishes having but one school, was not of any moment, as it was o essential condition of the agreement with the Town-Council that here should be a separate school in each parish. There was no im-roper failure to lodge a vidimus. It was only delayed in consequence f the Town-Council refusing to pay the annual dividend. It had now een lodged in this process, and would in future continue to be so. And he system of education, conducted in terms of that vidimus, was that required by Dr Bell's trust.

Pleaded by the Defenders—

1. There was no parish of the Outer High Church, in Glasgow, posessing a civil status or persona standi. It existed quoad sacra only.
 uch a body could not validly enter into the contract founded on: and it ad no title to pursue for implement of it.

2. The stock was vested in the defenders as a corporation, "upon rust, for ever, to apply the dividends and interest thereof, in the suport and maintenance, from time to time, of schools" on the Madras ystem. They alone were confided in by the truster Dr Bell to support and maintain the schools with the funds committed to their charge.
 Under this trust they possessed the absolute right of patronage in electing such teachers as they preferred; the absolute control in determining what should be the teacher's salary; what should be the amount of fees exigible in different branches of knowledge; what ordinary branches should be taught: and how far it might be prudent to give gratis education to the poorer classes. All these and other similar powers of control were essential to secure the efficiency of the schools, and were inherent in the trust, as conferred on the corporation by the truster; but none of them remained to the corporation under the contract in question. It therefore amounted to a delegation of the trust, which was ultra vires and invalid.

3. The specification in the vidimus being merely of "English Reading, Grammar, and Religious Knowledge, with such other branches as are required," was too indefinite, as the deed of indenture required to embrace generally "the ordinary branches of educa-

1837. 64. tion : " and the defenders had no power of adding any of the other ordinary branches to those above specified, if the contract was sustained. And farther, the vidimus merely provided that a monitor should preside over each class ; which was neither in terms, nor in substance, providing, as required by the deed of indenture for " the Madras system " of education.

4. There was no binding contract. Any of the Kirk-sessions might withdraw at pleasure, on merely forfeiting its share of the dividend. It ought to be equally in the power of the defenders to withdraw at pleasure, on merely liberating the Kirk-sessions from all obligation to lodge a vidimus, or apply the dividend in terms of the contract.

5. The pursuers were expressly bound " to satisfy " the defenders that the dividends were applied " strictly in terms of the deed of donation," and as the defenders were not satisfied of this, but convinced of the contrary, that alone was enough to entitle them to withhold all farther payment of dividends.

6. As the contract had been completed on the very eve of the expiry of the powers of the Town Council, chosen under the old system, there was no hardship in setting it aside as ultra vires, provided there were good grounds in law for holding it to be so. The fact of there being but one school between the Outer High Church and the College Church parishes, in place of a school in each parish, was contrary to the understanding upon which the contract had been made, especially as that school was not situated within either of these two parishes. And no vidimus had been lodged after 1833, until after the present action was raised. The contract, therefore, had not been duly implemented by the pursuers, and they had forfeited their right and interest in it.

The Lord Ordinary " repelled the objection to the title of the pursuers ; and, on the merits, found that the agreement libelled between the Magistrates and Town Council of Glasgow on the one hand, and the pursuers on the other, cannot be held as a valid execution of the trust created in them by the deed of the late Dr Bell, but truly imports a devolution of that trust on the pursuers, for such time as the pursuers choose to undertake it ; that such agreement on the part of the Magistrates and Town Council for the time was ultra vires, and cannot bind their successors in office : Therefore assoilzied the defenders from the general conclusion, that, in all time coming, the part or share of the annual interest or dividend libelled shall be paid over to the pursuers ; but appointed the case to be enrolled, that parties may be farther heard on the pursuer's claims for reimbursement, out of the annual interest or dividends falling due since the date of the agreement, of any expense that may have been incurred by them in the maintenance or establishment of a school or schools conducted in terms of that agreement, and decerned." *

* " NOTE.—Whatever may be the peculiarity of the constitution of pursuers reclaimed.

No. 164.

GILLIES.—I entertain very great doubt as to this interlocutor. On looking at the terms on which this fund was vested in the town-council, it is stated in

Feb. 21, 1837.
Forbes v.
Town-Council
of Glasgow.

of the Outer High Church of Glasgow, and of the other Kirk-sessions of the city, the Lord Ordinary has no doubt that the members of that Kirk-session, the parties with whom the alleged contract was entered into, have a title to the present action, seeking to enforce it. But, upon the merits, the Lord Ordinary thinks the action cannot be sustained.

The deed of indenture entered into between the late Dr Bell, and the persons who may be called his general trustees, the Magistrates and Town Council appointed trustees for the special purpose of establishing or maintaining the Madras system in the city of Glasgow. The words of the trust are general; and the Lord Ordinary thinks that these trustees had full power to bind themselves and their successors in office, in all contracts entered into in pursuance or furtherance of the objects of the trust. Accordingly, it rather seems to him, that a contract, binding themselves to pay annually, the whole, or a portion of the dividends, or interest, under their management, to the pursuers, or to any public body or individual having the power to undertake, and absolutely binding, for the permanent establishment or maintenance of a school, taught on the Madras system, would have been a valid exercise of their power as trustees. If, by a transaction with parties invested with the management of an existing school, they could, at a comparatively small annual expense, have permanently secured the conducting of that school on the Madras system, such transaction would have evidently been a fair and most advantageous act of administration. The agreement libelled is one of a very different kind. The Kirk-session of the Outer High Church, and the other Kirk-sessions, have no powers to undertake any obligation, nor do they profess to undertake it by the alleged contract on the ground of the present action. While, on the one hand, the Magistrates and Town Council irrevocably bind themselves to make over, in all time coming, the whole dividends and interests, in certain proportions, to the Kirk-session of the city of Glasgow, the pursuers, and those other Kirk-sessions, only bound to furnish annually a 'vidimus,' showing that those shares of the dividends and interests are to be applied in the promotion of the system of education proposed by the donor, Dr Bell, which vidimus shall contain an obligation binding on them to apply such annual payments accordingly. And the only consequence of failure to furnish that 'vidimus,' and to satisfy the other party of the same, has been carried into effect, is, that the Kirk-sessions, or Kirk-session that fails, forfeit their right under the contract, and that the Magistrates and Council are entitled to apply the funds so forfeited as if the said contract never had been entered into.

The Lord Ordinary cannot hold this to be a contract. The only obligation on the pursuers, and the other Kirk-sessions, is to apply funds, to be annually placed in their hands, 'in the promotion of the system of education proposed by the donor,' being just the general obligation imposed by the trust; and, in this view, the pursuers do not disguise that they claim a very considerable latitude. They fairly state, in their condescendence, that it is neither required in the contract or the vidimus, that a school or schools should be established in each parish. In short, they assert, under the transaction, a permanent right to a certain portion of the trust revenue, under the single obligation of applying it to the objects of the trust, and that only so long as they choose to undertake the duty. It seems to the Lord Ordinary that this is not a contract, in the proper sense of the word, but truly a delegation of the powers of the corporation, a substitution of the fund, to be vested in the ten Kirk-sessions of the city of Glasgow, for that established by Dr Bell. Whether or not the attempted transaction is a more beneficial employment of the fund is a different question,

184. the deed of conveyance in their favour to be, that they may employ it for founding or maintaining a school or schools in Glasgow, where the ordinary branches of education are to be taught, but so that the tuition shall be on the Madras system. On receiving that sum the town-council signed an acknowledgment, and bound themselves, and their successors in office, to apply the dividends "in the support and maintenance, from time to time, of a school or schools already founded or to be founded in the city of Glasgow," on the Madras system. This had in view the endowment of schools already founded, just as much as those which might afterwards be founded, provided that the tuition was according to the Madras system. The parochial system of education in Scotland is one of our institutions which has been universally approved and admired. And it would appear that the Town Council of Glasgow in 1831, as soon as they received this money, made a resolution to the magistrates to ascertain "how far Dr Bell's plan of instruction and discipline, can with propriety be adopted in the parochial schools of Glasgow already erected or which may be erected." I approve entirely of that resolution of the Town Council; and I think if they had thought fit to rely exclusively on their own opinion in regard to this matter, without taking such a step as this, they would have made a great omission. Then the various Kirk-sessions and the magistrates are of opinion that the application of Dr Bell's donation may be made available to the existing parochial schools, consistently with the conditions of Dr Bell's trust. And they enter into a contract for carrying the trust into execution in that manner. In doing so, I think there was no devolution of the trust, no transference to a third party, of the requisite control over the application of the trust fund. The Kirk-session became bound to lodge with the trustees a written vidimus stating the proposed application of the dividend, "showing definitely that the same is to be strictly applied in the promotion of the system of education proposed by the donor Dr Bell, and accompanied by an obligation binding the Kirk-session to apply the same accordingly." This is to be annually done, and so long as the Kirk-session do this, and satisfy the trustees that this obligation is duly carried into practical execution, they are to be entitled to the payment of these dividends. It is said there is no sufficient contract, as the Kirk-sessions may cease to implement the part when they please. I can scarcely suppose it to be meant that any penalty in case of such failure should have entered into this contract; but a very sufficient provision is made on the subject, for, so soon as such failure shall occur, it is to infer the forfeiture of all right to any future share of the dividend, which will thereon be in the hands of the Town Council. I am at a loss to know what other or better stipulation could have been made than this. I hold it an effectual con-

but that question has been determined by the truster himself, whose will must, in this particular, be the law.

"Holding this opinion, the Lord Ordinary thinks the general conclusion of the action, that a particular proportion of the annual dividends shall be paid to the pursuers in all time coming, cannot be sustained. But there may be a question, whether the pursuers, if they have maintained a school on the Madras system since the agreement was entered into, may not be entitled to some reimbursement for any expense thence incurred, out of the annual interests or dividends fallen due since the date of the agreement, and now in the hands of the defenders; and as this question has been hitherto little, if at all, touched upon by the parties, the Lord Ordinary has directed the case to be enrolled for further argument on this subject before finally disposing of the cause."

as long as it is fulfilled, the true objects of the trust will be attained No. 164 by the instrumentality of the Kirk-sessions; but, so soon as any of them fail, the dividend of that Kirk-session will remain forfeited, and in the Feb. 21, 18 the Town Council to be by them applied in furtherance of the trust. I Strachan v. that such a contract is a devolution of the trust, or in violation of the Edinburgh think it is a judicious mode of executing the trust. And it is satisfactory Improvement that it was so viewed by the general trustees of Dr Bell, who approved Commission the management, when its details were communicated to them. I concur in the which they expressed. And I may notice, that, at the date when the Magis-Council of Glasgow entered into this contract, they held their office by legal tenure, and with all the powers of any Town Council of Glasgow; indeed being, as at that particular date, derived from the same Burgh under which the defenders have since been elected. If the Kirk-ses-fulfil their part of the contract, the defenders will obtain redress in a 7. But they will require to show that they have good reason to be dish the management of the Kirk-sessions before they can hold themselves from this contract; and as nothing of that sort has been instructed, I Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and decree pronounced the libel.

OREHOUSE.—I am of the same opinion.

RESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot see how the Magis-Council could themselves take a personal superintendence of the schools.
 k the most judicious mode has been adopted of carrying this trust into ion.

ACKENZIE.—If a bona fide statement was made and proved that there rture by the Kirk-session from the provisions of Bell's trust, it would be case. But, as that cannot be done here, I concur with your Lordship.

COURT then recalled the interlocutor, repelled the defences, and decernin terms of the libel, with expenses.

W. YOUNG, W.S.—CAMPBELL and MACDOWALL, W.S.—Agents.

HE STRACHAN, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford.—J. Anderson. No. 165 GH IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS, Defenders.—D. F. Hope
 —G. Grant.

ion—Clause—Statute.—An Act of Parliament was passed for carrying certain improvements in the city of Edinburgh, and, inter alia, for level-at which was in the line thereof; by an operation on this street the pave-lowered in front of one of the shops:—Held that a claim for damages at s of the proprietor of the shop was competent against the Commissioners act, although there was no provision in it for compensation in such a the alleged damage was necessarily consequential on the operation by it.

act of the 7th and 8th Geo. IV., commonly called the Edinburgh Feb. 21, 18 Act, certain Commissioners are appointed for carrying into 2d DIVISION movements" upon the city of Edinburgh, and, inter alia, Lord Jeffr
 T.

165. for "levelling" Bank Street, this being one of the streets in the line of the improvements. Power is given to the Commissioners to assess the inhabitants generally, and to assess at a higher rate the proprietors and tenants of houses or shops situated in the districts to be more immediately benefited by the execution of the improvements." By sect. 35 it is provided that corporations, heirs of entail, and other parties not entitled at common law to alienate or deal upon heritage in their possession, shall have power to convey such property, "and also to treat and agree with the said Commissioners for any damages alleged to be sustained in carrying into effect any of the purposes of this act." By sect. 36 it is enacted, that if any person or persons, bodies politic, &c. being proprietors or occupiers of lands and houses "which may be required for the purposes of this act, shall refuse to treat, contract, or agree to sell the same, or to settle the damages in respect of the same as aforesaid," the Sheriff of Edinburgh, or his substitute, shall, upon application from the Commissioners or their clerk, summon a jury, and so try the matter in dispute.

By the act 1st and 2d Will. IV., c. 45, (amending the preceding act) it is enacted (§ 44) on the narrative that in the course of executing the improvements, it may happen that lands, houses, tenements, or other heritages or parts thereof, of comparatively small value, may be required from the owners or occupiers thereof, for the purposes of the act, and "damage of a comparatively trifling nature may be thereby done or supposed to be done," to such owners or occupiers or to their properties, and the ascertaining of such damage by a jury, would cause an expense exceeding the object at issue,—that therefore if any person or persons, owners or occupiers of houses, &c. of comparatively small value, which may be required for the purposes of the act, shall refuse to treat or settle the damage in respect of the same, or of the injury done, or supposed to be done thereto, the Sheriff shall, upon application from the Commissioners, decern for such damage without a jury.

No express provision is made in either of the acts for compensation to be allowed to a party on the ground of damage done to his property by the operations of the Commissioners.

In August, 1835, the Commissioners commenced an operation on the pavement in front of the shop of the pursuer, Strachan, in Bank Street, whereby the pavement was lowered about 14 inches in front of the door, and also in front of the window, and a flight of three steps, instead of one as before was placed in front of the door. The pavement was increased in breadth about 18 inches along the whole street, which in consequence of the operation was rendered less steep than formerly. Strachan made no opposition at the time to this lowering of the pavement.

Thereafter he raised action against the Commissioners, setting forth their operations in Bank Street, and the alteration caused by them in the condition of his shop, and alleging that his property had been deteriorated in value, in so far as the access to the shop was rendered more diffi-

It, and it had been made to present an awkward and uninviting appearance, and concluding first for a sum of £500 damages, and, alternatively, have the defenders ordained to make application to the Sheriff for summoning a jury in the manner provided by the act, in order to determine the pursuer's claim of damages for the loss and injury sustained by him.

Against this action the Commissioners pleaded the following preliminary defences:—

1. The whole operations by the Commissioners of Improvements being specially authorized by statutes passed for the particular purpose of effecting an improvement in the city and in the locality where they were carried on, and for which improvement the inhabitants (and among others the pursuer) agreed to be assessed, there can be no claim competent against the Commissioners at the instance of any individual, on the ground that the said operations have not benefited and improved, but, on the contrary, have injured and deteriorated his premises.

2. The pursuer is barred, by the consent given, and otherwise, from now claiming damages, since the Commissioners' operations are strictly within the powers intrusted to them.

3. No action of damages against the Commissioners is competent in the Court of Session, as there is conferred on the Sheriff of the county of Edinburgh, with the assistance of a jury, an exclusive jurisdiction to settle all differences between the Commissioners and those who have claims against them on the alleged ground of damages. The conclusion in the summons, that the Commissioners should be decerned and ordained to make application to the Sheriff of the county for summoning a jury, is altogether incompetent under this action.

As a peremptory defence the Commissioners pleaded that the pursuer had no claim for compensation against the Commissioners, because his property, on the whole, in place of being injured and deteriorated, was greatly increased in value, by the operation of lowering and levelling Bank Street.

In support of these defences it was, inter alia, maintained that at common law there could be no claim for consequential damage in an action such as the present against public trustees,<sup>1</sup> and the statutes in question recognised no such claim as competent, the only case for which compensation was provided by the acts being that of property required for the purposes thereof, and the injury alleged in the summons being strictly consequential on the operations requisite for lowering Bank Street which were thereby authorised and directed.

Strachan in answer maintained generally, that there was nothing in the clauses of the acts, or in the circumstances of the case, which could render his claim for damages incompetent.

---

<sup>1</sup> Bolton v. Crowther (2 Barnwell and Cresswell, 703).

165. The Lord Ordinary "repelled the preliminary defences," and added to his interlocutor the subjoined note.*

1837.

R. v.

Fish

Market

Chambers.

* "Assuming (as must be assumed hoc statu) that actual damage has been sustained, the Lord Ordinary conceives that the two first preliminary defences are palpably untenable. Because the statute recognises the operations which it authorizes as generally beneficial to the city, and properly to be considered as improvements, and because the pursuer (along with the great body of the citizens) has consented to their being carried into effect, can it be seriously maintained that this is inconsistent with the certain fact of their having been the cause of great damage to him individually? Or that, if, in the course of levelling the adjoining street, the defenders had actually brought his house to the ground, they would have been entitled to answer his claim for reparation of the damage by saying, 'What, do you talk of damage? We have done nothing but what you yourself recognised as a benefit. Have you not allowed that levelling the street was an improvement? and as we have done nothing else, instead of claiming damages from us, you are bound to pay us an additional assessment.' It appears to the Lord Ordinary, that if this would be but poor pleasantry, it is still worse as argument, yet it is exactly what is stated in those two defences, the defenders having actually founded upon the additional assessment to which the pursuer is liable, by having his house in this street, as a conclusive proof that he cannot possibly have suffered any damage from their operations in its neighbourhood. The short answer is, that though lowering or widening a street may be a benefit, and chiefly to those in the vicinity, the loss of the property taken to widen it, and the damage done to buildings in the course of lowering, are distinct injuries, for which compensation is due: And as the defenders are confessedly bound to pay the value of the property taken for widening, they must also repair the damage occasioned by lowering, although the claimants, in both cases, may be among those who are liable to a double assessment.

"At the debate those defences were sought to be supported by reference to the clause<sup>1</sup> of the statute beginning at the bottom of p. 22 of the copy in process, and providing that, where the owners or occupiers of lands, houses, &c. 'required for the purposes of the act,' shall refuse to sell such houses, &c. 'or to settle the damages in respect of the same,' the Commissioners may apply to the sheriff to summon a jury, 'who shall give their verdict for such damages, recompense, or price, as they shall judge fit to be awarded for any such lands, houses, &c. for their respective estates or interests in the same, or for any damage done thereto,' from which they inferred, that as the house of the pursuer was not 'required for the purposes of the act,' no damage could in any case be due on account of it. The first remark which occurs upon this is, that whether the clause in question affords a defence to the Commissioners or not, it certainly can never be cited in support of the two special defences that have been mentioned, and, indeed, furnishes per se a conclusive answer to these defences; the scope of those being, that the Commissioners can never be liable in damages at all, while only executing the improvements allowed by the statute, and the clause providing that they shall pay damages as well as prices to those whose property they take or injure in the course of their operations. But the limitation of this claim of damages to such as occur upon properties actually required for the purposes of the act, is not only without any reasonable meaning, but without any meaning at all, and incapable of any practical application. The properties required for the purposes of the act are of course taken by the Commissioners, and become their property. It is manifestly impossible, therefore, for any one else to claim damages for them. The former owners or occupiers are to be compensated by the 'value of their respective estates or interests therein;' but for the damage done thereto, it is utterly in-

<sup>1</sup> Sect. 36.

The Commissioners reclaimed.

No. 165.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am much impressed with the importance of the case of Bolton v. Crowther, and if the claim of Strachan rested on the common law

Feb. 21, 183
Strachan v.
Edinburgh
Improvement
Commissioners

possible that the Commissioners can ever be liable, after they have become themselves proprietors. When pressed with this, the defenders endeavoured to maintain that the right to damages was at least limited to such as were occasioned, though to property not taken, yet in consequence of operations on what was so taken from other individuals ‘for the purposes of the act;’ and, therefore, did not arise here, where their operations were not on such newly acquired property, but upon what had all along been a public street. It is needless, perhaps, to observe, 1st, That there is not a word in the act that gives the least countenance to this construction; and, 2d, That, if adopted, it would lead to consequences the most inequitable and unjust. If a house, not itself taken or required for the purposes of the act, is injured by the operations of the Commissioners upon the ground adjoining, is it imaginable that the owner’s right to reparation should depend upon the fact, whether the adjoining ground had been always a public street, or was an area recently acquired for the purposes of the act from some private individual?

“This, then, it is humbly conceived, cannot be the meaning of the act; and to find out what it truly was, it is only requisite to go back to the immediately preceding section. This, indeed, is the more necessary, as in that on which the defenders rely there is an express reference to something antecedent, the whole of its provisions being for the case of the owners and occupiers refusing to agree to sell their lands, houses, &c. ‘or to settle the damages in respect of the same as aforesaid.’ Now the preceding section<sup>1</sup> (which is at p. 22) states, in the most unequivocal manner, what sort of damages were thus to be settled for. The immediate object of that section is to enable corporations, heirs of entail, tutors, trustees, and other persons not entitled at common law, to alienate or deal upon the heritage in their possession, to transact with the Commissioners under this act; and, accordingly, it expressly empowers all such persons to sell and convey their lands, houses, &c. ‘for the purposes aforesaid, and also to treat and agree with the said Commissioners for any damages alleged to be sustained in carrying into effect any of the purposes of this act.’ These words, it is thought, are quite unequivocal; and they prove two things, 1st, That the damages so to be treated for were not such as might befall the properties which were to be sold to the Commissioners, as to which, indeed, the claim must have been extinguished confusion; and, 2d, That they were not damages occasioned by the improper or unwarranted acts of the said Commissioners beyond the line of their duty (which was another surmise of the defenders), but, in the express words of the clause, ‘any damages occasioned by carrying into effect any of the purposes of this act.’ Now this is the first section in which there is any mention of damages, and is evidently that referred to in the immediately subsequent section, where provision is made, inter alia, for the case of persons not agreeing or refusing ‘to settle the damages’ as ‘aforesaid.’ It is the leading and governing enactment, therefore, on the subject of damages, and in it alone the description of damages for which the legislature intended that compensation should be given, is naturally to be looked for; and this description is as broad and general as the justice and reason of the case would have led any one, a priori, to expect,—‘any damages alleged to be sustained in carrying into effect any of the purposes of this act.’ It provides for the adjustment and settlement of all such damages by voluntary agreement, and

<sup>1</sup> Sect. 35.

185. independent of the statute, I should have doubts as to its relevancy, but I cannot — take up the present case as one at common law. I am satisfied that the argument 1837.

1837.
 1837.
 1837.
 1837.

the next section for the case of parties not being able to agree. The one, therefore, is relative to and complementary of the other; and the Lord Ordinary thinks it indisputable, that they are co-extensive as to the subjects to which they relate, and mean to settle the very same questions,—with reference merely to those two alternatives, of a voluntary or a judicial adjustment. It would be nothing else, indeed, than a manifest absurdity, to hold that persons should be entitled to 'trust for and agree' as to any kind of damages under the first clause, for which they were not entitled in case of disagreement to the verdict of a jury under the second, and, therefore, if the pursuer could have lawfully treated with the defenders for the damages he now seeks to have judicially awarded (which does not seem questionable), it follows that no construction of the second section can be sound which could exclude him from the benefit of such a verdict.

"The wording of that second section, indeed, is not very happy; and there is no doubt that, having chiefly in view the case of properties to be actually purchased and taken by the Commissioners, its language is generally accommodated to that case, even where it speaks of damages, which, it has been already seen, could never possibly accrue or be claimable in relation to such properties. But this verbal inaccuracy or imperfect expression can never be allowed to defeat the plain sense and policy of the act, or so construed as to render it at once a source of inconsistency and an instrument of injustice. Throughout the whole of its provisions, indeed, the language is singularly inaccurate, and, if rigidly construed, would lead, in many other instances, to the same inconsistencies which the defenders would charge upon it in the present. The section on which they rely, for example, confessedly provides for the case of a verdict for damages (of some kind or another), as well as for a price or consideration. But in all the immediately subsequent sections, as to who shall pay the expenses of the juries, the investment of the money, &c. &c., it provides in terms only for the case of a verdict for a price or value, although it is not supposed to be doubtful that all those provisions must be held equally applicable to that of a verdict for damages only. Take the clause as to expenses of trial as an example: The rule (p. 25 of act) here is, that 'if the jury shall find the premises to be of greater value than the sum offered for the same by the Commissioners,' the expense shall be on the Commissioners, if of less value, on the party who had refused the price offered. Now, as there may plainly be a trial and a verdict for damages only, it is manifest that the same rule for awarding the expenses must have been meant to be applied to that case also, though, from the imperfection of the wording, it is not expressly provided. In the same way, as to investing the sums awarded, in questions with heirs of entail, minors, or lunatics, the literal direction of the act would only enforce this in the case of sums paid as the price of properties actually taken and acquired, though the plain principle extends equally to all sums agreed on or awarded for damages done to properties belonging to such parties, and would no doubt be so applied under any judicial direction. The words of the section are (p. 26, 27), that 'if any money (exceeding £200) shall be agreed or adjudged to be paid for any premises purchased or acquired for the purposes of this act,' the same shall be first paid into a bank, and afterwards reinvested in other purchases, &c. There is here no express provision as to money agreed or awarded for damages; and yet, can it be doubted, that if a large sum were thus found due as damages to an heir of entail, the Court would direct it to be paid into bank, and reinvested, in terms of this provision of the statute? In all these cases, the true meaning is to be found by referring back to the leading provisions, and the true rule of construction is that by which their application is best secured. The present case, however, is far stronger than any of those last mentioned, both because there is here an express reference to the former section in the latter, and because, as there is confessedly han is well-founded. My difficulty turns upon the form of the conclusion the summons. The first conclusion, which is simply for damages, I am to think cannot be entertained under the statute. Neither do I think that alternative conclusion to have the Commissioners ordained to take the statutory means for ascertaining the compensation due to the pursuer a proper conclusion. My difficulty, therefore, refers to the form and shape in which the conclusions ought to be enforced. I am not satisfied with the defence that, looking to the provisions of the act, whatever the Commissioners do in the particular districts to be provided, no claim for damages can be brought against them. I can find no authority which sanctions this view. Suppose my property to be benefited generally by improvements in a certain district, if a slice of that property be taken away, it will be a good answer to a claim of damages on my part to say that the property injured was in what is called an improved district? I am inclined to

No. 165.

Feb. 21, 1837.
Strachan v.
Edinburgh
Improvement
Commissioners.

admission of such a claim of damages as the present in the statute, it would be inconsistent at common law, even if not within the express provisions therein made for adjustment of all similar claims.

In the third preliminary defence the Lord Ordinary has had more hesitation. He agrees with the defenders, that the mode of settling claims of damage prescribed by the statute—viz. by the sheriff and a jury—is imperative and exclusive of cases for which it is provided, viz. cases in which the private party refuses to apply to the Commissioners, and the Commissioners apply for a jury; and he is inclined to think that it was intended that the same machinery should be employed where the Commissioners (as in this case) refused to move in any way, and thus put the private party under the necessity of making some application. But as the Commissioners alone are authorised to apply to the sheriff, he is clearly of opinion that the pursuer was bound to come here. The only doubt is, whether he should not have confined himself to the conclusion for having the Commissioners ordained to apply to the sheriff, and whether this should not have been done by summary petition to the sheriff rather than by an ordinary action before a single judge. Upon the first point the Lord Ordinary inclines to think both conclusions competent, in a case contested like the present, where a doubt is raised as to the meaning of the statute, which, if made good, might yet leave a competency at common law; and, in the event, if the second or alternative conclusion is sustained, a doubt as to the propriety of the first would be no ground for dismissing the whole action. On the second point, the Lord Ordinary conceives that an application by a party for the benefit of a public statute, and for having certain persons ordained to admit that benefit, is an application for the ordinary remedies of the law, and not for the exercise of extraordinary authority, for which it might be necessary to apply to the nobile officium of the Court; and though, if this had been all that was for, a summary petition might also have been competent, the combination of a direct claim for damages (it may be at common law), at the pursuer's own instance, seems to render preferable the course of an ordinary action.

The motion for sisting till the issue of a declarator at the defenders' instance, which embraces the grounds of the two first preliminary defences, is rejected, on the ground that the pursuer has not been called as a party to that action, and has no control over it. If the defenders wish only for a judgment of the Court on the merits of those two defences, their speediest way of obtaining it will be by discussion on their reclaiming note against this judgment. If, on the other hand, their object be delay, as the pursuer alleges, he seems entitled to insist that the case shall not be hung up till they find it convenient to bring to issue, and that he is not yet called in Court, and with which he has no concern as a

165. think that the circumstance of the pursuer's house being in such a district does not preclude him from his claim of damages, provided damage can be qualified. The act of 7 and 8 Geo. IV. is very loosely drawn, and is blundered in several of the clauses. (His Lordship then referred to the provisions of the acts.) If the Commissioners had levelled and lowered the street in such a way as to interfere with the arches and roofing of the cellars underneath, I think a claim of damages would have lain; and the same would be the case if they did any thing so as to obscure the window-lights, or impede the access into the shops or houses. I am disposed, therefore, to repel the preliminary defences.

—
1837.
R. v. right element
injurers.

LORD GLENLEE.—I have no wish to go farther than the Lord Ordinary has gone. His Lordship has repelled the preliminary defences only, and the peremptory defences remain entire. The effect of what has been stated by the pursuer as to the injury done to his shop is reserved, and by adhering to this interlocutor we just allow the action to proceed.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I agree, and, in addition to what has been stated from the chair, am disposed to hold that, if we can give these statutes a liberal interpretation, so as to entitle this party to reparation, we are bound to do so. This is a local act, and I have always understood that, in the case of such acts, a principle of construction applies different from that applicable to public statutes. This passed, like the old Scotch acts, salvo jure cujuslibet; and when the property of individuals is trespassed upon, we are to interpret it favourably to the right of such individuals to claim reparation. In the English case of Bolton the act in question was a public act.

LORD MEDWYN.—I differ from your Lordships. It was admitted at the bar that the claim of the pursuer for damages was rested solely on the Improvement Acts, and not on common law. Now, when a work for the public benefit is executed under powers conferred by an Act of Parliament, it requires consideration whether any individual whose property has not been taken nor materially injured has any right at common law to claim damage for an inconvenience directly arising from the operation authorized, and not from any carelessness or oppressiveness in the mode of operation. In Bolton v. Crowther, which was a claim against road-trustees, under the General Road Act, for damage caused by levelling a road, no damages for such a case being provided by the statute, the Court of King's Bench found that none were due at common law. In construing an improvement act, this affords a fit guide for discovering the principle of interpretation. The same principle was applied in the case of the Caledonian Canal Commissioners v. Glengary (June 5, 1830), which was a strong case to show that, under such an act as the present for carrying through a public work, held to be a public improvement, no claim for compensation will arise to a private party, unless recovered under the express provisions of the statute. It is admitted that the clauses here are loosely expressed, but it is said that the interpretation in such a case must be liberal. Now, I hesitate to say that there should be a liberal interpretation to supply the statute. This might be proper where the property of a party was taken or invaded against his will; but such is not the case here, and as, at common law there is no claim, and as the act does not expressly supply the defect of the common law, we must be satisfied that the clauses of the statute warrant us by implication in doing so. If legislators express themselves ambiguously, the common law should be left to take its own course. (His Lordship then referred to the of the Improvements Act.) Upon the whole, I think the present case very No. 165.

 r to the English case of Bolton, and to be ruled by it.

Feb. 21, 1837.

Heritors of Annan v.
 Herbertson.

THE COURT adhered.

DAVID GRAY, S.S.C.—JAMES BRIDGES, W.S.—Agents.

HERITORS and MAGISTRATES OF ANNAN, Suspenders.—M'Neill— No. 166.
G. G. Bell.

GEORGE HERBERTSON, Respondent.—Hunter.

School—Statute—Jurisdiction.—Where the heritors of a parish had raised the sum salary and divided it among three masters—Circumstances in which that the justices of peace had not exceeded their powers, under the Schoolmasters' Act, in granting the accommodations of schoolhouse, &c. to the successor of original parochial schoolmaster, notwithstanding the provision in § 11, that in case the heritors are "exempted from the obligation of providing schoolhouses, &c. for the teachers among whom the salary is to be divided in the manner provided;" and Observed that this exemption only applies to the case of the teachers and not to the successor of the original or proper parochial schoolmaster.

the Schoolmasters' Act, passed in 1803 (43 Geo. III. c. 54), it is Feb. 21, 1837.
 enacted (§ 1), "That from and after Martinmas next, the salary of each 2<sup>D</sup> DIVISION. parochial schoolmaster in every parish of Scotland, shall not be under Ld. Moncreiff.
 the sum of 300 merks Scots per annum, nor above the sum of 400 merks per annum, except in the cases herein after mentioned;" and (§ 8) that in every parish where a commodious house for a school has not yet been provided, pursuant to the directions in the above-recited Act, and in every parish where a dwellinghouse for the residence of the schoolmaster has not already been provided, together with a portion of ground for a garden, to the extent after mentioned, the heritors of every such parish shall provide a commodious house for a school, and also a house for the residence of the schoolmaster, such house not to consist of more than two apartments, including the kitchen, together with a portion of ground for a garden to such dwellinghouse, and fields used for the ordinary purposes of agriculture or pasturage, as may be convenient to the schoolmaster's dwellinghouse as reasonably required, which garden shall contain at least one-fourth part of a Scotch acre. It is farther enacted (by § 9), that, in the event of the heritors neglecting or refusing to provide the accommodations authorized by the Act, or of the schoolmaster being dissatisfied with them, it shall be competent for him to bring the matter before the Quarter-Sessions; and it is enacted, that "in all such cases the judgment of the Quarter-Sessions shall be final, without any further appeal by advocacy, suspension, or otherwise. Finally, by § 11, it is enacted, "that when the parish is 1836. of great extent or population, so that one parochial school cannot be of 1837. any effectual benefit to the whole inhabitants of such parishes, it shall be 1838. competent to the heritors and minister, if they shall see cause, on fixing 1839. a salary of 600 merks, or the value of three chalders of oatmeal, to be 1840. computed according to the provisions of this act, to divide the same among two or more teachers, according to the extent and population of the parish; and these proportions, so divided, shall be paid to teachers of schools in the same way and manner, and under the same conditions as hereafter are specified by this act for supplying vacant parochial schools with masters; but in respect that the heritors of such parishes are to pay an higher salary, they are hereby exempted from the obligation of providing schoolhouses, dwellinghouses, and gardens for the teachers, among whom the salary is to be divided in the manner aforesaid."

At the date of this act, the schoolmaster of the parish of Annan, consisting of the royal burgh of Annan and a considerable landward district, possessed a schoolhouse, but he had no dwellinghouse or garden. Immediately on the passing of the act, the heritors held a meeting, at which the following resolution was adopted:—

"The meeting, being convinced, from the local situation of the parish, that there are two divisions thereof where the children, at least the youngest part of them, cannot attend the parochial school, unanimously agree that there shall be three schools in the said parish, situated as follows:—One in the burgh of Annan, another upon the estate of Bonshaw, near Breakenbeds, and the third at or near the junction of the estates of Brydekirk and Limekilns.

"The meeting in the view above mentioned, unanimously agree that the salary for the whole parish shall be six hundred merks, to be divided amongst them, in the following proportions, viz. four hundred merks for the school at Annan, one hundred merks for the school upon the estate of Bonshaw, and one hundred merks for the school upon the estates of Brydekirk and Limekilns."

The two additional schoolmasters were accordingly appointed. Thereafter, in 1805, the heritors and magistrates agreed that the schoolmaster at Annan was entitled to a dwellinghouse under the statute, and directed estimates to be taken in for building the same and a new schoolhouse, the old schoolhouse and ground attached being to be sold, and the price applied to defray, pro tanto, the expense.

This resolution of the heritors, however, was never carried into effect, and, in 1820, the old schoolhouse was pulled down, and a money-allowance made to the schoolmaster in lieu of it. In 1831, Forrest, the individual who had held the office of parochial schoolmaster at the passing of the act, died, and the respondent, Herbertson, was appointed in his stead. The minutes of his election by the heritors were not produced, but his examination and admission by the Presbytery was expressed in their minutes as follows:—"Mr Herbertson compeared, and a minute election to the parish school of Annan having been produced, the tery, in respect that Mr Herbertson had been examined, and his ations highly approved of, when formerly elected to a parochial within their bounds, declare him duly qualified for his new ap-ent, and instal him, accordingly, as parochial schoolmaster of declaring him entitled to the emoluments of the said office ; and e Lords of Council and Session to interpone their authority for ng the same effectual."

No. 166.
 Feb. 21, 1837.
 Heritors of Annan v.
 Herbertson.

Herbertson having, without success, applied to the heritors and magistrates for a schoolhouse, dwellinghouse, and garden, presented, in 1834, a petition to the Quarter-Sessions of the county of Dumfries, narrating the facts of the 43 Geo. III. above referred to, and praying them " to order the said magistrates and heritors of said parish liable to provide the necessary a schoolhouse, dwellinghouse, and garden, in terms of the Parliament 43d Geo. III. chap. 54, sec. 8."

In his petition answers were given in by the heritors and magistrates in which, without maintaining any plea of incompetency or want of jurisdiction on the part of the Justices, they contended, generally, under the 11th section, where the highest salary had been raised and added among two or more schoolmasters, the accommodations provided by the 8th section of the statute could not be demanded.

The Quarter-Sessions decerned for the accommodations craved, and the expenses against the heritors and magistrates, who presented a bill of suspension. This bill having been refused by Lord Gillies, Order of a meeting of the heritors was held (October 1, 1835), at which an offer was made to Herbertson, that, if he would abandon the process, they would recommend to the magistrates to concur in providing, at joint expense, a schoolhouse and dwellinghouse. Herbertson, who was present, stated, that he would return an answer next day. He did not, however, return an answer till the 10th, when he intimated his acceptance of the offer, it having been in the mean time agreed to by the magistrates on the 2d. The heritors, however, now required that Herbert-son should pay the expenses incurred since the 2d, though what they demanded, any, did not appear ; and Herbertson refusing this, the heritors refused to abide by their offer, and, with the magistrates, presented a new bill of suspension, which was passed by Lord Mackenzie, J. The letters having been expedited, and a record made up, it

Decided for the Heritors and Magistrates—

The jurisdiction of the Quarter-Sessions in the matter of schools is statutory, and under the 43 Geo. III. alone. Their judgments, accordingly, can only be excluded from review when they keep within the limits of the statute. They cannot possibly decern for the erection of a school or schoolhouse, in respect of any agreement by former ministers of any circumstances other than the provisions of the statute.

1836. Then, in the first place, they are only authorized by the statute to decide in cases where no schoolhouse or dwellinghouse has previously been provided, and consequently, although the provisions of § 11 may not warrant the depriving a schoolmaster, after the increase and division of the salary, of any accommodations formerly provided to him under the act 1696, the remedy, if these are taken away and withheld, is not an application to the Quarter-Sessions, who have clearly no jurisdiction in such a case. As to the schoolhouse, therefore, the Quarter-Sessions could have no jurisdiction, whatever may be the view taken of the obligation of the heritors itself. In regard again to the schoolmaster's dwellinghouse and garden, the jurisdiction of the justices must depend on whether the statute authorizes these accommodations to be provided to any of the masters where two or more are appointed, and the maximum salary is levied and divided among them. If the heritors are not bound in such case to provide these accommodations, there can be no warrant for the justices to interfere, because their jurisdiction is exclusively dependent on the heritors refusing or neglecting to comply with the enactments of the statute. The provisions of the act, however, are express that under it and in respect of its enactments, no claim for the accommodations authorized where there is only one parochial schoolmaster (which is the only case treated of in § 8), can lie, where two or more have been agreed to be appointed, and the maximum salary levied. Nor can it be maintained that the exemption from this obligation extended only to the additional masters, for they are all equally proper parochial schoolmasters, and have been so treated by the Court;<sup>1</sup> and in the statute there is no countenance to the idea of a distinction; the salary might be divided equally among all, without any preference of one over the others, and the whole are referred to in the clause of exemption as "the teachers among whom the salary is to be divided," including necessarily the master situated at the place where the original parish school was established, as otherwise he could have no share of the salary. Then if the justices exceeded their powers their judgment cannot be protected, and there could be no prorogation of a jurisdiction which did not subsist under the statute, nor is there any pretence for the plea that the suspenders are barred by agreement from now persisting, Herbertson not having accepted their offer within the period limited.

Pleaded for Herbertson—

Under § 4 every schoolmaster is declared entitled to the accommodations provided by the act, and in case of neglect or refusal on the part of the heritors, he is authorized to apply to the Quarter-Sessions, whose decisions are declared to be final. The Quarter-Sessions have thus a general jurisdiction in regard to the matter of providing these accommodations, <sup>1</sup> Murray, Dec. 5, 1834, ante, XIII. 128.

ugh by § 11, an exemption is introduced, it is a question on the No. 166.
 whether in any particular case the exemption applies. In detern this, the Quarter-Sessions may put a wrong construction on the Feb. 21, 1837. out this is an error in judgment in a matter committed to them Heritors of being subject to review, and not an excess of power which lays Annan v. n to the review of this Court. Accordingly, here the suspenders Herbertson. objection to the jurisdiction, but pleaded the exemption as on the bus prorogating the jurisdiction and so barring themselves from in the present suspension, as they also did by the agreement first bill had been refused. Further, even if it were competent ourt to review the judgment of the Quarter-Sessions, it is found-ust construction of the statute. It never was intended to deprive er parochial schoolmaster of accommodations to which he was under the act 1696, and although the justices might not be war-decern for the accommodations demanded in respect of contract ous possession, they might properly take these matters into conn, and judge whether in the circumstances the claim should not ed. But in truth the exemption only applies to the branch teachers expressly described by that term "teachers," while the proper schoolmaster is termed "schoolmaster." The respondent, how-he proper parochial schoolmaster entitled to make up the militia ct under the Parliamentary representation acts, &c., and holding distinct from the mere branch teachers, and to his case the exempnot extend.

ord Ordinary repelled the reasons of suspension, and found the derly proceeded, with expenses, adding the subjoined note.*

---

ie Lord Ordinary thinks that there is much ground for the plea, that the s, having stated no plea on the record of the inferior court, objecting to iction of the justices, are barred from insisting in such a plea now. He s that the suspenders took a very sharp course when they retreated from offer of settlement, after Lord Gillies's interlocutor, on the grounds now He thinks that, in fairness, the acceptance should have been held suffishould not have been rejected.

the precise ground on which he decides the cause requires particular ex-
 He thinks it clear that there was no abstract incompetency in the appli-the justices, under the 8th section of the statute 43d Geo. III. and the which apply, in broad general terms, to every parish in Scotland in which master has not the accommodations pointed out. The 11th section of Geo. III. does not take away the jurisdiction given by the 8th in any case. declares an exemption from its application in a particular case. The suspenders stated their claim of exemption, for the judgment of the justices, g any doubt as to their jurisdiction. The justices considered the claim of master, with this claim of exemption as raised, under all the circumstanthey had power to decide the question, the statute makes their decision d it is really not easy to see how it can be otherwise than that they had nd were bound to judge of it in the first instance; for, on any construc-the statute, cases may easily be figured where the question, whether the

1. 166. The heritors and Magistrates reclaimed.

21, 1837. LORD GLENLEE.—I think the interlocutor right. There are views in the note distinct from each other. In the first place, I agree that there was no incompetency in exemption applied or not, might be very doubtful. The case of the suspenders must therefore resolve into this, that, by rejecting the claim of exemption, and giving decree for the schoolhouse, &c. the justices have committed error of judgment, and, by such error, refused effect to a particular clause in the statute. Whether this would be enough to exclude the interference of this Court in a simple case under the act—as, for instance, if they had decreed for schoolhouses, &c. to all the three teachers appointed under the 11th section—the Lord Ordinary does not think it necessary to decide. The palpable deviation from the statute would probably be held to lay the case open. But the provision in the 8th section, specifically excluding all review in an application under it, necessarily supposes that matters requiring judgment as to the obligations of the heritors might be brought before the justices, and still that their decision should be final.

“The case is argued by the suspenders on the hypothesis, that the only question which could arise is, whether in a simple case of the salary of six hundred merks being awarded, and divided among three schoolmasters, the justices could, on a right construction of the 11th section, give decree for the accommodations to one schoolmaster. The Lord Ordinary does not think that question by any means free from doubt, on the true meaning of the statute, in its connexion with the act 1696; and he is not prepared to reject the able argument of the respondent on that point, though he thinks the question very doubtful. But he considers the present as a very special case, in regard to the bona fide meaning of the heritors, and the effect of their resolution, when they divided the salary of six hundred merks into three parts.

“The case is that of a parish where the schoolmaster was in possession of a schoolhouse and adjoining ground, before the resolution of the heritors to divide the salary was taken. Supposing that it had been proposed at the time, that that house and ground should be sold, and the price divided among the heritors, or any class of them, would it have been consistent with the statute, in its fair meaning, that the only obligation incumbent on them was to pay the six hundred merks yearly, and that the operation of the 8th section was entirely excluded? The Lord Ordinary doubts it much. But the case here is, that the heritors, though they seem to have contemplated the removal of the old schoolhouse, never dreamt of its being taken away otherwise than on the supposition of new accommodations being given under the statute. Upon the facts in the record, either not denied or proved by the minutes of the heritors produced, (particularly Min. 30th August, 1805; 17th April, 1806; 5th September, 1809; and 6th November, 1809,) it is perfectly clear that there was an old schoolhouse, and ground adjoining to it, which remained in the possession of the schoolmaster after the two other schools were instituted, and the salary divided—that it was an understood part of the arrangement, at last reduced into a firm agreement, that, in place of that schoolhouse and ground, intended to be sold, the schoolmaster should be ‘entitled to have the house built for him, in terms of the late Act of Parliament,’ &c., and that arrangements were accordingly made for the erection both of a schoolhouse and a dwellinghouse. Then it is averred in the record (Art. VII. respondent’s statement), that, in 1821, the old schoolhouse was taken down, and the materials sold, ‘and in lieu of it an annual allowance was made to the late schoolmaster.’ This last statement is not at all denied in the answers; and though the suspenders deny that the house was taken down, or the materials sold, ‘at least by them,’ it is plain, from the form of this expression, that it is not a denial of the fact, but only a colourable throwing of it from the heritors of the parish, as distinguished from the Magistrates of the burgh. But the Provost of the burgh is officially a suspender; and, at any rate, is ication to the justices in the character truly belonging to the respondent of No. 166. schoolmaster. The heritors plead the exemption, but do not state that the ion was incompetent till the cause came here. The justices decide. It is Feb. 21, 1837. that if the application were by the whole three teachers to provide accom- Heritors of n to each, we would hold that it could not be made under the statute, Annan v.

 excluded by the statute. But what is there in § 8 implying that an ap- Herbertson.
 plication from one of them is incompetent? The application is not incompetent.
 The justices might have been of opinion that the true meaning of § 11 excluded the application, but the application not being incompetent, their decision that that decision was ill-founded could not be incompetent if the application was competent, consequently the declaration of finality applies; and it is impossible to say that the application is incompetent because the justices put a wrong construction on the statute. Such a rule would open the widest door to review in all cases. This is a precedent, and besides I never saw any thing so unjustifiable as the whole opinion of these heritors.

MR. MEADOWBANK.—I entirely agree. I think the conduct of the heritors is reprehensible. On the competency I have nothing to add to what has been said by Lord Glenlee, and on the merits I would have concurred entirely in judgment with the justices. The act provides for the accommodations where not already provided, in every parish. Then it enacts that the heritors may fix a salary of six hundred marks to be divided among two or more—not “schoolmasters,” but “teachers of schools.” This is very distinct, and it is clear that they are just allowed to pay salaries to branch teachers, who are not parochial schoolmasters, and the provision applies to these other teachers exclusive of the parochial schoolmaster.
 This is the true interpretation, giving a fair and free construction, which I think the legislature intended should be given to this act. In that reading of the act I am borne out by the authority of these heritors themselves in their opinion soon after the passing of the act. When I look to that and the whole content, from the previous minutes of the heritors, that the house was taken down without the express sanction of the heritors, and on the faith of the accommodations statute being given in place of it.

---

These being the special circumstances of the case, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, 1. That, upon the claim of exemption, made by the heritors before the justices, it was competent and just for the justices to consider, not only whether exemption would generally arise in such a case, but whether the heritors were precluded from making the claim by the special facts, and by the clear understanding when the resolution to divide the salary took place; and that, if this was within their competency, their judgment is final. And, 2. That in so far as it is competent and necessary to consider the merits, the judgment is right. The suspendings argue, that they stand on their defence, and have nothing to claim. But the Lord Ordinary's view is different; that, on both statutes, the presumption is for the schoolmaster's right, he being, in fact, without the accommodations, and that it is for the suspenders to make out their claim of exemption.

The case of Dawson v. Allardyce was very different. That was an attempt to remove the schoolmaster, against his will, of the schoolhouse already allotted to him by the act 1696, or to remove it to a different situation.

The Lord Ordinary says nothing of the general reasonableness of the suspensions. But the idea of the parochial schoolmaster, in such a place as Annan, being removed from a schoolhouse, is, at the least, not a little extraordinary. The framers of the act could never have contemplated such a result.”

, 166. subsequent proceedings, and to the circumstance that the schoolmaster was previously in possession of a schoolhouse, I am satisfied that the judgment of the justices is right. When the heritors adopted the resolution to divide the salary, Mr Forrest was parochial schoolmaster, and he could not be deprived of the accommodations he then enjoyed. On the whole, I think the proceedings of the heritors unfounded in law and most iniquitous.

LORD MEDWYN.—I agree that the heritors have behaved sharply, and I think both parties wrong in not having settled this dispute. I would have wished that the Court had decided the case on that ground, as I cannot concur in all the opinions delivered. The act 1696 is not touched by the late statute. But it provides only a schoolhouse, not a dwellinghouse. I would have said the schoolmaster's situation was not to be deteriorated by dividing the salary. But the only question is, what his rights under the 43d Geo. III. are? That act provides by § 1 a salary of not less than 300, nor more than 400 marks. By § 8 the justices are brought in on the failure of the heritors to give the accommodations thereby required. Under § 11 there is an exemption in the case of raising the highest salary and dividing it among one or more teachers. We are told these teachers are different from the parochial schoolmaster. I cannot think so. "Teachers" means all those who teach, including the parochial schoolmaster. Otherwise where is his salary—his share of the 600 marks which is to be divided among the "teachers"? Then the exemption applies to the same persons among whom the salary is to be divided. I do not mean to say that this clause excludes the proper parochial schoolmaster's claim to a schoolhouse under the act 1696, or from having had it before. Also, if he had a residence formerly he would be entitled to it still. I would hold that the exemption in § 11 withdrew the power in the case of a division to apply for the accommodations to the justices who have no power to give what is not provided by the statute, and therefore I thought the application incompetent. I cannot see how it should be incompetent if the whole three applied, and yet competent on the part of one if he has as little title as the others.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a most important question; but I fairly confess I have no difficulty in concurring with the Lord Ordinary. I lay aside all the objections to the conduct of the heritors, though, if the case were narrowed to that, I could scarcely have supported their plea; but I go at once to the Act of Parliament. Then as to the question of competency, admitting that § 11 is equivocal and ambiguous, I am not satisfied that it gives any aid to the plea of the respondents, because the question is, if, when the application was made to the justices, this party was in a condition to make it. He was elected parochial schoolmaster, and he puts in an application for the accommodations under the statute. The heritors assert that § 11 affords a defence. It is most material, however, that there is no indication of any denial of the right of the justices to dispose of the application. Then if the application was regular were they not entitled to judge of it? They may have erred, but is not their judgment final by this act as to their construction of that clause as on their construction of any other? Suppose we admit their construction to have been erroneous, still the judgment is unreviewable. We can't meddle with it. But we are driven to consider the questions discussed on the merits. Now as to these it would require the most express words to exclude the right to accommodations to every parochial schoolmaster. But § 11 is ambiguous, using the word "teachers," not used in any other part of the act. In construing it we are bound to keep in view the whole act and the object of it, and doing so, ing a common sense and rational construction on it, I have not much difficulty in determining what it is. If common justice were done, according to their rates, the accommodations would have been provided. But the question arises, let us look at the clause. The exemption extends to the providing of houses which it is admitted the respondent is entitled to under the act 1696. Does not this give ground for holding that it only applies to the additional, and that the heritors are only to be relieved from the burden as to the salaries who are to get small shares of the salary. "Teacher" alone is a general term, and on a fair construction we are to apply it only to the additional, and not to the parochial schoolmaster. But who is the regular parochial schoolmaster of Annan? There are heavy duties which can only be performed by a regular schoolmaster—making up militia lists—registers under reform act, &c. If a branch teacher had done any of these things his acts would have been entirely invalid; and I therefore agree with Lord Meadowbank that the act looks to those as branch teachers, and so there is no admission of these as regular schoolmasters. Therefore I have not the same difficulty as Lord Moncreiff. It would have been very different if all the three had made application, as only one would have been competent, and if the justices had attempted to assign accommodations to each it would have been an unwarranted deviation from the law.

On both grounds therefore I am for adhering, and I have seldom seen a case where heritors have allowed themselves to be dragged into a litigation more MEADOWBANK.—With reference to the observations of Lord Medwyn, the term "teachers" in the 11th section must include all the masters, be- mentions them as those among whom the salary is divided, I think this is the surplus above the minimum provided to the proper parochial school- by § 1, which surplus it is that is to be divided among the "teachers" or masters.

WILL.—The salary specified in § 1 is only so provided, "except in the cases mentioned."

THE COURT adhered.

WILLIAM STEWART, W.S.—WILLIAM MARTIN, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN RAE, Suspender and Defender—D. F. Hope—Turnbull.
JAMES HENDERSON, Charger and Pursuer.—Monteith—Neaves.

No. 167.

Prisoner—Lease—Jurisdiction.—1. Held that a disposition omnium, executed under an application for the benefit of the Act of Grace, falls under the exemption of the stamp act applying to "all proceedings under the statute relative to the aliment of poor prisoners," and does not require a stamp. 2. Held, that such a disposition was, in the circumstances, truly executed under the Act, though not signed till about 16 days after liberation—the prisoner was liberated, under the act, on condition of signing it, and having signed it was prepared and presented to him. 3. Circumstances in which a judgment of the Lord Ordinary was acquiesced in, which suspended a charge on a debt removing, pronounced by a sheriff under an action which was founded on a claim of irritancy, but which involved several points besides that of the competency of the jurisdiction.

167. In 1823, John Rae, senior, let some heritable subjects in Uddingston to his nephew, John Rae, junior, for 19 years, at a rent of £100 annuum. The lease contained this clause, "declaring that, in case of said John Rae, junior, becoming bankrupt, in terms of the statute or under any other law or statute, this lease, in the option of the proprietors, shall, ipso facto, become null and void. The tenants and all co-tenants subject, without any declarator, to be summarily removed by ordinary or summary action before the Judge Ordinary, and without power or privilege of purging such irritancy."

John Rae, junior, was rendered bankrupt in 1833, at which time his uncle did not avail himself of the above clause to bring the lease to an end, but allowed Rae, junior, to continue in possession. He cultivated the farm, and paid rent subsequently to this. In December, 1834, John Rae, senior, whose affairs were embarrassed, was thrown into prison. He applied for, and was found entitled to the benefit of the Act of Grace, on condition of executing a trust-disposition omnium bonorum in favour of James Henderson of Peasebanks, as trustee for his creditors. He was allowed to leave prison before actually executing the disposition, but signed it as soon as it was presented to him, which was about 10 days after his leaving prison. The disposition was not extended on stamped paper. It included the heritable subjects let to Rae, junior; and Henderson, in virtue of that disposition, took infeftment in these subjects. In January, 1835, Henderson caused a search to be made for John Rae, junior, under the same letters of caption, in virtue of which Rae, junior, had been made bankrupt in 1833, the execution of search being intended to make him again bankrupt. Henderson then raised an action of removing against Rae, junior, founding on the clause in the lease, and on his bankruptcy in 1833, together with the recent execution of search, by which steps he contended that Rae, junior, was duly rendered bankrupt; that the lease had become, ipso facto, null and void; that Rae, junior, was subject, without any declarator, to be removed summarily by action before the Judge Ordinary; and concluding for decree of removing.

Among other defences, Rae, junior, pleaded, that as the disposition in favour of Henderson constituted Henderson's title to the subjects under the lease, was unstamped, it could not be pleaded in Court, and Henderson had therefore no title to pursue.

Henderson answered, that the deed was exempted from stamp-duty under that clause of exemption in schedule, P. II. § V. appended to the Act Geo. III. c. 184, which applies to "all proceedings under the Scots law relative to the aliment of poor prisoners."

After some intermediate procedure, the Sheriff "repelled the plea of want of stamp to the disposition omnium bonorum, founded on by Henderson, in respect it falls under the exception in the stamp-act of 1804, granted by the Act of Grace for the benefit of the Act of Grace; Forasmuch as the facts, on which the plea is founded, have been proposed by the der; and of new, appointed him, within six days from this date, to find caution for violent profits, under certification of instant decree of removing being pronounced, in case of failure." No. 167.

Rae, junior, failed to find caution, a decree of removing was pronounced, and a charge thereon was given.

Rae, junior, presented a bill of suspension, alleging, inter alia, that his bankruptcy had been occasioned by bills which he had accepted for the accommodation of Rae, senior, his uncle. On advising the bill, with answers, the Lord Ordinary (Corehouse) "passed the bill upon juratory action."*

After the letters were expedite, the suspender maintained those pleas which were referred to in the note of the Lord Ordinary, besides founding on the objection of the want of a stamp to the disposition omnium bonorum. He also alleged that he had made considerable disbursements and ameliorations on the farm, relying on the endurance of his lease.

Before completing a record, Henderson raised a declarator, in which, besides libelling on the procedure already narrated, he also libelled on a fact of Rae, junior, having been incarcerated for debt, at the instance of a third party, subsequently to the institution of the action before the sheriff. He concluded for declarator of the several acts of bankruptcy, and of nullity of the lease, in consequence of the irritancy having been

Feb. 23, 1837
Rae v.
Henderson.

---

* "NOTE.—There are several points in this case which appear to the Lord Ordinary to be attended with difficulty. The complainer was bankrupt in 1833; at this time, Mr Rae, senior, was landlord, who did not avail himself of the provision in the lease to declare the irritancy, and remove the complainer from the farm, but continued him in possession;—after Rae, senior, had granted the disposition omnium bonorum to the charger, in December, 1834, the charger, by virtue of the same letters of caption, on which the complainer had been incarcerated in 1833, rendered him again bankrupt by an execution of seurch, dated 28th January, 1835. But if the Act of Bankruptcy in 1833 was passed from by the landlord, may be questioned, whether a seurch on the same caption, and for the same debt, in 1835, would entitle a singular successor in the lands to declare the irritancy. It would still be more material if the complainer's averment were proved that this bankruptcy was occasioned by diligence on bills in which he was not the primary debtor, but which he had accepted solely for the accommodation of his landlord, as it is plain the landlord would not have declared an irritancy of the lease on that ground, neither could a singular successor in his right. But farther, if the complainer was allowed to continue in possession, and to cultivate the farm, as he paid the rent, it may be doubted whether it was competent to declare an irritancy in the Sheriff-Court, the case being materially distinguished in all its circumstances from that of Scott v. Wotherspoon, 27th February, 1829; and though an action of that nature were competent in the Sheriff-Court, it may be doubted whether the complainer was bound to find caution for violent profits, in the present case, for it is only in ordinary removings under the statute or Act of Session that caution can be required, not in extraordinary removings. Douglas v. Morrison, 18th February, 1628; Morrison, 13,892. The Lord Ordinary expressed no opinion on these points, some of which have not yet been argued, but he refused him to pass the bill on juratory caution."

167. incurred ; and for decree of removing. This action was conjoined with the suspension.

183, 1837.

afforded.

A record was made up in the conjoined actions, and the Lord Ordinary, "in the suspension, suspended the letters simpliciter, and decerned ; found the suspender entitled to the expenses thereof, both in the Inferior Court, in the Bill-Chamber, and in this Court, previous to the conjunction of the processes, with the half of the expense of this debate ; and in the declarator, repelled the defences, and decerned in terms of the conclusions of the libel ; and found the pursuer entitled to the expenses thereof, reserving entire the suspender's claim for improvements and meliorations, and the objections thereto, as accords."

Rae reclaimed against this judgment, but did not insist in any plea excepting (1.) that the disposition omnium bonorum not having been signed until some time after liberation had taken place, and after Henderson had failed to lodge aliment, was not truly granted under the Act of Grace ; and (2.) that even if it were so, yet the exemption of the stamp act, though reaching all proceedings under the Act of Grace, did not apply to the execution of the disposition omnium bonorum, which was not required till a later act, 6 Geo. IV. c. 62, § 7 ; but applied only to the petition and answers, the proof, if any, and generally to the other steps of process under 1696, c. 32.

Henderson read, in answer, so much of the procedure in the application for the Act of Grace (which had not been printed) as was necessary to instruct the statements on this subject, which are above noticed. He contended, that the disposition omnium bonorum was a "proceeding" under the Act of Grace exempted from stamp-duty both by the letter and the spirit of the exemption in the stamp act.

LORD GILLIES.—The proceedings under the application for the benefit of the Act of Grace should have been printed and laid before us, so far as was necessary for disposing of the question whether this deed was truly executed under the act. But from what has been now read, I am satisfied that it was neither more nor less than a disposition omnium bonorum under the Act of Grace. The prisoner was liberated a few days before signing the deed, but it was only after being found entitled to liberation provided he executed the deed ; the execution of it was a condition of his liberation ; and accordingly, though he was not kept in jail till it was prepared, he signed it as soon afterwards as it was brought to him. I think the deed required no stamp, and that this reclaiming note should be refused.

LORD MACKENZIE.—My opinion is the same. The execution of such a disposition is just an ordinary part of the proceedings under the Act of Grace, and falls completely within the exemption of the Stamp Act. As to the objection that the prisoner was liberated in consequence of no aliment being lodged, that circumstance does not show that the liberation was not under the Act of Grace, but is perfectly consistent with his having been so liberated. I think the note should be refused.

PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion.

COREHOUSE.—I retain the same opinion as when I pronounced the inter-under review.

THE COURT adhered.

LOCKHART, HUNTER, and WHITEHEAD, W.S.—A. HAMILTON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 167.

Feb. 24, 1837.
Magistrates of Stirling v.
Gordon.

ISTRATES AND COUNCIL OF STIRLING, Suspenders.—Sol.-Gen.

Rutherford—A. Dunlop.

DR ROBERT GORDON (Collector of Ministers' Widows' Fund), Charger.—Robertson—Grant.

No. 168.

ch—Vacant Stipend—Ministers' Widows' Fund.—A parish contained a burgh and a land-ward district; two ministers officiated in the parish; in the town-council, who were patrons, applied to the Presbytery to revive and institute a third charge within the parish, which had formerly been established by authority of the church courts; the Presbytery did so, "on condition that the council bind themselves to make up the stipend of the third charge to the minister per annum:" the council agreed to this, and, as patrons, granted repeated contributions to the third charge, and, on the death of one of the ministers holding the charge, they paid £100 as Ann, to the widow, and £100 to the Ministers' Widows' Fund, as a half-year's vacant stipend; the stipend was payable out of the various funds of the burgh; on a subsequent vacancy, the council refused to do anything in name of vacant stipend to the Ministers' Widows' Fund:—Held that the endowment of the third pastoral charge was of a permanent nature; that the charge was a benefice in the sense of the statutes relative to the Ministers' Widows' Fund; and that the vacant stipend, which was for half-a-year, being due as due to the Fund.

As early as 1643, there was only one Minister in Stirling, which is a burgh including a landward district, besides the royal burgh; the stipend is payable out of the teinds of the parish. In that year a second charge was established with the sanction of the Presbytery, whose stipend was payable, partly out of funds mortified for the purpose, and partly by the Magistrates out of a converted mulcture belonging to the burgh. These two ministers officiated in one church, called the East Church. In 1731 the Magistrates and Council resolved to fit up the West Church, and, on the settlement of a third minister by the authority of the Presbytery, they bound themselves to pay to him a yearly stipend of 1200 merks Scots. The Rev. Ebenezer Erskine was inducted into the third charge; but after his suspension, secession, and deposition, the charge was not filled up, and the Synod of Perth and Stirling, in 1758, passed a resolution, declaring that there was no sufficient foundation for perpetuating it.

On March 12, 1817, the Town-Council, on the narrative of deficient accommodation in the East Church, and the propriety of celebrating public worship in the West Church by an unordained assistant, resolved that the sum of £150 sterling, yearly, shall be raised as a provision for the said assistant," by contributions from the funds of certain burghs. The first and second charges were at this period vacant,

Feb. 24, 1837.
1st Division.
Ld. Corehouse.

March 12, 1817, the Town-Council, on the narrative of deficient accommodation in the East Church, and the propriety of celebrating public worship in the West Church by an unordained assistant, resolved that the sum of £150 sterling, yearly, shall be raised as a provision for the said assistant," by contributions from the funds of certain burghs. The first and second charges were at this period vacant,

168. and the Council afterwards resolved, in place of having an unordained assistant, that it was expedient to have an ordained third Minister, "and that he and the other two ministers shall preach alternately in both churches, so as always to form only one parish, with one kirk-session, and having the sacrament dispensed by all the three ministers alternately in the East Church; reserving always to the Magistrates and Town-Council their right to the patronage of the said third charge, thus instituted by them, with a salary of £150 sterling yearly, as fixed by the said act of Council, of date the 12th day of March last."

The Town-Council petitioned the Presbytery to approve the proceedings, and to institute the third charge "on the terms above mentioned and agreeably to the rules of the church." The Presbytery granted the petition, "and did and do hereby revive and institute the third charge of the town and parish of Stirling, upon this condition, that the Magistrates and Council bind themselves to make up the stipend of the third charge to £200 per annum."

In July, 1817, on considering this deliverance of the Presbytery, an act of the Town-Council was passed, resolving to grant a presentation to Mr Bruce; "and the Council further, in addition to the salary of £150 sterling yearly for the third minister mentioned in their petition to the Presbytery, unanimously resolve to guarantee a further allowance of £50 sterling yearly to Mr Bruce during his incumbency, which they propose to raise from the seat-rents or by private subscription, reserving always to the said Magistrates and Town-Council, and their successors in office in all time coming, the right of patronage of the said third charge, as being the founders and endowers thereof, and as being undoubted patrons of the said kirk and parish of Stirling." The deed of presentation, executed on the same day, bore, that the Town-Council granted to the presentee "the yearly salary settled upon him by act of Council, of date the 12th day of March last, with the addition thereto guaranteed to him by act of Council, of this date, during his incumbency in the said third charge."

In August, 1817, the Town-Council passed this act:—"Having resumed consideration of their act of 12th March last, relative to the stipend for the third minister, they unanimously agree, that no part of the stipend shall be taken from the funds of the hospitals, without the consent of the Guildry and Trades; but that the Council shall, in terms of their guarantee already reported to the Presbytery, raise the same, the mean time, from the converted mulcture, and any other funds under their administration, and from private subscriptions and contributions from the seat-holders."

In October, 1817, Mr Bruce was inducted into the third charge, and during his incumbency he preached in the West Church, the other two ministers preaching alternately in the East Church. In 1818 an act of Council was passed granting an addition of £50 yearly to Mr Bruce.

out of the church seat-rents payable to the town," making his whole stipend £250, "during his incumbency as third minister." No. 168.

Mr Bruce died in 1824. He had become a contributor to the Ministers' Widows' Fund, on his induction, and at his death his widow received the benefit of the fund. She also received £100 from the Town-Council, in name of Ann. After the death of Mr Bruce, the Town-Council appointed the Rev. Archibald Bennie as his successor, by an act, in which, considering that the Council had granted "an allowance of £50 a-year to the late Rev. Mr Bruce in addition to the stipend of £200, for which they became bound to the Presbytery, and that during his incumbency only, which it is now therefore in the power of the Council to continue or withdraw, they do unanimously resolve to continue the same during the incumbency of Mr Bennie; and do hereby grant him the said additional allowance of £50 per annum accordingly." The presentation in Mr Bennie's favour bore that the Town-Council, "during all the days of his life," disposed "to him the yearly salary or stipend of £250, in terms of said act of Council, during his incumbency therein." Feb. 24, 1831
Magistrates &
Stirling v.
Gordon.

Mr Bennie was next year translated to the second charge, and the Town-Council passed an act of presentation in favour of Mr Marshall, and farther, resolving "to continue to Mr Marshall, during his incumbency in the said third charge, the stipend of £250 sterling allowed to the late Mr Bruce and to Mr Bennie; reserving to the Magistrates and Council, if they shall see cause, to reduce the stipend of the said charge to £200 (for which amount only they are bound to the Presbytery) after Mr Marshall's incumbency therein shall have ceased."

In 1829 Mr Marshall was removed to the second charge, and, in December, 1830, the Town-Council granted a presentation to Mr Macfarlane. They paid to the Ministers' Widows' Fund the sum of £100, as a half-year's vacant stipend of the third charge accruing prior to Mr Macfarlane's induction. Before granting this presentation the Town-Council passed a resolution that the "stipend of the minister to be appointed to the vacant third charge shall be £200, being the sum for which the Burgh was pledged to the Presbytery, agreeably to the proceedings which took place in July, 1817, more especially as the state of the Town's funds will not afford a larger stipend."

The presentation to Mr Macfarlane was "to the third charge during all the days of his life, giving and disposing to him during his incumbency therein the yearly salary or stipend of £200, being the stipend for which his predecessors in office became bound to the Presbytery, at the revival of the third charge in the year 1817." While Mr Macfarlane held this charge he officiated in both East and West Churches, during one diet, at each Sunday. The other diet was supplied at each church by the first and second ministers respectively. Mr Macfarlane was translated to the first charge, and in June, 1832, more than six months' vacancy having elapsed, a presentation was executed by the Town Council in favour of Mr Ritch.

168. The second and third charges had never been sanctioned by the Teir Court. The stipend of the third minister had always been paid out of the ordinary burgh funds, there being no special fund set apart thereto.

h. 1837.
rates of
R. v.
B.

A charge was given to the Town Council, by the collector of the Ministers' Widows' Fund, for £100, as vacant stipend accruing from Michaelmas, 1831, to Whitsunday, 1882, and the Council presented bill of suspension and interdict, contending that the enactment of 5 Geo. III. c. 169, founded on by the charger, did not apply to the provision made by them for the third minister. The enactment is in these terms:—"That when any parish in the Church of Scotland becomes vacant by the death, translation, resignation, or deprivation of an incumbent holding the pastoral cure and benefice of such parish, and the vacant stipend thereby arises subsequent to the crop and year 1813, and vacant stipend, in so far as it has heretofore been applicable by the patron to pious purposes, shall thenceforth, and in all time to come, be levied in manner herein mentioned, and paid to the said general collector."

Parties were at issue whether there existed any practice of levying sums, under the name of vacant stipend, in cases similar to that of the third charge in Stirling. The bill was passed, and the suspender pleaded, 1. No parish became vacant by the translation of M Macfarlane, as there was but one parish of Stirling in which the ministers officiated, and the third minister had never had a parish of his own. 2. The third charge was merely a pastoral charge, erected by the authority of the church courts alone, and was not a benefice recognised or erected by the Court of Teinds. But it was to such benefices alone that the statute applied. 3. The statute merely gave the vacant stipend "in so far as it had heretofore been applicable by the patron to pious purposes." But the provision made for the third minister out of the burgh funds, was not of such sort that any sum would, before the statute have fallen under the administration of the patron to be applied to pious purposes, during a vacancy. The Widows' Fund had no right but such as previously was in the patron prior to the statute. The right of the patron to the vacant stipend, arose originally from his having endowed the benefice, and from there being a permanent subject in existence which yielded fruits during the vacancy, and which the patron drew, while there was no incumbent; the patron entering into possession, and reaping the fruits, which for a considerable period he had right to appropriate to his own purposes, but which were afterwards by a series of statutes directed to be applied by him to pious uses, and have now been transferred to the Widows' Fund. The Fund, however, could have nothing which a patron originally could not have claimed. Now here there was no subject yielding fruits; there was merely a contract to provide a minister during his incumbency, and there was no obligation to pay the provision to any party during a vacancy. The patron never had right to such provisions during a vacancy, as is expressly stated in Forbes, the only institutional writer who touched this question.<sup>1</sup> In regard to the payment of the Ann, that was regulated by the terms of the statute 1672, c. 13, which were very comprehensive in referring to all ministers ; but the application of that statute could not afford a precedent as to a question dependent on the extent of the patron's original right. The suspenders also contended that there was no previous decision, and no practice, to warrant the charge. 4. The stipend should at least be computed only at the rate of £150, as the suspenders were not bound to continue a higher stipend, and the charge should therefore be restricted from £100 to £75.

No. 161
Feb. 24, 18
Magistrates
Stirling v.
Gordon.

The charger pleaded, 1. Vacant stipend arose in burghs where there were no teinds as well as in landward parishes ;<sup>2</sup> and such stipend always arose when any one of the ministers of a collegiate charge died, or was translated. It was not affected by the circumstance of there being several ministers officiating in an undivided parish, if each held a charge of the nature of a benefice. 2. The third charge in Stirling was permanently endowed, and was a benefice in the sense of the statutes regulating the Ministers' Widows' Fund.<sup>3</sup> 3. The contract under which the Town Council became bound to provide the third charge, on condition of its being revived and instituted by the Presbytery in 1817, was not of a temporary character, limited to the first individual appointed to the charge. It was of a permanent and enduring kind, having reference to the constant endowment of that charge. While an incumbent existed, the annual sum contracted for was payable to him ; and during a vacancy, the annual sum was vacant stipend, subject to the Ann, and subject to the act 54 Geo. III. c. 169. The vacancy was not to become a source of gain to the suspenders in any contingency. And if necessary to go into the practice in similar cases, the charger averred that it existed to a considerable extent in his favour. 4. The minimum of fixed stipend was £200, that being a condition of the institution of the charge by the Presbytery ; having been expressly agreed to by the Town Council before proceeding with the first presentation, and repeatedly acknowledged in their minutes to be the tenor of their obligation. The sum of £100 was therefore correctly charged for.

The Lord Ordinary found " that the third pastoral charge in the burgh of Stirling, being permanently endowed by the Magistrates and Town Council of that burgh, with the consent and under the authority of the Presbytery of Stirling, is to be held as a benefice in the sense of the act 7th Geo. II. c. 11, and other acts relative to the fund for provision of the Widows and Children of Ministers in Scotland : That £75 sterling, being one-half of the permanent annual stipend, which was payable to the

<sup>1</sup> Forbes on Tithes, p. 50.

<sup>2</sup> Magistrates of Dundee, Nov. 18, 1829 (ante, VIII. 66).

<sup>3</sup> Gordon, Feb. 18, 1836 (ante, XIV. 509).

166: last incumbent when he was loosed from his charge, is due to the fund 1837. and therefore to that extent found the letters orderly proceeded, an tes of decerned; and found the suspenders liable in expenses."

Both parties reclaimed; the suspenders in so far as they were subject ed in a sum of £75 and expenses; the charger in so far as he had not been found entitled to the full sum of £100.

LORD COREHOUSE.—In disposing of this question the first thing to be attended to is the nature of the endowment of the third pastoral charge at Stirling. The Magistrates and Council being satisfied that a third charge was required at Stirling resolved to make an adequate provision, and to apply to the Presbytery to revive and institute the third charge. They did so, and the Presbytery revived it charge, upon the express condition of the Council binding themselves "to make up the stipend of the third charge to £200 per annum." The Council agreed to this condition, and exercised the right of patronage, which they had expressly reserved to themselves in the arrangement, by presenting to the third charge, a revived; and the existence of their obligation to pay a stipend of £200 is repeatedly referred to in their subsequent minutes relative to succeeding ministers. The Council have reaped the full benefit contemplated by them in coming under a obligation for the endowment of the third charge, and I think that endowment was a permanent one. Now I believe it has been settled that ministers are entitled to all the benefits of the Widows' Fund though their stipends are not paid from the teinds; and I think it of no importance, in this question, whether a particular fund or mortification was set apart, yielding annual fruits, as a provision to the minister.
 There was a permanent endowment, under the contract entered into by the Town Council; an endowment as permanent as the charge itself. I think therefore that the statute, as it applies to any vacancy which occurs by the death, translation, or otherwise, of an incumbent in the benefice, applies to this case, because it is, in the sense of the statutes regulating the Widows' Fund, as much a benefice as the stipend arose from teinds, and clearly as much so, as in the case of any second minister who is not paid out of the teinds. Dealing with this third charge, therefore, as with a benefice, the only question is whether vacant stipend is not due to the charger, because it is said that nothing would have been applicable to pious uses by the suspenders, if the statute 54 Geo. III. c. 169, had never passed; and that that statute merely grants vacant stipend to the charger "in so far as it has heretofore been applicable by the patron to pious purposes." Now I consider that the statute is to receive a liberal construction, according to the true meaning and intent of its provisions. And it appears to me that these limiting words were introduced so as to guard against the Ann being supposed to be encroached upon by the statute in favour of the Widows' Fund; and that the statute meant to convey to that fund the whole vacant stipend except what fell under the Ann. If however, the statute was to be construed so as not to give any vacant stipend the fund unless it was such as the patron, but for the statute, would have been bound to apply to pious purposes, it would require more consideration before deciding that the suspenders would have been bound so to apply the sum charged for. I incline, however, to think that they would, and that, after satisfying the Ann, they must have so applied the vacant stipend. In regard to the reclaiming note of the suspenders, I think therefore it ought to be refused; but in regard to that of the charger, as it now appears to me that the permanent annual stipend was £200, the interlocutor should be altered to the effect of sustaining the charge for the full sum of £100 in place of limiting it to £75. I must have overlooked the circumstance that the payment of £200 was a condition of the revival of the charge, when I limited the sum as in the interlocutor under review.

No. 166

Feb. 24, 18
Magistrates
Stirling v.
Gordon.

LORD GILLIES.—I think the charge was well-founded for the full sum of £100. I am at a loss to discover upon what ground the Council could propose at any time to reduce the stipend to £150 in the face of their resolution agreeing to the revival of the third charge, and exercising the patronage of it, after the Presbytery had revived it on the express condition that the endowment of the charge should be £200. The suspenders might as well attempt to reduce the endowment to any sum, however nominal, as to reduce it to £150 in the face of that agreement. They never can exercise their patronage by appointing a minister to this third charge, without the condition taking effect, which was attached to the revival of the third charge.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I think that the note for the suspenders should be refused, and that for the charger sustained. I apprehend that a perpetual benefice was instituted when this third charge was revived. It was not merely the appointment of an individual clergyman which was then in question, but the institution of a permanent charge, and this was so distinctly in the view of the Town-Council that they expressly reserved the patronage to themselves. And supposing that they were not duly to exercise that right of patronage to fill up a vacancy, assuredly I do not conceive that the charge would thereby come to an end, but merely that the jus devolutum would take place, and the Presbytery would present to the benefice. The suspenders, possessing the right of patrons, are liable to the same obligation with other patrons, not to abuse their right, but to administer it fairly. Suppose that the suspenders, though liable in the stipend, had not retained the right of patronage till now, and that a third party was patron. I think such party would have been entitled to insist, during a vacancy, that the suspenders should not possess the stipend, but should apply it to pious purposes. And although the suspenders be themselves the patrons, that does not diminish their liability in this respect.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the interlocutor should only be altered so far as to sustain the charge for the full sum of £100. I look on this third charge as being properly a benefice in the sense of the statutes respecting the Widows' Fund. It was under the agreement between the Town Council and the Presbytery, that the third charge was revived and instituted. No party complained of that agreement, or took the deliverance of the Presbytery to appeal; so that their deliverance had just as much force as if it had been confirmed by the General Assembly. And as to the objection that this is not a benefice because the authority of the Third Court was never interposed, it will be observed that it was not a new charge which was created in 1817, but merely an old charge which was then revived and instituted by the Presbytery. It was made a condition of reviving it, that there should be an annual sum of £200 payable to the incumbent: and though the Town Council appear to have thought they could reduce this to £150, they had no power to do so, and apparently became aware of this themselves. The charge was therefore well-founded, and should be sustained.

Mr. Advocate.

The Court adhered, with the exception of substituting in the interlocutor

168. the sum of £100 for that of £75 sterling; and awarded additional expenses against the suspenders.

1837.

J. and J. N. FORMAN, W.S.—H. INGLIS, W.S.—Agents.

169.

JOHN YOUNG, Suspenders.—D. F. Hope—Patterson.

JOHN JOSEPH CHARLES SHERIDAN, and MANDATARY, Chargers.—

Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Ivory.

Oath on Reference—Extrinsic or Intrinsic.—1. The acceptor of a bill of exchange referred to the oath of an indorser whether he had paid value or not to the indorser; he deposed that he had paid value, and that he did so "partly in money, partly in professional services, and partly" in agreeing to grant a license to the indorser, for using a certain patent-manufacture invented by the indorsee:—Held that the oath was negative of the reference, and that no part of this statement was extrinsic, because "the point referred, being, value or not? it was of no consequence whether the value was of one kind or another; for example, whether it was given in money, in goods, or in services." 2. Observed that if the suspender wished to have a fuller explanation as to the services rendered, it was his business to have examined the charger more minutely than he did.

1837.

PETER YOUNG of London took out a patent for manufacturing vinegar, papier maché, &c. from mangel wurzel, and, in November, 1834, employed John Young, S.S.C. to sell the patent for him, which John Young did to Robert Liddell and Company of Leith, for a price of £500, and one-sixth of the profits which should arise from the patent-manufacture. In remuneration for his employment, John Young, besides his professional charges, was to receive one-fourth of this price from Peter Young. In January, 1835, Peter Young drew on John Young a bill for £50, as "on account of my agreement with Messrs Liddell and Company of Leith;" and in February, 1835, he drew another bill for £25 as for "value received on account of my patent." John Young accepted these bills, and Peter Young indorsed them to John Joseph Charles Sheridan, manufacturing chemist in London. They were not paid when due, as John Young alleged that they were accepted for the accommodation of Peter Young, who was his debtor; that he had never been paid his fourth share of the price of £500 or his professional charges; and that Sheridan gave no value for the bills, but was merely acting for behoof of Peter Young, with whom he was a copartner in reference to the patent. The bills were protested, and the instruments of protest were, by a clerical error, extended in name of John James Charles Sheridan in place of John Joseph Charles Sheridan. Letters of horning were raised; a charge was given; a bill of suspension was presented, followed by answers, and a reference to the oath of the charger, which was taken on commission, at London, before the error in substituting the name James for Joseph was discovered. On the oath being reported, the bill was passed on caution. The charger then ex-ew instruments of protest, setting forth his designation correctly, No. 169. letters of horning were also raised, and a charge given ; intima- Feb. 24, 1837. made to the suspender, at the same time, that the previous charge Young v. to be insisted in, and that the charger was ready to pay the Sheridan. incurred under it. A new bill of suspension was presented and and it was conjoined with the first process of suspension, reserv- questions of expenses. Parties agreed to hold the deposition under the first suspension, as possessing the same legal effect as if under the second. The matter referred was thus stated :—" The is not an onerous holder of the bills in question. He never gave e for them to the said Peter Young, and merely holds the said er an arrangement with that individual, his copartner, for the of trying to obtain payment, and thus to defeat the just claims omplainer."

leposition negatived the allegation that the charger was a partner Young, or held the bills for the purpose of defeating any claim as John Young and Peter Young themselves ; and the deponent being ated " If he ever gave any value for the said bills to the said Peter depones that he did." The charger further deponed " That he ve value to the acceptor John Young, for both or either of the said he gave value to the indorser, the said Peter Young. Depones, deponent gave value, partly in money, partly in professional ser- aiding him to complete the patent taken out by the said Peter and partly in a license agreed to be granted to the said Peter for an invention of the deponent's, for an improvement in the ture of malt, for which invention the deponent holds a patent." ath was taken without any party attending for the suspender ; ad received due notice to attend, and had transmitted written in- ories to the Commissioner, which were put to the charger. In e to the terms of the oath, the suspender pleaded, 1st, That the t of value having been given in professional services, and an nt to grant a license as to the malt-patent, was extrinsic, and re- be proved aliunde ; 2d, That if such a statement of value was le, the particulars should have been more fully specified wherein ed value consisted ; and 3d, That the use of the malt-patent was d to have ever been taken by Peter Young, so that it did not e had ever received that item of the value at all. The charger l, 1st, That the question referred was, value or not ; and that he essly sworn he gave value. He was ready to answer all perti- rrogatories as to the kind of value given, and had done so ; but ot liable to do more than this, or to lead a proof of value, whe- nisted in money, in goods, in professional services, or other- ly. The suspender had full notice to attend at the examination, at his own fault if he did not cause every requisite inquiry to be t in reality he had done so, and the deposition was full and 1837. 1837. satisfactory; and 3d, That the value in regard to the malt-patent was stated to be the actual granting of a license to use it, which value was not affected by the circumstance whether Peter Young used the license or not, after obtaining it.

The Lord Ordinary "decerned against the defender, in terms of the libel; found the pursuer liable to the defender in the expenses which were incurred with regard to the first Bill of Suspension, in consequence of the pursuer being erroneously designed in the charge; and found the defender liable to the pursuer in all the expenses subsequently incurred." *

The suspender reclaimed.

LORD GILLIES.—I can have no doubt that the interlocutor should be adhered to. This would be an important case indeed, if it could be shaken.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The suspender should have made fuller inquiry as to the nature of the professional services, at the time, if he was not satisfied with the explanation given. The interlocutor is quite right.

LORD MACMENZIE.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD CORNHOUSE.—I remain of the same opinion as when I pronounced the * "NOTE.—The reason of suspension is, that the pursuer did not give value for the bill in question, which was indorsed to him by Peter Young, and the fact is referred to his oath. He depones, that he did give value to the indorser; and being asked, what the value was? he depones, that 'he gave value partly in money, partly in professional services in aiding him to complete the patent taken out by the said Peter Young, and partly in a license agreed to be granted to the said Peter Young, for an invention of the deponent's, for an improvement in the manufacture of malt; for which invention the deponent holds a patent.' The defender says, that the statement in the oath, with regard to services and the use of the patent, are extrinsic qualities which the pursuer was not entitled to adject. This is plainly a mistake. The present case is not that of an action for money lent, in which the defender, on a reference, admits the loan, but pleads compensation in extinction of it. That is an extrinsic quality; because it would be equivalent to the defender's bringing an action on a separate ground not involved in the first issue, and proving his libel by his own oath. But in this case, the point referred is, value or not? and it is of no consequence whether the value be of one kind or another, for example, whether it was given in money, in goods, or in service. Certainly it could not be relevantly pleaded, that an indorsation was not overruled because the indorsee had been the factor or manager of a company, and received it as part of his wages.

---

"Then, it is said, that the services are not sufficiently specified, but that was the fault of the defender. He ought to have examined the pursuer more minutely upon the subject. Lastly, the defender observes, that part of the value was for the use of a patent, which the pursuer agreed to give to the indorser; and that it is not stated that the indorser had ever obtained the use of the patent. But the value sworn to is the obligation which the pursuer contracted to give the use of the patent. Why the indorser did not avail himself of that obligation, is a point on which the pursuer was not interrogated, and it is doubtful whether he could have been interrogated on the subject, except to the effect of proving, either that he himself had failed to fulfil his obligation, or that the bargain had been rescinded of consent of parties. No attempt of this kind is made, and, therefore, the Court, looking exclusively to what is sworn, must hold, that value was given for the bill, and that it was the value specified in the deposition."

erlocutor under review. The question referred was, value or not? If the suspender thought that the explanation as to the value was not sufficiently minute, he could have put more particular interrogatories than he did.

No. 169.

Feb. 24, 1837
Paget v. Earl of Galloway.

THE COURT adhered, and awarded additional expenses against the suspender.

J. YOUNG, S.S.C.—J. IMRIE—Agents.

SIR ARTHUR PAGET and SIR JAMES R. G. GRAHAM (late Earl of Galloway's Trustees), Pursuers.—Anderson.

No. 170.

EARL of GALLOWAY, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Robertson.

Entail.—Held that no improvement-expenditure by an heir of entail is chargeable under 10 G. III., c. 51, against the succeeding heirs, if the expenditure was made while the entail remained unrecorded.

In 1804, John, Earl of Galloway, executed an entail of his estates containing the requisite prohibitory, irritant, and resolute clauses, to render it effectual against creditors so soon as recorded. He died in 1806, and George, Earl of Galloway, made up titles to the estates as heir of entail and provision under this deed. The entail was not recorded until 1823, prior to which period his Lordship had contracted debts to the amount of £293,903. In the following year a private Act of Parliament was obtained, authorizing the sale of the entailed estates, in respect of their being liable to be adjudged for his Lordship's debts, contracted before the recording of the entail.

Feb. 24, 1837
1st DIVISION
Ld. Fullerton
D.

In 1808, and again in 1812, Lord Galloway had given notices under 10 G. III., c. 51, in reference to improvement-expenditure which he intended to make on the estate and on the mansionhouse. Considerable sums were disbursed in these improvements. His Lordship died in 1834, and left a disposition in favour of the Right Hon. Sir Arthur Paget, and the Right Hon. Sir James Robert George Graham, as trustees, conveying to them specially his claim against the next heir of entail for three-fourths of the improvement-expenditure, which was stated to amount to £32,851. The trustees, founding on 10 G. III., c. 51, raised an action against Randolph, now Earl of Galloway, for payment of three-fourths of this sum, so far as not exceeding six years of the free rents of the estates, which, after deducting the interest of debts affecting them, amounted to about £2024. The defenders, besides defences of a special nature, pleaded, 1st, That no claim for improvement-expenditure, which was made on 10 G. III., c. 51, could lie, on account of expenditure which was made while the entail remained unrecorded; and 2d, That all the expenditure on these improvements, was anterior to 1823, and was provided for under the private Act of Parliament, authorizing sales of the estates for payment of the debts of the late Earl, so that if any part of the improvement-expenditure was now allowed to become a permanent charge.

appeared that it was recorded entails, good against creditors and all the world, which alone were regarded; and the enactments corresponded with this. The amount of expenditure which was made chargeable against the next heirs was defined to be, in reference to the subjects improved, an amount equal to four and two years "free rent of the said entailed estate, after deduction of all public burdens, liferents, and interests of debts which may affect the estate, as the same shall happen to be at the first term of Whitsunday after the death of the heir who expended the money claimed." In order to compute this charge, it was essential to know what debts might affect the estate, so as to deduct the interest, in estimating the free rents. And as these never could be known, where an entail was not recorded, (because then the estate was liable for all the debts of the heir,) it became practically impossible to ascertain the amount of charge against the next heirs. But farther, if the entail was not recorded, and a charge for improvement-expenditure, of the mansionhouse for instance, was made against the next heir, it might happen that the mansionhouse itself should afterwards be adjudged and evicted from that heir, for a debt contracted by the preceding heir-disburser, who had made the expenditure while the entail was not recorded. It would, therefore, be highly unjust, and contrary to the true import of the statute to extend the remedy to unrecorded entails.<sup>1</sup>

The Lord Ordinary "sustained the first plea in law upon the part of the pursuer, and repelled the first and second pleas in law for the defender." *

<sup>1</sup> Fletcher, July 4, 1826 (ante, IV. 788, or new ed. 795); 2 St. 3, 58; 3 Ersk. 8, 25 and 26; Smollett's Creds., May 14, 1807 (Dicty. v. Tailzie, App. No. 12); Nairne, March 10, 1757 (15605).

* "NOTE.—The first plea upon both sides raises the question, Whether an heir holding under a strict entail, but unrecorded, is entitled to avail himself of the provisions of the 10th George III., c. 51, in regard to money expended upon improvements? The Lord Ordinary thinks no sufficient grounds are assigned on the part of the defender for refusing that benefit to an heir so circumstanced. The provisions of the statute in question confer certain privileges on 'the proprietors of entailed estates,' who lay out money on improvements according to the regulations there specified. Even in the strictest and most technical language, an estate is justly said to be entailed, although the entail is not recorded, so that the letter of the statute is against the plea maintained by the defender. Looking at its object and spirit, the case appears to be equally clear. Its object was to enable entailed proprietors who laid out money in improvements to raise a right of credit, to a certain amount, of these improvements in their own persons against the succeeding heirs of entail. According to the expression of the statute, it enables such proprietors to become 'creditors to the succeeding heirs of entail,'—an object which could not be effected at common law, whether the entail was recorded or not. It is true that, in this latter case, debts contracted by the heir in possession might be made good against his successors; but that circumstance, which is the main foundation of the defender's argument, affords no well grounded inference in favour of his attempted limitation of the effect of the statute. For, in the first place, the statute was intended not for the benefit of creditors advancing the money laid out in improvements, but for the benefit of the heir in possession, who 1370. The defender reclaimed. The Court called on the pursuers to the interlocutor, without calling on counsel to support the Recl 1887. Note. Counsel for the pursuers was accordingly heard.

 v. Earl of Argyll.

LORD GILLIES.—I think the interlocutor should be altered. The statute 10 Geo. III. c. 51, was passed for the relief of those heirs on whom the fettered entail were effectually imposed, as against creditors and all others. Then recorded entails alone. Where there is no registration of the entail, every one who advances money to the heir, contracts with a person whom the law will not be neither fettered nor protected by an entail in any question with him. But if entails are duly recorded no money could be raised on the credit of the estate, less the remedy of the statute 10 Geo. III. c. 51, applied to them. It is all different where the entails are left ineffectual against creditors, and there, the remedy was not equally required, and has not, I think, been provided.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion. And I think the other side is well founded also. After getting a private Act of Parliament to pay off Earl's debts, amounting to near £300,000, it appears to me in the circumstances that it would be just a double payment of a part of these debts, if a charge allowed to be good for improvement-expenditure against the present heir.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I think the remedy of the statute 10 Geo. II. applies only to recorded entails, and that every part of the statute shows that it begins by referring specially to entails under 1685, c. 22, and the effect of that statute gives them "when completed and published in the manner directed by the said act," as being "effectual against purchasers, creditors, and others forever." No unrecorded entail can fall under this description; and, indeed, on important respects, an unrecorded entail may be said in law to be no entail. And the reason of the act, when duly attended to, confirms this construction. Where an entail is recorded, then the succession to the estate is for ever fixed to the heirs of entail in their order, and there is obviously justice in enabling the heir in possession who makes improvement-expenditure on the estate, to himself, by a certain procedure, the creditor of succeeding heirs for a certain proportion of that expenditure. If they are subject to that burden, they are benefited by receiving the estate as improved. But if the entail was not re-might lay out his own money for that purpose, which money, in the case of an unrecorded entail, he never could make good against a succeeding heir through the intervention of the statute. 2dly, If the improvements were made by borrowed money, the benefit of the statute, even in the case of an unrecorded entail, is equally apparent. For if the entailed proprietor expressly burdened the estate with the debts so contracted, he must have exposed himself to a decree of irritancy, and if he did not expressly burden the estate, then his separate personal estate must have been made available for them, either directly or in the form of relief, at the instance of the creditors, or in the form of relief, at the instance of the succeeding heirs, so that, even in the case of an unrecorded entail, there is no ground for saying that the provisions of the statute were superfluous or unavailing. On the contrary, they evidently confer on an entailed proprietor, whether the entail is recorded or not, an important benefit, viz. that of securing a right of credit against his successors, for a certain amount of the improvement on an estate understood in law to be his own,—an object which clearly can be attained at common law."

---

then the heir-disburser may leave debts behind him, all of which will affect the estate, and may cause it to be wholly evicted from the succeeding heir. It is impossible therefore to render him the creditor of that succeeding heir for improving an estate or a mansionhouse, which estate or mansionhouse may itself be carried off at any time from such succeeding heir for the debts of the heir-disburser. And there is another clause of the statute which shows that it necessarily refers to recorded entails alone. It is provided by § 15 that a party holding a decree against the next heir, for improvement-expenditure by his deceased predecessor, shall “in all questions of competition for the rents of the entailed estate” “be preferred to the other creditors of the heir of entail who has succeeded to the estate.” Now if the entail was not recorded, it would not be merely on the rents of the estate that such a competition would arise among the creditors; and it seems evident that unless recorded entails alone had been contemplated, a very different phraseology would have been used in the statute. On the whole I am decidedly of opinion that the benefit of the statute extends to recorded entails alone.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It was once held that a judge could not argue from the preamble of a statute, as to the import and effect of the body of that statute; but that view has long since been altered, and it is now admitted that though the statement in the preamble will not control or defeat a substantive enactment in the body of the statute, it is nevertheless an authentic source from which to elucidate its object and meaning. The preamble of the statute 10 Geo. III. c. 51, explicitly refers to entails under 1685, c. 22, and to entails “completed and published in the manner directed by the said act,” so as to be “effectual against purchasers, creditors, and others whatsoever.” I consider, therefore that the claim of the pursuers is without any foundation in the words of the statute; and that, on principle, a claim like theirs was never meant to be sanctioned by the legislature. The object of the statute was to encourage heirs of entail to make improvements on the entailed estates. From the brief and limited interest which an individual heir enjoyed under a strict entail, it was equitable, when he made improvement-expenditure, to give him some relief against succeeding heirs who were sure to reap the benefit of it. But it would not have been equitable to allow such expenditure to be reared up as a debt against them, unless they were secured in the enjoyment of the subject improved, which they could not be in the case of an unrecorded entail. After the death of the heir-disburser, any creditor of his might by a special adjudication sweep away the mansionhouse, or estate, with all its improvements. I cannot therefore see any ground for subjecting the heirs succeeding to an heir-disburser, in liability for improvement-expenditure made by him while the entail was unrecorded. And there is no hardship in this, for any heir may record the entail at any time; and sibi imputet if he does not choose to do so. I am, therefore, decidedly of opinion that the interlocutor should be altered.

THE COURT were understood also to concur with the Lord President as to the separate defence founded on the circumstances under which the private Act of Parliament had been passed for paying the late Earl's debts. Their Lordships accordingly altered and assoilzied the defender, with expenses.

171.

1837.

1837.

MRS DARLING and CHILDREN, Pursuers,—G. G. Bell.
JAMES ADAMSON, Defender.—M'Neill—H. Bruce—Neaves.

Sale—Warrandice.—Trustees were directed, after the lapse of a specified period, to expose certain lands to sale, and to bind the representatives of the truster in absolute warrandice; the sale did not take place at the time appointed, delays having been interposed chiefly at the instance of one of the trustees; in an action to have this trustee ordained to concur in a sale, the Court found that the trustees were bound to proceed immediately to expose the lands in terms of the trust-deed; thereafter articles of roup were approved of by the Court containing a clause of warrandice in terms thereof; objections having been stated by intending purchasers to the sufficiency of the title to the lands, which were not without foundation.—Held, that the lands must be exposed to sale, under the conditions as to warrandice in the articles of roup, and that it was incompetent in the circumstances to take measures, by declarator or otherwise, for removing the objections to the title.

1837.

By Division.
Jeffrey.
B.

By trust-deed dated in 1805, the late Mr Stormonth authorized and directed his trustees, amongst whom were the pursuer, Mrs Darling, and the defender, Mr Adamson, after the lapse of ten or twelve years, to dispose of his lands of Inverchroskie and others by private sale or public roup, to grant the necessary deeds, and "to bind the truster in absolute or other warrandice, as the nature of the right should require." Stormonth thereafter died. Some years having elapsed after the period mentioned in the deed had expired, and no sale having taken place, Mrs Darling and her husband raised action against the other surviving trustee, Adamson, concluding to have him ordained to concur with them in selling the lands, as provided for by the deed, and to do or cause to be done whatever should be necessary "for rendering the title of the trustees valid and sufficient, in case the title under which they at present hold the lands should turn out in any respect insufficient or objectionable." The Court found (Nov. 17, 1830) that Adamson was bound to proceed immediately to sell the lands in terms of the trust-deed, and with the benefit of the warrandice thereby authorized. Steps were taken accordingly, but the sale was delayed from various causes, particularly from doubts as to the trustees' ability to give a good title to purchasers. Articles of roup were prepared, and approved of by the Court (July 9, 1835), which provided that the trustees should be bound and obliged to grant a valid disposition of the lands to a purchaser, containing, inter alia, a "clause of warrandice from fact and deed as to themselves, and binding the heirs and representatives of the said James Stormonth in absolute warrandice."

A remit was made by the Lord Ordinary to Mr Richard Mackenzie, W.S., to report as to the objections to the title stated by intending purchasers. The reporter was of opinion that the title to Inverchroskie was doubtful, unless the defect should be held to have been cured by prescription, but that as Mr Stormonth's representatives were liable in absolute warrandice, this doubt might safely be disregarded.

Delays being still opposed by Adamson to the sale, the pursuers, after being allowed to state the circumstances in a minute, moved the Lord Ordinary to remit to Mr Mackenzie to re-expose the lands of Inverchros-
 No. 171.
 Feb. 24, 1835.
 Darling v. Adamson.
 kie at a reduced upset price. This motion was opposed by Adamson, who maintained that it was still competent and was now proper that steps should be taken for removing what objections might exist to the title to the lands in question, and that a remit should accordingly be made to Mr Mackenzie to take the necessary measures for this purpose.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor and note : *
 —“ The Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of this minute, with the answers thereto, and heard parties thereon, and on the motion of the pursuers for a renewed warrant, or order to sell, and made avizandum with the whole process, finds, 1mo, That it is not now competent, consistently with the final interlocutors in the cause, and especially with the interlocutor of 9th July, 1835, approving of the amended articles of roup, and the report of Mr Jollie thereon, to order (or allow) the lands to be exposed under any other conditions or provisions as to warrandice, or otherwise, than those distinctly expressed in the articles of roup, thus finally approved of ; or at least that it is not competent to vary or depart from these conditions, except on the ground of such a change of circumstances as might absolutely require such a variation : Finds, 2do, That the legal objections to which it is surmised in the answers to the minute, that the title to the lands may be liable, can in no way be considered as such a change of circumstances, in respect that the whole facts and circumstances on which such objections are raised, have confessedly been from the very beginning in the knowledge of all the parties : Finds, 3tio, That the lands must therefore be exposed under the condition of the purchaser being entitled to the warrandice specified in the said articles of roup, and that

---

* “ The Lord Ordinary conceives that he has no power to vary the articles of roup, or the obligations of the parties under them, after they have been adjusted in contraditorio, and approved of by final interlocutors : But he thinks it right to say that, if it were open to him so to vary them, he would not be in the least degree disposed to do so. The trust-deed empowers the trustees to bind the trustee, the late Mr Stormonth himself, in absolute warrandice to purchasers ; and since his death, the only equivalent security is consequently the whole body of his representatives. But, wherever representatives are bound or liable as such, it is understood to be certain that they are all liable singuli in solidum to third parties, though entitled to relief rateably inter se. As Mr Adamson appeared to dispute this maxim, or at least the application of it to his case, it has been thought right to express it in the interlocutor ; and it will be borne in mind that, besides his fourth share of the lands now in dispute, he has succeeded to a very large portion of Mr Stormonth's property, in which the other parties have no participation. As he intended a purpose to exercise his undoubted right to take this interlocutor to review, the Lord Ordinary thought it best to postpone the day of sale till after the time when his reclaiming note, if he shall be advised to present one, must be lodged ; and at the same time, for the sake of the other parties, to put the other disputed matters between them into the shape of findings, on which a final judgment may be at once obtained.”

171. the disposition to be granted to the said purchaser in terms thereof must accordingly contain a clause binding the trustees as such in warrandice from fact and deed, and the representatives of the late Mr Stormonth in absolute warrandice : Finds, 4to, That the import and effect of the latter part of this clause will be to bind not only the parties to this action, but all who truly represent the late Mr Stormonth in the character of successors titulo lucrativo, or otherwise, singuli in solidum or jointly and severally, to the said purchasers in the first instance : But finds, 5to, That this joint liability in respect to the purchasers will not in any degree affect or impair the right of any of the said representatives, who may be subjected, or sought to be subjected therein, in the event of eviction, to be relieved by the other representatives, rateably or in proportion to the shares they may have obtained of Mr Stormonth's succession : And farther, and in respect that the attempt to dispose of these lands by private bargain has not succeeded, and that the sale thereof has been very long and inconveniently delayed, remits of new to Mr Richard Mackenzie, to re-expose the said lands of Inverchroskie and Whitefield, at the former upset price of £15,000, and that upon the 3d day of September next to come (if not previously disposed of by private bargain, with the consent of both parties), in terms of the articles and conditions of roup above-mentioned, with such variations only as to the terms of entry and payment of the price, as may be necessary in consequence of this change in the time of sale."

Adamson reclaimed and contended that there was nothing incompetent in having the title put in a proper state before the lands were sold, all he required being that the title should be mended, not that the articles of roup should be in the least altered, or the clause of warrandice struck out; that it was very reasonable that the trustees should have it in their power to sell with a good title, if the Court could enable them so to do; and that it was not expedient to turn the sale of the lands into a matter of speculation and dispose of them at a lower price than would otherwise be given, in consequence of the risk of the title being bad.

The pursuers answered that according to the trust-deed of Mr Stormonth the lands should have been sold in 1807; that the defender had no interest in the matter except as trustee, and as such he was not entitled to state any objection but was bound to sell in terms of the deed and with the warrandice thereby conveyed; and that the question of warrandice was already settled by the interlocutor of 17th November, 1830.

LORD GLENLEE.—I take it to be finally settled that by the articles of roup absolute warrandice must be given by Mr Stormonth's representatives; and it is premature to say how the warrandice when incurred may strike against different individuals. As to the title, I have doubts about the incompetency of stating an objection to it if the objection be a good one. Supposing the people on taking advice are told that the title is not good, I am not sure that the defender will justified in making this demand, especially seeing the Lord Ordinary has No. 171.

 d to Mr Mackenzie to report on the objection to the title. He has reported s that the objection to the title of Inverchroskie is not yet obviated by pre- Feb. 24, 1837.
 n. He thinks that an action of declarator would be all that is necessary, Darling v.
 it would not be advisable to stir. But can we force people to be prudent Adamson.
 their will?

D MEADOWBANK.—I have considerable doubt. It would be strange if we compel parties to go on with the sale in the face of an objection to the title ;
 m not sure whether old Stormonth did not anticipate all this when he order-trustees to expose the lands to sale and absolute warrandice to be given.
 w the state of his own title and probably was aware of the objection, and made the trust-deed in these terms, binding himself and his heirs in absolute lice. I am inclined to think that the interlocutor of Court in 1830 has the point that the sale is to take place immediately. At the end of so long I have difficulty in saying that any farther delay should be allowed. An of declarator, which is the remedy contemplated for removing the objection, ring a hornet's nest about these parties.

D MEDWYN.—I also have doubts. The defender is both a trustee and bene-interested in the deed ; and as there now seems to be no great risk in the the title, and this question is brought forward at so late a period,—the very which has taken place tending to remove the risk, I am not inclined to accede emand. I agree with Lord Meadowbank that Stormonth must have been of any objection to his title, and I also think that the defender must have of it. At this late hour, therefore, I am not inclined to listen to his proposal.

D JUSTICE-CLERK.—I had from the first an impression in favour of the in-or. Why was not this objection brought forward at an earlier period, when have been put with more force ? The matter just comes to this, that it for the parties who make offers to consider what abatement they should their offers in consequence of the risk. Looking to the whole circumstan-ink there is little risk run ; and considering the provision in the trust-deed lute warrandice, it seems clear that this objection could not have escaped ce of any of the parties concerned. I am for adhering to the interlocutor.

D GLENLEE.—One thing reconciles me to the opinion of the rest of the viz. that the trustees could not have considered it necessary to perfect the ewise they would themselves have proceeded to raise a declarator. So we air own confession that they were satisfied that things should just remain as re, and that it was not necessary to take this step.

THE COURT adhered to the first four findings of the interlocutor, and recalled the fifth finding as premature, reserving all questions of expenses.

J. S. DABLING, W.S.—D. TURNBULL, W.S.—Agents.

172.

1837.

EDWARD HENRY, Pursuer.—*D. P. Hope—A. McNeill.*WILLIAM MATHER, Defender.—Patison.

Summons—Personal Objection—Process.—The second year of the reign of Geo. IV., ended on Jan. 28, 1822: A petitory summons for payment of an account, raised in name of Geo. IV., bore in gremio to be "given under our signet, at Edinburgh, the 27th day of January, in the second year of our reign, 1823;" it also bore this marking, "27th Jan. 1823," in the hand-writing of the under-keeper of the signet; an execution, dated "twenty-seventh day of January, eighteen hundred and twenty-three years," was indorsed on the summons, citing the defender to the "twenty-fifth day of February next to come:" peremptory defences were lodged denying the debt, and not objecting to the regularity of the summons; and various procedure followed, at long intervals, during a space of above 10 years, after which the defender objected that the summons was a nullity, in respect of a fundamental error in the date of signeting, as the year of the King's reign was stated to be the "second," whereas the year of grace was stated to be 1823;—Held that, if a summons bore one distinct date, in reference to the King's reign, or the year of grace, an error in the other date did not necessarily amount to a nullity, though it might occasion ambiguity, and found a dilatory plea, if timefully stated: that, in the whole circumstances, the defender had recognised the summons as bearing the date of Jan. 27, 1823, as its true date, and that he was now barred from recurring to any objection in reference to the date.

1837.

FISHER.

Horton.

1.

EDWARD HENRY, flesher in Edinburgh, raised an action before the Court of Session, against William Mather, also flesher there, concluding for payment of an account. The summons ran in name of Geo. IV., and at the end it bore these words, "Given under our signet, at Edinburgh, the 27th day of January, in the second year of our reign, 1823." It was signed "John Grahame," and there was a date prefixed, in the hand-writing of the under-keeper of the signet, which was "27th Jan. 1823." The warrant of citation, agreeably to the style then in use, authorized Mather to be charged, on 27 days' warning, to compare before the Lords, "upon                      day of                      next to come." There was an execution indorsed on the summons, which bore date the "twenty-seventh day of January, eighteen hundred and twenty-three years," and cited Mather to appear on "the twenty-fifth day of February next to come." The execution referred to the within written libelled summons, but did not specially recite the date of the summons. The summons was called in Court on May 16th, 1823. It was taken out to see, and on 24th May, was returned, with peremptory defences, denying that the debt was due. It was then enrolled in the ordinary action roll, and on 30th May a debate took place, according to the existing practice. The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor: "Having heard parties' procurators, appoints the pursuer, within eight days, to give in a condescendence, framed in terms of the act of sederunt, of the facts and circumstances which he avers and offers to prove in support of his libel." The action was allowed to fall asleep without any condescendence being lodged. Henry brought a waking in 1832, which was taken out to see, and returned without defences. In March, 1833, as the former rdinary had been removed to the Inner House, Henry petitioned No. 172.

 mit to a new Lord Ordinary (Fullerton), which was duly intima-Mather's agent. On March 8th, 1833, the action was remitted to Feb. 25, 1837.
 Fullerton, after which it again fell asleep, without any farther pro- Henry v. being had in it. Henry brought another waking in March, Mather.

which was taken out to see, and returned without defences on May 5. Henry now lodged the condescendence which had been ory the interlocutor of May 30th, 1823, and, having enrolled the he Lord Ordinary, on Jan. 16, 1836, pronounced this interlocu-Holds the process as awakened, in virtue of the summons of wa-produced, and appoints answers to be lodged to this condescend-within fourteen days from this date." Mather lodged answers, as

Henry then applied for an order to revise the condescendence vers, to which Mather took the objection, that the whole proces funditus null ab initio, in respect of an error in the date of the s, which was as fatal as an error or erasure in a date in an instrusasine. It was stated in words, and in gremio of the summons, been given under the signet in the "second" year of the reign ge IV., which ended on 28th January, 1822. But the summons e to be given under the signet on 27th Jan. 1823, and these con-y dates were destructive of each other. The summons was, e, in the same situation as if it were totally without date, in which was a mere nullity, and could not be sustained to any effect what-
 And in regard to the subsequent procedure, that could not cure a nullity, which had the necessary effect of placing parties on the ting as if they attempted to dispense with a summons altogether, e into Court spontaneously; which was altogether incompetent.
 ver, any one of the two dates on the summons could prevail over r, it was that which was written in words at length, and purported ss the "second" year of the reign; and so it had been decided.<sup>2</sup> his date was above a year and day prior to the execution, the s had fallen, as a warrant of citation, and there was no legal citar given; and on that ground also the subsequent procedure was nwarrantable as if it had followed on a summons having no date

r answered that, since there was a discrepancy between the two the year of grace, and the year of the King's reign, as given in nons, which arose from a clerical error, there might have been taking an objection, if this had been timefully done. But there

---

<sup>1</sup> Feb. 13, 1835 (ante, XIII., 461.)

<sup>2</sup> March 5, 1829 (ante, VII., 547); Cooper, July 4, 1833 (ante, XI.,

April, June 28, 1826 (ante, IV., 766; new ed. 774); Cumming, Nov.
 (ante, XII., 61.)

172. was no true analogy between this case and that of a sasine; and the error here was of that nature which might be cured by the consent of parties.
 1837. The defender had lodged peremptory defences, without taking any objection, and, after so much lapse of time and repeated wakenings, had lodged answers to the pursuer's condescendence before objecting, so that he was now as effectually barred by his acts and deeds from taking the objection, as if he had barred himself by an express writing from doing so.

Minutes of debate were ordered, after which, the Lord Ordinary, "in respect that no objection to the summons was originally stated by the defender, that peremptory defences were given in, and various other steps of procedure have taken place during a course of years, inconsistent with any other supposition than that the defender recognised the summons as bearing the date of the 27th day of January, 1823,—Repelled the objection, and in respect the objector declined to acquiesce, found him liable in expenses to the pursuer." *

Mather reclaimed.

LORD GILLIES.—The interlocutor is quite right. The blunder in the summons did not amount to a nullity, and as the defender, in place of availing himself of it, lodged peremptory defences, he waived his right of objecting, and cannot do so now.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion. After all the procedure which

---

* "NOTE.—In this case, the summons proceeds in the name of 'George the Fourth,' &c. and the date is in the following terms:—'Given under our signet, the 27th day of January, and second year of our reign, 1823.' It is signed, 'John Grahame,' with date prefixed, 27th January, 1823, and the execution bears the same date. As the second year of the reign of George the Fourth terminated on the 28th of January, 1822, there is clearly a disagreement between the date of the summons, by reference to the year of the King's reign, and the date in figures 1823. There is, therefore, an error in either the one or the other; and had nothing farther taken place upon this summons, and the objection been originally stated, the Lord Ordinary must have been bound by the decision, Cooper v his Creditors, 4th July, 1833, to hold that the date, by the year of the King's reign, was the overruling date, and that an error in it could not be remedied by a reference to the subjoined date, by the year of God. But here no objection was taken to the date; peremptory defences were given in, and various procedure took place absolutely inconsistent with any other supposition, than that the defender understood the 27th of January, 1823, to be the true date of the summons, and that the error lay in a misstatement of the year of the King's reign. As the summons apparently contained two dates, according to one of which, the defender was not bound to make appearance, while, according to the other, he was so bound; and as he did choose to make appearance without stating any objection, the Lord Ordinary must hold him to have admitted, by implication, that the 27th of January, 1823, was the true date; and as there seems no reason to question that this is a point upon which an admission may validly be made, the Lord Ordinary does not think, that after a lapse of ten years, and after all the procedure has taken place, the defender can be allowed to invalidate the whole of that procedure by the critical objection in point of form, which, if competent at all, ought to have been stated at the outset, and which evidently cannot receive effect now, without the risk of very great injury to the pursuer."

was taken place under this summons, it is quite out of the question to allow the No. 175 defender to plead this objection now.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I concur. In the summons, as it originally stood, there Feb. 25, 18 was an ambiguity as to its true date. But if the defender knew it to be accord- Campbell v.
ing to the truth of the case that the summons was signeted in the third, and not Campbell.
in the second year of the King's reign; and that 27th January, 1823, as stated on the summons, was the actual date of signeting, there was nothing to prevent him from appearing and admitting the summons to be what it really was. He was not bound to take advantage of the clerical error, and if he waived it, he just did what my honest litigant might very well do. In the circumstances I think his conduct did amount to a waiver of the objection; and as it was an objection such as he might completely waive, he cannot now be permitted to recur to it.

LORD CORNHUSE.—If the want of either of the two dates in a summons referring respectively to the King's reign, and to the year of grace, were a nullity, the plea of the defender might still be in time, and it might be para judicis to refuse to sustain procedure on such a summons. But there is no such nullity. This case is different from that of an instrument of sasine, in which it has been held essential to have these two dates inserted, and both of them accurate. That was so decided consistently with the immemorial practice for centuries. But although it is the common practice in summonses to express a two-fold date, it is enough if a summons bears one distinct date, and there is no nullity although there be only that one. When this summons came first here, the defender might have said that one of the dates was right, but the other was wrong, and he could not tell which was right and which was wrong. If he had maintained this in limine, it would have been a good dilatory plea. But he did not do this. He pleaded peremptory defences; and procedure has followed, at intervals, during a space of about 10 years, so that it is impossible for him now to take the objection, just because the error did not amount to a nullity, and he by his conduct has waived the right of objecting, which would have been originally in his power.

THE COURT adhered, and awarded additional expenses against the reclamer.

R. JOHNSTON, W.S.—J. PATISON, Jun. W.S.—Agents.

Mrs SUSANNAH CAMPBELL, and HUSBAND, and OTHERS, Pursuers.— No. 173.

D. F. Hope—Thomson.

CHARLES CAMPBELL and TRUSTEES, Defenders.—M'Neill—Patton.

Record—Process.—Circumstances in which the Court recalled the interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary, making avizandum with a process, preparatory to closing the record; and remitted to his Lordship to allow a farther revival of papers, and to use any diligence which might be necessary for that object.

In May, 1835, Mrs Susannah Campbell of Sonachan, with concur- Feb. 25, 1837 one of her husband, as one of the substitute heirs under a deed of en- 1st Division tailed, raised an action, along with other substitute heirs, to declare an in- Ld. Fullerton terdict, and forfeiture of the estate, against Charles Campbell of Combie, 2. and in possession. Defences were lodged in June, 1836. This was 173. followed by a condescendence lodged at the second box-day in the autumn vacation; by answers on 5th December; revised condescendence (1837. on 15th January, 1837, and revised answers on 5th February. The pursuers then moved for avizandum, preparatory to closing the record, which was met by the defender with a motion for a diligence, with a view to a farther revisal. The Lord Ordinary "refused the motion, hoc statu, and made avizandum with the process preparatory to the parties closing the record." *

The defender reclaimed, and prayed for a diligence against havers, or at least for permission to re-revise his answers.

It was explained to the Court, that owing to the sudden death, in autumn, of the agent who was originally employed to conduct the defence, and owing to the confusion in which his papers were left, the defender had been exposed to unusual difficulty in making up the record; and that very recently, a large mass of papers had been sent to the new agent, the inspection of which had suggested the necessity both of re-revising, and of asking for a diligence. The defender also maintained generally, that considering the very important interest at stake, and that only one revisal had yet been allowed, he was entitled, independently of any specialities, to a farther revisal.

THE COURT, and especially LORDS MACKENZIE and COREHOUSE,

* "NOTE.—It has been determined in various cases, that there is no absolute incompetency in granting, during the preparation of the record, a diligence for the recovery of writings, which might be recoverable after it was closed, in modus probationis. The ground upon which this has been done is, that the production of the writings was necessary in the particular circumstances of the case, to enable the party to make his averments.

"Even as so limited, the practice frequently leads to great delay, and to great unnecessary prolixity of statement.

"But the present case is very different. Every party is bound to know at least whether he is enabled to make his averments or not. Now, here the defender answered the condescendence and revised his answers without any call for writings, and it was not till the record was completed by the giving in of his revised answers, that he met the motion of the pursuer for avizandum with a motion for a diligence, without alleging any circumstance newly emerging or coming to his knowledge as the ground for such an application.

"The abuse of the power of revisal is already become an intolerable grievance. It too often happens that the parties take no very serious consideration of the statements on which they ultimately mean to rest, until they have exhausted all the epithets, simple and compound, by which their multiplied pleadings can be designed.

"But the abuse would be increased tenfold if the present application were sanctioned, and if a party, after admitting by the clearest implication that the production of writings was not necessary to enable him to prepare the record, were to be held entitled to demand a diligence, on the simple statement that it might possibly enable him to amend or alter those averments on which he had already put the case.

"The defender may ultimately get the production now sought in modus probationis, but the Lord Ordinary is clearly of opinion that his demand must hoc statu be refused."

expressed their concurrence in the general observations of the Lord Ordinary in his note. But, in the particular circumstances of the case, their Lordships held it expedient to recal the interdictor, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to allow a farther revisal, and to grant such diligence as might be necessary for that purpose.*

No. 173.
Feb. 25, 1837.
Macgregor v.
Macgregor.

J. W. MACKENZIE, W.S.—H. GRAHAM, W.S.—Agents.

ROBERT MACGREGOR, Petitioner.—G. G. Bell.
MRS JEAN HOWIE or MACGREGOR, Respondent.—R. Thomson.

No. 174.

restment—Aliment—Husband and Wife.—The wife of a retired barrack-r, living in separation from her husband, had been found entitled, by decree of the Commissaries, to an aliment of £40 yearly out of his pension, which was regularly paid; having arrested her husband's funds in security and for payment of annuity, the Court recalled the arrestments, on the husband producing a discharge by the wife of the sums of aliment already due, together with an assignation in her favour authorising payment of the £40, and a certificate by the provost-marshal in the barrack department that this allowance would be made good to the QUEL of the case reported ante, XIV. 707.

After the arrestments used at the instance of the respondent, Mrs Macgregor, had been recalled (March 11, 1836), various communings took place, without any result, in regard to the security to be given by the husband, the petitioner Macgregor, for payment of the yearly aliment of £40 awarded by the Commissaries. No sum of aliment was past due, and Macgregor was in solvent circumstances. Thereafter Macgregor again used arrestments in the hands of Sir William Pines and Company, “in security and for payment of the foresaid aliment of £40, at the terms and in the proportions specified in the Commissaries’ decret;” and she followed up this diligence by an action of coming.

Macgregor then presented a petition, praying for recal of the new arrestments, “and that without caution, or at least either upon the petitioner granting a proper authority, so as to enable the said Jean Howie Macgregor to uplift the pension due to him, to the extent of the an-

In the course of the discussion, LORD GILLIES took occasion to repeat a censure which his Lordship has frequently passed, on the omission to print the dates of the decrees or documents laid before the Court. His Lordship also expressed his disapprobation of a suggestion by the Dean of Faculty, that the whole series of interdicts pronounced by a Lord Ordinary, in the Outer House, should be printed and laid before the Court, along with a reclaiming note, as it was often important that the Court should thus see the previous history of the case. The other Judges concurred to concur with Lord Gillies in regard to both of these points.

174. nuity claimed by her, or upon the petitioner finding caution for the annuities, on account of which the arrestments complained of have been used." Major v. Major, 1837.

Major v. Major.

In support of the prayer of his petition, he pleaded—

1. The arrestments were incompetently or unwarrantably used, in respect no aliment or annuity was due at the date of the arrestment, whilst the petitioner, as the debtor, was neither insolvent nor vergens ad inopiam. The cases of Macdonald<sup>1</sup> (Jan. 15, 1811), and Lockhart v. Sharp<sup>2</sup> (Nov. 13, 1828), where arrestments for aliment at the instance of wives against their husbands were sanctioned by the Court, differed from the present case in so far as the husband was either insolvent at the date of the arrestments, or in such circumstances as fully justified an arrestment either for arrears or for future aliment.

2. Mrs Macgregor's arrestments are, in the circumstances, unnecessary, nimious, and oppressive.

Mrs Macgregor in answer contended, inter alia, that the arrestments complained of were perfectly competent and regular, having been used in execution for a debt constituted by an extracted decree, for which Macgregor was liable from the date of that decree, though it was exigible only for the periods and at the terms specified therein; that she was entitled to be adequately secured in her annuity, in default of which security the present diligence had been used.

THE COURT were of opinion that the arrestments ought to be recalled, but that the respondent was entitled to security for the future payments of her aliment; and accordingly pronounced the following interlocutor:—

"The Lords having considered this petition with the answers and heard counsel thereon, upon the petitioner producing a discharge by the respondent of the sums of aliment already due, together with an assignation or other proper deed in favour of the respondent, by which she will be duly authorised and enabled to obtain payment of £40 yearly, out of the pension receivable by the petitioner as a retired officer in the Barrack department of the army, with a certificate or other document by the proper officer in that department that the said allowance of £40 will be made good to the respondent, and that by two half yearly payments, recall the arrestments complained of and decern."

SCOTT, RYMER, and SCOTT, S.S.C.—W. HUNT, W.S.—Agents.

<sup>1</sup> F.C.

<sup>2</sup> Ante, VII. 1.

ANDREW AITKEN, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—J. Anderson.

JAMES FINLAY and OTHERS, Defenders.—D. F. Hope—Penney.

No. 175.

Feb. 25, 1837

Aitken v.
Finlay.

Reparation.—A party executing diligence on the regular decree of a competent court cannot be sued for damages, although the decree should be ultimately found to be erroneous, and although steps had been taken at the time of using the diligence for bringing it under reduction.

THE pursuer Aitken brought an action before the Magistrates of Glasgow, Feb. 25. 1837 against the defenders Finlay and Nelson, which was decided in favour of the defenders, and decree for expenses allowed to go out in name of Barlas, their agent. Prior to the decree for expenses being obtained, Aitken had taken steps for bringing a reduction of the judgment of the Magistrates, the summons in which was executed 8th March, 1834. Barlas having extracted his decree, charged Aitken upon letters of caution raised thereon; of which charge a bill of suspension was passed, but on caution only, and it subsequently fell from no caution being found. Thereafter, letters of caption having been taken out, Aitken was incarcerated on the 18th June. He then presented a bill of suspension and liberation, which was remitted by the Inner House to be passed upon juratory caution; and he was liberated from prison accordingly before the middle of July. The action of reduction above-mentioned was proceeded with, and on 17th February, 1835, the Lord Ordinary reduced the Magistrates' decree. His Lordship's interlocutor was acquiesced in.

In these circumstances Aitken raised action against Finlay and Nelson, and also against Barlas, narrating the grounds of his action before the Magistrates of Glasgow, the proceedings had therein and in the subsequent process of reduction, the steps of diligence instituted by Barlas, and his incarceration, and alleging that "the pursuer's imprisonment and detention in jail were wrongous, illegal, and oppressive, in so far as there is no just claim or debt due by the pursuer to the said defenders, or either of them; but, on the contrary, the defenders Finlay and Nelson are largely indebted to the pursuer on the transaction out of which the proceedings arose;" from which proceedings and imprisonment he averred that he had suffered injury; concluding to have the defenders ordained to make payment of a sum in name of damages and solatium.

In defence against the action it was maintained, 1st, That the proceedings complained of afforded no relevant ground for a claim of damages, the defenders being legally entitled to use them, and they being perfectly regular. 2d, That in regard to Finlay and Nelson the claim of damages is farther excluded on the separate ground, that as the decree for expenses in question was obtained and followed out by Barlas for his own behoof, they could not in any shape be made answerable for the consequences.

175. A record having been made up and the cause remitted to the jury, the following draft-issue was prepared, the defenders contending before the jury-clerks that the pursuer was not entitled to have any issue sent to the jury; "Whether, on or about the 18th day of June, 1834, the defenders, or any of them, wrongfully apprehended and imprisoned in the jail of Glasgow, or wrongfully caused to be apprehended and imprisoned in the said jail, or wrongfully detained, or wrongfully caused to be detained the pursuer in the said jail from on or about the said day till on or about the day of July, 1834, or during any part of the said period, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer."

The cause having returned before the Lord Ordinary, the defender moved his Lordship to disallow the issue, whereupon minutes of debate were ordered as to the relevancy thereof and generally of the action of damages.

Pleaded for the Pursuer—

Where a party has carried on judicial proceedings unsuccessfully, he is virtually subjected in damages by having expenses awarded against him, damages and expenses being synonymous terms;<sup>1</sup> but in point of principle the pursuer is as much entitled to reparation for the damage he has sustained by the wrongous imprisonment suffered by him on a decree ultimately found to be bad, and still more as the diligence in question was put in execution while he was in course of bringing under review the proceedings on which it was founded. It is no sufficient defence to an action against the party using such decree, however it might be to an action against an officer executing it, to say that the decree while standing unreduced was a sufficient warrant for the imprisonment; the party is liable for any fundamental objection to the decree, and this imports essentially a heavier responsibility than any mere irregularity in the proceedings, which is an ordinary ground for damages; but no objection can be more fundamental than this, that instead of being creditors, the defenders were in point of fact debtors to the pursuer, and were wrongously resisting his just claim at the time the decree was taken. The view for which the pursuer contends is likewise in accordance with the train of decisions.<sup>2</sup>

Pleaded for the Defenders—

In enforcing the decree in question the defender Barlas was exercising a clear and undoubted legal right. No claim of damages arises in consequence of a party having carried on judicial proceedings which are ultimately unsuccessful, provided they are regular,<sup>3</sup> and this rule has been extended to steps of an executorial character, such as the present, duly No. 175.

<sup>1</sup> Inst. iv. 16, 1; Stat. 1592, c. 142; Dallas's Styles.

<sup>2</sup> Leslie, Nov. 18, 1761 (M. 11749); Clark v. Thomson (1 Murray, 161); Milhollan v. Dalrymple, Dec. 21, 1826 (F.C. and ante, V. 170, new ed. 155); Gordon's Executors v. Dunlop, July 13, 1825 (3 Murray, 515).

<sup>3</sup> Cree v. Collier, Nov. 27, 1821 (ante, I. 169, new ed. 162); Gordon v. Royal Bank, Dec. 19, 1826 (ante, V. 164, new ed. 150).

 and regularly taken in the course of such proceedings.<sup>1</sup> The same prin- Feb. 25, 1837.
 iple is applied in cases where the proceedings were mainly of an ex Altken v. parte description, and which therefore might be said in a peculiar sense Finlay.
 to be taken periculo petentis, it being held in regard to such proceedings that something extrinsic to the merits of the cause, and of the nature of malice and mala fides, was indispensable to found a claim of damages;<sup>2</sup> a fortiori, therefore, no claim of damages can arise in the present case on account of the enforcing of a decree regularly obtained in foro con-tentioso.

Thereafter the Lord Ordinary, without having the record closed, made avizandum with the cause, and issued the subjoined note.*

<sup>1</sup> Graham v. Dundas, July 9, 1829 (ante, VII. 876).

<sup>2</sup> Moir v. Hunter, Nov. 16, 1832 (ante, XI. 32); Duff v. Bradberry, May 19, 1825 (ante, IV. 21, new ed. 23); Swayne v. Fife Banking Company, June 27, 1835 (ante, XIII. 1003).

* "The Lord Ordinary thinks the question important, especially as it is argued by the pursuer. If that argument be good, he sees no alternative, but that, wherever a man holding a clear and confessedly legal decree of a competent court, executes diligence on that decree, he must be liable in damages as for false imprisonment, if at any distance of time it be found that the decree was either directly or consequentially erroneous. Much is no doubt made in parts of the argument, of the fact that here the decree was under reduction before the diligence was put in execution. But it would be very dangerous to go on such a ground.
 The plea at bottom rests on the assumption, that because it was at last found that there was not a just claim of debt by the principal party, the decree for expenses was for a debt not truly due, and this would equally apply though the reduction had not been brought for thirty-nine years. The ground of argument will not do, that the reduction had been raised, unless it can be also held, either that that rendered it illegal to execute diligence on the decree for expenses, or that the party using such diligence did it at his own peril, with the certification of being liable in damages for legally executing such legal decree, where no stay of execution existed, if it should be found that there was error in the original decree. The first alternative is untenable, it being clear, and having been decided in this cause itself, that the reduction was no stay of diligence on the decree for expenses. It is difficult, therefore, to see how the existence of the reduction affects the principle as to the claim of damages. It may in a vulgar popular view, but it seems to make no difference in the legal matter for judgment.

"The Lord Ordinary should think it right that such a case as this should be under the eye of the Court, before it is sent to trial or otherwise disposed of, in order that the real meaning and bearing of the issue may be understood, if it is to be tried, and that the rule of judgment may be clearly understood, if it should be otherwise determined.

"The pursuer strives hard to draw out of his averments in the record some special grounds of liability, other than the simple statement that it was ultimately found that the original debt sued for, and of course the expenses were not due. But this cannot really be of any avail. The amendment of the summons proposed could make no difference. Indeed, it would make it worse than it is; for it would leave the summons insufficient in the main point of it, as not specifying any ground on which the general averment rested. At any rate, it makes it no better than it is;
 and it is necessarily left to rest on the averment of its having been at last found that no debt was due, and nothing else. The mere insinuations by which this has been inflamed to a jury, are unsuitable and useless when addressed to the 176. The case was this day put out for advising.

6th 1837.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I agree with the view taken by the Lord Ordinary. If we were to allow a jury trial in such a case as this, we should be opening a door to interminable litigation, and doing great injury to the public interest. If this action is relevant, parties might lie by for 39 years and get damages against a man who has made use of the proper executorial of the law upon a decree which, on any ground whatever, is within the period of prescription found to be erroneous. I think, under the circumstances, we should find that nothing has been stated relevant to warrant an action of damages.

LORD MEDWYN.—I am entirely of the same opinion. This is one of the results of the proceeding by reduction instead of advocacy. The party invites execution upon the decree by so bringing it into Court.

LORDS GLENLEE and MEADOWBANK concurred.

THE COURT accordingly pronounced an interlocutor "closing the record, and finding that, under the circumstances here stated, there were no relevant grounds for the conclusion for damages, and absolving the defender with expenses."

JOHN CULLEN, W.S.—JOHN FORBES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 176. JAMES WILKIE and FRANCIS RENWICK, Petitioners.—R. Thomson.

Bankruptcy—Stat. 54 Geo. III. c. 137—Composition.—Where a party, whose estate had been sequestrated under the Bankrupt Act, absconded from the second diet of examination appointed by the sheriff, without taking the oath prescribed by the 33d section of the statute,—Petition for approval of a composition offered by a friend of the bankrupt and agreed to by the creditors, refused as incompetent.

Court. The main point stands thus: The diligence was used on a lawful decree of a competent court: It was executed at a time and under circumstances when it was lawful to use it: It was executed in all due and legal form. These are the points. The question for the Court is—Is the party so correctly using legal diligence on a lawful decree liable in damages on that account, because that decree has since been set aside? There is nothing else in the cause, all the rest of the pursuer's statement being mere amplification for effect.

"Now the Lord Ordinary wishes the more especially to put this question before the Court, because he is entirely unable to distinguish the present case from that of Graham v. the Writers to the Signet, according to the opinions of the whole judges. See the report, and the opinion quoted, p. 14 of the revised minute for defenders. He cannot at all enter into any of the distinctions attempted, and is of opinion that if the issues in the present case are thought to be admissible, it would be the worst course to say at once that that case, however solemnly decided, was erroneous. The Lord Ordinary does not think so; but he gives the pursuers the opportunity of making what they can of the point with the Court.

"It will be observed that the record has not been closed. Unless the case shall be remitted for trial, this must be done before any judgment can be pronounced."

THE estate of Peter Wilkie was sequestrated under the statute 54th No. 176. s. III. c. 137, and the petitioner, Renwick, was chosen trustee. on application by him to the Sheriff of Edinburgh, two diets were appointed for the examination of the bankrupt, which were duly advertised and notice given to the creditors. Wilkie attended the first diet the examination, but did not attend the second, nor take the oath prescribed by the 33d section of the statute. Renwick was unsuccessful in attempt to apprehend him on a warrant from the sheriff, and was led to understand that he had absconded.

Feb. 28, 1837.
2d Division.
F.
Cunninghame
v. Cunnings-
hame.

Meanwhile, at a meeting of creditors duly called by the trustee, an offer of composition of ten shillings in the pound, with security, was made to them in name of the friends of the bankrupt. This offer was entertained, and subsequently agreed to at a general meeting of the creditors, though it turned out that the only party making the offer was the petitioner, James Wilkie, father of the bankrupt.

Thereafter, under the 59th section of the statute, James Wilkie, and Renwick, the trustee, with concurrence of the requisite number of creditors, presented a petition stating the circumstances, in substance as above mentioned, and praying for approval of the composition. Renwick at the same time gave in a report of the proceedings in the sequestration, with a scheme of ranking.

THE COURT refused the petition as incompetent, the bankrupt having absconded from the second diet of examination and never taken the oath.

WILLIAM HUNT, W.S.—Agent.

JOHN SMITH CUNNINGHAME and OTHERS, Advocators and Defenders. No. 177.

Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Deas.

ALEXANDER CUNNINGHAME, Respondent and Pursuer.—Hunter—Hector.

Process—Furthcoming—Arrestment.—The factor on a trust-estate rendered to the trustees an account of charge and discharge, showing a certain balance in his favour, but never gave in a complete state of his intromissions; thereafter a creditor of the factor used arrestments in the hands of the trustees of the sums due to him, and brought an action of furthcoming;—Held, in an advocacy, that there were no termini habiles for giving decree in the process of furthcoming for the sums appearing on the account or to any other amount, until a complete state of the factor's intromissions should be made up; and that the duty of exhibiting such state was legally incumbent on the creditor.

On a considerable time subsequent to the year 1825, David Hous-land, an agent and factor for the advocators, Smith Cunninghame, Ltd. Moncrief R.

Feb. 28, 1837

2d Division
Moncrief R.

1877. and others, trustees of the late William Simson, and in this capacity made advances for behoof of the trust, and intromitted with the trust-funds. On 21st June, 1831, he rendered to the trustee an account of charge and discharge, showing a certain balance in his favour, but he explained, in a relative letter, that this account did not contain a complete state of his factory-accounts, and that the real balance could not be ascertained without farther investigation. These accounts were never balanced, and the claims of Houston and the trust-estate respectively continued illiquid, the account-books remaining in Houston's possession till 1834.

In 1832, a creditor of Houston's, in whose right the respondent Cunningham now stood, having raised action against him for a debt, used arrestments in the hands of the trustees, and on obtaining decree, brought a process of furthcoming against Houston and them, stating, inter alia, that the trust-estate was creditor to Houston, who had rendered an account to the trustees showing a certain balance in his favour, and concluding to have them ordained to make furthcoming the sums owing by them to the common debtor.

In defence against the action the trustees maintained that Houston had never furnished them with a full state of his intromissions, and that they were not indebted to him in any sum whatever.

The sheriff found "that the pursuer has validly arrested any sum that may have been due by the defenders to David Houston at the date of the pursuer's arrestment, and is entitled to have the same made furthcoming to him to the extent of his debt, but under deduction of any sum which the defenders can instruct to have been due to them by the said David Houston at the same period on the business accounts of the late William Simson."

Simson's trustees thereafter brought an advocacy of this judgment and of certain others, following it up, and pleaded, inter alia,

1. That the respondent, as an arresting creditor, can only maintain the same pleas, and is subject to the same liabilities as the common debtor, Houston; and as he would not be entitled to decree against the advocates in the terms pronounced by the sheriff, so neither is the respondent.

2. That the balance alleged to be due to the common debtor, Houston, not being admitted, or in any way constituted against the advocates, cannot be held to form to any extent a liquid claim against them, and the advocates are at all events entitled to set off against that balance the sums due to them by Houston, especially as their claims against him arise out of the same intromissions and transactions relative to the late Mr Simson's estate, to which the foresaid balance relates.

3. That the advocates are not responsible as in a question with the respondent, who comes in place of the common debtor, Houston, for the delay or difficulty of making up proper states of his intromissions, which ight to have been furnished by Houston himself, who was bound to ive duly constituted his claim against the advocates, if any such isted, and for whose neglect and omissions the respondent is responble.

No. 17
 Feb. 28, 1834
 Cunningham
 v. Cunningham
 same.

It was pleaded in answer—

1. The respondent having validly arrested in the hands of the advocars all sums due by them to the common debtor, and having established, r evidence, that certain sums were so due, is entitled to a decree in his ation of forthcoming, to the extent of the debt owing to him.

2. Although the advocates might have been entitled to have deducted om the amount any sums arising out of counter claims by them against e common debtor, prior to the arrestment, had they proved the exist-ace of such counter claims, yet, after ample time and full means had een allowed to them, having failed so to do, decree was legally and arrantably pronounced against them, notwithstanding their vague and indefinite allegations of the existence of counter claims.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the ubjoined note : *—“ Finds it admitted in the summons and record, that David Houston acted, for a considerable time, as the agent and factor of he advocates, Simson’s trustees, and that it is in these capacities that he s alleged to have become a creditor of the trust : Finds, that, although appears that he had, on the 25th June, 1831, rendered a certain ccount, No. 12 of process, it is clearly instructed, by his letter of that ate, that that account did not contain a full statement of his intromisions as agent and factor, and that he then engaged that so soon as his investigations, then said to be in progress, were completed, he would ender a full state : Finds it not alleged that any such full state of Houson’s intromissions was ever rendered to the trustees, though the books emained in his possession till the 24th June, 1834 : Finds that the espondent, as an arresting creditor and pursuer of a process of forthcoming, can be in no better situation, in respect of the arrestees, than his

---

* “ The case appears to be very simple in principle, however difficult it may e to extricate it. Here is a factor and agent who had large intromissions with e constituent’s funds. Confessedly he has not accounted for them, though he s made up and rendered, at a particular time, an account of his own claims in e characters. Can any creditor of his, by arresting, deprive the constituents their right to refuse to pay any such partial account, till he or his debtor shall der a full state of his intromissions? It is impossible to maintain such a proition. There is nothing liquid to warrant any decree, the duty of accounting g wholly on the factor.

“ The Lord Ordinary is therefore under the necessity of altering the sheriff’s gments. But, being in some doubt whether it may be most for the interest of parties, that the cause should be advocated or remitted with instructions, he appointed it to be enrolled before adopting either course.

“ There is no averment in the record that Houston was a partner of Simson.”

177. debtor, David Houston, in whose right he sues ; and that it is incumbent on him to prove that, at the date of the arrestment, the arrestees were debtors to the said David Houston : Finds that the rendering of such an account as that, No. 12 of process, is not sufficient to instruct any liquid debt, even at the date of rendering it, while it is proved and admitted that he had not rendered any full state of his intromissions with the rents and property of the trust-estate : Therefore finds that there are no termini habiles for giving decree in the process of forthcoming, for the balance appearing on the said account, or to any other amount, whether upon caution or without it, until a full and complete state of all the intromissions of the said David Houston shall have been made up : Finds that the duty of exhibiting such a state is legally incumbent on the respondent, and that, if the advocates are willing to undertake to make the investigation in this process, full and ample time, and every facility, must be afforded to them for that purpose ; the respondent, as standing in the place of Houston, being answerable for all the difficulties occasioned by his failure to render full accounts and vouchers, according to his duty : Therefore sustains the reasons of advocacy ; but, before disposing of the cause otherwise, appoints it to be enrolled : Finds the respondent liable in the expenses of the advocacy hitherto incurred, and remits the account, when given in, to the auditor to be taxed ; but reserves all questions as to other expenses."

The respondent reclaimed, but

THE COURT adhered, finding expenses due since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

GIBSON and HECTOR, W. S.—ROBERT NICHOL, S. S. C.—Agents

No. 178. WILLIAM FORRESTER, Pursuer. — Sol.-Gen. Rutherford-Naves.
ANDREW FORRESTER and OTHERS, Defendants.—D. F. Hope—Maitland.

Proof.—Witnesses.—Interest.—Relationship.—1. In an action of proving the tenor of a will, a witness was examined in Jamaica, having previously made affidavit as to the subject-matter of his examination—Held that this was no objection to the admissibility of his evidence. 2. Question, whether in such action the natural brother of a legatee under the will, not a party to the cause, is an admissible witness?

b. 28, 1837. THIS was an action of proving the tenor of a last will made in Jamaica, in which a proof was allowed, and thereafter certain objections which had been reserved in the course of taking it, came to be advised by the Court.*

* It was suggested by the Solicitor-General, for the defenders, that the objec-

It appeared that Dinham, one of the pursuer's witnesses resident in Jamaica, and an instrumentary witness to the will of the testator, de-oned, on his examination in causa, when cross-interrogated, that he had sworn to two affidavits, along with Jones, another instrumentary witness, the same effect as his present examination.

No. 178
 Feb. 28, 1834
 Forrester v.
 Forrester.

It was objected for the defenders, 1st, That the affidavits should not have been taken at all; 2dly, That they ought to have been cancelled, the previous deposition of the party, before his examination; and, 3dly, That this was a case of two witnesses being precognosced together,<sup>1</sup> and that, if the agent in Jamaica received instructions from the party's agent in Scotland, the proceedings objected to became the act of the Scottish litigant.

It was answered for the pursuer, that, admitting the fact, the objections in question were not a ground of disqualification,<sup>2</sup> more especially looking to the country where the examination of the witness took place, and that the objection was too late of being stated, and ought to have been taken before the witness was examined as to the merits of the cause.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We cannot reject the testimony of this witness. The objection ought to have been taken before a question was put as to the merits of the cause. But in itself the objection is not valid to exclude, however in the circumstances it may affect the witness's credit. It is very customary in England and Ireland to take a man's affidavit and afterwards adduce him as a witness, and the circumstance of Dinham having made affidavit along with Jones is no ground for setting aside his evidence.

The other Judges having concurred,

THE COURT repelled the objection.*

The other reserved points in the state of the proof were disposed of without argument.

ALEX. DOUGLAS, W.S.—R. MACFARLANE, W.S.—Agents.

ions should be taken up when the whole case came afterwards to be advised; but the Dean of Faculty, for the pursuer, contended that they ought to be decided now, as in the case of objections in the course of a proof on commission brought before a Lord Ordinary; with which view the Court agreed.

<sup>1</sup> Duncan v. Thomson, July 16, 1834 (ante, XII. 935).

<sup>2</sup> Mackenzie v. Henderson (2 Murray, 217); Millar v. Fraser (4 Murray, 114 and 120); Mackay v. Macleods (4 Murray, 279).

* It was objected by the defenders to the evidence of another witness that he was the natural brother of a legatee under the will in question, and interested therein, and therefore disqualified.<sup>1</sup> To this it was answered, that although near <sup>1</sup> Anderson v. Jeffrey (4 Murray, 105); Angus v. Magistrates of Edinburgh (4 Murray, the Practice of Jury Trial, p. 141.

179.

WILLIAM FRASER, Petitioner.—Patterson.

1837.

Trust.—Where a trust-settlement was conceived in favour of the trustees, and the survivor of them; and one of two surviving trustees became insane: the Court granted authority to the other trustee to wind up the trust, with the full powers conferred on the trustees, or survivor, but only on condition of his finding caution.

t, 1837.

VISION.

THE late Mrs Margaret Stewart or Denholm, by a general trust-settlement disposed her estate and effects to William Fraser, clothier in Edinburgh, and two other trustees, and "to the survivors, or survivors of them, or such other person or persons as they, or the survivors or survivor of them, should assume as trustees." These three parties accepted, but one of them died, and another became insane and was put under judicial curatory, before the trust was wound up. William Fraser, the remaining trustee, then presented a petition to the Court, stating that he was not in terms of the trust-deed, the sole surviving trustee, though he was the sole trustee capable of acting; that the extent of his power under the trust was therefore doubtful; that he was ready to pay over the whole estate to the beneficiaries under the trust, and that the period was arrived when this ought to be done; and he prayed the Court "to grant warrant to, and authorize the petitioner to bring the aforesaid trust to a conclusion, as sole trustee capable of acting therein, and to act with the full powers conferred on the trustees, and the survivors or survivor of them, by the aforesaid trust-deed, in trust, and for the purposes therein expressed."

THE COURT granted the petition, but only on condition of the petitioner finding caution.

JARDINE, STODART, and FRASER, W.S.—Agents.

relationship to the party, or direct interest in the cause, might disqualify a witness, there was no ground for holding that a witness was disqualified by relationship to an individual having an interest in but not a party to the cause.

The Court, considering the point thus raised to be doubtful, made avizandum therewith, but it is understood they will not be called upon for a judgment.

JAMES HUNTER, Advocate.—*D. F. Hope—M<sup>r</sup> Neill.*WILLIAM FAIRWEATHER, Respondent.—*Neaves.*ALEXANDER MERCHANT, Respondent.—Ivory.

No. 180.

March 1, 183
Hunter v.
Fairweather.

Proof—Reparation—Carrier—Jurisdiction—Process.—1. Circumstances in which, held to be proved that a coach-parcel, containing a process and title-deeds, as duly delivered at the office of one of the agents in the process; and, having been mislaid for several years owing to the negligence of that agent, or some party to whom he was responsible, held, that he was liable for the expense of certain processes thereby occasioned.—2. An action was raised before a burgh-court, against a law-agent, who had his writing-office within the burgh, but whose dwelling-house, at the date of the summons, was without the burgh: the action was accessory to a process already depending in the burgh-court, and bore to be raised for the purpose of being conjoined with it: a statute was, soon after, passed, enlarging the territory of the burgh, so as to include the dwelling-place of the law-agent, and, thereafter, he was cited at his dwelling-place, in common form: Held that he was liable to the jurisdiction of the magistrates, and that he was duly cited.—3. In a question as to the delivery of a coach-parcel, pending between the coach-proprietor, and the party to whom the parcel was addressed, held that the evidence of the coach-porter, who was charged with the delivery of the parcel, was not inadmissible on the ground of interest, though the coach-proprietor had not discharged him of liability in case the parcel was not duly delivered by him; and, therefore, after the porter's death, evidence allowed to be adduced by the coach-proprietor of what the porter had stated on the subject.—4. Where a party to a process executes a private trust-disposition for behoof of creditors, held unnecessary to delay the advising of the process until intimation should be made to the trustee.

THE late William Fairweather, merchant, Dundee, employed James Hunter, writer there, to raise an action before the Sheriff of Forfarshire, against Whitton and Petrie, for payment of £200. The firm of John William Baxter and John Boyd Baxter, writers, were the opposite agents. The process fell asleep, and was sent by Hunter, in January, 1825, to Forfar, to Thomas Carnaby, depute sheriff-clerk of Forfarshire, for the purpose of obtaining a precept of wakening. Carnaby prepared the precept of wakening, and inclosed the parcel in a process addressed to Hunter at Dundee, which was duly delivered and booked at the coach-office, in Forfar, of the Railway coach, on 31st January. That coach travelled between Forfar and Dundee, and the coach-books at Dundee bore an entry as to this parcel that the carriage of it had been duly paid, as on delivery. It appeared, however, from a correspondence between Hunter and Carnaby, in the beginning of March, 1825, that Hunter did not then know where the process was, but supposed, first, that it was still lying with Carnaby, and next, that it had been lost by the people of the Railway coach, of which Alexander Merchant, innkeeper in Dundee, was proprietor. Considerable search and enquiry was made for the parcel, without success, and a process of proving the tenor of the missing deeds was resorted to by Fairweather, in which, decree of proving the tenor was obtained. Afterwards, in 1829, William Fairweather, jun., as representing the late William Fairweather, raised an action against Merchant, before

March 1, 183

1st Division
Ld. Corehouse
B.

- To. 80. the Magistrates of Dundee, concluding for payment of the expense which
 - 1837. had been occasioned to him by the loss of the parcel, libelling that it in. had never been delivered to Hunter, but lost by the persons in charge of the. the coach, for whom Merchant, as proprietor, was responsible.

Merchant, in his defences, alleged that it had been duly delivered to Hunter.

In the course of the process, a diligence against havers was granted, and, John Boyd Baxter, writer, who had been a partner of J. W. and J. B. Baxter already mentioned, was named commissioner. He recollected, during the examination before him of Hunter as a haver, that the process, Fairweather v. Whitton and Petrie, was actually in his own possession. He himself was afterwards examined as a haver, and produced the process. This occurred in 1829; the process had been in Baxter's possession for years, and it was his strong impression that he had received it from Hunter; but the chief charge of conducting that process had been taken by Baxter's former partner, John William Baxter. No trace existed either in the books or papers of Hunter or of Baxter to indicate any thing as to the date, or manner, of the process having been received by either of them.

Fairweather thereafter raised an action against Hunter before the Magistrates of Dundee, setting forth the dependence of the process against Merchant, and that if Merchant, in that process, should prove that the coach-parcel had been duly delivered to Hunter, then Hunter was liable to him (Fairweather) in the whole expenses concluded for in the action against Merchant, and in all the expenses incurred in that action itself. The summons further set forth, that this action against Hunter should be conjoined with the depending action against Merchant; and it concluded for decree against Hunter, as above, in the event of Merchant proving that the coach-parcel had been duly delivered to Hunter.

The dwelling-house of Hunter was situated, at this date, beyond the jurisdiction of the Magistrates of Dundee; but, on the 23d August, 1831, an Act of Parliament was passed which enlarged their jurisdiction, and included within the territory the dwelling-house of Hunter. Hunter's writing-office was within the old territory of the burgh. The summons, dated 12th August, 1831, contained a warrant of service on Hunter "personally, or at his dwelling-place." It was executed at the dwelling-place, but not until after the 23d of August.

Besides defences on the merits, including a denial of the delivery of the parcel to him, Hunter objected to the jurisdiction of the Magistrates, in respect that, at the date when the warrant of service was granted, he lived beyond the jurisdiction, so that the warrant, as granted, could not reach his dwelling-place; and as both the warrant and the dwelling-house remained the same at the date of actual citation, the citation was unauthorized. If the pursuer wished to avail himself of the enlargement of the Magistrates' jurisdiction, he ought to have obtained a fresh warrant, issuing under the authority of the new statute.

Fairweather answered, that the Magistrates possessed jurisdiction over No. 180
 Hunter in reference to the subject-matter of this suit, at the date when March 1, 18 the summons was raised, in respect that Hunter's business as a writer Hunter v. was carried on in an office within the old limits of their territory ;<sup>1</sup> and Fairweather also in respect that the action was of an accessory or supplementary nature to one already pending in the Burgh Court. If, therefore, the citation was duly given, there was no objection for defect of jurisdiction. And the citation was valid, because the summons contained warrant to cite at the dwelling-place, which warrant was executed by citation at the dwelling-house, not given until after 23d August, at which date the enlarged territory included the dwelling-place.

The Magistrates repelled the objection to their jurisdiction, and considered the actions.

Merchant afterwards raised an action of relief against Hunter, alleging that the parcel was truly delivered to him, and that all the subsequent trouble and expense had been occasioned by an act of negligence of Hunter in mislaying it, or failing to produce it; and therefore Hunter must relieve him of the action at Fairweather's instance.

A proof was led, in the course of which, witnesses were asked as to the statements of one Mollison, the porter at the railway coach, now deceased, who, when enquiry was first made respecting the loss of the parcel, had distinctly asserted that he duly delivered the parcel at the office of Hunter. Hunter objected to the admissibility of these interrogations, in respect that Mollison had an interest which disqualified him, because he would himself have been liable for the parcel unless he exonerated himself by stating that he had duly delivered it. Fairweather and Merchant answered, that, though the situation of Mollison laid him open to observation as to his credibility, it did not affect his admissibility; otherwise no servant, or shop-boy, or carrier, employed to deliver goods or parcels, could ever be called to prove the fact of his having delivered them; which would be equally contrary to principle and practice. The objection was repelled and the evidence received.

Upon weighing the proof, though it was attended with considerable difficulty, and though Hunter had been exposed to some hardship in consequence of the lapse of so many years before he was made aware that he was to be charged with having lost or mislaid the parcel, the Magistrates were satisfied that it must be held to have been duly delivered to him, or at least to some one in his office for whom he was responsible; and that he was liable, both to Fairweather and Merchant, in terms of their respective joined actions. As the parcel was traced into the hands of Mollison the porter, and was duly addressed to Hunter; and as it was afterwards found in the hands of the opposite agent; there appeared to be no other mode of accounting for this, excepting by its having been delivered at Hunter's office, to some person there, and having been soon after sent by Hunter, or by some one in the office, to the opposite agent, and then forgotten. In coming to this conclusion, little was rested on the statements of Mollison, who appeared to have been a person addicted to drunken habits. But the admitted facts of the case did not appear susceptible of any other explanation which was not much more improbable than this. And nothing whatever was imputed to Hunter, as reflecting in the least on his integrity; or implying any thing more than some degree of negligence either on his own part, or on the part of some of the persons in his office, in consequence of which the process Fairweather v. Whitton and Petrie had been lost sight of, soon after its delivery from the coach, and transmission to Baxter.

The Magistrates, therefore, decerned against Hunter, with expenses. He brought an advocacy, and the Lord Ordinary found "that it is not proved, that the parcel containing the process in question, raised before the Sheriff of Forfarshire, at the instance of Fairweather v. Whitton and Petrie, was mislaid or missent through the negligence of the proprietors of the coach, called the Railway coach; found it proved that the parcel was duly delivered to the advocator, and that he is liable for all the damages and expenses occasioned by its supposed loss; therefore remitted the cause simpliciter to the Magistrates, and decerned, and found the advocator liable in expenses."

Hunter reclaimed. Before disposing of the reclaiming note, Fairweather had executed a trust-disposition for behoof of creditors, and Hunter, at the advising, moved that intimation should be made to the trustee, before deciding the cause. Fairweather answered that though that was necessary where a sequestration had taken place, it was not necessary in reference to a private trust-deed.

LORD GILLIES.—I think no intimation is necessary where there has been no sequestration.

The Court concurred, and directed the case to be pleaded, without delaying to intimate.

The pleas as to jurisdiction, and as to the inadmissibility of Mollison's statements, were again pleaded and repelled.

In regard to the jurisdiction, it was observed by Lord Gillies that if personal citation had been given to Hunter, within burgh, at any time after raising the summons, it would have been effectual; and that the citation at the dwelling

‘NOTE.—“This is entirely a question of evidence. It is thought that the proof is quite satisfactory, and that the Magistrates are right in all their findings.”

as was equally so, as it was not given until after the dwelling-house was included within the territory of the burgh. The other judges severally expressed their concurrence in this opinion. No. 180
March 1, 1836
Greig v. Christie.

LORD GILLIES also expressed a decided opinion that Mollison would have been admissible if alive, and therefore that his statements might be proved, now that he was dead. In this opinion also the Court were understood unanimously to concur.

On the merits

THE COURT unanimously adhered, and awarded additional expenses against Hunter.

WILLIAM MARTIN, S.S.C.—JAMES STUART, S.S.C.—WILLIAM MILLER, S.S.C.—Agents.

JAMES GREIG and CHARLES MORTON, and LYELL'S TRUSTEE, Pursuers. No. 181
—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Pyper—Russell.

MISS CATHERINE CHRISTIE, Defender.—D. F. Hope—Buchanan.

Confirmation—Executor-creditor.—1. The creditor of a defunct having obtained a decree of constitution, cognitionis causa, raised an edict in the commissary court, on February 12th; it was published at the market-cross and parish church, respectively, on 14th and 16th February; notice of the application was published in the Gazette of February 21st; decree, decerning the party executor-creditor, was pronounced on February 26th; the oath, emitted by the creditor, related to the amount of the estate left by the defunct, and given up in inventory, and it did not relate to the verity of the debt; sentence of confirmation as executor was pronounced on March 1st: Held that the confirmation was regularly expedite, and was not objectionable, either (1.) in respect of the oath not having deponed to the verity of the debt, as that is not required by 4 Geo. IV. c. 98; or (2.) in respect of the lateness of the notice in the Gazette, as the advertisement was duly given, in terms of that statute, and the explanatory A. S. Nov. 12, 1825, § 19, as to the Commissary Court.—2. In granting commission to take the oath of a party applying for confirmation, and who resides in a different commissariat from that in which confirmation is applied for—Held no irregularity to appoint a party to be commissioner who was not commissary clerk, or commissary clerk-depute of the district in which the oath was to be taken.

IN a competition among the creditors of the late Robert Jamieson, March 1, 1836
W.S., Miss Catharine Christie, his sister-in-law, founded on a confirmation as executor-creditor, including the whole fund in medio. The late 1st Division
Ld. Fullerton
S.
John T. S. Lyell, executor-dative of the deceased Major Lyell of Kinneff, was conjoined with Greig and Morton, W.S., as executors-creditors of the deceased, under a posterior confirmation. They raised a reduction of Miss Christie's confirmation, and, Lyell having died during the dependence of the action, his trustee was sisted in his place. On November 18, 1836,<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> See ante, p. 41.

1831. the Court, on reviewing an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, which repelled the reasons of reduction, under a certain reservation, pronounced this interlocutor: "Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, in so far as it repels the reason of reduction grounded on the objection to Miss Christie's decree of constitution, as having proceeded on a general charge and summons irregularly executed; and before answer, quoad ultra, ordain the parties to make up, see, interchange, lodge, and box minutes of debate on the question whether the confirmation of Miss Christie, as executor-creditor of Robert Jamieson, was correct, and regularly proceeded in according to the provisions of the act of the 4th of Geo. IV. c. 98." Their Lordships at the same time granted warrant for transmitting to the process, the various steps of procedure in the respective confirmations, from the Commissary Court, and the stamp-office, respectively. The question thus ordered to be discussed, turned on the following facts.

The late Robert Jamieson, W.S., died domiciled at Arden, in the parish of Newmonkland, Lanarkshire, on 7th December, 1832. On January 21, 1834, Miss Catharine Christie obtained decree of constitution, cognitionis causa tantum, of a debt amounting to £1403, 10s., besides other sums. On February 12th, she raised an edict in the Commissary Court of Lanarkshire, libelling on the decree, for the purpose of obtaining herself confirmed executor qua creditor. On 14th February the edict was published at the market-cross, and on Sunday 16th February, at the parish church-door. On 21st February the application was notified in the Gazette. On 26th February, the Gazette containing the notice was produced in Court, and no appearance having been made to oppose it, decree was pronounced by the Commissary at Glasgow decerning her executor qua creditor. Miss Christie then presented a petition to the commissary praying that, as she resided in Edinburgh, a commission should be granted to T. B. Ferrie, W.S., to take her oath as to the inventory. A commission was granted accordingly on 27th February, and, an inventory having been prepared, stating the movable estate of the deceased, at £687, 10s., Miss Christie, on March 1st, deponed before the commissioner, "That the said deceased Robert Jamieson died on the 7th day of December, 1832, without leaving any will or settlement of his affairs: That the foregoing inventory, which is signed by the deponent and commissioner as relative hereto, is a full and true inventory of all the personal or movable estate and effects of the said deceased Robert Jamieson, wherever situated, already recovered or known to be existing, belonging or due to him beneficially at the time of his death, and that the said estate situated in Scotland is of the value of £687, 10s. sterling, and under the value of £800 sterling.—All which is truth, &c." The inventory and deposition were then produced in the Commissary Court, and on March 8th, Miss Christie was confirmed executor-dative qua creditor of the deceased.

the pursuers of the reduction of these proceedings objected to their No. 181.
clarity, on the following grounds.

By 4 Geo. IV. c. 98, § 4, the procedure of every executor-creditor regulated, which section applied equally whether the confirmation embraced the whole of the estate of the deceased, or a part only. It acted "that in the case of confirmation by executors-creditor, such confirmation may be limited to the amount of the debt and sum confirmed, to which such creditor shall make oath." This was an explicit enactment that the creditor should make oath both to the debt, and to the sum confirmed. And so the statute had been interpreted, both by institutional writers,<sup>1</sup> and by the commissaries of Edinburgh in laying down regulations on the subject.<sup>2</sup> The practice of the commissariat of Edinburgh, was conformable to these instructions, and the same practice had been followed in Aberdeen and other parts of Scotland.<sup>3</sup>

The same section of the statute farther provided "that notice of every application for confirmation by any executors-creditor shall be inserted in the Edinburgh Gazette, at least once, immediately after such application shall be made; in evidence whereof, a copy of the Gazette in which such notice shall have been inserted, shall be produced in Court before any such confirmation shall be further proceeded in." The object of this enactment was to certify all creditors throughout Scotland, so that they might have an opportunity to apply to be conjoined in the confirmation. The old form of publication was inadequate for this purpose, and a Gazette notice was superadded on it. But such notice could not receive full effect unless it was given as early as the publication of the edict, and therefore the statute directed it to be made "immediately" after application to be confirmed, and before the "confirmation was farther proceeded in," which, both in letter and spirit, meant, before publication according to the old forms took place. For if that publication might be current, or perhaps nearly expired before the notice appeared in the Gazette, the purpose of such notice might be defeated at any time. In the present case, two Gazette notices passed after the application, without the notice being given; and on the third, published on 21st February, only five days elapsed before decree was taken. By the practice of the Court, sentence of confirmation might be taken, on the same day with this decree<sup>4</sup> if no competitor appeared; and thus, if such procedure was sustained, the Gazette intimation might always be made nugatory.

8. This question was not affected by the provision of A. S. November 1, 1825, relative to the Commissary Court. That A. S. directed the notice to be inserted in the Gazette "within ten days after the edict had been signed by the clerk," which would therefore render proceedings

March 1, 1833
Greig v.
Christie.

<sup>1</sup> 2 Bell, 489.

<sup>2</sup> Instructions of Commissaries dated 31st December, 1823.

<sup>3</sup> Certificates of Commissary clerks produced in process.

<sup>4</sup> Certificate by Commissary clerk-depute produced.

181. objectionable if a longer delay occurred, in reference to any commission in Scotland, however remote, and whatever might be the special circumstances causing the delay. But though it fixed the limit, beyond, the statutory word "immediately" could not in any case be extended. It did not fix the opposite limit, so as to declare that a party in Edinburgh or Glasgow who allowed every Gazette except the last, during the rancy of the nine days induciæ, to pass without notice, should be nevertheless to have "immediately" given such notice as required by statute.

4. It was irregular and incompetent to have the oath administered to the defender by any other commissioner than the commissary clerk of the district.

The defender answered—

1. Where an executor-creditor confirmed the whole estate of deceased, the procedure was regulated by § 3, of 4 Geo. IV. c. 98, which required no oath except as to the amount of the estate. But even if applied to such a case, it required no oath of a different sort as the oath was exacted merely in reference to fiscal considerations. And according to the practice of Lanarkshire, Perthshire, Renfrewshire, and the other parts of Scotland, no oath of verity was required.<sup>1</sup>

2. The edict having been raised on 12th February and published on the 14th and 16th; the notice having been inserted in the Gazette on 21st February; and the Gazette being produced in the Commissary Court "before the confirmation was farther proceeded in," the statute was duly complied with, in taking decree, decerning the defender executor-dative qua creditor on 26th February. And it was not followed by sentence of confirmation until March 8th, during all which period no other creditor might have been conjoined.

3. But all question as to the effect of the statutory word "immediately" was at an end in consequence of the A. S. 12th November, 1825, § 1, which was passed expressly to regulate it, and to fix a general term reference to all the commissariots in Scotland, within which the notice should be given in the Gazette. That was fixed to be ten days "after the edict has been signed by the clerk." In this instance only nine days elapsed before the advertisement, and therefore it was duly given.

4. The commissioner who administered the oath derived his authority from his commission only, and there was no incompetency in selecting any party to be commissioner who was not the commissary clerk of the district.

At the first advising of the cause, on November 18th, it was observed by Lord Balgray, that as the statutory word "immediately" would be liable to a certain looseness of construction when applied to different commissariots, some of which were more and others less remote from Edinburgh,

<sup>1</sup> Certificates of Commissary clerks produced.

re the Gazette was published, it had appeared to the framers of the No. 181.
 of Sederunt to be desirable to define a specific term, applicable alike <sup>March 1, 1837.</sup> the whole of Scotland, within which term the notice must appear in <sup>Lords Commis-</sup> Gazette, and within which term it should be held that such notice was <sup>sioners of the</sup> ful, if inserted. But his Lordship added that as such an enactment <sup>Treasury v.</sup> ht perhaps be ultra vires, he concurred with the rest of the Court in <sup>Mackenzie.</sup> ring the minutes of debate. These were now advised.

ORD GILLIES.—I perceive nothing to indicate any undue conduct or proceon the part of the defender in taking out this confirmation as executor-credi-

The oath was never required but as to the inventory given up. I think the le of the pursuer's objections are ill founded.

ORD PRESIDENT.—I have formed the same opinion.

ORDS MACKENZIE and COREHOUSE severally intimated that they also concur-

THE COURT then adhered, and awarded expenses against the pursuers since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

GRIG and MORTON, W.S.—FERRIE and JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

LORDS COMMISSIONERS OF THE TREASURY, and LORD ADVOCATE, No. 182.
 Petitioners.—Ivory.

OMAS MACKENZIE, W.S., and OTHERS, Respondents.—D. F. Hope.

Process—Enrolling—A. S. 11th July, 1828.—The pursuers of an action, ch had fallen asleep, raised a summons of wakening and transference, which called so late in the Winter Session as to make it impossible in the regular ne for the process to be proceeded in till the ensuing session; a petition was sent immediately after the calling, for warrant to enroll the process of wakenin the regulation roll, and obtain decree of transference, and in the principal ne for warrant to the Lord Ordinary to pronounce decree of constitution in ms of the libel:—Held that such application was incompetent, notwithstanding ain grounds which were alleged to render the necessary delay very prejudicial the pursuers.

In the year 1832, the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, and the March 1, 1837 rd Advocate, raised action against Mrs Catherine Munro, and others, <sup>2D DIVISION.</sup> representing the late George Ross, Alexander Gray or Ross, John <sup>R.</sup> llvie, and Augustus Saltren Willett, army agents, concluding for ment of the balance of certain sums received from Government by ie parties many years ago for the use of diverse regiments, and not ounted for. The last interlocutor in the cause was pronounced in ary, 1834, after which the process fell asleep.

In the mean time, in consequence of the death of certain of the defen-s, Mr T. Mackenzie, W.S., had been appointed judicial factor on the t-estate of George Ross, and it was found necessary to institute a mons of wakening and transference against him as having come in

182. place of the deceased parties, and also against Mr Andrew Drummond of London, assignee on the estate of Alexander Ross and Ogilvie. This summons was duly executed, and the induciæ having expired on the 19th February last, it was called on the 23d. The defenders having entered appearance, and availed themselves of their right of taking the summons out to see, it was impossible for the pursuers to have the summons enrolled in the regular course in the printed rolls of the Winter Session, so that without a special dispensation neither the process of wakening and transference nor the original process could be proceeded in till the Summer Session.

In these circumstances, on the narrative, inter alia, that the pursuers would thus be "shut out not only from all opportunity of proponing and enforcing their just rights and interests, as creditors of the said George Ross, and Alexander Gray or Ross, entitled to claim and to be preferred upon the price and proceeds of the estate of Cromarty, formerly belonging to their said debtors, in the process of ranking and sale, which has so long been in dependence before your Lordships; but will also be prevented from attaching, by adjudication and other legal diligence, certain heritable debts belonging to the representatives above named, of the said deceased Augustus Saltren Willett," &c. the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, and the Lord Advocate, acting for his Majesty's interest, and as mandatory for their lordships, presented a petition praying the Court "to grant warrant to the keeper of the rolls for enrolling the process of wakening and transference in the first printed rolls, and to remit to the Lord Ordinary, before whom the same shall be so enrolled, either himself to pronounce decree of transference, statu quo, or to remit the process to the Lord Ordinary in the principal cause, that he may pronounce such decree; and in the principal cause to grant warrant to the Lord Ordinary to pronounce decree of constitution, in terms of the libel, reserving all objections contra executionem, and to dispense with the minute-book, so as such decree may be immediately extracted, in order thereby to enable the petitioners to compare, and lodge their interest in the said process of ranking and sale, as well as to proceed with all necessary adjudications against the parties above named; and, if need be, to remit the said original process, which formerly depended before Lord Mackenzie, to such one of the Lords Ordinary as to your Lordships shall seem meet."

This petition was intimated on the 23d February, and having been this day put out for advising, the respondents appearing by counsel at the bar, the Court were unanimously of opinion that it was incompetent.

The petition was accordingly withdrawn of consent, and the respondents found entitled to expenses.

WISHAW and COLTNESS RAILWAY COMPANY, Pursuers.—D. F. Hope—Monteith.

HENRY STEUART'S REPRESENTATIVES, Defenders.—*Sol.-Gen.
Rutherford—Anderson.*

WILLIAM DIXON, Defender.—Sandford.

No. 183.

March 1, 1837
Wishaw Railway Company
v. Steuart's Representatives.

—Joint-Stock Company—Contract.—In a question between a joint-company, constituted by Act of Parliament, and two shareholders, certain contracts entered into prior to the passing of the act, and subsequently recognised by the parties as existing,—Held to be binding and effectual, though not mentioned in the act.

Wishaw and Coltness Railway Company was projected for the purpose of connecting the Clydesdale or Upper Coalfields of Lanarkshire with the Forth and Clyde Canal and the markets of Glasgow and Edinburgh. With the view of obtaining the concurrence and support of the proprietors of that district, the promoters of the railway addressed certain proposals, in which it was stated, inter alia, that the estimated expense was £60,000, of which it was proposed the proprietors should advance one-third; but that, as it might not be convenient for them to advance or come under direct bonds for so large a sum, “the instalments should not be payable till the railway was opened to the satisfaction of the subscribing proprietor, and then only by annual instalments at the rate of 7½ per cent;” it was “also understood, that the proprietors of the Railway Company will agree, after the act is passed, to pay, as the work proceeds, the whole sums so subscribed by the landowners on the above terms.”

James Steuart of Allanton was a proprietor in the dispute, and had originally subscribed £500 to the undertaking. Shortly subsequent to the above proposals, and it having been represented to him that the railway would be carried through his property, he increased his subscription to £3000.

At a preliminary meeting of subscribers, in September, 1828, which was presided over by the defender Dixon, it was agreed to by the landowners and by the other subscribers, that the proprietors of the lands through which the railway was to pass should “allow to the undertakers the use of the lands and necessary for the railway, and its works and wharfs, free of all claim for damages,” &c. A missive to this effect was simultaneously signed by several landowners, and, amongst others, by Dixon, who was a proprietor of shares to the amount of £2950. In May, 1829, James Steuart and Dixon executed bonds respectively for the performance of their subscriptions, which was required for the passing of the bill through Parliament.

As following, the Act 10 Geo. IV. c. 107 was passed, empower-

March 1, 1837
2D DIVISION.
Lord Jeffrey.
R.

183. ing the pursuers, the Wishaw and Coltness Railway Company, a railway from Chapel, on the estate of Sir Henry Stewart, to Monkland and Kirkintilloch Railway; the capital to be divided into shares of £50 each. It was declared that the committee of the company for the time being should have power to make any call from the shareholders for defraying the expense of, and carrying out any undertaking, provided that no call should exceed 10 per cent of the share subscribed, and that calls should not be made except at the expiration of one month from each other. It was farther enacted, that in any action brought by the said company of proprietors against any one or more owners of any share or shares, to recover any sums of money due or payable to the said company of proprietors, for or by reason of any call made by virtue of this act, it shall be sufficient for the said company of proprietors to declare and allege that the defendant or defendants, being a proprietor or proprietors of such share or shares in the said undertaking, is or are indebted to the said company of proprietors, in such sum or sums of money as the calls in arrears shall amount to, for such or so many call or calls or so many sum or sums of money upon such or so many shares belonging to the said defendant or defendants, defender or defenders, as the case may happen to be, whereby an action has accrued to the said company of proprietors by virtue of this act, without setting forth the matter: And on the trial of such action it shall only be necessary to prove that the defendant or defendants, at the time of making such call, was or were proprietor or proprietors of some share or shares in the said undertaking, and that such call or calls were in fact made, and that such notice thereof was given as directed by this act, without the appointment of the committee who made such call or calls, or any other matter whatsoever: And the said company of proprietors thereupon be entitled to recover what shall appear due, unless it shall appear that any such call exceeded the sum of £10 for every £100, made within the distance of one calendar month from the last previous call, or without notice given as aforesaid."

There was no clause in the act sanctioning the stipulations contained in the proposals above-mentioned. Certain proceedings of the committee, however, subsequent to the passing of the act, recognised them as existing, and showed a mutual understanding that they were to be enforced; and, in particular, an arrangement was made whereby the Bank agreed to grant to the company a cash-credit for £60,000, entitling "to receive payment of the credit at the rate of 10, or, if desired, 7½ per cent per annum on the principal, exclusive of the interest, which must be paid up at the same time."

In consequence of the extent and productiveness of the canal, and the more immediate proximity of Glasgow and the line of the canal, it appeared, in the course of a year or two, that the success of the new ay would not realize expectations. It was carried through the property No. 183 Mr Dixon, but was five or six miles short of reaching the property of r Henry Steuart.

In 1829, 1830, and 1831, four calls were made on the subscribers, March 1, 18 d amongst the rest on these gentlemen, the first of 5 per cent, and the Wishaw Ra hers of 10 per cent. Sir Henry Steuart paid £150 to account of the way Compa st; Dixon paid the first call, but neither of them made any farther v. Steuart's yment. representative

Thereafter the Company raised action against Sir Henry and Dixon, unding on the provisions of the act above referred to, setting forth the lls which had been made on them, and concluding for payment of the lance due by them respectively on the amount of the whole.

In support of their action, the Railway Company pleaded, inter ia—

1. That the defenders, at the respective periods when the calls were ade, having been proprietors of the shares of the company stock above entioned, and the formalities of the statute having been complied with, re bound in terms thereof to pay the sums concluded for.

2. That this obligation in the case of Sir Henry Steuart could not be alified by conditions extrinsic of the act; nor met by illiquid counter-ims on the part of Mr Dixon, who must be held to be barred, by the ms of his original agreement, from demanding any price or consideran for the use of his ground occupied by the railway.

Sir Henry Steuart pleaded in defence—

1. That having become a subscriber to the proposals for the railway, on the express conditions of his subscription being paid in the manner rein set forth, and not until the railway should be opened to his pro-ty, and this agreement having been sanctioned and approved by the mpany both before and after the Act of Parliament was passed, it was ding and effectual, and no demand for payment of the shares in ques-i could be made except under the conditions on which they were subibed for.

. That this agreement, with all its conditions, was binding and effectual, ough not embodied in the Act of Parliament; more especially since effect in the present case must be determined as in a question inter ios, and there was good evidence of the understanding of all parties ing been, that the conditions of the agreement should be binding on Company, although not engrossed in the act.

Mr Dixon, the other defender, pleaded—

That the agreement contained in the missive referred to had been

---

Marshall Bridge Company v. Earl of Spencer and others, April 11, 1821, 10th Rep. 1. 64.

185. entered into on the faith of a certain number of parties concurring therein, and was not to be binding upon two or three when the others had refused to concur in the arrangement; and, therefore, the condition of his subscription not having been implemented, that he was not bound to give his land to the Company gratuitously, and was entitled to retention of the sums concluded for in security of the payment due to him on account of the land occupied by the railway.

1837.
Hull-Company
v. R.
Sullivan.

The Lord Ordinary, after ordering Cases, pronounced the following interlocutor, with the note subjoined:—"Finds, I mo, That it is suffi-

* "The case of the pursuers as against Sir Henry Stewart is extravagantly over-pleaded on almost every point of the argument. Their denial of the authenticity of the copy of the proposals in process, and their professions of their ignorance of any document of such a tenor, are, to say the least of them, altogether unaccountable, and, so far as the Lord Ordinary's experience goes, without example in litigation with persons of their condition. That copy is referred to in, and seems to have been produced along with the original defences for Sir Henry Stewart, being marked as No. 8. of Process, while the defences are marked as No. 6. Its tenor is such distinctly recited in the record under the 5th article of Sir Henry's statement of facts, and referred to on the margin by the said number of process, and in the pursuers' answer to that, while it is expressly admitted that proposals of this description were addressed by the promoters of the undertaking to the owners of land on the line. There is no doubt a reference to the pursuers' counter statement, but when that is turned to, the admission only appears to be more distinct and unequivocal. All that is there said being, not that no such particular proposals were made, but that the two first articles of them (embracing those recited in the interlocutor, and thus clearly admitted to have been contained in the original paper), were afterwards withdrawn or abandoned. Of this last allegation there is not the shadow of evidence. On the contrary, when the different subscribers agree to relieve Mr. Grahame (their agent) of the consequences of his subscribing the bond to be laid before Parliament, this obligation is cautiously worded, so as to bind those in the situation of this defender only according to and in terms of the subscriptions respectively made by them, 'and by the instalments and with the securities therein specified.' And after the act is passed, this defender, along with the other leading landowners, after an option had been distinctly given them to restrict or withdraw their subscriptions (which of itself excludes all argument as to their being absolutely bound by the unqualified document they had previously signed), propose to the pursuers 'that an arrangement shall be made by which the advance on their subscriptions should be limited to 7½ per cent per annum, with the security over the minerals, and in terms of their original subscriptions,' and to this proposal, as recorded in the minutes of 5th June, 1829, 'the meeting agree.' The attempt of the pursuers to represent this as a mere consent on their part that the landowners should themselves endeavour to negotiate such a loan, is palpably absurd. They manifestly required no consent from the pursuers to enter into such a negotiation; nor is it conceivable that a suggestion of that nature should have been entered in the minutes as a proposal to the meeting, and one to which, after deliberation, they are stated 'to have agreed.' The meaning obviously was, that the pursuers wanted the money of those subscribers sooner than it was exigible from them under their contract, should, for their own accommodation, endeavour to get it advanced by the banks upon such security as those subscribers were then in a condition to give. If the landowners had been bound, like any other subscribers, to pay down their money when it was called for, the company plainly had nothing to do but getting the banks to advance it for them, and the whole proceeding would have been of no meaning. But it is really needless to dwell on this, for the subject of the company take away all doubt, and demonstrate what was instructed and admitted by the pursuers in the record, that the No. 188 of the Wishaw and Coltness Railway did, at the commence-

March 1, 1831
 Wishaw Rai-way Compan-
 v. Steuart's Representatives

of the whole arrangement. Instead of leaving the landowners to negotiate on the best terms they could, with the mere permission and sanction of the company, the business is immediately delegated to a committee, in which no one of these landowners is named, and which proceeds in the task without any reference to a consultation with them. A sub-committee accordingly drew up a draft of a proposal for the banks, which is submitted to the larger body, and approved of, and in that document, prepared at the backs of the landowners, and without the least hint or instigation from them, is very candidly and distinctly set forth as the circumstance which had made an application necessary, 'that it had been stated by the landowners at the time that it would be inconvenient for them to advance any of their £13,000, if the railway was opened, when they will conveniently be enabled to advance instalments, at 7½ per cent annually out of their minerals.' See minute of the 15th, 1829. This single citation is conclusive against the whole case of the pursuers, and gives a character to their confident and reiterated asseverations, that they had nothing of any original proposals similar to the copy produced, and that they in no way recognised the important stipulations therein contained, as to sustainment of the defender's subscriptions, on which the Lord Ordinary is about to enlarge.

Needless to follow out the detail of the subsequent proceedings. The committee of the company proceeded to negotiate with the banks, and to report their proposals to the company, without any reference to or interference by the landowners.
 The transaction, indeed, was entirely their own. If they succeeded they would obtain the possession of their subscriptions, for the company use. If they failed, they would be contented to wait till the time of payment shall come. It appears that the attempt ultimately failed, and the consequence has been this incompetent attempt on the part of the defender ante diem.

It is as extravagant, nor less palpably refuted by the record, is the pursuers' allegation, that their original proposals were framed merely with a view to be embodied in the act of Parliament; and that, when this was found impossible, they necessarily fell to the ground, and were abandoned. It is absolutely certain that the only provision ever intended to be inserted in the act, was that which gave such high authority was to be given to the landowners to bind the minerals in security, in security for their subscriptions. But in this it is manifest that the Sir Henry Steuart, never had any interest, such a provision was evidently for entailed proprietors alone. But Sir Henry held his estates in fee simply, not requiring any statutory authority to bind them in security, plainly in no way affected by the circumstance of the act having passed without giving such authority.

The pursuers' main argument is, that whatever might have been the original rights and obligations of the parties, all these were superseded by the passing of the act, by the terms of which alone, the rights and obligations of all consist thenceforth be entirely regulated and determined. It is truly needless to show how this might have been if nothing had passed after the date of the act, recognising and renewing the antecedent onerous and equitable engagements of the parties. But from the transactions last referred to, it is clear enough that the case here, and to maintain that it would be illegal, and in violation of a statute to enter into subsequent arrangements, varying in some respects from the original provisions, appears to the Lord Ordinary to be the very height of absurdity. Suppose that Sir Henry Steuart had not at all thought of becoming a subscriber after the act was passed, that he had then made a written proposal to subscribe £3000, on condition that it should only be payable when the minerals were brought into his lands, and then by annual instalments of 7½ per cent to the company, at a general meeting after the report of a committee,

1837. 183. ment of their undertaking, and before applying for the Act of Parliament subsequently obtained, address to the original defender, Sir Henry Stewart (in whose place his representatives have now been sisted as defenders), and the other landowners on the line of the said projected railway, certain proposals, containing among other things, a provision that such of the said landowners as might choose to subscribe for the execution of the said projected railway should not be called upon to make payment of had deliberately agreed to that proposal, and sent a copy of their minutes to Sir Henry; would this have been an illegal proceeding, and ineffectual as in violation of the statute? or could Sir Henry, upon that ground, have been called upon to answer calls like an ordinary subscriber, while the railway had come to a stand at a distance of six or seven miles from the nearest part of his property? This plain question disposes at once of the pursuers' whole argument on the statute, for it obviously can make no difference whether such a stipulation was adopted for the first time, after the act was passed, or was plainly recognised and acted upon after that time, though it had been arranged and agreed on before. If it was just and reasonable in itself, it would not be the worse for having been contemplated and mutually admitted from the beginning; and while the fact of its being formally proposed and agreed upon before the date of the act might explain why its terms are not so specifically set forth and resumed in detail after that event, it is quite enough if it be clearly referred to and recognised as subsisting at any subsequent period.

"The Lord Ordinary does not rest any thing on the title of the act, or the description in the preamble, as importing that the railway was to begin at the lands of Allanton, though even this is material, as showing how essential to the whole undertaking its coming into these lands was considered. But he certainly was not a little surprised at the confidence with which the pursuers have protested and maintained, in their last minute as well as in their case, that it was a matter altogether irrelevant, and immaterial to the merits of their present demand, whether their railway was ever to be brought to the lands of the defenders at all, considering the only objects which such parties could have had in joining such a concern, and the stipulations under which alone it is thought clear that they did join it, it must be confessed this is a strong proposition. The Lord Ordinary has found that the stipulation referred to was just and reasonable, and this is thought to be clear enough. But the injustice of disregarding it cannot but be enormously aggravated, if it appears that this large sum is to be exacted from the defenders, not only without the remotest prospect of benefit to themselves, but for the mere purpose of helping their rivals to a market from which they are still excluded, and thus aggravating the disadvantages of their natural distance. With the pursuers' present means and credit, it seems to the Lord Ordinary plain enough that the railway never can be completed on to the defenders' property within the short period now remaining of the renewed statutory term.

"With regard to Mr Dixon, the same view of the statute which has led the Lord Ordinary to asswizle the other defenders, compels him to repel his defence. Whatever pleas might have been open to him on the express words of the act, if he had uniformly sought to avail himself of them from its date, he is excluded by his own acts and deeds subsequent to that period, drawing back and contracting as they do with his voluntary and reasonable undertaking before. His case, indeed, is in this respect precisely the converse of that of Sir Henry Stewart; and, accordingly, it is curious to observe with what composure and apparent unconsciousness the pursuers, in the body of the same paper, set themselves to answer and refute the very arguments which they had advanced in so peremptory a tone against their other opponents in the preceding part of it. They could not well hope to succeed in both of these inconsistent arguments; and having prevailed in one, they must submit to give way in the other."

their subscriptions till the said railway should be brought into their lands respectively, and should then only be liable to pay up their said subscriptions by annual instalments at the rate of seven and a half per cent :
 inds, 2do, That the subsequent subscription of the said Sir Henry Stewart of the sum of £3000 (instead of £500, originally subscribed by him) must be held to have been made with reference to the said proposals, and on the faith of the special provision herein before mentioned :
 inds, 3tio, That there is no evidence that the benefit of this provision has ever renounced or abandoned by the said original defender, but, on the contrary, that many of the proceedings and stipulations of the parties subsequent to the passing of the Act of Parliament, as well as previous hereto, did recognise the continued existence of such provision, and their mutual understanding that it was to be implemented and enforced :
 inds, 4to, That the said provision was in itself reasonable and equitable, and was in no respect a fraud on the legislature or on the other subscribers to the undertaking, having been pressed on the defender's acceptance by the body of such original subscribers, and repeatedly recognised and admitted by the pursuers after they had been erected into company by the Act of Parliament referred to ; and therefore, and in respect that it is fully admitted that the said railway has not yet been brought into the lands of the said defender, nor within five or six miles of the nearest part of the said lands, that no step has been taken to advance it in that direction for the last two years, and that there is good reason to believe that it will not be brought into the said property during the time limited for its completion by the existing statute, sustains the defences originally maintained for the said Sir Henry Stewart, and now assisted in by his representatives, and assoilzies him and them from the whole conclusions of the action, and decerns, reserving to the pursuers to pursue for the amount of the said defender's subscription in any other action they may be advised to bring, in conformity with the said proposals, and to the defenders their defences as accords : Finds the said defenders, the representatives of the said Sir Henry Stewart, entitled to the expenses incurred by him and them in this process ; allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same when lodged to the auditor of his taxation and report : And with regard to William Dixon, the only other defender, for whom a case has been lodged, Finds that he is not entitled to any price or consideration for the ground belonging to him that has been occupied by the said railway, but is bound in terms of his original agreement, recognised and acted upon on several occasions after the passing of the said Act of Parliament, to give the said ground for the use of the said railway gratuitously, and without any consideration ; and, before, and in respect of the illiquid nature of his claims of compensation or retention, and of the terms of the said act, repels the defences maintained by him against the conclusions of this action, and decerns in

No. 18

March 1, 18

Wishaw R

way Comp

v. Stewart's representative

1833. terms of those conclusions in so far as he is concerned: Finds that in expenses."

1837.

1837.

1837.

1837.

1837.

1837.

The Railway Company and Mr Dixon respectively reclaimed.

The note for the Company was first advised.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This question is in some respects not free from difficulty. When we see an act with specific clauses as to the rights of parties, the general rule is that these rights are to be regulated by the act alone, and we are disposed to look at prior communings or stipulations; just as in the case of a lease, these are held to be all embodied in the lease. In the present case, however, we must look to what took place at and after the passing of the act, and when we see how the real parties forming the company act; if they act in a manner referring to what took place previously, then we are to look at the nature of that transaction. I am much struck by this, that the original proposals were made to the landed proprietors, and to Sir Henry Stewart and the rest, who all trusted to the representation that the railway was to be a market for the coal of their estates. It would require very strong evidence to lead us to suppose that they were to subscribe to provide a market for intervening coal-fields. It is clearly proved that proposals were circulated containing stipulations as to the shares being payable in a certain way, and as to the way being to be carried to their coal-fields, and that on the faith of these Sir Henry Stewart subscribed. It appears from the evidence in the case that these proposals were before and after referred to as binding by the Company themselves; I cannot now be allowed to turn round and get rid of the stipulations therein contained. In the circumstances of the present case, therefore, notwithstanding the general rule above-mentioned, I think the interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—Had there been no proceedings subsequent to the passing of the act, there might be some difficulty, but all ambiguity has been removed by the proceedings of the company, after their constitution, with reference to the prior conditions and stipulations. I am satisfied that Sir Henry Stewart and the other landowners were only bound according to the terms of the proposals.

LORD MEDWYN.—If I concur, it is with great difficulty. I cannot think that the previous proposals are to regulate the terms of a concern settled by Act of Parliament. Entirely concurring in the decision in the case of the Gas Light Company in 1823,<sup>1</sup> I think we must throw out of view altogether the conditions in the proposals. The only ground upon which I can concur with the rest of the Court is the nature of the arrangement with the Royal Bank in the second year after the passing of the act, whereby, as it is stated in the case for Sir Henry Stewart, the Royal Bank agreed to grant a cash-credit for £60,000, consenting "to the payment of the credit at the rate of 10, or even, if desired, 7½ per cent per annum on the principal, exclusive of the interest which must be paid up at the same time. Looking to this arrangement, therefore, which implies that the partners are intended on being able to pay up the early annual instalments of 10 or 7½ per the Bank from the calls made on the ordinary subscribers, allowing the postponed instalments to be repaid from the calls payable by the landed proprietors, as soon as the railway was open to their estates," I am for adhering to the interlocutor.

<sup>1</sup> Sir Henry Stewart having died, his representatives were cited in his stead.

<sup>2</sup> Reid v. Edinburgh Gas Light Company, May 13, 1823 (ante, II, 29 ed. 257).

LORD GLENLEE was absent.

No. 183.

March 2, 183
Bontine v.
Graham.

THE COURT held the reclaiming note for Dixon to be entirely groundless, and their Lordships accordingly refused both notes.

W. A. G. and R. ELLIS, W.S.—STEWART and SPROT, W.S.—TOD and ROMANES, W.S.—
Agents.

ROBERT CUNNINGHAM BONTINE, Pursuer.—Keay—Maitland—Ivory—Speirs. No. 184.

WILLIAM CUNNINGHAM CUNNINGHAM GRAHAM, Defender.—D. F. Hope—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Sandford—Moir.

SCOTTISH UNION INSURANCE COMPANY, and TRUSTEES FOR GRAHAM'S CREDITORS, Compearers.—D. F. Hope—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Sandford—Moir.

Entail—Title to Pursue—Right in Security.—1. The resolute clause in an entail declared that heirs contravening "shall, for themselves, ipso facto, forfeit," &c.; and it was made lawful for the next heir, "albeit descended of the contravener's own body, to purge and obtain declarators upon the contravention:" the son of the heir in possession raised a declarator of irritancy, libelling (inter alia) upon an act of contravention, committed by making up titles in fee simple, in place of making them up under the entail:—Held, that the statute 1685, c. 22, has not declared that such a contravention shall forfeit the contravener's descendants, as well as himself, without reference to the terms of each particular entail, as to the effect of contraventions; that, in this instance, such contravention would not forfeit the pursuer's right; and that he accordingly had a good title to pursue. 2. Terms of a clause in a bond of tailzie, under which, held, that the entailor had effectually bound himself and his heirs to possess the lands under no title but the entail. 3. An ancestor of the entailor, being infeft in the dominium directum of lands held of the Crown, onerously acquired the dominium utile of these lands in 1708, under a conveyance containing a procuratory of resignation ad remanentiam, and a precept of sasine, neither of which he executed; his descendants renewed the infeftment under the Crown, and continued to enjoy full possession, and to exercise all acts of property in the lands for more than 40 years, but without executing the procuratory or precept: in 1765, the entailor, who was already infeft under the Crown, took infeftment under the precept, and afterwards executed an entail, in the form of a procuratory of resignation:—Held (1.) that consolidation of the dominium utile with the dominium directum had taken place prior to the execution of the precept of sasine in 1765, and that that was an unmeaning act of the entailor, which did not split these two estates; and, (2.) that the act of a substitute-heir in making up a title in fee-simple to the dominium utile of the lands, and selling them, was an act of contravention, inferring forfeiture of the estate. 4. Circumstances in which various sales of portions of the entailed estate were found to have been made. 5. Decree pronounced in an action directed against the heir in possession, declaring that he had forfeited the entailed estate, that his right was now, and in all time coming, void and extinct; that the whole rents, had devolved on and accresced to the next heir from and date of citation in the declarator, free and disburdened of every act done and dead granted in contravention of the entail, as fully as if the contravener had never been in possession, but reserving all questions with regard to the validity and effect of heritable securities granted to creditors by the contravener.

1837. WILLIAM CUNNINGHAM CUNNINGHAM GRAHAM possessed the estate of Gartmore under a strict entail, executed in 1767 by his grandfather, Nicol Graham of Gartmore. The prohibitory clause was in these terms:—"Providing also, that it shall not be lawful to, nor in the power of the said William Graham, nor any other of the said heirs of tailzie above specified, to alter, innovate, or change the said tailzie or order of succession hereby prescribed, nor to do any other deed that may import or infer any alteration, innovation, or change of the same, directly or indirectly; nor to sell, annailzie, dispone, either irredeemably or under reversion, nor yet wadset or burden with infestments of annual rents, or any other servitude or burden, the tailzied lands and estate above written, or any part thereof, nor to set tacks nor rentals of the same for any longer space than nineteen years, and without diminution of the rental, or for the setter's lifetime, in case of any diminution of the present rental, through necessity, where a sufficient tenant cannot be found to pay the whole rent, nor to set in tack or rental the house or manor-place, offices, gardens, orchards, parks, or inclosures of Gartmore, longer than the lifetime of the granter of the said tack or rental; nor yet to contract debts, nor to commit treason (as God forbid), nor to do any other fact or deed of omission or commission, civil or criminal, directly or indirectly, in any sort, whereby the said tailzied lands and estates, or any part thereof, may be affected, apprised, adjudged, forfeited, become escheat and confiscate, or in any manner of way evicted from the said heirs of tailzie, or order of succession thereby prejudged, hurt, or changed."

The resolute clause, inter alia, declared that "the person or persons so contravening, or failing to perform the above written conditions and provisions, or any one of them, shall, for themselves, ipso facto amitt, lose and forfeit," &c. : and farther, that "it shall be lawful for the next heir of tailzie who would succeed if the contravener was naturally dead, albeit descended of the contravener's own body, to purge and obtain declarator upon the contravention," &c.

In 1819, Graham effected a loan from the Hope Assurance Company, and he granted a heritable bond of annuity in their favour to the amount of £1311, 10s. 10d., payable termly, during his life, out of the entailed estate. The conveyance was qualified by this clause, "Providing always and declaring, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that as by the said William Cunningham Cunningham Graham, possess, hold and enjoy the whole lands and other heritages before mentioned, under settlements of strict entail made by my predecessor, the former proprietor thereof, whereby I am prohibited from alienating, disposing, or any manner of way encumbering the same, to the prejudice of the No. 184. its of tailzie who may succeed thereto after my decease: Therefore it March 2, 183 hereby provided and declared by me, and the said Thomas Cobb, &c. Bontine v. trustees of the Assurance Company), do, by acceptance of these pre- Graham. sents, agree, and bind and oblige themselves, that no adjudication, or any process or diligence to follow or be used upon the personal obligation hereby come under by me, the said William Cunningham Cunningham Graham, for payment of the said annuity, penalty, or interest, or upon the right in security hereby granted, and infeftment to follow hereupon, or upon either of these, at the instance of the said Thomas Cobb, &c. assignees or assignee, shall any way affect the lands and other heritages before described, or any part or portion thereof, or the rents, mails and duties of the same, for any longer period than during my life, except the rents, mails and duties which may be due to me at the time of my death; nor shall these presents, or infeftments to follow hereupon, or any process, diligence, or execution to follow hereon, any way affect the lands and other heritages foresaid, or operate so as to infringe in any manner of way the right of any person or persons, when they shall succeed, or become entitled to succeed to me, the said William Cunningham Cunningham Graham, as heir of tailzie in the foresaid lands and others, excepting always in so far as such person or persons may otherwise represent me; nor shall my granting hereof be construed in any manner of way as any infringement upon, or irritancy of, the entails upon which I possess, hold and enjoy the said lands and others, or any derogation therefrom, in any manner of way whatever; hereby farther declaring, that these presents, and infeftments to follow hereon, are meant and intended to have effect no farther than is compatible with the said deed of entail, by which I hold the said lands and others; and also, that this present right in security, and infeftment to follow hereupon, and the assignation to the rents, mails and duties herein-after inserted, and all process, diligence and execution of whatever nature, to follow upon the same, or upon the personal obligation herein-before written, shall, immediately upon my death, become ipso facto void and null, as against the lands and other heritages foresaid, and the heirs of tailzie succeeding thereto, and the rents, mails and duties thereof, other than those which may be then due, and which would belong to my executors, if they had not been assigned by me in manner herein-after written; which declarations before written, whereby the effect of these presents, and the infeftments and others to follow thereon, are limited and restricted as said is, shall be verbatim inserted in the said infeftments to follow hereon, and in the whole transmissions, conveyances and investures of the foresaid annuity, or part thereof; declaring, as it is hereby specially provided and declared, that all infeftments, transmissions, conveyances, or other deeds made or granted in regard to the said annuity, having the redemption of the same, in which the said declarations shall not be engrossed, as herein-before provided, shall be funditus void and null." At this date Graham's eldest son, Robert Cunningham Bontine of Ardoch, was in minority.

Infestment passed in favour of the trustees of the Hope Assurance Co. who, in 1825, for a price of £12,000, conveyed their right to the Scottish Union Insurance Co., who took infestment under the conveyance in their favour. Afterwards, in 1828, that Company led an adjudication of the lands of Gartmore, for certain debts, and were infest, under a similar qualification in reference to the entail.

In 1828, Robert Cunningham Bontine, the next substitute in the Gartmore entail, raised a declarator of irritancy against him, libelling upon the entail 1767. A son and daughter of R. C. Bontine, both in pupillarity, were co-pursuers. The summons libelled acts of contravention to have been committed in making up complete titles in fee-simple to part of the entailed estate, and in burdening and selling various portions of it. The summons concluded for declarator of the acts of contravention; "and the several acts of contravention above specified, or any one of them, being established to the satisfaction of our said Lords, it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the said William C. G. Graham, defender, has thereby incurred an irritancy of, and amitted, lost, and forfeited all right, title, and interest in the said whole entailed lands and estates above described, contained in the said deed of tailzie, and every part thereof; and that his right, title, and interest in and to the said whole lands and estates, and every part thereof, is now, and shall in all time coming, be void and extinct: And it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the said whole lands, teinds, and others above described, with the rents, maills, and duties of the same, falling due from and after the date of citation to follow hereon, have fallen, devolved, and accresced, and do now belong to the said Robert C. Bontine, pursuer, as the next heir appointed to succeed by the said deed of entail, and that free and disburdened of the foresaid dispositions and infestments thereon, and of all and every other act done and deed granted by the said defender, in relation to the said several lands and others, in contravention of the said tailzie, in the same manner, and as fully and freely in all respects as if the said defender had never been in the possession of the said lands and estates; reserving entire to the pursuers all right of action competent to them and the other heirs of entail, against the defender for the loss and damage which they have sustained, or may sustain, by and through the foresaid sales, and other acts done and deeds granted by the defender in contravention of the foresaid tailzie; as also, reserving all right of challenge competent to the pursuers and the other heirs of entail, for reducing and setting aside the conveyances and other rights to the said lands and others granted by the defender to the purchasers or disponees, and all heritable securities granted over the said lands, or any part thereof, by the defender to creditors or others."

Prior to this, Graham, whose affairs were embarrassed, had executed a trust-disposition in favour of James Brown and Edward M'Millan, for behoof of his creditors. The trustees had also led an adjudication of his right and interest in the lands. Defences against the declarator were lodged, both in name of Graham, and in name of the trustees for the creditors. In the course of the discussion, appearance was made for the Scottish Union Insurance Company, who sisted themselves as defenders, in respect of their interest above specified as heritable creditors.

No. 184
March 2, 18
Bontine v.
Graham.

The defenders pleaded that the entail of 1767 was no longer an effectual and subsisting entail. The grounds of this defence are fully stated in a preceding report.<sup>1</sup> After a discussion on Cases, and a hearing in presence, the Court repelled the defence, and found that "the lands contained in the entail 1767, are effectually secured against the debts and deeds of the defender (Graham); and that the said entail is binding and effectual against him in questions with the substitute heirs of tailzie." Their Lordships at the same time remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the remaining points of the cause.

Under this remit the following points were discussed:—1st, Whether the pursuers had a title to insist; 2d, Whether acts of contravention had been committed; and, 3d, If committed what was to be their legal consequences.

1. Objection to the title. This plea, though of a preliminary nature, had been kept open on the record, without being previously disposed of, apparently because it assumed the subsistence of the entail as its foundation; and that had been hitherto disputed.

One of the acts of contravention libelled was that of making up titles to part of the entailed estate in fee-simple; and the defenders pleaded, that, by the statute 1685, c. 22, such contravention, if proved, involved a forfeiture not only against the contravener, but also his descendants; as the statute enacted "that if the saids provisions and irritant clauses shall not be repeated in the rights and conveyances, whereby any of the heirs of tailzie shall brook or enjoy the tailzied estate, the said omission shall import a contravention of the irritant and resolute clauses against the person and his heirs, who shall omit to insert the same, whereby the said estate shall ipso facto fall, accresce, and be devolved to the next heir of tailzie." By force of the statute, this inferred forfeiture against the contravener's descendants, and therefore the pursuers had no title to insist in an action, which, if successful, would equally destroy their own rights and that of the defender Graham.

The pursuers answered, that even if the deed of entail had merely refrained from expressly extending the forfeiture, resulting from an act of contravention, to the descendants of the contravener, it was decided 1835.

1835.

1, June 12, 1835 (ante, XIII 905).

184. and settled, that the descendants would not suffer from the contravener's forfeiture.<sup>1</sup> But much more must this rule apply to the present case where the entail only declared that contraveners should forfeit "for themselves;" and expressly gave right to the next heir, "albeit descended of the contravener's own body, to purge and obtain declarators of contravention," &c. And independently of authority, this was the true construction of the statute, even had the question been open.

2. Acts of contravention. These related to two properties called respectively (1.) Gartinstarry, and (2.) Garchells.

(1.) Gartinstarry. Nicol Graham, the entailor, was infeft in Gartinstarry as well as Gartmore, &c. at the date of executing the entail in 1767, and the entail was in the form of a bond of tailzie and procuratory of resignation. On the entailor's death his son Robert, made up a feudal title to the entailed lands which held of the Crown, but he possessed the lands of Gartinstarry, which held of a subject-superior, merely on a personal title. After his death, his son, the defender, made up a feudal title under the entail to the Crown lands, but possessed Gartinstarry merely on a personal title. He was heir under the old investiture of those lands anterior to the entail; and, in 1814, he obtained from the superior a precept of clare constat as heir of that investiture, and made up his title to these lands in fee-simple. He then burdened the lands with debt, and finally sold them.

The clause in the entail, binding the heirs of entail to possess under that title, provided that they "shall bruick, enjoy, and possess the said tailzied lands and estate, by virtue of this present right and taillie, and infeftments to follow hereon, or any other right that I have in my person to the foresaid lands and others above written, and by no other right and title whatsoever; and the said William Graham, and the haill other heirs of taillie above specified, shall be obliged timeously to obtain themselves entered, infeft and seised in the said lands and estate, and not to suffer the same to lie in non-entry; and also to cause insert in the instruments of resignation, charters and infeftments to follow hereon, and in the haill procuratories and instruments of resignation, charters, services, retours, precepts of sasine, and instruments of sasine, and haill other conveyances of the said lands and estate, all the provisions, declarations, and irritancies of this present taillie."

In reference to this clause, Graham pleaded that he was merely enjoined to possess the several lands under the entail, "or any other right that I (the entailor) have in my person to the foresaid lands:" that entails were to be strictly construed, and that he was left free by these words to make up a title under the entail, or any other title which was in the entailor; that no title under the entail had ever been made up to tarry, and he had availed himself of the option of making up a No. 184.

<sup>1</sup> Simpson, Jan. 6, 1697 (15353); Gordon, Nov. 14, 1749 (15384).

ple title, under which he was at liberty to sell that portion of the

March 2, 1837.

Bontine v.

Graham.

pursuers answered, that though entails were to be strictly construed they were not to be construed in a sense contrary to the true meaning and import of the words actually used; and that these words bore a plain and anxious injunction to possess all the lands contained in the entail, under no title whatsoever except the entail. And the words "or any other right that I have in my person," had no such effect as to defeat that injunction, but merely expressed the entailer's desire that the entail should not be passed over by any heir, so as to avoid representing the entailer. And as this injunction was contained in a bond of tailzie, binding the entailer and his heirs, under which the defender Graham had taken the Gartmore estate, he was bound to have made up titles, as heir of the entailer, to the lands of Gartinstarry; and his either making up a title in the name of the entailer, or selling them, was as much a contravention, as the sale of a portion of lands to which his right was feudalized under the tailzie would have been.

Garchells. The dominium utile of these lands was onerously burdened by Robert Graham, an ancestor of the entailer, from one Hodge, 3. Robert Graham was previously infeft in the dominium directum of the lands holding of the Crown; and Hodge's conveyance in his favour contained a procuratory of resignation ad remanentiam, and also a precept of sasine, neither of which he executed. He and his descendants continued to hold these lands, being infeft in them, under the Crown, and exercising every right of full property and possession in them, but without executing the procuratory or precept till 1765, when the entailer, Robert Graham, took an infeftment under Hodge's precept of sasine. His charter of entail expressly contained "All and Whole the lands of Garchells,"

816, the defender Graham expedite a general service as heir-male in the possession of his grandfather Nicol Graham, the entailer. By means, eventually, of an interposed trustee, a reduction was carried through of the defender's infeftment under Hodge's precept; and Graham then took an infeftment under it and sold the lands. He afterwards reacquired a considerable part of them by executing several excambions of portions of the entailed estate, such as the lands of Mendowie, Colrigrean, and others, 10 Geo. III. c. 51. Part of Garchells was recovered in exchange for several parcels of land, but part was never reacquired to the entailed estate at all.

The defenders pleaded that as the entail was in the form of a procuratory of resignation, it could contain only the dominium directum of all the lands in which the dominium utile was not consolidated with the superior. This was the case with Garchells. When Robert Graham

184. acquired the dominium utile in 1708, he refrained from consolidating with the superiority, which he could easily have done by executing a procuratory ad remanentiam; and in like manner every successor refrained from executing it. And although forty years elapsed before Nicol Graham executed the precept in 1765, that could not operate facto consolidation, unless the heirs had actually both possessed and regarded the subjects as one undivided fee. But the contrary was proved to be the case by the conduct of Nicol Graham. His was a better means of judging than any person now enjoyed, whether the two fees, directum et utile, had been possessed as one, or had been separate; and, knowing them to be separate fees, he expedited a deed under the precept of Hodge: and though this was done in an irregular manner, and had since been reduced, it proved the non-consolidation of the fees at the date of executing the entail. And separately, even if the two fees had been consolidated, such infestment had, in the circumstances, the effect of separating them. The dominium directum of the lands was therefore alone contained in the procuratory of entail; and the sale of the dominium utile was no contravention.

The pursuers answered that Robert Graham was infested in the dominium directum of these lands, when he onerously acquired the dominium utile in 1708; and, as, the full possession and enjoyment of the lands and of every right of property therein, had always been concomitant with a feudal infestment in the dominium directum eminens for more than forty years thereafter, the two estates were consolidated thereby as effectually as if the procuratory of resignation ad remanentiam had been executed.<sup>1</sup> When, posterior to the year 1765, Nicol Graham executed Hodge's precept of sasine, it produced legal effect, and in particular, it did not separate the dominium utile from the superiority. But the defender Graham had farther rendered that infestment nugatory as in a question with him, by having the lands reduced, which would have destroyed any effect of its preventing consolidation, if it could otherwise have had such effect. The dominium utile of the lands was therefore contained in the entail, equally with the dominium directum; and as Graham made up a title to them in a simple, and sold them; and had afterwards only re-acquired a portion of them for the entailed estate, by exchanging other portions of that estate (which was in itself a new act of irritancy), he had committed acts of contravention, which were not and could not be purged.

3. In regard to the effect of the acts of contravention, it was proved to have been committed,

<sup>1</sup> Bruce, Dec. 6, 1770 (10805); Walker, Feb. 27, 1827 (ante, V. 466); Elibank, Nov. 21, 1833 (ante, XII. 74).

Pleaded by the defender Graham, and the Compearers—

No. 184;

The summons concluded for declarator that the lands and whole rents thereof had devolved on, and now belonged to, the pursuer, R. C. Bontine, since the date of citation in this action, free of every act or deed of the defender Graham, as absolutely as if he had never been in possession. The creditors compearers in this action had a right and interest, along with Graham, to resist this sweeping conclusion, which was untenable.

Every heir of entail, in succession, took up a right of fee, and nothing more; and he was entitled to make his own estate of fee the subject of lawful and onerous contract with third parties. In regard to all such lawful contracts, the rights of third parties could not be affected by any subsequent decree of irritancy on account of contravention by the heir; and though such decree might resolve the heir's right, from and after the date of its being pronounced, and might enable the next heir to make up the estate, it could only devolve the estate upon such heir, subject to the effect of all lawful contracts previously made by the heir in possession.<sup>1</sup> Thus, for example, provisions to a wife or child, though not strictly onerous, had been sustained, being within the powers of the entail, although decree of declarator of irritancy was subsequently pronounced against the heir, on account of an act of contravention which was prior in date to the provisions.<sup>2</sup> So also all leases made by an heir in possession, within the powers of the entail, were good, although the heir's right could afterwards be irritated by decree.

The question therefore was reduced to this, whether the act of burdening the entailed estate during Graham's lifetime was in itself a lawful act, or a contravention of the entail. For, if not in itself a contravention, it must remain good, notwithstanding the subsequent forfeiture of Graham. But it had been fixed by the case of Gray,<sup>3</sup> that an heir in possession might effectually constitute a real security during his lifetime. The practice of the country had since followed on this footing; and the right of adjudging the entailed lands, during the lifetime of the heir, was expressly recognised in the case of Graham, which had since been followed universally in practice.<sup>4</sup> And in the case of Gordon,<sup>5</sup> and analogous cases, the right of the heir in possession had been pleaded and sustained to this full effect, in the most unfavourable circumstances. After Gordon had committed an act of contravention, he engaged in the rebellion of 1745, and suffered forfeiture in consequence. The next

<sup>1</sup> 4 Stair, 18, 7; Bontine, Jan. 15, 1823 (ante, II. 115; or new ed. 106).

<sup>2</sup> Lothian, &c. Feb. 13, 1725 (15554).

<sup>3</sup> Feb. 15, 1810 (F.C.)

<sup>4</sup> Graham, Nov. 14, 1828 (ante, VII. 13); Graham, Dec. 3, 1830 (ante, IX. 5).

<sup>5</sup> Nov. 16, 1750 (4728); and 5 Brown's Supp. 782; Kinloch, Jan. 10, 1751 (5500); Lundin, Dec. 13, 1750 (9605); and 2 Elch. voce Forfeiture, No. 16.

184. heir afterwards claimed the estate, in respect that an act of contravention had been committed before rebellion, and was never purged; and that he had a right to declare an irritancy, which must prevail over the posterior right accruing to the Crown under the forfeiture. But the Court pronounced a finding, which was specially affirmed on appeal, that, as the irritancy was not declared, or founded on, prior to forfeiture, the forfeiture could not be affected by it. And as the right acquired by the Crown, under the forfeiture, was uniformly pleaded on the same footing as the right which would be acquired by any party to whom the heir should onerously alienate his estate during his lifetime, this case was direct precedent for the principle that such onerous alienation would remain good, throughout the lifetime of the heir, notwithstanding any subsequent declarator of irritancy.

On the authority of these cases, and on the principle that every heir of entail possessed an estate in fee, which he might lawfully make the subject of onerous contract to its full value, the real securities granted to creditors, by Graham, could not now be affected by any decree of irritancy which might be pronounced against him.

In this case there was the farther reason for repelling the pursuer's demand, that R. C. Bontine had allowed so many years to elapse after the acts of contravention, before bringing his challenge. While he was entitled, in vindication of the entail, and consistently with the policy of the statute, to forfeit the right of the defender Graham, he was not entitled, in the subordinate question which was strictly personal to himself, as to the period of his beginning to reap the full rents, to deprive onerous third parties of the consideration for which they had made advances to Graham while the pursuers chose to allow Graham's title of heir in possession to remain unimpeached.

Pleaded by Pursuers.—

The conclusions of the present action were directed solely against the defender Graham; and the pursuers were entitled, as against him, to a decree in terms of the libel in all respects, and particularly devolving the estate on the pursuer, R. C. Bontine, free of every act or deed of Graham, in contravention of the tailzie, "reserving," as specified in the summons, "all right of challenge competent to the pursuers and the other heirs of entail for reducing," &c. all rights granted to creditors or purchasers. But in so far as it was competent in this action to dispose of the pleas of the creditors, they were unfounded. It was true that leases, if within the powers of the entail, and all other lawful acts of administration, would remain good, notwithstanding the subsequent decree irritating the granter's right. And so also would family bonds of provision, granted within the powers of the entail, because, in so far, the granter acted as a fee-simple proprietor. But neither of these cases touched the present. It was true that every heir in possession held a right, not of liferent, but of fee: but it was a qualified and com-

In regard to its duration, it was, by its constitution, liable to be cut No. 184. out by various contingencies besides the heir's death. His succession a peerage, or to a second estate, for example, might bring his right to end, just as effectually as a declarator of irritancy for contravention, March 2, 1837 Bontine v.
Graham.
 the event of his death would do. But in reference to each and all of these contingencies alike, the heir had no right to create a burden on the estate in favour of any third party, which should endure beyond the period when his own right came to an end.

There were no decisions which were opposed to this. The case of Bontine was not a declarator of irritancy, but a competition among creditors. The security there, like every other security which was granted to an heir of entail (and like that held here by the Scottish Union Insurance Company), was qualified by the condition that it was only granted in so far as was consistent with the whole provisions of the entail, and to the extent of the right of the heir in possession, and no farther. The effect of such a qualification saved the security from being a contravention, if challenged by any heir of entail: and it was a good real security against all the rest of the world, to whom the entail was jus tertii. But the very condition which saved it from being an act of contravention in a competition with heirs of entail, rendered it, in terminis, void, so soon as the heir's right came to an end, whether by decree of irritancy, or by taking a peerage, or by death, or in any other manner.

In regard to adjudications, they were saved from being contraventions by inserting a qualifying clause of the same import as that in the voluntary securities, restricting the diligence so as to operate only in so far as was consistent with the entail. But until a case could be produced where an adjudication was found to subsist after the right of the heir had fallen, there was no authority whatever for maintaining the pleas of the defender.

The right accruing to the Crown under a forfeiture for high treason, was not analogous to that acquired by a creditor lending money on the security of the entailed estate: nor did the decisions on that subject warrant the inferences drawn by the defenders.

The principles maintained by the pursuers did not prevent an heir of entail from making his qualified right of fee the subject of onerous contract: they merely prevented him from conveying to any creditor a higher right than he possessed himself.

If necessary, it would be easy to show that it was directly contrary to the policy of the law of entail, and would militate against the security of the estate in general, if substitute heirs, on forfeiting the right of an heir in possession, were nevertheless to be cut out of the whole rents of the estate during his lifetime. The heir in possession might often be a larger man than the next substitute: the next substitute might himself be obliged to give up an entailed estate, as the condition of taking up the same.

784. that which was forfeited, and might be unable to do this, if he did not receive it free of the debts of the forfeited heir: and many similar cases might be put, showing how much against the policy of the law of entail it would be to sustain the defenders' pleas.

No delay had occurred which could interfere with the right of challenge of the pursuer, R. C. Bontine,<sup>1</sup> who was a minor when the loan to the Hope Assurance Company was effected; and still less could such delay be imputed to his minor children, the next substitutes. By such delay the pursuers were themselves the only losers. The creditors of an heir of entail in possession knew of the existence of the recorded entail, and had no right to complain that, by the public law of the country, the right of their debtor was liable to forfeiture, if he committed acts of contravention.

The Lord Ordinary "repelled the objection to the title of the pursuers to insist in the present action; found that the defender, William Cunningham Cunningham Graham, has incurred the irritancies set forth in the summons, by alienating or putting away the lands of Gartinstarry, with the pertinents thereof, the lands of Garchells, comprehending the Offerance of Cashley and others, or a part of the said lands, and also the lands of Mendowie, Colrigrean, Drum of Arnmanul and others, all portions of the estate contained in the entail executed by Nicol Graham, Esq. of Gartmore, mentioned in the record; and therefore declared accordingly in terms of the libel; and found the pursuers entitled to expenses of process."

<sup>1</sup> Cormack, July 8, 1829 (ante, VII. 868).

* "NOTE.—The interlocutor of the Court, dated 12th June, 1835, having finally disposed of various points of the cause, the defenders now plead,

"1. That the pursuers have no title to insist, because the provisions of the tailzie not being inserted in the rights and conveyances under which Mr W. C. Graham enjoys the estate, the irritancy incurred by this omission extends, statuti, to the pursuers, his descendants.

"2. That the defender, Mr C. Graham, did not commit an irritancy by disposing of the lands of Gartinstarry, and the dominium utile of the lands of Garchells and the Offerance of Cashley, because they did not fall under the entail; and if the lands of Garchells had fallen under the entail, that the irritancy has been purged.

"3. That the conclusions of the action cannot affect the creditors of Mr C. Graham, who have sisted themselves in the action as defenders, their debts being made real incumbrances on the estate before his contravention has been declared; and these incumbrances being restricted to his life-interest in the estate.

"With regard to the first defence, when an entail declares that the contravener shall forfeit for himself only, and not for the heirs of his body, the Lord Ordinary considers it to be perfectly clear, that neither a contravention of the prohibitions of the entail, nor of the injunction in the statute to insert all its provisions in the subsequent rights and conveyances of the estate, can operate further than against the contravener himself. The statute 1685 is inaccurately expressed, and has always been strictly construed against the fetters of entails. Thus it enacts that all the conditions of an entail duly recorded shall be effectual, not only against the contravener and his heirs, but against his creditors; and on that ground Mr.

defenders reclaimed, and the Court ordered Cases.

No. 184.

wards, the Cases were laid before the whole Court, and a proceeding took place. As it appeared that it was understood by writers have held, that unless heirs are expressly exempted, irritancies them. But the reverse was decided in the case of Simpson,<sup>1</sup> and the law so settled ever since. On the same principle, although the statute de- at the omission to insert the provisions in subsequent rights and convey- all import a contravention by the person who omits and his heirs, this signifies a contravention of the same extent and effect with any other tion of that entail, operating against heirs, if the entail expressly forfeits t not otherwise; and this is plainly the opinion of Mr Erskine, as the one species of contravention and the other on exactly the same footing. dature could have had no object in inflicting a penalty in either case an the entailer himself had thought proper to do.

March 2, 1837.
Bontine v. Graham.

ems equally clear, that the lands of Garchells and those of Gartinstarry effectually entailed. With regard to Garchells, the dominium directum and had been in the family of Gartmore for a long period. In the year bert Graham of Gartmore acquired the dominium utile; and both it and um directum were possessed by him and his successors, for a period of a forty years before the entail was executed by his descendant, Nicol

According to a fundamental and most expedient principle in our law ancing, a consolidation of the superiority and property was thus effect- t is thought that they were not afterwards separated by an unmeaning e entailer, who, long after prescription had run, took investment on the the disposition by which the property had been conveyed to him. But ey were again separated or not, it was manifestly the intention of the o include them both in his entail. Indeed, the precept seems to have uted in majorem cautelam, for that very purpose, and accordingly, the words in the bond of tailzie apply equally to both. With regard to of Gartinstarry, which hold of a subject superior, it is admitted that they sly entailed; but as there is a clause, providing that the heir shall pos- tue of the entail, or by any other right in the entailer's person, it is at the defender having completed his titles, not by executing the procu- he entail, but on a precept of clare constat from the superior, under the ee simple investiture, he was at liberty to possess on that right, inde- of the entail. It is thought that the clause founded on imports only ir should pass by the entailer, and make up a title to the exclusion of the t by possessing on rights which were in the entailer's person, that he ject himself to the obligations in the bond.

defenders plead, that the irritancy as to the lands of Garchells, &c. was cause, after being sold by the defender, Mr C. Graham, they were again y virtue of certain excambions under the 10 Geo. III. It is enough to art of them was not recovered by these excambions; and farther, and ll more material, it is impossible to purge one irritancy by committing a tancy, for the lands excambed under the statute were themselves part of d estate.

is defence upon which Mr C. Graham's creditors mainly rest is, that a irritancy be declared against him, it will not affect their debts made he entailed estate, by conveyances, heritable bonds, or adjudications on hments have followed, before a decree of declarator of irritancy has not him,—these incumbrances being restricted to his life-interest in the principle at one time obtained in our law, that the deed of a proprietor

21 1837.

21 1837.

21 1837.

1841. both parties, or at least by the defenders, that the decree pronounced by the Lord Ordinary would not only cut down the right of the debtors, but also the right of the creditors.

E. 1837.

1841.

infest must affect, ex necessitate juris, the fee of his estate; to obviate which, in the case of entails, irritant and resolutive clauses were devised, by which the estate was held to be forfeited in the person of the contravener, by virtue of the clause, before the right which he had granted was annulled by the resolutive clause. According to this presumption or fiction, every deed of the contravener, in violation of the entail, though not prohibited, or even although permitted by the clause, ought to have been avoided, on the maxim, resoluto jure dantis, resolutio recipientis. But the fiction itself was absurd, as has been often demonstrated, if followed out to all its consequences, would have been unjust and mischievous. Accordingly, for more than a century it has been settled law, that every deed of the heir in possession, permitted or not prohibited by the entail, is valid, done after a contravention, but before decree of irritancy; for example, power to wives and children, leases for an ordinary term of endurance, feus under a missive clause, and the like. But it never was pretended that an act of contravention could be effectual, because it was committed before a previous contravention had been declared. The question, therefore, in the present case is not this, Are the debts which have been made real on the estate of Gartmore infestments of the creditors, or their trustees, contraventions of the entail? The creditors maintain the negative, on the ground that their infestments are absolute, but defeasible on the death of Mr C. Graham, and they refer to the case of Nairn versus Gray.<sup>1</sup> But the entail of Gartmore prohibits all incumbrances without distinction as to the period of endurance, by the ordinary clause, the contraction of debt. In equity, indeed, it has been held, that if an incumbrance, though prohibited, does not encroach on the rights of the next substitute, they have no interest, and, therefore, no title to challenge it; and on that ground, a trust-deed, an adjudication, or heritable bond, has been thought valid, if its endurance is commensurate with the right of the heir in possession. It is obvious that the right of the heir in possession does not necessarily subsist for his life. It terminates not only by his death, but by a decree of irritancy. It is not, therefore, in equity, therefore, in holding, nor has it ever been held, that any incumbrance not defeasible on either of these events, is not a contravention, and therefore a substitute has both interest and title to challenge it if not so restricted. The case of Nairn seems to have been misunderstood. It was not a declarator of irritancy. The question occurred in a competition of creditors, and resolved into this, whether an heritable bond, granted by Mr Gray, the heir of entail in possession of the estate of Carse, to Mr Fletcher, and afterwards assigned to Sir William Nairn, was or was not a real security? The bond declared that it should not be interpreted or extended to infer any infringement upon, or the creation of any of the irritancies contained in the said deed of entail, or any other therefrom in any manner of way whatever. In virtue of that clause, therefore, Sir William Nairn's infestment was clearly defeasible, not only on the death of the heir, but when his right to the estate terminated by a decree of irritancy, or otherwise. But the personal creditors maintained, that as the security was declared by this clause to be such as did not infer an irritancy, and as every security was prohibited, therefore the infestment was not a real security. The Court overruled that plea, on the principle already explained, that while the right subsisted, no substitute was entitled to challenge a security, even although it was real, and falling under the words of the prohibition, because it could not at that time operate to his prejudice.

"In the present case, the trust-deed granted by Mr C. Graham in favour <sup>1</sup> Fac. Coll. Feb. 15, 1810.

raham, but also the right of the creditors, the Lord Ordinary, before No. 184
e cause was advised, gave the following explanation to the Court.

March 2, 18
Boutine v.
Graham.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I think some misunderstanding exists as to the import and effect of my interlocutor, and that it has been construed in a sense which I never meant it to bear, and which I do not conceive it can bear; but if it can, it could be altered and qualified. The action is a declarator of irritancy, directed solely against the heir in possession, concluding to have certain acts of contravention declared against him, and his right to the estate declared to be forfeited. Such an action is often combined with a reduction-improbation setting aside conveyances to purchasers, or securities granted in favour of creditors. But this action contains no such conclusion, and, on the contrary, the summons, in express terms, “reserves all right of challenge competent to the pursuers for reducing and setting aside” such conveyances. By necessary implication the right of creditors and purchasers was also reserved to state their defences against such challenge, when it should be brought. Under this action, though the contravention by the heir was declared, and his right to the estate forfeited, it does not follow that the rights of creditors must be set aside. They may have various defences. The entail may have been defectively recorded; the pursuer may be barred personally excepted from challenging their rights, though not from setting aside the right of the heir in possession; or there may be other defences. It is therefore an erroneous assumption, as it appears to me, that a decree in terms of this libel, which expressly reserved the rights of creditors for future challenge, should be held to have the effect of sweeping away the rights granted to these creditors, or declaring them to have been mala fide possessors since the date of citation in this action. No such decision has yet been pronounced. The judgment, under review, is no such decision. And supposing that a reduction-improbation is still to be sought, for rescinding their securities, it may perhaps be found that their bona fides did not cease until citation, or even until decree in that action. The question of their bona fides, as well as their other defences, is not disposed of, and, as creditors, some of whom appear in this action, contains a clause exactly similar to that which occurred in the heritable bond in the case of Nairn, declaring that the debtment should not prejudice the heir of entail succeeding to Mr C. Graham in the estate, nor affect his right to the lands, nor the rents falling due after his death, nor be further binding on him, in regard to said lands and rents, than is consistent with the entail. It does not appear whether all the other securities contain clauses of the same effect. If they do, they are, in terminis, void, when an irritancy is declared. If they do not, they are incumbrances prejudicial to the rights of the substitutes, and, therefore, contraventions which can have no support in equity. It may be added, that the law then laid down, that a substitute has no title to challenge a contravention unless it be prejudicial to his interest, though very expedient in practice, may be questioned on principle. There may be various conditions in an entail, such as, that the heir shall bear the name and arms of the family, shall reside in the kingdom, and the like—which a substitute has no interest to enforce, but that they were the injunctions of the entailer, and on their being violated, his own right to the estate has opened. Be this as it may, it is clear that they can never interpose to support the right of creditors holding real securities expressly prohibited, after the right of the heir who granted them has been extinguished.”

---

1847. it seems to me, cannot, by the frame of the summons, be disposed of, in the present action. These misapprehensions of the creditors appear to rest on the circumstance that the summons concludes for declarator that the lands, with all rents, have devolved on the pursuer R. C. Bontine, from the date of citation of this action, disburdened of every act and deed of the heir in possession, and as and freely as if he never had enjoyed possession. Now, although these conclusions are in the summons, according to the ordinary style of such a summons, and though I pronounced decree in terms of the summons, it is necessary to consider who is the party, and the only party, against whom decree is pronounced. It is the heir in possession; against whom alone the action was raised, and against whom these conclusions, if contravention was proved, were well founded, and a decree must have been pronounced in these terms against him. It is true that creditors have appeared and been sisted in this action. They had an interest in title to do so, to the limited effect of supporting every defence competent to the heir in possession. If they could defend his right, a fortiori they could defend their own. But they appeared in an action in which his rights, and the plea competent to him alone, could be effectually discussed and decided; leaving other parties to defend their own rights, when challenged in an action directed against themselves. It would even involve an absurdity if the judgment under review was interpreted in any other way. The conclusion as to the devolution of the lands free of every act and deed of the heir in possession, is, of course, broad and sweeping, that if it was not to be construed with reference to him, it would strike not only at every right granted to a creditor, but every lease entered into with a tenant, and at all deeds of the heir though executed under the missive powers of the entail. It appears to me, therefore, to be clear that the decree under review could not possibly receive the general effect ascribed to the defenders; but if there is any room for doubt on this subject, a reserve should be inserted in the interlocutor, saving to the creditors, or trustees of the estate, who had sisted themselves, their defences in every challenge of their title which may hereafter be brought.

On this explanation being made, the

Dean of Faculty, for Defenders, moved for leave to withdraw the Creditors from the process.

The Court refused the motion.

The following Opinions were given by the Court:—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As I understand, from the explanation of the Lord Ordinary, that his interlocutor was intended to decide no question as to the validity, or invalidity, of any securities which may have been granted by the defender Mr Cunningham Graham, to affect the estate of Gartmore, but that it only related to the fact that the defender had incurred the irritancies set forth in the summons, by alienating or putting away the several portions of the entailed estate of Gartmore specified in the interlocutor, I am of opinion that the interlocutor ought to be adhered to. I think the objection which has been taken to the title of the petition to insist in the action is not well founded, in reference either to the terms of the entail itself, or to those of the act 1685, c. 22.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD GILLIES.—I am of the same opinion too. I entirely concur with the Lord Ordinary, and have all along done so. No. 184

LORD PRESIDENT.—I entirely concur with the Lord Ordinary also, and with all the views he has expressed in his note. I should have done so, independently of the explanation that has been given by his Lordship. March 2, 18 Bontine v.
Graham.

LORD MEDWYN.—I concur in the interlocutor as it has been qualified by the explanation of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD FULLERTON.—I concur with the Lord Ordinary.

LORD MONCREIFF.—After the explanation which has been given by the Lord Ordinary, I have no hesitation in concurring in the interlocutor. But I should have felt great difficulty in concurring with some of the views in his Lordship's note. I only adhere, therefore, on the understanding that the right of the creditors, to try the validity and effect of their securities, remains without prejudice from this judgment.

LORD JEFFREY.—I am for adhering to the interlocutor as now explained, and would pronounce decree in terms of the libel, which contains a reservation of the rights of the creditors as the subject of future challenge, in any question with them. In doing so, I consider that some of the defences are repelled, which the creditors could otherwise have maintained. If no judgment had been pronounced declaring that the heir in possession had contravened, and had forfeited his right, in any question with the next substitute, R. C. Bontine, it might have been the first part of the creditors' defences, when an action was brought against them, that no act of contravention had been committed which could have any legal consequences against the right and interest of the individual heir in possession. But that is disposed of in this action; a contravention, and its consequent irritancy, are declared against him in this action; and thus, when the rights of the creditors are afterwards challenged, the outworks of their defences are already removed, and they will be obliged to defend themselves upon grounds peculiar to themselves as onerous third parties, who contend that they possess defences which remain good, notwithstanding that the heir in possession had committed acts of contravention, and that his right had suffered a decree of irritancy.

LORD COCKBURN.—I am for adhering to the interlocutor as now explained by the Lord Ordinary.

LORD CUNINGHAME.—I am also of opinion that we ought to adhere, subject to the explanation which has been given. Perhaps, however, such an interlocutor does not make much way against the rights of the creditors, as it only cuts down the right of the heir as maintained in this action, and the creditors in their pleadings appear almost to admit that that right cannot be defended.

Solicitor-General, for Defenders.—I move your Lordships to insert a reservation of the rights of the creditors in the decree to be pronounced. The pursuers have no right or interest to object to this; and as the cause is likely to be carried to the Court of Appeal, where the Judges are nearly less familiar with the technicalities of our forms of process than your Lordships are, there might be some hazard that an unqualified decree in terms of the libel might receive a larger interpretation than your Lordships give it.

184. LORD GILLIES.—I think a reservation in the interlocutor is quite unnecessary. The summons contains that reservation in gremio, and a decree in terms of the libel is just a decree under that reservation. It is not, and cannot be, more than that.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the reservation in the summons is as effectual as any which could be inserted in the decree; and as the decree is pronounced with express relation back to the summons, it is qualified with the same reservation which exists in the summons itself.

LORD CORHOUSE.—The decree certainly did not go beyond the summons in decerning in terms of it. The summons contains expressly the reservation of the rights of the creditors for after challenge. The decree did not, and could not, go farther than the summons.

In regard to expenses, their Lordships were of opinion that those only should be awarded to the pursuers which had been incurred in discussing the question as to the acts of contravention, and the conclusions of irritancy; and that the expenses belonging to the previous branch of the discussion, respecting the validity of the entail, which was disposed of by the interlocutor of June 12, 1835, should not be awarded against the defenders. Their Lordships were not understood to intimate expressly whether they held it, in the circumstances, incompetent to go back as that branch of the expenses; or whether, supposing it competent, it was not according to the justice of the case to do so.

The following was the interlocutor pronounced by the Court:—

“The Lords of both Divisions, and the permanent Lords Ordinary, having heard this cause, adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against, with the exception hereinafter mentioned as to the expenses found due, and refuse the desire of the reclaiming note, reserving all questions with regard to the validity and effect of the heritable securities granted to or acquired by the creditors of the said W. C. C. Graham, and to all concerned, their objections, as accords. Find the pursuers entitled only to the expenses incurred in discussing the question of irritancy, and, to that effect, alter the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor; and of new find expenses due to the pursuers relative to that branch of the cause.”

J. KEE and H. G. DICKSON, W.S.—A. HAMILTON, W.S.—Agents.

RICHARD FRITH and MANDATARY, Pursuers.—D. F. Hope.—Moir.
 BUCHANAN, HAMILTON, and COMPANY, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Ivory.

No. 185.

March 3, 1835
 Frith v.
 Buchanan.

Confirmation—Executor—Arrestment.—A party died intestate, leaving four next of kin; the creditors of one of the next of kin used arrestments in the hands of a debtor to the deceased, as being now debtor to his (the arrester's) debtor; two of the other next of kin afterwards expedite a confirmation, specially including the whole debt due by the arrestee to the deceased; the arrestee then paid the debt to the confirmed executors, and obtained a discharge from them:—Held (by a majority), that the arrestee was still liable to the arrester, in respect that, by the statute 4 Geo. IV. c. 98, the moveable estate of the deceased vested ipso jure in the surviving next of kin, to the effect of being either assignable or arrestable, though no confirmation had been expedite at the date of such assignation or arrestment.

THE late Robert Hamilton, merchant in Glasgow, died intestate on March 3, 1835 December 26, 1834. He left five brothers and sisters; one brother elected the heritable succession, the other four were entitled, as next of kin, to share amongst them the moveable succession. One of these four was John Hamilton, residing at Partickhill. Robert Hamilton, at his death, had funds to the amount of £4725 in the hands of Buchanan, Hamilton, and Company. On January 13, 1835, Richard Frith, a creditor holding a decree against John Hamilton, used arrestments to the amount of £200 in the hands of Buchanan, Hamilton, and Company, as debtors to John Hamilton. No confirmation of the estate left by the deceased Robert Hamilton had hitherto been expedite by any party. On February 24th, confirmation qua next of kin was expedite by one of the brothers of the deceased, named James, and by one of his sisters: in the inventory, the funds in the hands of Buchanan, Hamilton, and Company were specially contained. On the following day, Buchanan, Hamilton, and Company paid over John Hamilton's share of the sum in their hands to these executors, and obtained a discharge from them. The executors, on the same day, paid over this sum to a private trustee for the creditors of John Hamilton, whose affairs were in embarrassment. The trustee granted a letter to Buchanan, Hamilton, and Company, obliging himself to hold the money "subject to the arrestments used in your hands at the instance of Richard Frith; that is, in so far as these arrestments were sufficient, validly to attach the said money." Frith raised an action against Buchanan, Hamilton, and Company, as liable for the debt, in respect of their having paid away the whole of John Hamilton's share of the intestate succession of his brother Robert, in breach of the arrestment.

Buchanan, Hamilton, and Company pleaded in defence, that, at the date of his arrestment, there was no real right in his debtor John, to any

1st DIVISION
 Ld. Corehouse
 B.

185. of the funds which had belonged to the deceased Robert; and that statement was an inhabile diligence.

The question turned chiefly on the following provisions of 4 Geo. 4 c. 94, entitled, "An Act for the better granting of confirmations in Scotland;" (§ 1.) "Whereas it is expedient that provision should be made for the better granting of confirmations in certain cases in Scotland, be it therefore enacted, That from and after the passing of this Act in all cases of intestate succession, where any person or persons who, at the period of the death of the intestate, being next of kin, shall die before confirmation be expedited, the right of such next of kin shall transmit to his or her representatives, so that confirmation may and shall be granted to such representatives, in the same manner as confirmations might have been granted to such next of kin immediately upon the death of such intestate." It is also provided (§ 3), that after January 1, 1834, "every person requiring confirmation shall confirm the whole moveable estate of a deceased person known at the time, to which such person shall make oath;"—"provided (§ 4), That in the case of confirmation by executors-creditor, such confirmation may be limited to the amount of the debt and sum confirmed to which such creditor shall make oath."

In reference to this statute, the defenders pleaded—

1. The evil, intended to be removed by this statute, was that of the next of kin of an intestate defunct dying unconfirmed; in which case, whether such next of kin died testate or not, his representatives, or his creditors, could not have taken up the moveable succession which was in bonis of the first defunct.<sup>1</sup> But so long as the next of kin of the first defunct remained alive, no hardship ever existed, as it was open to him to confirm, qua next of kin, to the intestate; and if he refrained from doing this, the special remedy of 1693, c. 41, was given, by which his creditor could obtain himself decerned executor-dative to the defunct as if he had been creditor of the defunct. The only grievance requiring remedy was, therefore, where the next of kin died without confirming to the intestate defunct. But in the present case, the next of kin, John Hamilton, was still alive, and the statute had no application.

2. The words of the statute, equally with its spirit, showed that the remedy was not meant for a case where the next of kin was still surviving. It was entitled "An Act for the better granting of confirmations;" and it was, on a corresponding narrative, provided, that where any one of the next of kin "shall die before confirmation be expedited, the right shall transmit" so that confirmation may and shall be granted to such representatives in the same manner as confirmations might have been granted to such next of kin." This was a well defined and limited

<sup>1</sup> 3 Etsk. 9, 30.

edy, exactly adapted to the species of grievance to be removed, but together inapplicable to the case where the next of kin remained

No. 185.

March 8, 1887

Frith v.

Buchanan.

The precise effect of the statute was, to make the jus ad rem, including the whole succession, transmit to the representatives of any of the next of kin, dying unconfirmed. It was thus analogous, in effect, to a partial confirmation qua next of kin, under the old law, which, though it created no real right in such executor, excepting to the partial extent of effects specially confirmed,<sup>1</sup> yet created a jus ad rem to the whole movable estate, and caused that right to transmit to the next of kin of such executor, though he died only partially confirmed. But any creditor of such executor, using arrestment of effects not included within the partial confirmation, would have attached nothing, as these remained in bonis fidei, until confirmation of them should be duly expedited. And so also, under this statute, an arrestment, while the next of kin was alive and unconfirmed, must be equally ineffectual.

4. The case of Mann was no precedent to this case, both because the next of kin was there dead, whereas here he remained alive; and also because that case did not decide in what manner the effects of an intestate decedent were to be taken up, but merely that the jus ad rem transmitted to the representative of the next of kin, dying unconfirmed, and that the assignee of such next of kin (who was also husband of the next of kin) was a representative in the sense of the act.

5. If the statute was construed so as to vest ipso jure in the next of kin, a real right in the moveables of an intestate defunct, so soon as the death happened, it would lead to very anomalous consequences, not only in reference to the other provisions of the statute itself (which enjoined confirmation, and required it to be total, in every case but that of an executor-creditor), but also to the general principles of the law of Scotland which would thereby suffer innovation to an extent altogether unforeseen at the passing of the statute.

Pleaded by the Pursuer—

1. The grievance to be remedied was not so limited as the defenders contended; and the intention of the statute was, to vest the succession ipso jure in the next of kin surviving an intestate, both to the effect of rendering it assignable by the voluntary deed of the next of kin, and enforceable by the diligence of his creditors. The necessity of confirmation still remained, both for fiscal purposes, and also to complete a title for extracting payment from such debtors as might refuse otherwise to pay. It placed the vesting of moveables in Scotland on the same footing as

<sup>1</sup> Sloane Lawrie, July 27, 1779 (3918); Alison, May 26, 1802 (3922); Atkinson, Jan. 14, 1808 (Dict. voce Service, &c. Appx. No. 3); Henderson's Trusts, May 20, 1831 (ante, IX. 618).

185. in England, where letters of administration were nevertheless required for these purposes. And institutional writers had concurred in taking view of the statute.<sup>1</sup> In regard to the remedy of 1695, c. 41, it could apply to this case now, as the whole executry had been confirmed two of the next of kin.

2. The statute, being remedial, the Court should construe its words liberally, so as to advance the remedy, and prevent the statute from being frustrated. Such construction was the more necessary in reference to the statute, as it was loosely and inaccurately framed, and had been so considered by the Court.

3. The right conferred by the statute was broader than that which existed under the old law from expeding a partial confirmation; and it was in consequence of the whole succession being made to vest ipso jure, that partial confirmations qua next of kin, were abolished.

4. The case of Mann<sup>2</sup> could not be explained on any principle other than that of a real right vesting ipso jure, in the surviving next of kin. In that case, one of the next of kin of the intestate, assigned her share of the succession; and such assignation was found preferable to any posthumous confirmation; which could not have been the case unless there had been a real right in the cedent, to the effects assigned. And though the cedent was dead before the competition arose, that did not weaken the case as a precedent; as it would be altogether anomalous to hold that the death of a cedent should make his assignation carry more than he could have made it carry, while he lived.

5. There might be difficulties experienced at first, in adjusting the operation of this new statute; but these would be found to be great according to the defender's interpretation, than according to that of the pursuer.

The Lord Ordinary "repelled the defences and decerned in terms of the conclusions of the libel; and found expenses due." *

<sup>1</sup> 1 Bell, 141; Stair (by More), 357, Note II.; Stair (by Brodie), p. 597, Note Robinson on Personal Succession, p. 65; Robertson, Jan. 26, 1828 (ante, p. 446.)

<sup>2</sup> Feb. 9, 1830 (ante, VIII. 468).

* "NOTE.—The statute, 4 Geo. IV. c. 98, as has often been remarked, is not distinctly or accurately expressed. If it were literally construed it would support the defenders' plea, but being a remedial statute, by a well-known rule of law, it is entitled to, and has in practice received, a very liberal construction. Thus, although it is limited to the case of the next of kin dying unconfirmed, whose right it provides shall transmit to his representative, it has been found to give the same remedy to the assignee of the next of kin, who is a singular successor, and not a representative. But the question here is, what is the nature of the right which is transmitted? Is it merely a jus ad rem, or does the property vest pleno jure in the representative, confirmation being still required in both cases? In the one case the purpose of placing the subject in bonis of the representative, and in the other merely to give the title to administer for behoof of all concerned. The latter view seems most conformable to the object of the legislature, in so far as it can be put defenders reclaimed; and the Court ordered cases. On consideration of the cases the following Opinions were given:—

March 3, 1857.
Frith, J.
Buchanan.

GILLIES.—I think the interlocutor is well-founded and should be adhered to. I conceive that an assignation by John Hamilton would have been valid, and consequently that an arrestment was a habile diligence.

MACKENZIE.—I feel some difficulty in disposing of this case. It appears that there is a total want of authority in the statute to sanction what the court attempts to do here. He has arrested funds of the intestate defunct, as the defunct is debtor, one of the next of kin, who is still living: and the competing claim is confirmation by another of the next of kin to the intestate defunct. The question then is, what authority is there in the statute for arrestment used in the present circumstances. I can find no warrant for it in the statute. The narrative of the statute purports that its object is to make provision “for the better grant of confirmations in certain cases,” and it proceeds to make an enactment corresponding to this narrative, “That, in all cases of intestate succession, any person or persons who, at the period of the death of the intestate, being conjectured. The defects in the law of Scotland with regard to the vesting of moveable succession had been felt in the case of Egerton in 1812, and of Mann in 1817, and the decisions pronounced in both were calculated to get the better of that defect in the case of succession to funds in England, where the hardship was not so apparent. But the soundness of the principle on which they proceeded, ingeniously and ably stated, came to be called in question, particularly in the case of Milligan in February 1826. It therefore became desirable to assimilate the law of Scotland to that of England in this matter, and accordingly the statute 4 Geo. 4, was passed in that year. By the law of England, moveable succession vests in the same manner as the legitim and jus relictæ vest with us, or the property which the next of kin obtains possession; and it cannot be doubted that, from this point of view, this is the most equitable and expedient rule. The form of the statute is still allowed to remain to give the jus exigendi, for various reasons, and in particular to serve fiscal purposes, just as administration is requisite and for similar reasons, although unnecessary for the purpose of vesting the property in those who have the beneficial interest in the succession. Undoubtedly the statute does not bring out this in a clear, or indeed an intelligible manner. The Lord Ordinary would not have ventured to pronounce the interlocutor as done, were it not agreeable to high authority. In the case of Mann, mentioned, it was laid down in the First Division, that ‘the statute was intended to promote, that its purpose was to give to the next of kin, in the case of an intestate defunct, the same right in the moveables which they would have by actually apprehending and taking possession of them.’ Now, it is clear, that, by the apprehension or possession of moveables, the next of kin acquire a jus ad rem merely, but that the property so apprehended or possessed no longer remains in bonis of the defunct, but vests in them pleno jure.

---

The same view had been previously taken by Mr Bell in the fifth edition of the Commentaries, published in the year in which the statute was passed. Explaining the former state of the law, he proceeds to observe, ‘that, by the statute, this is altered, and the succession is made to vest ipso jure without any apprehension.’ It is needless to remark that, if a jus in re is transmitted to the next of kin, it will found an effectual arrestment in competition with a subsequent assignation.

While the Lord Ordinary has thought it his duty to follow these authorities, he is fully aware that the question is attended with difficulty.”

185. next of kin, shall die before confirmation be expedé, the right of such next of kin shall transmit to his or her representatives, so that confirmation may and shall be granted to such representatives, in the same manner as confirmations might have been granted to such next of kin immediately upon the death of such intestate. That is the whole provision of the statute on which the pursuer can found. It is expressly limited to the purpose of granting confirmations as there allowed; and it expressly points out that the cases to which it applies, are those in which "the next of kin shall die before confirmation be expedé." In that express case benefit is conferred on their "representatives." I cannot see how the statute is to be construed so as to apply to cases which are just the reverse of this, in regard to the important fact of the next of kin not being dead, but being still alive: during which period it is premature to speak of his having a representative, he himself being still in existence and able to confirm. I cannot find any thing in this enactment to imply that where the next of kin is still in life, his creditor may do arrestments of the goods or debts left by the defunct, as being ipso jure fully vested in the next of kin by his mere survivance. If arrestment be good without confirmation, I suppose it may also be followed by a forthcoming without the intervention of confirmation: and all this under the authority of an act which was passed expressly to facilitate the granting of confirmations. I own that I do not perceive how it possibly can be done. I am of opinion that the statute was not meant to vest the real right in the next of kin without confirmation, but intended that there should be confirmation in order to vest such real right, and, for that purpose, gave certain facilities for expediting confirmation. And accordingly the statute contemplated the continuance of confirmation by executors-creditors, as well as other executors, and made express regulations respecting them. But if the mere force of the statute passes the real right in the effects, out of the defunct's hereditas jacens, and vests it in the next of kin, so as to be there attachable by a creditor of the next of kin, it is difficult to see what remains in bonis defuncti as to be attachable by the confirmation of any of his own creditors; and yet the statute has expressly sanctioned the proceeding of confirmation by an executor-creditor. The statute has also prohibited any partial confirmation excepting by an executor-creditor, and it is declared (§ 3) that every other person "shall confirm the whole estate of a deceased person known at the time, to which such person shall make oath." But if one or more arrestments by the creditors of any of the next of kin have attached part of the estate in the mean time, I am at a loss to know how a total confirmation can afterwards be expedé; and if it cannot, in what way is this injunction of the statute to be satisfied. Besides this there are other difficulties and apparently inextricable anomalies which seem to me to result from construing the statute upon the principle adopted in the interlocutor, in which therefore I cannot concur. I am aware of the decision in the case of Mann; but that case differed in some essential points from this. The next of kin was dead, in place of being still surviving, as here; and, in other respects, it did not involve all the principles which are involved in this case.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I have before me the notes of the late Lord Belgray upon this cause, when his Lordship had first considered the reclaiming Note: and they are to the import that his Lordship understood the statute to have the effect of causing moveables to vest pleno jure, as in England, and that consequently an arrestment must be effectual in competition with a posterior confirmation. were his Lordship's views. I am sensible that this interpretation of the

attended with various difficulties, and I foresaw this at the time of pronouncing my interlocutor. But I thought it the true construction; and, after much consideration, I remain of the same opinion still. I think the object of the statute was, in respect to all but executors-creditors, to abolish partial confirmations, which vested no jus in re except to the partial extent contained in the confirmation; and to substitute something else in their stead. I think the object of the statute was to vest a jus in re, in the next of kin; a matter which was the subject of much discussion in the cases of Egerton and Craigie, and which drew from the late Lord Meadowbank an expression of regret that there then prevailed so much difference between the law of England and that of Scotland, in regard to the vesting of the moveable succession of a defunct. In England, moveables vest ipso jure, but still letters of administration require to be taken out; and so in Scotland I conceive that they now vest ipso jure, but that a confirmation should still be expedite. I consider the case of Mann to be an authority to the effect that the moveables actually vest ipso jure. The assignation by one of the next of kin was there held to be effectual, without his having confirmed, which showed that he held not a mere jus ad rem, but a real right of property. And although an assignee be not properly a representative, yet the Court in that case held the assignee to be a representative quoad the subject assigned. The Court held that the statute had the same effect, as to vesting, which the actual apprehension of the moveables themselves would have had; in which case the real right was enjoyed without any confirmation having been expedite. To that extent I regard the case of Mann as a precedent. And I find that Professor Bell, in his Commentaries, takes the view that the statute has the effect of producing an ipso jure vesting of the moveable succession. I am aware that the case is attended with difficulty, but this appears to me, on the whole, to be the just view of the statute. And I may add, in regard to the question whether the statute requires confirmation to be expedite to the testate defunct, or to the next of kin afterwards dying unconfirmed, that it does not appear to me that there would be much incongruity in confirming to either.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the interlocutor should be adhered to. I am much struck with an observation of Lord Gillies at advising the case of Mann, which was that the statute changed the phraseology from “next of kin,” in reference to the party in right of the intestate defunct, to “representative,” in reference to the party in right of the next of kin. And I consider that an assignee is a representative of the cedent, in whose right he insists.

THE COURT adhered, and awarded additional expenses. In regard to the expenses, it was Observed by the Court that the difficulty of the question raised should not have the effect of burdening a competing creditor with the cost of trying whether the defenders had been able to defeat his diligence.

HENRY CHEYNE, W.S.—GIBSON-CRAIGS, WARDLAW, and DALZIEL, W.S.—Agents.

No. 185.

March 3, 1837

Perth v.

Buchanan.

186. UNIVERSITY OF GLASGOW, Pursuers, and JOHN M'MILLAN and 1837. Charges.—D. F. Hope—Sandford.
 Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons of GLASGOW, Defen Suspenders.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Penney.

Corporation—Penalty—Expenses.—1. Adherence, on remit, to the ante, XIII. 9, finding the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons of Glas corporation.—2. The adjection of a penalty for contravention of corpo leges does not preclude the corporation from the benefit of an interdict penses in House of Lords awarded to the respondent under an authority mine the same.

1837. SEQUEL of the case mentioned ante, XIII. 9, which see. An appeal been taken by the pursuers and chargers against the interlocutor Division. reported, the House of Lords (28th August, 1835) pronounced the fi T. judgment: ' It is ordered and adjudged by the Lords, Spiritual or poral, in Parliament assembled, that the said cause be remitted bet Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, with direct the Judges of that Division to consider, and to take the opinions whole Judges of the Court of Session, including the Lords of whether the respondents, as the Faculty of Physicians and Surg Glasgow, are a corporation, capable in law of possessing, and, clothed with the rights for which they contend in this action; and consider whether the right of interdict is taken away by the provis penalty made in the grant, or letter of gift, in the pleadings men And it is further ordered, that the said Court do determine the c of the respondents' costs, relating to this appeal, and that they hav to recall or alter the said interlocutors appealed from."

On the cause returning to this Court cases on the points remi consideration were ordered to be laid before the whole Judges opinion, but the pleas maintained in these it is unnecessary se to detail, as they are sufficiently adverted to in the opinion of the ed Judges, which was as follows.

LORDS PRESIDENT, GILLIES, MACKENZIE, CRANSTOWN, FULLERTON CREIFF, JEFFREY, COCKBURN.—We have considered the remit from the Lords, with the cases subsequently lodged for the parties, and the whole and remain of the opinion which we formerly gave, that the respondent appeal are a corporation capable of holding the rights which they now cla

Their title is a letter of gift or charter from King James the Sixth, c 29th November 1599, which was ratified by the Scotch Parliament in 167 possession of the character of a corporation, and their actings in a corpor city for more than two centuries, are established by documentary evidence allest and most satisfactory nature ; and their title, as a corporation, has not only been recognised in various judicial proceedings, but specially found and declared by this Court in an appropriate action brought for that purpose.

The case of the appellants, as it appears to us, derives its only support from the principle which they have adopted of laying entirely out of view the law and practice of Scotland with regard to corporations, and substituting in its stead the law and practice of England in that matter, not as to one point alone, but almost every point which they have had occasion to raise. It is true that the corporation law of Scotland has a general resemblance to that of England, as it has to that of many other countries in Europe, for the nature and object of these institutions are the same in all, being originally derived from the civil law, and afterwards modified by feudal rules, to suit the form of government, and state of society and manners when that system sprung up. But, notwithstanding this general resemblance, the law of each country in details and matters of form has its peculiarities, and in none are they more remarkable than in our own law, as contradistinguished from that of England.

Before examining the grant of King James the Sixth, the appellants suggest a doubt, whether the term charter is not improperly applied to it, because it passed under the Privy Seal, and not under the Great Seal. This seems to be of little moment, because there is no question what the document is, to which both parties refer. We may remark, however, that it forms no part of the definition of a Scotch charter, that it is a writ passing under the Great Seal. Taking the term in its most restricted sense, namely, a grant of land, or other heritable right, from a superior to a vassal, nine-tenths of the charters in Scotland not only do not pass under the Great Seal, but they pass under no seal at all. With regard to the more extensive and appropriate use of the term, it is employed as a synonyme for literæ patentēs, or patent letters, in contradistinction to literæ clausæ, or close letters, under whatever seal they pass, or whether they are sealed or not. If King James's grant had been directed to Messrs Low and Hamilton exclusively, or even to them and their brethren in succession exclusively, the letters would have been close, and could not with propriety have been called a charter. But the letters are patent, for they are addressed by the King, not to those individuals, or to the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons, but to all provosts, bailies of burghs, sheriffs, &c., within certain bounds, "and all and sundry, otheris our leidges and subjectis whom it effeirs, quhas knowledge thir our letteris sal be," that is, omnibus probis hominibus totius terræ suæ, the precise formula of a Scotch charter ever since the days of King David I. Even letters of deaconry, by magistrates and council of a burgh, or a lord of regality, by which corporations are often constituted, by virtue of a delegated power from the Crown, being letters patent, are rightly termed charters ; accordingly, in the documents and pleadings, which the parties in this case have referred, during a period of more than a century, this grant has been indiscriminately termed a gift, a patent, and a charter. We have alluded to this, not because it bears upon the merits of the question, but because it shows how unsafe it is to apply the law or forensic language of England to a Scotch case, even where there is a general analogy or resemblance.

The charter is granted in favour of Mr Low, the King's surgeon, and Mr Hamilton, professor of medicine, that is, physician, "and their successors, indwellers of the city of Glasgow ;" and it gives them power to convene before them all persons practising or using the art of surgery within certain bounds, that is, within the

No. 186.

March 3, 1833
University of Glasgow v.
Faculty of Surgeons.

186. burgh of Glasgow, Lanarkshire, Renfrewshire, Dunbartonshire and Ayrshire, to examine them upon their literature, knowledge, and practice; to admit and authorize them if they are found qualified; to debar them if otherwise, and to fine them if they are contumacious, by a judgment on which letters of horning are directed to pass. Power is given to Messrs Low and Hamilton, or the visitors, with the advice of their brethren, to make statutes for the common weal of the subjects anent the said arts, that is, surgery and medicine, and to punish the breakers of them. And various duties are imposed on the visitors, indwellers of Glasgow, professors of the said arts, and their brethren, present and to come. Lastly, the magistrates, sheriffs, and other ministers of justice, to whom the letters are addressed, are ordained to assist and defend the visitors and their posterity professors of the said arts, and to put the grant into execution.

The appellants maintain that there is no corporation constituted by this charter, and therefore that the respondents have no persona standi in judicio, that is, to sue or be sued as a body. This plea is rested on various grounds.

First, It is said, that a special denomination is one of the essentialia of a corporation; that where it is erected a name must be given to it; that the king must baptize it; and that the name thus given is indispensable to its existence. In support of this doctrine, passages from Coke, Blackstone, and Kid, are quoted, excellent authorities undoubtedly as to the law of England, but not one of these learned authors says that is also the law of Scotland. Whatever may be the form by which a corporation is baptized in England, nothing is requisite with us, but a grant from a competent authority, bestowing corporation privileges on a set of persons in existence, and their successors of a certain description. It will throw light on this point, and indeed on every point which the appellants have raised in this branch of the cause, to consider the way in which corporations anciently came to be erected in the royal burghs of Scotland, and the style of the writ issued for that purpose.

It appears to have been an early practice for the various trades within burgh to form voluntary societies for regulating their business, and for raising a fund by the contribution of their members. Those societies laid down rules respecting the trial and admission of masters, the number and fees of apprentices, the mode in which the trade was to be carried on, and the like. Further, they were in use to appoint officers to collect their funds, which, before the Reformation, were for the most part applied to defray the expense of an altar dedicated to the patron saint of the craft, and to pay the priest who officiated there. Thus the surgeons of Edinburgh had an altar dedicated to St Mungo: the tailors to St Anne; the weavers to St Soverane: the waukers to the Saints Mark, Philip, and Jacob, and so forth. The officer who had the charge of the altar was called kirkmaster or church-con (an ecclesiastical term); if he collected the contributions, he was called quartermaster, because they were paid quarterly; and visitor if he was appointed to examine the qualifications of the tradesmen, or the goodness of their work. As those were voluntary associations only, they could not enforce their rules, or levy the duties which they imposed, not only in the case of a person who had never joined the society, or who had abandoned it, but even in the case of a reluctant member, because they had no persona standi as a body. To remedy this, it became the practice for the trade to present a petition to the magistrates and council, the great corporation of the burgh, who have in every case an assumed authority delegated to them from the crown, on behalf of the termaster or visitor of the craft, and of some or all of the members, either No. 186.

 red or described in the petition, praying the council to interpose their authority he laws, statutes and ordinances of the craft, by a grant in favour of the petiers and their successors, that is, all who exercised, and should exercise the le within the limits of the grant. If this petition was complied with, a writ in form of a charter to that effect was issued under the burgh seal, which writ is nically called a seal of cause; and there is no point in the law of Scotland re clearly settled than that a seal of cause so issued, erects the grantees into a poration, and gives them power to sue and be sued, with every other privilege ecessarily incident to a corporate body, whether expressed in the grant or not—h as the power of electing officers, imposing fines, making bye-laws, and the b.

March 3, 1837.
 University of Glasgow v.
 Faculty of Surgeons.

The same form was adopted by lords of regality and barons who had power in ir rights from the crown, to erect corporations within their burghs of regality l barony; and it is evident from the present charter that the same style, mutatis standis, was adopted in the erection of corporations by the crown itself.

When it is objected, therefore, that the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons in agow had no special denomination given to them in King James's letter in 1609, or as it is quaintly said, that they were not baptized, the obvious answer is, the grant is made to them as the members of a specified calling in a specified re, that is, as physicians and surgeons being indwellers in Glasgow. They are ized just as the corporation of surgeons and barbers in Edinburgh were a cent before in their seal of cause, dated in 1505. The petition in that case was ented by the kirkmaster and brethren of the surgeons and barbers within the gh of Edinburgh, and the grant is to them and to their successors. Thus also, he case of the tailors of Edinburgh, the petition was presented by John Steill, master; George Bell, William Hockburne, and seven others named, "and the of the tailors' craft within this burgh," and the charter confirms the rules of the ety "to the said masters and their successors of the said craft." Thus also, in case of the butchers of Edinburgh, the petition is given in by "Richard Furde, kin of the fleshoris for the tyme, Robert Gray and others, principall masters of said fleshoris craft;" and the council ratify the regulations exhibited to them out even naming the craft. Thus also, the petition of candlemakers is preed by Robert Taffintoun, Andrew Galloway, and others, craftsmen of the canakers of the burgh of Edinburgh, and the seal of cause merely ratifies the tations. In the case of the weavers or websters, the petition is presented in name of "the best and worthiest personis of the haill craft of wobetaris within said burgh." And the council find the statutes exhibited "lovable to God and kirk, honourable for all the realme, profitable and worship for the craftsmen, therefore we admitt the samyn."

A multitude of other instances might be given of the erection of corporations, in Edinburgh and in the other royal burghs of Scotland, in which the same form adopted at, and previous to, that period, and it does not appear to have changed till a considerable time after the union of the crowns, when a more system of conveyancing in this department was gradually introduced.

It is evident that the charter in question was framed on the same model with the seal of cause then in use. It does not, indeed, narrate a petition presented by the surgeons, and Mr Hamilton, professor of medicine, and the other surgeons in Glasgow, probably because there was no voluntary asso-

186. ciation of the practitioners of those arts in Glasgow, and perhaps no petition 1837. presented by Messrs Low and Hamilton. But the grant is to those indivi-body of designed or described by the arts which they practised, and their successors of dwellers of the city of Glasgow. No kirkmaster is mentioned, because it was of sequent to the Reformation; but Low and Hamilton are appointed visitors term which, after that event, was often applied to the principal officers of of corporations.

The second objection taken by the appellants is, that there are no "incorporating words" in King James's Letter of Gift, or words which evince any intention on the part of the Crown to create a corporate body. This is another attempt to substitute the law of England for that of Scotland. It is quite sufficient in law, that privileges are conferred in the grant, which can only be exercised by a corporate body; and there is not one privilege conferred by King James's Letter of Gift which is not of this description. Thus power is given to Low and Hamilton, and their successors, to summon and convene before them all persons professing the art of surgery within the bounds, to pronounce decrees against the contumacious, on which diligence by horning and caption is to follow; to make statutes for the common well of the King's subjects anent the said arts, and to enforce thereof faithfully, that is, the King's subjects dwelling within the bounds; to regulate physicians practising their arts, not being graduates, or licensed by the King and Queen's physicians; and various privileges are granted to the visitors, indwellers of Glasgow, professors of the said arts, and their successors present and to come, analogous to other corporations erected by seal of cause. That there is no necessity for express words of incorporation, is evident from the seal of the burgh granted 31st January, 1475, by the Town-Council of Edinburgh, to the weaver's craft, in which there are no such words. The same is the case in the seals of burghs granted to the hammermen, to the tailors, to the cordiness, to the goldsmiths, as to the surgeons and barbers of Edinburgh, and instances to the same effect may be found, it is believed, in every royal burgh in Scotland. It was not the style of a royal writ in and before the reign of James VI., to declare the grantees to be a corporation in express terms, yet all the trades or faculties having grants from the King's reign, or from councils of burghs during that period, exist at present as corporations, and have always acted and been recognised as such.

Then it is said by the appellants, that perpetual existence by succession is the essence of a corporate character, and that this grant does not express the mode of electing or continuing the corporate body. We conceive that the provision for continuing the corporate body is clearly expressed, and expressed in the usual and appropriate style of the period. The grant is to Mr Peter Low, surgeon, and to Robert Hamilton, physician, and their successors, indwellers in the city of Glasgow, that is, all surgeons and physicians legally practising those arts, and residing in that city. No person under the exceptions in the grant was entitled to practise surgery without a license from the grantees or their successors; or medicine, without a license from a University or the Royal Physicians; a provision, therefore, made for the subsistence of the corporation as long as there are surgeons and physicians legally qualified to practise and practising their respective arts in Glasgow, and actually residing there. When Messrs Steill, Bell, &c., and the rest of the master tailors of Edinburgh, petitioned the magistrates and council to confirm the rules which they had made for the practice of the tailor craft, there was no provision in their rules for the election of kirkmasters or visitors, no

the nomination of future corporations, neither was the council prayed to grant a power of making other bye-laws. On that petition the council confirm the rules presented to them "in all poynts and articles to the said masters, and their successors of the said craft, in perpetual memorial in time to come." That was the usual form of a seal of cause in 1500, by which a succession of corporators was provided for. So in 1517, when Robert Taffintoun, Andrew Galloway, and the rest of the candlemakers presented a similar petition to have their rules confirmed, the prayer was granted in favour of the said craftsmen and their successors, without any farther provision as to the mode of succession.

In the case of Wallace v. Calder, referred to in the pleadings, the same objection was taken by the suspender, Calder, to the ambiguity of the term "successors" in this grant. It was said the grant might be construed as personal to Peter Low and Robert Hamilton, and their families, provided the successors in their families were of the profession of the original patentees, and a great deal of discussion followed on that plea. But the Court, although they diminished the amount of the fine imposed on Calder, sustained the privileges of the corporation in all respects. More than seventy years have elapsed since it was settled by a decree of this Court, in fore contentious, who the successors of the grantees are; and surely it is too late now to stir the question again.

The appellants argue, that no power is conferred by the grant of making bye-laws to regulate the proceedings of the body, but that a power is given, and unlawfully given, to make general laws for surgical practice. The clause is in these terms:—"That it sall be leisum to the saidis visitouris, with the advice of their bretheren, to make statutis for the commonn well of oure subjects anent the saidis airts, and using thair of faithfullie, and the braikeris thair of to be punishit and unawit be the visitouris, according to their falt." It is the common style in the old seals of cause to represent the rules recited in them, for regulating corporate proceedings and the practice of the craft, as statutes made for the glory of God, the honour of the realm, the worship of the town, and the profit of our Sovereign Lord's lieges, and therefore this power of making statutes "for the commonn well of the subjects" anent the arts in question, clearly includes a power of making bye-laws for regulating the corporation; and so it was construed at the time; for the very first acts of the Faculty, as appears from the extracts from their minute-book, consist in making a series of bye-laws for regulating their corporate proceedings. This expositio contemporanea of the grant is certainly more authoritative than any speculation with regard to its meaning now. Whether it empowered the Faculty not only to examine and admit practitioners within their bounds, that is, within the four counties named, but also to lay down rules for their surgical practice after being admitted, may well be doubted, and we are not aware whether such a right was ever claimed. If it had, however unlawful according to English ideas, it would have been no novelty in the law of Scotland; for by King James the Sixth's charter of the 3d of January, 1586, to the Goldsmiths of Edinburgh, the corporation is "invested with a power to inspect, try and regulate all golden and silver wares, not only in Edinburgh, but in all other parts of Scotland, with a right to punish offenders concerned in making adulterated gold or silver."

It is plain, that as neither Mr Low nor Mr Hamilton, the visitors of the corporation, were royal physicians, they and their brethren had no right by the grant to examine and admit physicians, or to grant licenses for the practice of physic. From a university, or a license from the royal physicians, was sufficient

No. 186

March 3, 18
University of Glasgow v.
Faculty of Surgeons

1836. for that purpose. But in the ratification in Parliament in 1672, which 1837. recite the grant of the 29th November, 1599, the words quoted are,—“ it shall not be leisum to any manner of persones within the foresaidie be exercise medicine without the testimoniell of one famous Universitie wh cine is taught, or at leist the persones above-mentioned, and their successors the pains contained in the said gift.” Now it is plain that the grant is to here, for nothing is said in it as to the grantees having a power to give test for the exercise of medicine. That was reserved for the universities and physicians. Mr Low was only a royal surgeon. But it has been suggeste House of Lords, that the Court of Session were not entitled to say, that t misrecital in the ratification 1672; that if the grant had been to A, and liamentary ratification had been in favour of B, the Court had no right to the legislature meant A and not B, and that this act, if it is good for a gives the power to the persons whoever it names, and not to those whom t of 1599 names. The appellants have made this suggestion to the House apparently under a misconception, and a very natural one in England, of th of a ratification by the Parliament of Scotland, supposing it to be similar vate act of the British Parliament, or analogous to it.<sup>1</sup> But in Scotland mentary ratification was not a proper law—it carried no new right—no po held to be a party to it—it was carried through periculo petentis, and was to reduction by the Court of Session. This was settled by an act of the ture as early as the reign of Queen Mary. See statute 1567, cap. 18, George Mackenzie's observations upon it. If any act of this description fore, bears to ratify a preceding grant, and misrecites it, to that extent it null, and not only has the Court of Session a right to notice this misrecit is pars judicis to do so. Perhaps a court of law at Westminster might be find and declare that an English act of Parliament, even though a private from the beginning, is now, and will be in all time coming, void, null an effect in judgment, or outwith the same. But there is no doubt that the C Session can so deal with a Scotch ratification. If the grant is in favour of the ratification in favour of B, A will take nothing by the ratification, but a neither will B; for, except in so far as it corresponds with the grant, it is ing, unless perhaps when followed by possession it may be held a pro title.

Doubts have been entertained whether the ratification, being in favour surgeons, apothecaries, and barbers alone, can be of any effect, now that bers have withdrawn from the corporation. But it never was held, in Scot least, that the existence of a corporation was affected, because part of the c tors dissolved their connexion with it. The surgeons of Edinburgh remain corporation though the barbers withdrew from it in 1722, and so also the w though the bonnetmakers, who were incorporated with them at the date o charter, are now a separate craft.

Leaving the construction of the grant, we have next to observe, that fe have occurred, if indeed any one, in which the possession of corporation pr for nearly two centuries and a half has been proved by such overwhelmi

<sup>1</sup> Erskine, i. 1, 39.

ence. It is unnecessary to recapitulate the proof, for it is distinctly stated in the No. 186 use for the respondents. The Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons are found March 3, 18 making bye-laws, and enforcing them, as early as 1602. They appear in the University, o course of that century to insist in actions as a corporation, and their title is sus- Glasgow v.
 ined; a list is produced of more than 80 bonds of desistance taken between Faculty, of 1559 and 1701, by parties who attempted to violate their privileges, and that not Surgeons.
 only where the parties practised in the city of Glasgow, but in every other district which the grant extends. At least fifteen of these bonds are from individuals actising in the county of Ayr, to which a doubt is now expressed whether their privileges ever did extend. Where bonds of desistance were not granted extraja-cially, the Faculty cited the offenders before their own court, and pronounced decrees against them, upon which diligence by horning and caption was raised. A set of 17 of these decrees is produced between 1725 and 1759, on most of which diligence appears to have followed.

The appellants attempt to get rid of all this evidence of possession by referring to a letter of deaconry, which the surgeons and barbers obtained from the Magistrates and Town-Council of Glasgow in 1656; and they say that this proves the faculty not to have been a corporation before that year. It proves that they were not a burghal corporation, that is, they had not the privileges with regard to the government of the town, and other rights which it was in the power of the Magistrates and Town-Council to confer. But the Town-Council of Glasgow could not give the Faculty a corporate jurisdiction over four counties, or warrant all the corporate acts which were performed within that extensive district, at any period, and still less during a period of more than 50 years before the date of the letter of deaconry. It is insinuated that, with the exception of what appears in the minutes to have taken place in 1602, there is no evidence of the Faculty acting as a corporation before the date of the letter of deaconry. But this is a mistake. It is proved that the Faculty sued as a corporation in 1635, founding exclusively on King James's gift as their title, for the letter of deaconry had not then been granted; and in that action they obtained a decree against all persons within their district practising surgery or medicine contrary to the terms of the grants, and against all judges and magistrates within these bounds to concur in enforcing the grant.
 And upon this decree general letters of horning were raised at the instance of the Faculty. If there was not another document in process, we are of opinion that these signet letters would be decisive with regard to the point of possession. But there is a great mass of proof to the same effect, particularly with regard to corporate acts performed after the letter of deaconry was resigned.

In addition to the title which the respondents have produced, and the continuous possession satisfactorily shown to have followed upon it, the question now under consideration has been repeatedly decided in this Court, and that not only in cases where the rights of the Faculty were indirectly recognised, but where the point was distinctly raised and brought before the Court for judgment. It was tried and decided in an action of declarator raised by the Faculty in 1691, in which the summons libels upon the gift of James VI., and concludes that the privileges granted by it shall be declared. It was again tried and decided in the suspension at the instance of Calder v. Wallace, in 1761, in which almost all the arguments now advanced against the title of the Faculty were resorted to. And these were not undefended cases, but judgment was pronounced in foro contentione. A series of cases followed, in which the rights of the Faculty, thus esta-

186. blished, were judicially recognised. So clear was the point considered, that even the appellants themselves did not venture to stir it in the Court below previous to the present appeal. We do not think that they were in consequence precluded from recurring to it in the House of Lords, but we are of opinion that the decisions to which we have referred are to be held as precedents settling the law upon the point.

With regard to what fell from Lord Gifford, in the case of the Writers to the Signet v. Graham, it is enough to say, that his Lordship did not decide the question, whether the Writers to the Signet are a corporation or not. He held that he had no materials before him for that purpose. His judgment went on a separate ground altogether, namely, that whether they were a corporation or not, they had not sued in that character, and therefore that their action could not be supported. Whether Mr Erskine was wrong in laying it down, as established law, in his time, that the Writers to the Signet are a corporation (for that is necessarily implied in his observations on the College of Justice), remains yet to be tried.

The only other point which we are directed to consider by the remit is, "Whether the right of interdict is taken away by the provision of a penalty made in the grant or letter of gift mentioned in the pleadings?" We are clearly of opinion, that the right of interdict is not taken away. When a penalty is imposed to enforce an obligation, no option is given to the party against whom it is directed, to get out of his obligation by paying the penalty. In the language of the law of Scotland, the penalty is by and attain performance. It is one mode of enforcing the obligation added to every other mode which would otherwise have been competent. This is so clearly proved by the authorities cited in the respondent's case, that we think it unnecessary to enlarge upon the subject.*

The Judges of the Second Division concurred in this Opinion, and accordingly

Adhered to the former judgment; and, further, found the defenders entitled to their expenses in the House of Lords, as well as in this Court.

Pursuers' Authorities.—1 Kyd Inc. 13, 41; 1 Blackstone, I. 467, 472-4; Conservators of R. Tone v. Ash, 10 B. and C. 319; Writers to the Signet v. Graham, in H. of L. June 21, 1825 (1 W. and S. 538).

Defenders' Authorities.—1 Kyd, 1, 62—9, 226, 254, and 2, 50; Surgeons of Glasgow v. Magistrates, 1691 (Appx. p. 54 of printed papers); Surgeons of Glasgow v. Calder, 1761 (ibid. p. 64); Surgeons of Glasgow v. Dunlop, 1791 (ibid. p. 77); Surgeons of Glasgow v. Magistrates of Glasgow, 1791 (ibid. p. 74); Magistrates of Glasgow v. Steel, Feb. 26, 1819 (ibid. p. 82); Skirving v. Smellie, Jan. 17, 1803 (10921); Fleshers of Canongate v. Wight, Dec. 11, 1835 (ante, XIV. 135); Blankley v. Winstanley, 3 T. R. 279; Magistrates of Dunfermline v. The Heritors, April 10, 1835 (1 S. and M.L. 195).

W. A. G. and R. ELLIS, W. S.—HOPKINS and IMBACH, W. S.—Agents.

* The following note was added by Lord Moncreiff:—"Though retaining the opinion, or the doubt at least, formerly expressed by me on the general merits of this case, I entirely concur in this opinion on the points embraced by it."

SIR WILLIAM MILLIKEN NAPIER, Petitioner.—H. J. Robertson.

No. 187.

Entail—Statute.—Certain substitute-heirs of entail, in India, executed a power of attorney, for giving their consent to a bill for selling part of the entailed estate; March 4, 1831
Milliken
Napier. by authorized their mandatary “to appear before the Lords’ committees, to whom any bill may be referred, and also before the committee of the House of Commons, and then and there to signify and give the consent:” the power of attorney did not reach this country until after the bill had passed into an act, containing a clause that none of its provisions should take effect until the consent of the heirs of this act “shall be declared “before the Court of Session” by a deed executed to be executed:—Held that the consent authorized by the power of attorney, being in a different form from that required by the act, the requirements of the act were not satisfied, and that the Court could not interpose their authority until consents were obtained in precise conformity with the act.

SIR WILLIAM MILLIKEN NAPIER, Baronet, of Napier and Milliken, March 4, 1831
1st Division presented a petition, stating that he had obtained a private Act of Parliament for selling a portion of the entailed estate of Milliken and paying certain debts; that the act contained a clause providing that none of its provisions should take effect until four of the heirs of entail therein specified, who were abroad, should, by written deed, “executed or to be executed, declare their consent to this act, before the Court of Session in either of the Divisions thereof, which consents the said Court is hereby authorized and required to receive;” and that powers of attorney had been received from the requisite number of heirs in India, to execute deeds of consent. He prayed for warrant to record the powers of attorney, and the deeds of consent, to be executed by the mandataries and attornies, in the Court Books, and that the Court should interpose their authority by finding that the provisions of the act regarding consents had been complied with, and the consents duly given.

Under a remit to a man of business to examine into the facts and report, it appeared that the powers of attorney had been granted in the expectation of their reaching this country before the bill had passed through Parliament, and that the mandataries and attornies were authorized “to appear before the Lords’ Committees to whom any bill for the purposes aforesaid may be referred, and also before the Committee of the House of Commons, to whom the same may be referred, and then and there to signify and give the consent that a bill for the purposes foresaid may pass into a law.” As this power of attorney was, in its terms, applicable only to a consent to a bill before Parliament, and the consent now required was a consent in the Court of Session, after the bill had passed, the Reporter pointed out this discrepancy to the Lord Ordinary, who stated it to the Court.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The least deviation from what is required by the act under which these sales are intended to be made, might have the effect of invalidating

187. the sales. The powers of attorney limit the consent to be given in one form only, and the act requires it to be given in a different form. I think the Court must <sup>4/1837.</sup> supersede consideration of the petition; and I may add, I have no doubt it is for the interest of the petitioner himself, in reference to all the ulterior procedure which may take place under the act, that the petition should be suspended, and that he should rather suffer the comparatively small inconvenience of waiting till a new power of attorney can arrive from India, than run the risk of deviating only in the smallest point from the act.

The other Judges concurred, and

The petition was superseded.

PRINSON and ROBERTSON, W.S.—Agents.

188.

JAMES OGILVIE and COMPANY, Petitioners.—Patton.

JAMES SIMPSON and JOHN TODD, Respondents.—H. J. Robertson.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration.—A party was engaged in a trading concern which was wound up in 1819, all the debts being then paid up; in order to pay them, the party borrowed money from his friends; he ceased to be a trader after 1819, but a considerable part of the borrowed money was not paid up, when a creditor, holding a bill dated in 1836, presented a petition for sequestration.—Held that the party was not liable to sequestration as a trader.

March 4, 1837. JAMES OGILVIE and COMPANY petitioned for a sequestration of the 1st Division. estates of James Simpson, town-clerk at Pittenweem, under the Bankrupt Act. They were creditors under a bill for £100, which was dated June 9, 1836, and in which Simpson was a co-acceptor with one Bruce, a draper in St Andrews. Simpson lodged answers, stating that he had not been engaged in trade since 1819, and did not fall within the act; and that he had obtained a decree of cessio in January, 1837, and had executed a disposition in favour of John Todd, as trustee for his creditors, which rendered the sequestration inexpedient as well as incompetent. Todd sisted himself as a respondent along with Simpson.

The facts as to the trading were these. In 1819 Simpson was a partner in a distillery which proved unprosperous, and which the partners, therefore, resolved to wind up. Each partner raised his own proportion of the funds required for that purpose; the debts were paid, and the concern was brought to an end. In 1821, Simpson became town-clerk of Pittenweem, and continued to hold that office without being engaged in any mercantile concern. At the date of winding up the distillery, he possessed heritage which, if sold, would have sufficed to pay his share of the debts; but, in place of selling his heritage, he borrowed the requisite amount from his friends. He was afterwards proceeding slowly to pay of these loans, when, in consequence of being involved in a cautionary No. 188 obligation, subsequently contracted, for £600, he was thrown into prison,

December, 1836, and took the benefit of a cessio. Under his examination on oath, in the cessio, he deponed, "that his difficulties first commenced by being a partner of a distillery company in Dundee, and had to contract debts in consequence of that company not being successful, and these continued to press upon him, until he stopped payment." A sum amounting to near £400 remained due, which had been contracted to pay off the debts of the distillery.

March 4, 18
 Ogilvie v.
 Simpson.

In reference to these facts, the petitioners pleaded, that, if any debt still subsisted which was coeval with the period of trading, or anterior hereto, such debt would found a petition for sequestration, notwithstanding the lapse of any intermediate interval of years, as had been expressly decided in the case of Baillie,<sup>1</sup> affirmed on appeal. But the same result must follow, if any of these debts was merely paid by contracting other debts, which still subsisted, and this was confessedly the case in point of fact; the new creditors, whose funds were applied to pay the trading debt, were entitled to the same remedy which the original creditors possessed; and any other creditor of Simpson was entitled, equally, to apply for sequestration.<sup>2</sup>

The respondents answered, that so soon as the affairs of the distillery were wound up, and all its debts paid, so that Simpson was no longer engaged in trade, and was not liable for any debts except those which had been contracted subsequently to giving up trade, he was not subject to sequestration, although these new debts might have been contracted for the purpose of paying off his obligations in the trading concern which was given up.<sup>3</sup> In the case of Baillie, the debt founded on had existed at the date of trading, and had never been paid up, which formed an essential distinction between it and the present case.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think this question is attended with some difficulty. If any debt still subsisted which was coeval with the period of trading, it is clear that the precedent of Baillie would have applied, and that sequestration must have been awarded. And if such a debt had subsisted until a short time prior to this petition, say a month ago, for example, but had then been paid by the contraction of a new debt, and applying the funds to pay off the first, I feel much doubt in holding that the liability to sequestration was thereby brought to an end. So long as a debt exists which is substantially a continuation of the debts contracted in trade, I incline to think the debtor liable to sequestration. And in this instance he expressly admitted that debts contracted for paying off the debts of the distillery have continued to press on the respondent ever since.

<sup>1</sup> May 20, 1830 (ante, VIII. 778).

<sup>2</sup> Dick, Jan. 28, 1815, F.C.; Cook, Feb. 21, 1829 (ante, VII. 452).

<sup>3</sup> Wetherpoon, July 9, 1823 (ante, II. 463; or new ed. 414).

188. LORD GILLIES.—I do not consider that the sequestration can competently awarded; unless, indeed, the character of a trader is to be held by us, as a priest was once held, on a memorable occasion, elsewhere, to be indelible. 1837. respondent has had no connexion with trade for nearly 20 years; at retiring it, every debt contracted in trade was paid up; and I can see no ground for holding him still to be liable to sequestration. If he were so, it would follow that any who has engaged in trade for a few years, or perhaps a few months, and withdrawn from it, paying all the debts contracted in it, and going to the church, would remain liable to sequestration for all his life, if he had not paid off his trading-debts with borrowed money, the whole of which was paid up when sequestration was applied for. I cannot assent to that doctrine.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I think sequestration cannot be awarded. If a man himself engaged in an unprofitable trade, and has a friend willing to lend him a sum of money to pay off all his trading-debts, and if he gives up trade, and pays all the trading-debts, with that money, I think he ceases to be liable to sequestration. His trade is at an end; his debts incurred in trade are at an end; the only debt remaining is that which he contracted towards his friend, and which he has ceased to carry on trade. I rather think that where there is no debt existing which was of an early date as to be coeval with the period of carrying on trade, there is no room for sequestrating the debtor as a trader.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I am of the same opinion. Had the debt of the petitioners been coeval with the period when the respondent carried on trade, and that debt still subsisted till now; or, had it been a debt incurred by the respondent in his trade; then the case of Baillie would have applied, and the respondent would have remained liable to sequestration, notwithstanding the lapse of time since his trade ceased. But it is a totally different case where all the debts contracted in trade have been paid up, and it can merely be alleged that this was done by borrowed money, which borrowed money itself has never yet been well cleared off. If in this latter case sequestration was held competent, it would lead to the result alluded to by Lord Gillies, and then when any man, of any profession, was owing a sum of money under a bond or bill of which the history could be traced back, through a series of varying obligations, until its origin was shown to be a debt incurred in trade at any period short of 40 years, the result would be that the debtor was sequestrable under the statute. I do not think that doctrine well founded which leads to this result.

THE COURT refused the petition, with expenses.*

P. RAE, S.S.C.—A. STEVENSON, W.S.—Agents.

* Expenses—Advocate.—A cause was gained, with expenses; the agent received from the losing party payment of fees to counsel, exceeding 100 guineas which he withheld from the counsel, who thereon presented a petition and the complaint to the Court. In consequence of this the fees were paid, and the complaint was no longer insisted in; but the Court intimated that the conduct of the agent was highly reprehensible, and that it was not without hesitation that they allowed it to pass without any other animadversion besides an expression of censure.

of CAITHNESS, Petitioner.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Robertson—Penney.

No. 11

HAMMOND and SON, and MANDATARY, Respondents.—Keay—Wood.

March 4, 1
Earl of Caithness
Eaton.

ion—Transaction.—A petition for recal of inhibition used on the depen-in action was refused of consent, a simultaneous arrangement being enter-whereby the one party granted a discharge of the inhibition, while the nd caution for a certain sum; a judgment on the merits was thereafter ed by the Lord Ordinary in favour of the party using the diligence, against eclaiming note was presented; about six months subsequent to the dis-ove-mentioned, new letters of inhibition were raised on the same depen-Held that the use of the last diligence was a departure from the good e previous transaction, and also that there was no change of circumstances the use thereof; and the same accordingly recalled.

EL of proceedings mentioned ante, XIV., 1091,<sup>1</sup> which see. The of the Earl of Caithness there mentioned for recal of the inhibil at the instance of the respondents, Eaton, Hammond and Son, een refused of consent (July, 1836), an arrangement was at the e entered into under the eye of the Court, whereby a discharge diligence was executed by these parties, and, on the part of the ond of caution granted to them by four cautioners for the sum 0. In November following, the Lord Ordinary pronounced an tor on the merits of the action, on the dependence of which the a had been used, unfavourable to Lord Caithness; against which tor a reclaiming note was presented.

March 4, 1
2D DIVISION
F.

uary, 1837, Eaton, Hammond and Son raised new letters of a to the same effect with the former letters, retaining, at the e, the bond of caution. Lord Caithness thereupon presented a for recal of this new diligence, on the ground that the use of it rary to the faith of the transaction, whereby the last inhibition arged, in room of and as a substitute for which the respondents ed to take, and had actually obtained, the security above-men-ir answers to this petition, Eaton, Hammond and Son alleged petitioner was negotiating for a large loan to be secured over his operty, and contended that their acceptance of caution could not effect of barring them from the use of future diligence, more as a change of circumstances had occurred in consequence, 1st, cession of interest and law expenses to the amount of the debt

---

report referred to, it is erroneously stated, at the end of the report, that was offered. Caution was found by the petitioner to the extent of 1837. sued for, and 2dly, of the judgment which had in the interim been pronounced by the Lord Ordinary.

When the case was first put out for advising, the allegation as to the proposed loan was explicitly denied. This denial was thereafter formally embodied in a minute, in their answer to which Eaton, Hammond and Son, while they departed from the statement thereanent, alleged that they had recently discovered the cautioners to be insufficient.

The case was this day again put out for advising.

The majority of the Court were of opinion that the raising of the second inhibition was a departure from the bona fides of the transaction by which the former diligence had been discharged, on security for £1500 being granted, and that there was no change of circumstances such as to justify the proceeding. Lord Medwyn held that the respondents were not precluded, by the previous transaction, from using fresh diligence, but that there was no change of circumstances to justify their doing so.

Their Lordships accordingly recalled the inhibition, and found expenses due.

ROY and WOOD, W.S.—SANG and ADAM, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 190. LORD DOUGLAS GORDON HALLYBURTON, Advocate.—Sol.-Gen.
Rutherford—Coventry.
ANDREW BLAIR, Respondent. —D. F. Hope—Neaves.

Lease—Proof—Presumed Payment.—The tenant of a farm under a lease for 21 years, became entitled, by the terms of his lease, to claim deduction of rent on account of the landlord's resuming possession of a considerable part of the farm, at an early period of the lease, and also to make a claim on account of meliorations made by him (the tenant): he continued to pay the full original rent without deduction, during the whole lease, and, at leaving the farm, granted a bill for the balance of the last year's rent on that footing; he made no claim for about three years afterwards, at which date his whole claim and interest amounted to nearly £900:—Held, on the special circumstances, that, though there was strong ground for supposing that his claim had been satisfied, during the currency of the lease, as the landlord alleged, yet, as there was no legal evidence of this, it must be sustained.

Arch 7, 1837. SEQUEL of the case reported ante, XIV. p. 859, which see. The question now disposed of was of a special nature, whether, in the circumstances, it was to be presumed that a tenant, under a lease for 21 years, had discharged his landlord of a claim amounting, with interest, to nearly £900, which chiefly arose from the landlord's having resumed possession of a considerable portion of the farm at an early period of the lease, and farther from meliorations made by the tenant on the farm, in buildings, dykes, &c. The lease contained a clause providing that the landlord should have power so to resume possession, on giving a corresponding deduction from the rent.

at Division.

A. Fullerton.

B.

ing for any damage occasioned ; and also that an allowance should be made to the tenant for meliorations, as the same should be valued by mutually chosen. The tenant had continued to pay his full original rent without abatement, and, at leaving the farm, had granted a bill for the sum of rent calculated, on that footing, as due at the end of the term. There was no proof of his having ever claimed any deduction during the term of the lease ; and it was not until about three years after that he made his claim, at a period when the landlord was on the point of bringing out a sequestration against him for arrears of rent under a writ, and in reference to a different farm belonging to the same landlord, which he had entered on quitting the first. The landlord the Hon. Gordon Hallyburton, afterwards Lord Douglas Gordon Hallyburton, stated that the tenant had never claimed deduction because he had received compensation in various forms during his possession, and his claim was waived, otherwise such compensation would not have been due to him : but this statement was not proved.

The case proceeded before the Sheriff, including the conjunctive process at the tenant's instance for constituting his claims, with a writ of sequestration at the landlord's instance, the Sheriff decreed for £287, 4s. 6d., being the balance due by the tenant, after satisfying his claims ; but allowed expenses to neither party, as the tenant maintained several unfounded pleas. The landlord reclaimed, and the Lord Ordinary, after the point of form was raised, by a judgment already reported,<sup>1</sup> pronounced a judgment in merits, remitting simpliciter to the sheriff, and finding the landlord liable for the expenses incurred in this Court. His Lordship added the following note containing the material facts of the case.*

protracted procedure before the Sheriff, including the conjunctive process at the tenant's instance for constituting his claims, with a writ of sequestration at the landlord's instance, the Sheriff decreed for £287, 4s. 6d., being the balance due by the tenant, after satisfying his claims ; but allowed expenses to neither party, as the tenant maintained several unfounded pleas.

landlord reclaimed, and the Lord Ordinary, after the point of form was raised, by a judgment already reported,<sup>1</sup> pronounced a judgment in merits, remitting simpliciter to the sheriff, and finding the landlord liable for the expenses incurred in this Court. His Lordship added the following note containing the material facts of the case.*

<sup>1</sup>, 1836 (ante, XIV. 859).

NOTE.—By the lease of North Ballo and Peattie, granted by the advocate respondent Blair, in 1804, for nineteen years, the landlord was entitled to use for planting, such 'ground as he chose ; the value of the ground so taken to be ascertained, and the deduction to be allowed therefor to the tenant, to be made by men mutually chosen.' He was also entitled to open quarries upon the tenant's damages, 'to be ascertained in manner foresaid.' In virtue of this lease, the Hill of Peattie, which is ground of considerable extent, was taken by the landlord in 1811, and a piece of ground called the Glacklees, was taken by the landlord from the farm of North Ballo at the same time. Eleven acres were taken in 1816, and a quarry was opened in 1819, but no deduction of rent nor was ascertained at the time. On the contrary, the tenant continued to pay full rent stipulated by the lease until its expiry in 1823. The lease was then extended for two years longer by separate missives, the whole rent to be paid ; and at its close in 1825, a settlement took place, apparently settling the full rent being due ; a bill for a certain amount having been given by the tenant, being the balance of the rent, without any reservation of deduction, either in the bill or in the discharges which he took from the 190.

In the year 1828, three years after the possession under the above-mentioned lease expired, and, upon a sequestration being threatened by the advocate, for the rent due by the respondent Blair, under a new lease, the respondent

The advocator reclaimed, and the Court ordered minutes of debate, after which their Lordships, though considering that there was strong applied by summary petition to the sheriff, for the appointment of persons to inspect the pieces of ground taken off during the currency of the former lease, and concluding for decree against the advocator, for the sums to be fixed by their valuation. This process having been conjoined with the process of sequestration, at the advocator's instance, the sheriff sustained the respondent's claims, to the amount fixed by the valuers under the summary application, and giving him credit for those sums, and various others in the accounting, ultimately doctored against the respondent in the conjoined actions, for the sum of £287, 4s. 6d., being the balance of the rents due by the tenant under his current lease, after giving him credit for the deductions claimed in his counter-action against the advocator.

Macdonald v.

"The only point really in dispute in this advocacy, is the claim sustained by the sheriff in that counter-action, and considering the whole circumstances of the case, the question is not free from difficulty. The claim of damage, in the proper sense of the term, being that for opening quarries, &c. is very trifling, being only £4, 10s. The bulk of the claim sustained in that action, amounting to nearly £900, is composed of the value of the pieces of ground taking off for planting; each successive year's value being calculated with interest; against this demand the advocator maintained that the tenant's claims for deduction were waived—that no demand had ever been made by the tenant during the currency of the lease, for any valuation of the pieces of ground so taken off;—and that any such claim was understood to have been compensated, by counter-claims which the landlord had against him, for miscropping and other breaches of the lease. On the other hand, the tenant denied these statements, and averred that repeated applications were made by him, to the landlord, during the currency of the former lease, for the appointment of valuers; and that the delay arose entirely from the advocator's evasion or refusal of those applications; no proof on those points, however, has been offered on either side, so that the question depends entirely upon the presumption arising from the facts which are undisputed, viz. the tenant's delay in making the application, and the successive payments by the tenant, of the rent without deduction, until the termination of the lease.

"Considering all things, it is impossible to deny the force of the presumption. The tenant's claim was properly not a claim of damage, but a claim of deduction of rent, from the time when the ground was taken off. The point truly to be ascertained by valuation was, not what the tenant was to receive for the ground taken off, but what the landlord was to receive, as rent for that, of which the tenant still retained possession. And the continuance on the part of the tenant to pay for what remained of the farm, the full rent originally stipulated, and his final settlement at the close of the lease on the same footing, are circumstances very nearly approaching to an admission of such rent continuing still due for the farm, though diminished, and consequently to an implied waiver of his claim of deduction. Very slight evidence indeed, in addition, of any understanding between him and the landlord on the subject, or of any existing counter-claims on the part of the landlord, would have been quite sufficient in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary to support the case of the advocator. But in the absence of any such proof, and considering that by the terms of the written contract between the parties, the extinction of a gratuitous surrender of any part of the farm is excluded, the Lord Ordinary does not consider himself warranted by mere inferences, amounting at best to a strong probability, in holding the tenant to have abandoned a pecuniary benefit, proved to be of very considerable amount, and that without any consideration whatever. He therefore sees no sufficient reason to alter the interlocutor of the sheriff on this point, and he also agrees with the sheriff in thinking that if the claim is sustained, interest must follow as a matter of course. —16. The landlord took from the tenant each year, successively, the full amount of the n for believing that the claims of the tenant had been waived or yet, as there was no legal evidence of this, adhered to the of the Lord Ordinary, and awarded additional expenses against timer.

No. 190.

March 7, 1833
Taylor v. His Creditors.

J. F. GORDON, W.S.—M'INTOSH and DUCAT, W.S.—Agents.

Watson v.
Glass.

— TAYLOR, Pursuer.— Whigham—Smythe.
HIS CREDITORS, Defenders.— Thomson.

No. 191.

—The Court, on making a remit to the sheriff for examining affairs of the pursuer of a cessio, in terms of 6 and 7 W. IV., anted warrant, notwithstanding the incarcerator's opposition, for g the pursuer on his finding caution de judicio sisti, to the amount
, the debt of the incarcerating creditor being £250.

March 7, 1833
1ST DIVISION

DER WATSON, Pursuer.— D. F. Hope—Robertson—A. M'Neill. No. 192.
WATSON OF GLASS, and ISOBEL WATSON or M'CASH, and BAND, Defenders.— Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—M'Neill—Pyper.

—Jury Trial—Witness—Interest—Public Record.—1. A party, in ren, expedite a general service as heir-at-law, which was unopposed; the as afterwards brought under reduction by a competitor who had expedite service sometime before the other; an issue was sent to a jury to try the opinquity; at the trial, the party tendered the deposition of a witness who examined at the service and was now dead; the competitor objected to ibility in respect that the deposition was emitted post litem motam, his etitor's) service being previously expedite; and also in respect that it was obtained under an ex parte proceeding; the presiding judge rejected the —Held, under a bill of exceptions, that the deposition ought to have itted, in respect that the service was regular, and the witness had died a jury trial. 2. Terms of a remit from the House of Lords, and of an ch, held, not to affect the general rule, that, in defending a service against it is competent to found on the deposition of any competent witness at the service, who has since died. 3. Where, according to the pedigree mant, at a service, his aunt is the executor of the deceased—Held (under xceptions, affirming the judgment given at the trial) that she is inadmis-

, in the knowledge that that was an over-payment, and that a deduction made, of which the amount remained to be ascertained, it appears to the inary that such over-payment must be held to have been received, under standing, that when the deduction was ascertained, he was to account for it as well as the principal.

ward to the objection taken in the additional plea for the advocator, that Blair, whose name appears in the lease of 1804, as a joint tenant, is not the summary application, it is to be observed that no such objection made in the inferior court; and the Lord Ordinary does not think that steps of the procedure it can be listened to, particularly when the ad-moderated perfectly safe by Thomas Blair's renunciation of all interest in

192. sible, on the ground of interest. Observed that such relationship affected the credibility, but not the admissibility, of a witness, in a question of pedigree. 4. 7, 1889. In the reduction of a service, the deposition of an aged witness was taken to lie in retentio, both parties attending, and the witness being cross-examined; after a judgment by the Court of Session on the proof, including this deposition, the cause was taken to appeal, the judgment was recalled, and a remit was made directing a trial of the propinquity of the competitors: the witness was still alive, and his faculties were entire, but he was unable, through age and infirmity, to attend at the trial;—Held that the deposition could not be laid before the jury, in respect that a new examination of the witness, with a view to the jury trial, should have taken place on commission, and under written interrogatories, as prescribed by A. S. 29th November, 1825, § 28. 5. An extract from a register of burials of an entry made in 1800, which stated "eighty years" as the age of a person then buried, was founded on in a reduction of a service; that age was a circumstance vitally affecting the service; the defender offered to prove that the register was loosely and inaccurately kept, particularly in and about the year 1800, and that the person who then kept the register was since dead; the presiding judge refused to admit the evidence, Observing that it was at best immaterial, as the extract was not good evidence of the age, but merely of the burial of the party; and his Lordship repeated the observation in charging the jury:—Held, under a bill of exceptions, that the evidence ought to have gone to the jury, as it could not be known what effect the extract had on their minds, or how far that effect was successfully counteracted by the observations of the judge.

Expenses.—Circumstances in which the House of Lords ordered the expenses of two parties, each of whom had been served heir to a person deceased, to be paid out of the estate of the deceased, and at the same time made a remit "to of the propinquity of the parties respectively to the deceased."

March 7, 1837. 1st Division. On the death of Alexander Watson, town-clerk of Port-Glasgow, who left a considerable amount of property, a general service as nearest and lawful heir to him was expedited in 1827, by Alexander Watson, weaver in Houston, Renfrewshire. Afterwards, in 1829, Ann Watson or Glass, and Isobel Watson or McCash, who were married to persons residing in Perth, expedited a general service as heirs-portioners of the deceased. According to their pedigree they were nearer heirs than Alexander Watson, weaver, whether his propinquity was correctly stated by him or not. They gave no notice of this proceeding to Alexander Watson, but the edict was published in common form, and the service was regularly carried through. No party appeared to oppose it. The estate of the deceased was in the meantime under the care of a judicial factor. Ann and Isobel Watsons then raised a reduction of the service of Alexander Watson, who raised a counter-reduction of their service. Their action of reduction was afterwards sisted; and in the reduction at Alexander Watson's instance, they were allowed, by interlocutor, to adduce "oral and supplementary evidence" in supporting "the proof of their propinquity as set forth in their claim in the service under reduction," and conjunct probation was allowed to Alexander Watson. Both parties brought a proof on commission, and the Court, proceeding upon the proof which had been led before the inquest, and the supplementary proof taken at the reduction, considered the propinquity of Ann and Isobel Watson sufficiently established, and assoilzied them from the reduction.

Watson. He took the judgment to appeal, and the House of No. 192. dered and adjudged that the said cause be remitted back to the March 7, 185
 Session in Scotland, with instructions to recal the interlocutor Watson v.
 l of, and to direct one or more issue or issues to be framed to Glasg.
 propinquity of the parties respectively to the deceased Alexander own-clerk of Port-Glasgow, and that such issue or issues be dingly. And it is farther ordered, that the costs of both par-appeal, as the same shall be taxed and certified by the proper his House, be paid out of the fund under charge of the judicial he estate of the said Alexander Watson deceased, and that the of Session do grant warrant accordingly, for payment of the taxed and certified as aforesaid, to the solicitors of the parties
 y. And it is farther ordered, that the said Court of Session do rther in the said cause, as shall be just and consistent with this this remit, the following issues were sent to trial:—"1st, the defenders, Ann and Isobel Watsons, are related, and in ee of propinquity they are related, to the deceased Alexander ometime town-clerk of Port-Glasgow?" "2d, Whether the alexander Watson, weaver in Houston, is related, and in what propinquity he is related to Alexander Watson, town-clerk of row aforesaid?"

irected that Ann and Isobel Watsons should stand as pursuers st issue, and Alexander Watson as pursuer of the second close of the trial, under the first issue, the jury found a verdict der Watson, defender in the issue. Ann and Isobel Watsons a bill of exceptions on the ground that evidence tendered by been unduly rejected by the Lord President, before whom the tried. The bill set forth five exceptions.

ption. Ann and Isobel Watsons proposed to give in evidence tions which had been emitted at their service before the inquest, set Miln, and Margaret Gardiner, respectively, both of whom died.

part of Alexander Watson, an objection to the admissibility of tions was stated on the following grounds. By the terms of from the House of Lords, and the issues, the cause was placed ew footing, which was in so far anomalous that the question e the jury was no longer the simple point whether the pedigree, at the service, was true or not, but whether Ann and Isobel ed at all, and if so, in what degree, to the deceased. In regard if under such an issue, no part of it was entitled to be received, none of its having been before the jury at the service; but the en tendered, was to be tried by the ordinary rules of evidence, ad or rejected accordingly. But by these rules, the depositions

190. in question must be rejected. Before Ann and Isobel Watsons had purchased the briefs under which they were to expedite their competing service, Alexander Watson had been regularly served. They ought to have given notice to him of their service, but failed to do so, and thus obtained an unopposed service. The depositions procured at such a service, were thus to be viewed in the same light as mere ex parte proceedings, and were therefore inadmissible. It was true that the hearsay of a person deceased was admissible; but then it must be hearsay of what flowed spontaneously and impartially from the untutored mind of the speaker; and accordingly in England where, by an exception to their general rule, the hearsay of dead relations was admitted in questions of propinquity, it was always rejected when the words were spoken post litem motam.<sup>1</sup> In this case the ex parte deposition was not the unbiased effusion of the mind of the speaker, but was just the rehearsal of what the deponent had been put in training to state at the precognition previous to the service; and as there was no cross-examination, it was merely a selected statement of so much of the deponent's evidence as suited the examiner's purpose.<sup>2</sup>

Ann and Isobel Watsons answered.

They were not under any obligation to notify their service to Alexander Watson excepting according to the regular form of publication required by law to be given to all the lieges. They had given such public notice, and the service was in all respects regularly obtained. Every deposition which was competently taken at that service, might be competently tendered in defending against a reduction of it, if the witness had died in the interim. There was much stronger reason for receiving it, than for receiving the mere hearsay of the conversation of a deceased party; which, though not spoken by the deceased under the sanction of an oath,<sup>3</sup> was undoubtedly admissible. And if this deposition was to be rejected, all services throughout Scotland would be exposed to imminent danger of being brought under reduction at any time short of the vicennial prescription, after the principal witnesses might be dead, when the services could easily be overturned if the depositions of deceased witnesses were inadmissible.

There was nothing in the remit from the House of Lords, or the terms of the issues, which did or could take this case out of the common rule. Although the issue sent to trial put the question whether Ann and Isobel Watsons were related in any, and what, degree, yet this was done in an action of reduction of their service, and in reference to a record in which the pedigree as proved at their service was alone founded on by them. In instance, therefore, they were obliged to prove that pedigree, as much No. 192 ter, as they were, before the case went to the House of Lords. But, <sup>March 7, 18</sup> before the appeal, the Court of Session, in judging of the reduction, had <sup>Watson v.</sup> looked at the evidence of this very witness along with the rest of the proof <sup>Glass.</sup> the service; and the jury should also have been allowed to consider it.

<sup>1</sup> Starkie's Law of Evid. I. 44, and II. 605.

<sup>2</sup> Smith, Oct. 6, 1824 (3 Murr. 429); Mackellar, May 28, 1828 (4 Murr. 345); Carleton, March 13, 1816 (1 Murr. 28).

<sup>3</sup> Talk on Evidence, 410 and 430, third edition.

The analogy of the English law was no safe guide in ours; the admission of the hearsay of a dead witness, was, with them, an exception from their general rule, and it might the more readily be narrowed by them;

Scotland, such admission was the general rule, and was not on slight grounds to be subjected to new and confined limits.

LORD GILLIES.*—I cannot help regretting, that, by our forms, which in this respect I believe coincide with those of England, the effect of sustaining any one of the exceptions must be to set aside the verdict, and occasion a new trial. But whatever are to be the consequences, the only question before us, is whether the law of exceptions be well or ill-founded. In regard to the first exception I think it must be sustained. The evidence tendered, consisted of the depositions of two witnesses who had been examined before the jury at the service of Ann and Isobel Watsons, but who had died before the Jury trial came on, under the remit from the House of Lords. After their death, no alternative remained, except that of either admitting the depositions just as they were emitted, leaving to the parties to observe their credibility, or to reject them absolutely. It is said that the English law would have so rejected them, being emitted post litem motam. Even if that was only instructed, I think this Court should pause before it follows any rule drawn from that law in a question like this. The general rule of the law of England is that when a witness dies, his whole evidence is absolutely lost; our general rule is just the opposite, for, whenever a witness is dead, so that the best evidence cannot be had, the words which he may have been heard to speak, are admissible reserving to parties to observe on the weight due to them, which may vary extremely according to circumstances. But when I recollect that the general rules of the two countries are thus opposed, and that the admissibility of hearsay of dead witnesses in a question of pedigree, is an exception to the general rule of the English law, and is opposed to the genius of that law, I am not prepared to hold that every limit by which that exception is confined and guarded in England, is equally to be applied here, where the subject of the limitation would not be an exception from our general rule, but our general rule itself. I lay aside, therefore, the English rule as a precedent. But it is next maintained that these depositions were no better than an ex parte proceeding, and are not so good as if they had been the hearsay of spontaneous and unbiassed conversation in which the deceased had taken a share. I do not think this observation is well founded. There are, on general principles, two objections to hearsay: 1st, That there is no opportunity for cross-examination: 2d, That the statement which is proved to have been made, was not made on oath. The first objection does not apply here at all. The first, would be more serious if the service had been no better than a common ex parte proceeding. But it was made with perfect regularity; after all the intimation had been given which the

---

* The opinions of the Judges, in reference to each several exception, are given immediately after the pleadings of the parties for and against the exception.

1837. law requires, and under which intimation any of the lieges might have been put at the service. The evidence was competently led under a public judicial process, well-known to the law, and having most important public ends in view. It distinguishes the evidence taken before an inquest, from that which was taken in the case of Carleton.<sup>1</sup> The depositions emitted in proof of a pedigree, before an inquest, in a legitimate and formal proceeding, are on an entirely different footing from voluntary affidavits, or from a deposition taken, in the circumstances of the case of Carleton, and it would be highly dangerous to disregard the distinction between them. In trying the merits of the service when brought under reduction, we never hesitated, before the cause went to appeal, to look at these depositions and to found on them. But it is said that the special terms of the remit from the House of Lords, made this a different cause from what it was before. I cannot adopt that view. It is still the same action of reduction of the same service. We pronounced decree in that action; it was taken to appeal, and in that action the House of Lords made the remit under which the Jury trial took place. The House of Lords had no other cause before them, and could not travel out of it. They could not direct an abstract point to be tried, without reference to its bearing on the cause in which the trial was to take place; and it was, of necessity, with reference to the reduction of the service that the issue was sent to be tried by the Jury. That issue tries "whether Ann and Isobel Watsons are related, and in what degree of propinquity they are related to the deceased?" But suppose that they had attempted to prove any other degree from that which was set forth in the service, the objection of surprise would have been fatal. It would have been an attempt to get up a new case before the Jury, a pedigree different from that which Alexander Watson was attacking and which they were defending. I look on the remit of the House of Lords, as being just to try the truth of the pedigree maintained by either party in their respective services. But be that as it may, the remit and the issue must be viewed in reference to the cause before the Court; that was the reduction of a service, and I think that all the evidence which would have been competent and important, in trying the reduction of the service, independently of the special terms of the remit from the House of Lords, and of the issues, was equally competent and important at this trial. And I can have no doubt that the mere death of a witness, who had been competently examined at a regular service before an inquest, is not to cause the loss of the deposition emitted by that witness, when the verdict of the jury is challenged in a reduction, and the challenge is brought before a jury in the form of an issue for trial.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. In the reduction of the service of Ann and Isobel Watsons, all the evidence which had been competently taken before the jury, at the service, was competent to be again founded on in defending the service. The witnesses competently adduced at the service, and who remained alive, might be again adduced in the reduction; and where they were dead, their depositions might be produced. And I may advert to two statutes which contain regulations as to the mode in which this Court is to deal with cases brought from an inferior court, in which a proof has been taken in that court. The first of these is 59 Geo. III. c. 35, which (§ 14.) directs this Court, where such proof appears inadequate, to direct farther proof to be taken according to the forms of this Court

<sup>1</sup> March 13, 1836; 1 Murr. 28.

No: 196

March 7, 18
Watson v.
Glass.

unless the parties consent to cancel the depositions of such witnesses as are alive & within Scotland ;" this provision shows that no consent was required as to the positions of witnesses deceased, and implies, I conceive, that these depositions should be used before the jury, just as the witnesses who emitted them, could have been adduced before the jury, if still alive. The second statute is the Judicature Act, 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 40, which repeals the former, in so far as the consent of parties was requisite to enable this Court to cancel the depositions taken in the inferior court, at sending a cause before a jury ; and gives us power "to give such directions with regard to the proof already taken, or with regard to any part or parts thereof as to us shall seem just." Had this been an action from any of the ordinary inferior courts, we should certainly not have held it to be within our discretionary power, to reject the deposition of a witness because he had died since the proof was led in the Court below. And although the present case is not identical with these, yet it comes very near it.

The only rule, according to which, evidence which has been led before the inquest, can be directed to be laid aside in the event of a trial by jury, is that the best evidence alone is to be laid before the jury. That rule will exclude the deposition of any witness who is still alive and who can be adduced and examined in the presence of the jury. But the rule altogether fails of application in the case where the witness is dead. It is quite impossible to reject such a deposition on the general abstract ground that it was taken in an unopposed service. If the witness was admissible at the service, his deposition, after his decease, must be admissible in defence against a reduction of the service. It is then the best evidence which can be had. And if any other rule were adopted, it would necessarily follow that whenever an unopposed service was brought under reduction, and the cause was sent to a jury, the whole evidence on which the service had proceeded must vanish ; not only the depositions of the witnesses who survive would require to be laid aside, because they themselves could still be examined, but the depositions of the witnesses since dead would also be laid aside, upon the grounds pleaded by the defender in this issue. But it would lead to very perilous consequences indeed, if it was in the power of a party, who did not oppose a service, to cause all the evidence taken under it to vanish, by merely instituting a reduction at any period within the vicennial prescription ; which period might even extend beyond the 20 years wherever a plea of non valentia agere could be stated. The effect of this might be to overturn the best services, in the most unjust manner ; as a competitor would just wait quietly, until the death of the principal witnesses on whose testimony the service rested, and then he would bring his reduction, and say that the depositions of these witnesses could not be read. In the same way, when reductions were brought of decrees in absence, the proof which might have been taken and put on record by the pursuer would be liable to be set aside. And every cognition would be exposed to the same danger ; the evidence on which a party had been cognosed as fatuous for example ; and so, in similar cases. In all these the verdict of the inquest would be liable to be overturned by having the whole original evidence before the inquest thrown aside, if the depositions of Miln and Garraway were to be rejected here. I think it impossible to adopt a rule in regard to depositions, which is so pregnant with dangerous consequences as this.

It has been pleaded, however, that this issue is to be severed from the cause in which it has been taken, and is to be viewed as a mere independent abstraction. We are satisfied that the remit from the House of Lords does not warrant any such 192/ remarkable interpretation being put upon it. That House did not intend the issue to be taken at all, or to any effect, except that of trying the case between the parties. The issue is no extraneous abstraction, but merely a means of trying whether the service of Ann and Isobel Watsons is reducible, or is valid. But even if it could have been held that the issue was to be regarded as an abstraction, I think the depositions were admissible. The objection of their being taken post litem motam might have been good if the service had not been regularly expede; but where the service was regular, I do not think the depositions could be rejected. But I do not rest my judgment on this ground, as I think the issue was truly taken in the reduction of the service, and must be viewed as part of the process of reduction, and nothing else.

LORD CORNHURST, after shortly stating the history of the case, read the terms of the remit from the House of Lords, "to try the propinquity of the parties respectively to the deceased;" his Lordship then proceeded as follows:—That remit undoubtedly meant that the propinquity was to be so tried, in so far as it was competent and relevant to try it in this action of reduction. The remit must be so read and so construed. And what, then, was it, which could thus be tried in the reduction of the service of Ann and Isobel Watsons? They could not defend that service by proving any degree of propinquity whatever, different from that which the inquest had found to be proved at the service. Had they even proved themselves to possess a nearer degree of propinquity; had they even proved themselves the lawful daughters of the deceased; that would not have defended their service. They must have proved their degree of propinquity the same as that which was stated in their service, or their service was gone. And so also Alexander Watson must have proved his pedigree to be consistent with his service, or his service was gone. I have adverted to these things for the purpose of recalling the attention of the Court to the fact, that, in this reduction of the service of Ann and Isobel Watsons, the Court were merely reviewing the verdict of the inquest who served them heirs; and neither the House of Lords, nor this Court, could try any point excepting in the reduction of that service. As the validity of that service was the question at issue, and was the only question which could completely be tried under that issue which went to trial, it remains to be decided, what evidence was competent in thus trying, and reviewing, the service under reduction. And I have no hesitation in thinking that all evidence competently tendered in the Court below, at obtaining the service, might again be competently tendered in defending it; and, as a part of the application of this rule, that, wherever any competent witness who had deposed in the Court below, had died in the interval, the deposition of that witness might be tendered in evidence, subject only to such remarks on the weight and credibility of the testimony as were warranted by the circumstances. In reviewing the verdict of the inquest, it was competent for this Court, and it was competent for the House of Lords, if not satisfied with the evidence laid before the jury at the service, to say there ought to be farther evidence adduced, and that this should be done before a jury. But in doing so, the general principle of the law of Scotland applies, that the deposition of a person deceased is admissible. And if we failed to apply this principle, I think very dangerous consequences indeed would result. Wherever there were competitors to an estate, and the proof of the pedigree of one of them chiefly rested on the testimony of aged witnesses, as Robert Simpson, his competitor might just lie by, and allow an unopposed service to be expedite, and, after waiting for any period short of the vicennial prescription, a his reduction; and insist that the deposition of every witness before the in- No. 192. who had since died, must be absolutely thrown aside. Or the disponee un-leath-bed deed, might suffer the heir-at-law to take a decree of reduction in March 7, 185

 e, and, after a lapse of 39 years, might bring a reduction, and insist that all Watson v.
 idence which the heir had taken and recorded before obtaining his decree, Glass.
 ow good for nothing; and that the heir must defend himself upon the eviof any witnesses still surviving, or lose his estate.

as been urged that the law of England would have ruled this point in a difmanner. Perhaps it might have done so, for any thing that I know; but I t going out of the law of Scotland, in order to determine what evidence is tent in the reduction of a service; I am not going into the law of England

I do not know what that law may be in such a case as this; I am a Scot-idge, and am not bound to know it. Laying it therefore aside, I hold that, ing to the law of Scotland, where a service has been regularly obtained, and rwards brought under reduction, and any competent witness who deponed the inquest, has died in the interim, it is competent for the defender in the ion to put in evidence the deposition emitted by that witness before the in-

RD PRESIDENT.—After all that I have heard, I certainly feel that my origiinion in this case has been considerably shaken; but the grounds of it are mpletely removed, and I still retain it, though with less confidence than for-

It is certain that the statement which a person deceased has been heard ke, is, by our general rule, admissible evidence. But such hearsay is proved sence of the jury by the oath of the person who heard the deceased make atement; and this person is liable to the check of cross-examination as to all cumstances under which the statement was made, which is a check of great tance in testing the degree of weight or credibility which is to be attached statement, and the statement of the deceased is also the unprompted, and meous effusion of his own mind. But the depositions tendered in this cause, in truth, ex parte evidence. The deponents had never been subjected to examination. And although the brieve of service was published in common and all the lieges might have appeared at the service, still I think there was portant omission made in respect to fairness of procedure. No intimation pecially given to the competitor Alexander Watson, although his service was e a considerable time before this. The evidence led at such a service stands ss favourable position than that which is led in an ordinary decree in ab-as the defender in that process has always received a citation, and it is his ult if he does not attend, but allows decree to go in absence. And as I er that these depositions should be viewed in the circumstances as taken ex merely, I think they were not admissible, and that the observations of the CHIEF COMMISSIONER and LORD PITMILLY, in the case of Carleton,<sup>1</sup> relative inadmissibility of ex parte depositions, have a strong bearing upon such a this.

and 4th Exceptions.—In leading the evidence before the inquest, stants of Ann and Isobel Watsons were examined. According to pedigree, these aunts, being their father's sisters, were a degree

<sup>1</sup> 17112 (1816).

<sup>2</sup> 17112 (1816).

<sup>1</sup> March 13, 1816, (1 Murr. 28.)

1892. nearer in kin to the deceased than Ann and Isobel Watsons themselves 1837. and were executors of the deceased, if the nieces were his heirs.
 1837. aunts died before the jury trial in the reduction, and Alexander Watson took an objection to the admissibility of their depositions, which was sustained by two successive deliverances; the first of which applied to the deposition of one of the aunts, and the last, to those of the other.
 The 2d and 4th exceptions, in the bill of exceptions, applied to these deliverances. Besides the objection, which was common to these deliverances, and to those of Miln, and Gardiner, already considered, Alexander Watson pleaded that the aunts were inadmissible both on the ground of relationship, and also on that of interest. In reference to interest, he alleged that the deceased had left a moveable succession, and as the pedigree which proved Ann and Isobel to be heirs, also proved them to be executors, they had a manifest interest to support it. By doing this they would throw Alexander Watson out of the field, and, in after claiming the executry, would only have to deal with their own and whose right as heirs was identified with theirs as executors, and who not resist their claim as executors. They had thus an interest, &c.
 The verdict under the issue, which rendered them inadmissible.<sup>1</sup>

Ann and Isobel Watsons answered, that, in a question of pedigree, the relationship of an aunt was no objection;<sup>2</sup> there was a penuria of evidence inherent in the subject of inquiry, and the evidence of near relation was essential to get at the truth, especially where the parties were in the lower classes of society, so that none but relations knew their private history or descent. In regard to interest, as it had the effect, when qualified, of absolutely excluding a witness, however high his character and important his testimony, it was indispensable that a positive interest in a legal, and not a merely popular sense, should be qualified. No interest could do this, but an actual interest in the issue of the cause; in particular, no mere belief of interest<sup>3</sup> in it, could do so. But the aunts had no such interest; Ann and Isobel Watsons did not claim them; the verdict of the inquest did not establish that they were executors of the deceased, nor could they afterwards have used it for establishing this. The service was merely to take up heritance, as to which the executors were strangers. There was therefore no legal interest affecting these witnesses; and the popular interest arising from their connection with the cause, was only a subject for animadversion as to their creditibility, and did not occasion total inadmissibility.

LORD GILLIES.—The first objection stated against these witnesses, being the same with that which applied to the depositions previously rejected, ought to have been repelled. So also ought the objection on relationship, &c.

<sup>1</sup> Angus, &c., July 23, 1827 (4 Murr. 343).

<sup>2</sup> Boyd, Jan. 20, 1770 (16770 and 3989).

<sup>3</sup> Ralston, Feb. 27, 1833 (ante, XI. 451); Nightingale, 1830, 1 Barn.
 Adolph. 439; Wood, 1826, 5 Barn. and Cress. 335; 1 Starkie, Law of Evid.

g that this was a question of pedigree. But the third objection, interest, applied to me to apply to these witnesses, and therefore their testimony was propererted. I do not go more minutely into this, as the interest appears to me to be ident, and as I concur in the judgment which was given in at the trial.

No. 192.

March 7, 1835

Watson v.

Glass.

RD MACKENZIE intimated that he concurred with LORD GILLIES in this on.

RD COREHOUSE.—I think there was a distinct interest affecting these wits so as to disqualify them. It is said, that by the law of England the hearsay ceased relations, if the words were spoken post litem motam, is not recei-
 . I should feel the greatest doubt in regard to the reception of that principle ur law, and it is altogether new to me. I think it would lead to very un-ate results if it were received. These were persons in a low rank of life, as ose pedigree there is probably no evidence to be had excepting among their ons. None of the public records are likely to exhibit the links of their suc-e descents. In such a case as that, if the effect of lis mota was to exclude bsequent statements of the relations of a competitor, the party who first pur-d a brievé and published it, would gain a most unjust advantage. But I do nter into that point, as I rest my opinion upon the ground of interest. There ainly an interest in the witnesses. I think it inaccurate to say that this servas res inter alios, as to them, and that they took no benefit by it. The servas duly published, all the lieges were made cognisant parties, and they were ed to appear at the service. If, in this reduction of their service, Ann and l Watsons be assoilzied, I think that their aunts might, if alive, have founded e decree of absolvitor, in any after question between Alexander Watson and
 . The objection of interest appears to me to be irresistible.

Exception.—At an early stage of the reduction, the deposition of beth Gardiner or Black, an aged witness, had been taken by Ann Isobel Watsons, to lie in retentis. Both parties had attended when leposition was taken, and she had been cross-examined by Alexan-Watson. The deposition had afterwards been opened up, and con-ed along with the rest of the proof, when the Court of Session ounced their judgment of Feb. 25, 1835. The witness was still alive, e date of the jury trial, and her mental faculties were entire, but she unable to attend at the trial on account of age and personal infirmity. deposition was tendered in evidence by Ann and Isobel Watsons, to h it was objected, that, after the remit was made, with a view to trial ry, she should have been examined on written interrogatories, ac-ng to the form prescribed by the Act of Sederunt,<sup>1</sup> for examining eses whose depositions are to be laid before a jury; and that the l deposition taken, was inadmissible at a jury trial. This objection unstained, and Ann and Isobel Watsons took an exception to the dence sustaining it.

regard to this exception, Alexander Watson pleaded, that, in all the best evidence must be laid before the jury. The form of taking

<sup>1</sup> Nov. 29, 1825, § 28.

1497. that evidence, on commission, when it was to be laid before a jury, enjoined by the Act of Sederunt (§ 28), 20th Nov. 1825, to be containing answers to written interrogatories previously adjusted. <sup>1498</sup> Without the consent of parties, there was no warrant, even in the case of rated jury trials, for laying before a second jury, the evidence which thus been obtained and used for the first jury trial; or any depositions which had not been obtained expressly for the second trial itself. there was no doubt of the competency of examining this witness on interrogatories, if it had been applied for.

Ann and Isobel Watsons answered, that as the deposition had been regularly taken, at an early stage of the cause, subject to the cross-examination of Alexander Watson, it was probably better testimony than now he had, after the witness had necessarily heard the cause so canvassed by all parties. There was no obligation on them to re-examine the witness, and, in general, the Court granted a re-examination with much reluctance, that it was doubtful whether they would have granted it at all, even if it had been applied for.<sup>1</sup> But it was open to Alexander Watson himself, to have had farther examination of the witness on applying to the Court; and, as he failed to do so, he could not object to the deposition tendered.

<sup>1499</sup> LORD GILLIES.—I think the deposition of Elizabeth Gardiner was rightly rejected. That witness still remains alive. The examination on written interrogatories, as prescribed by the Act of Sederunt, in reference to jury trial, is a mere form, but it is of substantial importance; and I think that Alexander Watson was entitled to object to any deposition of this witness, not obtained according to that prescribed form. I have formed a clear opinion on this point.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I concur in thinking that the judgment given at the trial was right. When a trial by jury was ordered, the evidence to be laid before jury, in so far as it consisted of the depositions of living witnesses who could attend at the trial, should have consisted of depositions taken under written interrogatories according to the forms which were prescribed by the jury court. It is only such depositions which could be looked upon as the best evidence of that in reference to trial before a jury.

5th Exception.—Robert Watson, the grandfather of Ann and Isobel Watsons, was buried at Perth in 1800. An extract from the parish gister of burials had been made by Alexander Watson, and founded in the previous stages of the cause, which bore that Robert Watson, aged 80 years, when buried. If this was his true age, it was a fact which destroyed the pedigree maintained by Ann and Isobel Watsons. The extract had been considered by the Court of Session at deciding the case on 25th February, 1835, and in particular one of the Judges, the Lord President, had stated that he had felt considerable difficulty in then the pedigree of Ann and Isobel Watsons, because of this extract; No. 192.

<sup>1</sup> Paul, March 10, 1832 (ante, X. 469).

 it he had finally done so, in consequence of disregarding the regis- March 7, 1831 together as a register of ages, and merely looking on it as authentic Watson v. available for establishing its proper subject of registration, which was Glass.
 be of burial alone.

the trial before the jury, Ann and Isobel Watsons tendered wit-to prove "that any entry of the age of Robert Watson, was not relied upon, as evidence of the age, inasmuch as such entry of age no proper part of the register of burials:—That the entries of age appeared in the said register were made from no authentic infor-
 , but were generally made from mere report, and frequently from port of persons who had no proper means or cause of knowledge, equently upon mere guess or conjecture of the person making the or of some person equally uninformed:—That such entries were y instances quite erroneous, and that this was particularly the case e practice in and about the year 1800, being the year of the burial said Robert Watson:—That the said register of burials, even in to those matters which properly form part of such a register, was, about the said year, kept in a very careless and inaccurate manner, is, in many instances, quite erroneous:—And that the person or s who then kept the register of burials, and made the entry in re-o Robert Watson, were now dead."

was objected for Alexander Watson, "that any inquiry into the of keeping the register of burials, in regard to the entry of ages generally, is incompetent, in respect that no evidence is tendered he mode of entering the age of Robert Watson."

s objection was sustained, the Lord President observing at the same hat the register was not good evidence of any thing but the date of ; which observation his Lordship repeated in charging the jury, he effect due to the extract which had been laid before them. An tion was taken against the deliverance rejecting the evidence offered peach the register. On this point it was pleaded for Alexander on, that, as no evidence was offered to prove the individual entry of t Watson's age to have been inaccurately made, it was not compeo go into general evidence as to the system according to which the er was kept, which last evidence could not be let in, until the first een adduced. And as the age was not a proper part of the register, e registration of it could make no faith, and the presiding Judge itimated this at the trial, there was no just ground of exception and Isobel Watsons answered that the extract from the register, inter alia, the entry of Robert Watson's age, had been used them, and that it was of no value to the other party as a docuof evidence, excepting in reference to the question of age. The ling Judge had, indeed, expressed an opinion that the register was 1892. entitled to little faith in respect to the question of age; but the 1897. was to be returned by the jury, and it was impossible to say how their minds might have been impressed with the terms of the ex-how far that impression remained unremoved by the terms of the by the Judge. And they had a right to prove the general inaccuthe system of keeping the register at the time, although, at this of time, and after the intervening death of the parties, they could prove the manner in which the individual entry as to Robert was made.<sup>1</sup>

LORD GILLIES.—I think the evidence tendered as to the general and inaccuracy of the mode of keeping the register should have been received. extract was used on the part of Alexander Watson, against the competing which bore not only the date of Robert Watson's burial, but also An offer was made by them to prove, that, besides the circumstance of being an extraneous and gratuitous addition to the proper subject of the record itself was kept so loosely as to be of no validity or authenticity.
 I think such a proof should have been allowed to go to the jury. It was known what effect the extract would have on the jury, in reference to question of age. It may be true that the jury were directed by the presiding judge to pay no regard to the extract as a proof of age, and it may be very probable that the jury paid no attention to it; but we cannot rely that they totally disregarded it. We have no means of knowing that they did so; and I think the verdict taken against the judgment refusing to allow the evidence to be tendered, should be sustained.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I entirely concur.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I incline to think that the evidence tendered in support of the accuracy of the register ought to have been received. Not to allow a proof of the inaccuracy of this or that individual entry; but the system on which it was kept was loose and incorrect. If it could have been proved that the keeper of the record was in the habit of making entries just as he casually pick up his information, without confining himself to such entries as were warranted to make by the parties best authorized, then I think such evidence was relevant to go before the jury. And I do not consider that the charge of the Judge, though directing the jury to pay no attention to the extract as to age, is enough to do away with the effect of having excluded competent evidence which was tendered to impeach the extract. Such evidence might have had weight with the jury, than the charge itself; and the party was entitled to the benefit of both the one and the other.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In reference to the 2d, 3d, and 4th exceptions, as to your Lordships concur with me in the view I took at the trial, I shall not make any observations. And in regard to the 5th exception, I would only remark that I refused to admit evidence to impeach the accuracy of the register as to merely because I regarded such an entry in a register of burials to be of no validity and entitled to no weight. Suppose the entry, besides stating the burial, also stated that the deceased had had a son named Thomas lawfully born

<sup>1</sup> Tait on Evid. 51 and 52; Miller, July 21, 1826, 4 Mart. 122.

sars before ; or had married one Jane Thomsom 30 years before ; the gratuitous statements as to these particulars would have been of no authority whatever, [ I should have considered that any evidence offered in impeachment of the register on these points was at best purely superfluous and supererogatory. It was on these grounds alone that I refused to admit the evidence as to the mode of entering the register. ]

No. 192.

March 7, 1833

Wright v.

Wright's

Trustees.

THE COURT then sustained the first and fifth exceptions ; disallowed the others ; and directed a new trial to take place.

C. F. DAVIDSON, W.S.—MACKENZIE and MACFARLANE, W.S.—Agents.

S ELISABETH WRIGHT or WEBSTER and SPOUSE, Pursuers.—D. F. No. 193.

Hope—Wilson.

WRIGHT'S TRUSTEES, Defenders.—Robertson—Cowan.

Marriage—Process—Parties to a Suit—Proof.—In a declarator of legitimacy by a child born of a connexion in Scotland, against the representatives of her father deceased, who subsequently contracted a regular marriage in England, and after having had children by this marriage, became domiciled, and died in Scotland, his wife continuing to live in England ;—Held, 1st, That the English marriage was no bar to an action proceeding on the allegation of a marriage effectually, though irregularly, constituted by the law of Scotland, and might be put an end to by proof of such Scotch marriage ; 2d, That it was not incumbent on the pursuer to call the English wife as a party to the process ; 3d, That in the circumstances of the case, the pursuer had failed to establish a marriage between her parents.

ABOUT the year 1804 or 1805, the late Douglas Wright and Janet Kirkwood, while fellow-servants together in Glasgow, formed a connexion in which the pursuer Elisabeth Wright or Webster, was born in January, 1806. An entry of her baptism of that date, as the lawful child of Wright and Kirkwood, appeared in the register of baptisms of the kirk-session of Glasgow. Wright and Kirkwood never cohabited continuously together as man and wife, and shortly after the birth of the child, the former went to England, and served for some years with various masters there and on the Continent. During this time Janet Kirkwood assumed the name of Wright, which was also borne by the child. In 1815, Wright was regularly married by banns in London to Ann Evans, by whom he had two children. In 1816, he came to Scotland, and while there was joined by a woman, who lived with him, and had a third child, after which she went to England and never returned to him. He then resumed his intimacy with Kirkwood, who had another child to him in Glasgow in 1819. This child, which died soon afterwards, was named after the father, and bore the surname, and the baptism was entered as before in the kirk-session register. Kirkwood had no other children but those already mentioned, and was not of dissolute habits. She died in 1833 in the Edinburgh In-

March 7, 1833

2d Division

Ld. Moncreif

F.

193. firmary, into which she had been received as Janet Kirkwood or Wright 1837. a married woman.

Wright had in the mean time been carrying on business as a postman in Edinburgh, and acquired property to a considerable amount. He received the pursuer to live with him, and showed an interest in her welfare, but did not openly acknowledge her as his lawful child: and he did not treat Kirkwood as his wife. He died shortly after her decease.

Thereafter the pursuer, who was now married to Webster, a stable-keeper, brought an action of declarator of legitimacy against her father's trustees. In her condescendence she undertook to prove a marriage between her parents, 1st, by celebration, 2d, at least by acknowledgment in presence of witnesses, and 3d, by cohabitation as man and wife.

The defence was that there was no legal and sufficient evidence of the marriage.

A record having been closed, the Lord Ordinary remitted to the Commissaries to take a proof, from which and from the admissions in the record, the state of the fact appeared to be in substance as above set forth. His Lordship appointed intimation of the existence of the process to be made in England to Ann Evans or Wright, that she might appear if she thought proper, but no appearance was made for her. He thereafter pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has failed to establish, by legal or sufficient evidence, that the late Douglas or Douglass Wright, and the late Janet Kirkwood, her parents, were lawfully married persons, according to the law of Scotland: Therefore, sustains the defences, assolvies the defenders, and decerns; but in respect that it appears from the evidence, that the said Douglas or Douglass Wright did so act and conduct himself as to create a reasonable belief in the pursuer that her said parents had been married persons, or at least a reasonable doubt as to her status, finds no expenses due."

The pursuers reclaimed.

* His Lordship's note referred particularly to the evidence of the witnesses, which his interlocutor was grounded; and in regard to the effect of the English marriage on the present action, it proceeded as follows:—"The Lord Ordinary is not of opinion that the marriage in London would bar the present declarator of legitimacy, upon good and sufficient evidence of a marriage constituted in Scotland by celebration in 1805, or by clear cohabitation as man and wife, before the date of that marriage in London; or that it would be at all incumbent on the pursuer to call Ann Evans as a party to this declarator. He appointed notice to be given to her of the existence of the process, that she might appear if she thought fit. But he has no idea that a declarator of legitimacy cannot proceed, founded on the allegation of a marriage effectually, though irregularly, constituted by the law of Scotland, merely because one of the parents may have committed bigamy, by entering into another marriage. He thinks that with that the pursuer has no concern. If her case were clear otherwise. But he nevertheless thinks that the English marriage is a fact of very great importance in the cause, as bearing upon the reality of the proof, and affording presumptions both of fact and of law, against any equivocal, doubtful, or suspicious state of the evidence."

THE COURT, with the exception of Lord Meadowbank, (who rested No. 193. mainly on the insertion in the register of baptisms,) were of opinion that the interlocutor was well-founded, and accordingly adhered, finding expenses due since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.* March 9, 1837 Dalrymple.

JOHN RONALD, S.S.C.—CUNNINGHAM and WALKER, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM DALRYMPLE, Petitioner.—Marshall.

No. 194.

Curator bonis—Lunatic.—A fatuous person, whose family resided in America, possessed of property which was partly situated there, and partly consisted of realty, under the charge of a curator bonis in this country; the family sent a mandate to the curator to transmit the funds in his hands, after which there should have been no fund left within Scotland for the provision of the fatuous person:—petition for authority to transmit the funds, and for recall of the curatory, granted by the Court.

WILLIAM DALRYMPLE, S.S.C., was appointed curator bonis to Mrs Kennedy, a widow who was labouring under mental imbecility. He realized a sum of about £600, belonging to her, which formed the whole curatorial fund. Mrs Kennedy's family resided in America, where part of her property was situated, and they executed a power of attorney authorizing Dalrymple to remit this fund to David S. Kennedy her eldest son, a merchant in New York, who was said to be a person of high respectability, and who would duly provide for her maintenance. Dalrymple presented a petition to have his accounts audited, and power given him "to transmit to the said David S. Kennedy, or to pay to his order for transmission, such balances as may appear to be due by the petitioner on his accounts, on receiving a valid discharge for the same; and, his being done, to recall the foresaid act of curatory," &c. March 9, 1837
1st Division.

The Lord Ordinary, to whom this petition was remitted, on reporting to the Court, called their special attention to the circumstances of the case, as his Lordship considered it extremely doubtful whether the Court should grant the prayer of the petition; and it was explained at the same time that the petitioner had no desire to be rid of the curatory if the Court did not empower him to pay over the curatorial fund.

LORD GILLIES.—If this money was sent out of the country, is there any other provision left here for the maintenance of the lunatic?

LORD CUNNINGHAME.—None.

LORD GILLIES.—It is altogether out of the question to authorize the curator to take away the money.

Other Judges concurred, and their Lordships refused the prayer of the petition.

W. DALRYMPLE, S.S.C.—Agent.

On the point above referred to in his Lordship's note, Lord Glenlee observed, that it is no means impossible to make out a marriage by repute, and cohabitation with a wife in Scotland, which will put an end to an English marriage taking place afterwards, but there must be very pregnant circumstances.

195. MRS ELIZABETH SINCLAIR OF M'DONALD and HUSBAND and OTHERS, Pursuers.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Deas.
 1837. ROBERT BROWN and OTHERS (Campbell's Trustees), Defenders.—
D. F. Hope—Mackenzie.

Prescription—Pupil—Process—Mora.—A decree of certification and reduction contra non producta, was pronounced in 1786 rescinding a disposition and sale of certain lands, which was followed by a decree of reduction-improbation of the same titles, in 1788, pronounced after the production had been satisfied; but decrees were taken, in absence, against an undefended pupil; after more than 50 years had elapsed, during which time the pursuers of these decrees, and their various disponees, possessed the lands, the representatives of the pupil, now deceased, raised a reduction of the decrees, and of all the subsequent conveyances of the lands: the defenders produced the decrees, and pleaded that they formed a title to exclude: Held, by the whole Court, (1.) that as the decrees affected the title of a heritable estate, minorities were to be deducted in computing the years of prescription against the pursuers; and (2.) that if, after deducting minorities, the lapse of prescription had not run upon the decrees in absence, these decrees did not technically form a title to exclude; and Observed that nevertheless, this did "not necessarily imply the instant recall of the decrees, or place the defenders exactly in the same situation as if they had never been pronounced;" but that the lapse of time, combined with other circumstances, might form a plea of personal exception against the pursuers, or might "have a most important effect in determining that general question of which the pursuers necessarily undertook to make out the affirmative, viz. whether, in the whole circumstances, the decree ought or ought not to be reduced; and that "the lapse of time might affect the question of onus probandi, in regard to the facts, on the ascertainment of which, the ultimate reduction of the decrees might depend."

March 9, 1837. SEQUEL of the case reported ante, March 3, 1835, (XIII. 594), which the Whole Court see. The facts are there stated, as well as the judgment then pronounced by the Court. The defenders took that judgment to appeal, and the House of Lords remitted the cause, "with an instruction, to order the matters of law, in question in this cause, to be heard before the whole judges, including the Lords Ordinary, and to pronounce judgment according to the opinions of the majority of such whole judges."

Under this remit a hearing in presence took place, after which

LORDS JUSTICE-CLERK, GLENLEE, MEADOWBANK, MEDWYN, CORNHILL, FULLERTON, JEFFREY, and COCKBURN concurred in delivering the following opinions:—

"This is an action brought by the representatives of Henry Sinclair the elder and of Henry Sinclair his son, for setting aside two decreets, the one dated July, 1786, and the other the 27th of February, 1788, obtained against Henry Sinclair the younger as the heir of his father: It also concludes for setting aside various titles dependent on those decreets. The object and effect of the decrees was, to reduce a conveyance of the lands of Auchenstarry, granted by Henry the proprietor, to Henry Sinclair the elder.

"Of the preliminary defences given in against the present action, the third and fourth stated a title to exclude, founded on the decreets 1786 and 1788:

of the years of prescription. By the interlocutor of the 7th of July, 1832, No. 195. the Lord Ordinary 'repels the preliminary defences pleaded, in so far as they are stated as grounds of objection to the defender satisfying the production in regard the two decrees of reduction called for, reserving all questions on the merits of the said decreets of reduction, and the effect of them in regard to the other writs called for, and the other conclusions of the summons; and the defenders declaring that they are to acquiesce in this interlocutor, allows them till the first box-day in the ensuing vacation to satisfy the production as to the said two decreets of reduction.' And on the 27th of November, 1832, the following interlocutor was pronounced:—

March 9, 1833.
Sinclair v.
Brown.

'The Lord Ordinary, in respect the production has been satisfied so far as regards the two decreets of reduction, and that the defences already lodged maintain the defences upon the merits of these two decreets—Appoints the pursuers to give in a condescendence of the circumstances they aver and offer to instruct in support of the reasons of reduction as applicable to these decreets, and that within ten days from this date, and appoints the defender to give in answers within ten days thereafter.'

"In the record prepared in compliance with this interlocutor, the parties appear to be at issue on various points of fact, which might affect the reasons of reduction and the defences, if there were no title to exclude, or other insuperable bar to such enquiry. Accordingly, the pleas in law subjoined to the defender's answers to the condescendence, contain various grounds of objection to the admissibility of the challenge of those decreets, and, inter alia, the following:—'4th. After the lapse of long prescription of forty years, the decreets now sought to be reduced form a title to exclude, and the pursuers cannot found either upon their minorities or the minorities of their authors, for the purpose of interrupting that prescription.' 5th. The benefit of deducting minorities is not applied to a mere right of action, which might have been pursued by the parties long prior to the lapse of the period of prescription, and their right of action is cut off by the negative prescription.'

'The Lord Ordinary, by his interlocutor of the 13th of May, 1834, 'sustains the title to exclude founded by the defenders on the decree of certification dated 16th July, 1786, and the decree of reduction-improbation and declarator William Brown against Henry Sinclair and others, dated 27th February, 1788, produced, together with the several conveyances executed, the titles made up posterior thereon and prior to the execution of the summons in the present action, of the 8th of February, 1832, as set forth and produced in this process: 'Therefore sustains the defences, assoilzies the defender, and decerns: Finds expenses due,' &c. And afterwards, by the interlocutor of 3d March, 1835, the First Division of the Court called the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and found that 'there is no title to exclude; and remit to the Junior Lord Ordinary to proceed further as shall be reserved, reserving all question of expenses.' This judgment having been appealed from, the case has been remitted by the House of Lords for reconsideration.

It appears to us that the title to exclude, according to the technical statement in the pleas in law for the defenders, cannot be sustained. The decrees sought to be reduced being obtained against a pupil without tutors, though not absolutely invalid, in the most favourable point of view for the defenders, be considered as valid in absence. Indeed that seems to be now admitted. Again, it will be found, that in urging those decreets as forming a title to exclude, the defenders maintain the decrees with the alleged lapse of the years of prescription; maintaining, in order to take off the effect of the specialty in this case, that in estiinconvenient, but irreconcilable with the usual forms, to decide upon such imperfect views, when many other circumstances, having a most important bearing on the merits, are left undetermined. On looking at the condescence and answers, it will be seen that the parties are at issue on many most important matters of fact. Nay, farther, it will be seen, as indeed might be anticipated from the imitation of the interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary, under which the record was prepared, that some of the most important circumstances on which the defenders now rest their case, do not enter into the record at all. For instance, an important branch of their argument is founded on the various successive transmissions of the property, and the silence of the pursuer's author on those occasions, though then arrived at majority; yet neither those transmissions, nor the circumstances under which they took place, are even averred in the statement of facts for the defenders.

"In this situation, it does appear to us that the case is not yet so prepared as to be ready for a decision on those matters which principally engaged the attention of the parties in the argument which we have heard. If by the term, 'title to exclude,' is meant the plea as urged by the respondent in the record, viz. that the decreets are protected by prescription, we concur in the former interlocutor of the court, that there is here no title to exclude. But as a different and more comprehensive sense appears to have been attached to the term, both in the note and interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and in the subsequent arguments of the parties, may be advisable to guard against the consequences of such misapprehension; and we rather think this might be done by recalling the former interlocutor of the court, by finding that in respect of the minorities, the pursuers are not barred by prescription from challenging the decreets of 1786 and 1788 as decreets in absence, and remitting to the Lord Ordinary to proceed in the preparation and disposal of the whole cause, reserving the effect of all the other pleas of the parties.

"This suggestion proceeds on the supposition that the minorities are admitted by the defenders. If they are not, the finding must of course be omitted, and the reservation left applicable in general to all the pleas of the parties."

LORD MONCREIFF subjoined the following Opinion:—

"Though I am unable to concur in all the statements in the above opinion of Lord Fullerton, &c., I see no objection to the interlocutor proposed to be pronounced. But I think it right to observe, that it was not on the fourth plea in law for the defenders, which no doubt involves the point of prescription, but upon a first plea, combined with the sixth and seventh, that, as Lord Ordinary, I thought that the decrees produced were sufficient to exclude the demand for production of the warrants of those decrees, and the title-deeds of the property, to be discussed on their merits.

"I am of opinion, 1. That the decrees are to be considered as decrees in absence; and, 2. That prescription has not run on them, in respect of the minorities. But I still remain of opinion, that it is not a matter of course, or of universal competency, that a decree, more especially in an inprobation, must of necessity be opened up, to the effect of compelling production, under the usual intimation, of the title-deeds or writs which formed the warrants or the subjects of a decree, and requiring the party who by himself or his author obtained it to state his grounds of action, on the single ground that it was a decree in ab-

No. 195.

March 9, 183

Sinclair v.

Brown..

185. sent, and that the long prescription of forty years has not run on it. It may in many cases be a mere impossibility for a man to support in such a manner a decree which his author may have obtained fifty years before he is called upon to do so, or even to produce the essential writs which formed the grounds of it, in which case they must all fall by certification. It was in this sense that I was of opinion, that the decrees in this case, with the great lapse of time which took place before they were challenged, and the acquiescence of the parties successively interested in the public titles completed in virtue of them and the sales following thereon, did form a title to exclude the pursuers of this reduction from calling for production of the other writs enumerated in the summons to be redressed. But I certainly was looking much more to the substance of the thing than to the mere form; and I still think, that the principle was directly sanctioned by the judgment in the case of Campbell against the Representatives of Graham, December 5, 1782.

"As the other Judges, however, seem to be of opinion, that the pleas to which I refer should rather be considered as grounds of defence against the conclusions of the action on the merits, than as forming a title to exclude, I am inclined to acquiesce in that view. Only, I must still hold, that the force of them must be duly weighed, equally in regard to any decree of certification which may be demanded, in case any of the writs called for cannot be produced as in reference to any other point affecting the merits of the decrees, and the titles of the property."

The cause was then resumed, along with these Opinions, by the Lordships of the First Division.

LORD GILLIES.—I concur in the opinion expressed by the consulted Judges.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur with them also.

LORD MACKENZIE.—My opinion is the same; and I would only observe, that I never meant to hold, that all the proceedings which have taken place since the date of these two decrees, are to go for nothing, or are to have no effect in regard to the onus probandi, as between these parties. But nothing of that sort is implied in the interlocutor now to be pronounced.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords, having resumed the consideration of this case, and the opinion of the consulted Judges, recall the interlocutor of 3d March, 1835, and find, that, if the minor claims shall be competently established, the pursuers cannot be held as barred from challenging the decrees of 1766 and 1788, as decrees in absence, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to have the cause prepared, and to proceed farther as shall be just, reserving the effect of all the pleas of the parties, and all questions of expenses, with power to the Lord Ordinary to dispose thereof, including the expenses in the Inner-House."

G. GORLON, S.S.C.—T. GRAMME, W.S.—Agents.

HIBALD SWINTON (Secretary of Edinburgh Academy) and OTHERS, No. 19

Suspenders.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Swinton.

JAMES PEDIE, Respondent.—D. F. Hope—H. J. Robertson.

March 9, 18

Swinton v.

Pedie.

Nuisance—Property.—Held that the erection of a great slaughter-house in the suburbs and immediate neighbourhood of a city would be a nuisance, notwithstanding an offer to make very great precautions for preventing any thing offensive to the sight, smell, or cleanliness: and that the experiment, whether the slaughter-house could be erected and conducted without committing a nuisance, was not to be permitted, in respect that such experiment could not be thoroughly justified without great, and perhaps irreparable, injury, to neighbouring property.

JAMES PEDIE, W.S., was proprietor of ground at Silver Mills, in the northern suburbs of Edinburgh. The ground was within the bounds of the police, and, though not included within the royalty, it was nearly approached by it on several sides. There were various private dwelling-houses in the neighbourhood.

1st Division
Ld. Fuller
D.

The Edinburgh Academy, a large seminary for classical education, was in 140 yards of this ground; and much capital had been invested in establishing this institution, which was numerously attended by scholars. A large building for the Deaf and Dumb Institution stood adjoining the Academy grounds. There was a public road or street which bounded both these grounds on the south; and the grounds of Pedie lay to the south of this road. In the same neighbourhood there was a tan-work of old building, situated on ground adjoining Pedie's on the west. Pedie proposed to erect extensive premises upon his ground, to be used for slaughter-houses; and a bill of suspension and interdict was presented by the professors of the Academy, the trustees of the Deaf and Dumb Institution, the proprietors of some of the dwelling-houses in the neighbourhood, and the ground of nuisance. The garden of one of the suspenders approached within about 30 yards of the spot where the shambles were to be erected.

In the Bill-Chamber, Pedie lodged a minute, consenting to pass the bill to try the question of nuisance, but praying that the interim interdict should be recalled "in so far as relates to the erection of the houses and buildings at present in progress, or any other buildings, and ought not to be confined to the letting, using, or occupying all or any part of his property, and the buildings erected or to be erected thereon, as slaughter-houses or shambles for the purposes aforesaid. The respondent is perfectly aware that the erection of these buildings must now, in consequence of this judicial challenge, be at his own risk. But he is confident that he will be able, in the course of the process to follow thereon, to give to the satisfaction of the Court, that his projected operations,

106. in their new and improved form, will constitute no nuisance such as to entitle the respondents to interfere."

1837. The Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Corehouse) "having considered the bill and answers, with the minute for Mr Pedie, and having heard counsel for the parties, and inspected the premises in question, passed the bill; but in respect that Mr Pedie desired to go on with the erection of the buildings at his own risk, and agreed that his doing so shall not be considered as affording him any plea of favour when the question of nuisance shall be determined, recalled the interdict in as far as it prohibited the erection of the buildings, but quoad ultra continued the interdict."

From the extent of building contemplated by the respondent, there would have been premises for above 20 separate shambles, or killing-places. On the record, the respondent did not explain how he was to prevent nuisance from these shambles, except by stating that they were to be constructed upon a new and improved plan, preventing any thing offensive to sight or smell; the whole enclosed within a wall of 20 feet in height; and the interior arrangement being so planned that each killing-place should be used only by a single flesher, who alone should have the key to it, and who should prevent any other flesher from using it. The respondent alleged that this arrangement would have the effect of limiting the extent of slaughtering which could otherwise be performed, and would also produce greater cleanliness in the details of it.

The Lord Ordinary, after visiting the ground, "found that the erection of shambles or slaughter-houses on the situation proposed by the respondent would be a public nuisance, and therefore sustained the reasons of suspension, and continued the interdict, and decreed; and found the respondent liable in expenses."

The respondent reclaimed, and before the note was advised, he lodged a minute, stating that, under the partial recall of the interdict in the Bill-Chamber, he had erected two killing-places, and was proceeding with a third, and craving leave to make use of them for such period as the

---

* "NOTE.—It has been repeatedly decided that the slaughtering of cattle in the suburbs of a town, or in the immediate neighbourhood of inhabited houses, is a common nuisance. Whether or not it be possible to devise means by which the various offensive consequences of such operations may be mitigated, or entirely avoided, it is not for the Lord Ordinary to determine. Prima facie, it does not seem likely. But, at any rate, if there be such a possibility, it was incumbent on the respondent to show how it was to be accomplished. But the respondent, though perfectly apprised, by the proceedings in the Bill-Chamber, of what would be expected of him, gave no explanation, but merely avers in general 'that the shambles are to be erected on a new and improved plan, by which there will be nothing offensive to the sight or smell, &c.' In those circumstances the Lord Ordinary thinks the interdict must be continued."

art might think proper for the purpose of trying, by actual experiment, whether the process of slaughtering could be carried on in them, without creating a nuisance to the neighbourhood. No. 196.

The Court, on advising the reclaiming note and this minute, directed the respondent to produce plans of the buildings which he proposed to erect, and also to lodge "a special condescendence of the precautions he wanted to adopt in order to satisfy the Court that his shambles will not be a public nuisance."

He lodged a plan of the buildings and a wooden model of part of them. The condescendence, in addition to what has been already noticed, stated that the shambles were not to extend to the northern boundary of the respondent's ground; that between the northern court-wall surrounding them, and the highway, there were to be interposed, first a range of byres and stables, and second a range of dwelling-houses; that the entrance to the shambles was not to be direct from the highway, but from a lane between the row of byres and the north court-wall of the shambles; that this lane, running parallel to the highway, was to open, at either end, into cross lanes or roads, leading into the public highway; and that the cattle were to be brought into the killing-places not later than 5 o'clock in the morning. He farther stated, that each killing-place was to occupy an area of 140 feet square; to be strongly paved with stone, and the walls, especially next the pavement, to be perfectly tight; the pavement to be an inclined plane, from which all the blood, &c. was to be carried into a cess-pool or dung-pit, sunk under ground, and situated between every pair of killing-places; this pit to be perfectly tight above, and to communicate by lateral openings, with the killing-places, which openings should admit of being shut close with a lid; and these cess-pools to be emptied every second morning before 5 o'clock, and their contents removed in carts for manure.

The suspenders contended that a public shambles was a nuisance<sup>1</sup> in the suburbs of a city, and that it lay with the respondent to take his case out of the general rule. They denied that any adequate means existed for enforcing the rules requisite for keeping the premises clean, in terms of this condescendence, and contended that they should not be exposed to the hardship of being obliged to see them enforced. For example, the driving of cattle through the streets, often in an excited state, could not be prevented from occurring at all hours of the day, if the shambles were opened. But, independent of this, even all the precautions specified, if literally enforced, would not prevent nuisance. The persons who killed the cattle, and, generally, the whole servants employed about the shambles, and their associates, would form an aggregate population, having the most deteriorating effect upon the condition of the neighbourhood. It would

March 9, 1833
Swinton v.
Pedic.

<sup>1</sup> Keltic, July, 1814, F.C.

196. not only injure the comfort of the dwelling-houses, but lower their value in the market, and the suspenders were ready to prove that some tenants in these houses had given notice of their intention to remove, in case the shambles were allowed to go on. And, in particular, as to the Edinburgh Academy, the consequences would be in the highest degree injurious, as parents would not send their children to a place where they were not only exposed to danger from the number of cattle driven along the highway in the neighbourhood, but had their moral habits and feelings exposed to contamination by the contact of the shambles. In regard to the respondent's proposal to make an experiment, it could not be fairly done, unless upon the full scale after the whole shambles were erected, as there might be no nuisance arising from one or two killing places, and yet a great nuisance from an assemblage of 20 of them. And any such experiment would occasion so much actual injury, and perhaps of an irremediable kind, to the interests of the suspenders, that it should not be allowed to be made.

The respondent answered, that, many operations which formerly amounted to a nuisance, were now, by an improved process, rendered perfectly harmless; and even the boiling of whale-blubber had been found so, in a recent case, after the party was allowed to try experimentally a new process. It was quite possible so to regulate the whole details connected with the slaughtering of cattle, as to prevent any thing offensive to sight or smell, or otherwise. In regard to the driving of the cattle, that was to be done at so early an hour as would prevent them from being on the streets during the day: but, as the street was a public thoroughfare, along which cattle might be driven, as lawfully as horses or carriages, there was no just ground of objection to their being driven along at any hour. And if the use of the property for erecting shambles was a lawful use, the respondent could not be excluded from it by the allegation that the exercise of the trade would probably have the consequential effect of bringing a number of inferior persons to the neighbourhood; a plea which was entitled to the less favour as a tan-work was in full operation in the vicinity, and had been so from an early date. And, in any view, the respondent was entitled to be allowed, at the risk of losing his outlay if he failed of success, to go on and build the whole shambles, and try the experiment whether, if conducted on his proposed plan, they would be a nuisance or not.

LORD GILLIES.—It seems at first sight to be a hardship not to allow the respondent fairly to make the experiment whether he can apply his property to the proposed use without committing a nuisance. But in order to make that experiment fairly, it would be necessary that the whole of the shambles should be erected, and in operation. It would afford no just data, for determining that twenty or thirty shambles would be no nuisance, although an experiment, to the extent of one or two, had been made without creating a nuisance. But i very great expense to the respondent to build all the shambles merely for of an experiment: and I feel satisfied that an aggregate of so many must be a nuisance in the neighbourhood of a town. The respondent t the public road or street may lawfully be used for driving cattle, and a driving therefore can be no nuisance to the neighbouring academy, or to neighbouring proprietors. I think this argument is ill-founded, as a nuisance on its own circumstances; and although Pall Mall, or Grosvenor Square, ly open for the driving of cattle, as the roads in the vicinity of Smithfield it is very evident that the establishment of a great slaughter-house, how-might be arranged internally, would be a nuisance in either of the former places, though not in the last.

PRESIDENT.—As the respondent offers to be at the whole expense of the entire number of shambles, and to run the risk, with his eyes open, prevented from using them, if he cannot do so without committing a I think we should allow him to make the experiment. I regret that he take upon himself so very great a risk, as I fear it would result in nothing But I am quite satisfied that the experiment cannot be fairly made the entire number of shambles be erected.

COREHOUSE.—This case came first before me as Lord Ordinary in the chamber, and I met the parties upon the ground, for the purpose of personal on. I then ascertained that there were to be eighteen or nineteen separate places for cattle. When I saw their proximity to the academy, I thought precautions which could be used could prevent the erection from being a and one of the most intolerable to which the academy could be exposed.
 it allude merely to the smell which may be occasioned by the slaughter-though even the smell of blood alone, where every thing putrid or filthy removed, has frequently the effect of scaring horses passing in the street: llude to nuisance of another kind. The academy, a large institution, is within 150 yards of the spot where it is proposed to erect the shambles.
 academy was not brought to their vicinity, but it is proposed to bring them vicinity of the academy. And I think the effect would be, that no parent suffer his children to attend a school, close by a great slaughtering-house, here would always be an assemblage of the lowest of the population, in-butchers' boys, and servants, and their associates. In addition to this, I satisfied that there are any adequate means provided for having all the of the cattle at an end by an early hour in the morning. I do not see who force that regulation in case the butchers neglect it; and I think the result be that cattle would be driven thither, at all hours, to the obvious personal of the boys attending the academy. And it is only the dictate of common hat so great a slaughtering-house, in such a situation, is, and must be, a
 e. When I visited the premises, one of the suspenders, who is proprietor ouse and garden, showed me how near the garden approached to the sham-berving that every blow which felled a beast in the shambles, would be a his garden. He appeared to feel keenly on the subject, and I thought it without reason that he did so. On the whole, I consider that it would be precedent to sanction the setting down of premises like these where they founded by a town population. I do not think the condescendence is suffi-to show that no just cause of offence to the sight or smell would remain; independently of this, I think there are concomitant circumstances connected

No. 196

March 9, 181
Swinton v.

Pedic.

- No. 196. with the erection of a great slaughter-house which are altogether beyond control or check, and which would render it a nuisance beyond the power of remedy. I think the proposed experiment should not be allowed.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I concur. There is an important distinction between a case like this and that as to the boiling of whale-blubber, which has been referred to. If the experiment there had not succeeded, the process could have been stopped on the instant, and, in the meantime, no permanent injury could have been done to the neighbourhood by allowing the experiment to be made. But here it is proposed to set up a great establishment, and make an experiment whether slaughtering can be carried on without nuisance. I think this experiment cannot be made without exposing the whole neighbourhood, in the interim, to great and substantial injury. In regard to the academy, I claim no more for it than that it is a lawful institution; but that is enough; for I consider that the proposed experiment, if permitted, would be productive of the utmost injury to it, an injury which might perhaps destroy it altogether. I think, therefore, that we should not be justified in allowing the proposed experiment to be made.

THE COURT adhered and awarded additional expenses against the respondent.

J. RUSSELL, W.S.—J. PEARIE, W.S.—Agents.

- No. 197. MRS CATHARINE MUNRO OF ROSS, and HUSBAND, Pursuers.—
H. J. Robertson.

WILLIAM PAUL (McLeod's Trustee), Defender.—D. F. Hope—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—G. G. Bell.

Title to Pursue—Process.—A party raised a reduction of a sale and feudal investiture of lands, libelling the title of heir of entail under a certain deed; the action concluded for declarator that the lands still formed part of a trust-estate, left by the maker of the entail, under a separate deed of trust, and also for accounting to the trust-estate; an objection being taken to the title, the pursuer proposed to insist, not as heir of entail, but as beneficiary under the trust-deed, and alleged that enough appeared ex facie of the summons to show that the heir of entail was also the beneficiary under the trust-deed. Action dismissed, in respect there was no sufficient title libelled, and motion refused for leave to amend the libel.

- arch 9, 1837. ON December 9, 1783, the late George Ross of Cromarty executed an entail of that estate in favour of his nephew, Alexander Gray of ST DUNVON, Ross, and a series of heirs. On the same day he executed a conveyance of certain other lands, including Pitkerrie and others, to trustees, with power to sell the lands and apply the price in payment of his debts, in the first place, and the residue in purchasing land to be added to the Cromarty entail. He died in 1786, and the trustees entered on the management of the trust-property. They sold the trust lands, by public 1. CORKBURN. soup, in 1795, and that part of them called Pitkerrie and others, was bought for £3500 by Donald McLeod of Geanies, who was a

George Ross's trustees. The minutes of roup and of sale in M'Leod's No. 197 favour, were subscribed in November, 1795. The trustees granted a disposition to M'Leod on May 30, 1796, which was followed by infeftment <sup>March 9, 18</sup> on September, 1796. In 1827, M'Leod disposed his estate, including <sup>Ross v. Pau</sup> these lands, to William Paul, accountant in Edinburgh, as trustee for his creditors, and for the other purposes specified in the trust-deed.
 William Paul was infeft under this disposition. On May 26, 1836, a reduction of the disposition of Pitkerrie and others, to M'Leod, and of all the subsequent rights and infeftments, was raised by Mrs Catharine Munro or Ross, of Glastullich, and her husband, against William Paul, the trustee, and also against the grandson and heir-at-law of Geanies, who was now deceased. The summons called these parties "to answer at the instance of Mrs Catharine Munro or Ross, daughter of the deceased Duncan Munro of Culcairn (with her husband's concurrence), the said Mrs Catharine Munro or Ross, being the heiress of tailie and provision, entitled to succeed to the lands and barony of Cromarty and others, under a deed of entail made and executed by the now deceased George Ross, Esq. of Cromarty, dated the 9th day of December, 1783, registered in the books of Council and Session the 15th day of May, 1786, and in the register of tailies at Edinburgh, the 27th day of May, 1803, and as such, and otherwise, having good and undoubted right, along with her said husband, to prosecute and follow furth the action of reduction underwritten." Among the reasons of reduction, it was stated that George Ross had executed a trust-disposition on 9th December, 1783, directing certain lands, including Pitkerrie and others, to be sold, and the residue, after paying his debts, to be applied in the purchase of lands, which the trustees should be bound to settle and entail "to and upon such persons, and to and for such uses, intents, and purposes, and subject to the other charges, conditions, and restrictions as were contained and declared, in and by the entail and disposition of his said estate of Cromarty, executed by him as aforesaid." The summons stated various alleged irregularities in selling the lands of Pitkerrie to Geanies, particularly as he was himself one of the trustees; and it concluded for reduction of the sale, and for declarator that these lands "remain still a part of the trust-estate of the said George Ross, subject to the uses and purposes pointed out by him in his deed before narrated." The summons concluded also for count and reckoning, and payment of the rents of the lands, from the commencement of the possession of Geanies, to be made "to the pursuer on behalf of the trust-estate of the said George Ross, or to Thomas M'Kenzie, W.S., the judicial factor now in the management of the said trust-estate."

Paul lodged preliminary defences, in the narrative of which he admitted that the pursuer was "next heir-substitute of Mr George Ross's failing heirs-male of the body of Alexander Gray or Ross:" and that "the right of succession to the entailed estate of Cromarty opened 1897. to the pursuer, Mrs Rose or Ross, by the death of Alexander Gray Ross about the year 1820." The defences, besides founding on prescription and alleged acquiescence, pleaded that the pursuer had not set forth on her libel a sufficient title to insist. She had libelled no title but that of "heiress of tailie and provision" under the Cromarty entail. The object of the action was to reduce a sale of lands, followed by feudal investiture. But as the pursuer had never expedie any service as heir of entail, she was not entitled to insist in such a reduction. And although the defences contained an admission that the right of succession, under the Cromarty entail, had opened to her after the death of Alexander Gray or Ross, which happened in 1820, that was not enough, as the defender was entitled to have such a party in the field as would enable him to obtain a decree which would be a good res judicata against the whole substitute heirs. But that could not be obtained, unless the pursuer had duly taken up the character and rights of heir of entail by service. Farther, the sole conclusions of the action were for reduction, declarator, and accounting for behoof of the trust-estate of George Ross, under the trust-deed of 1783. But no title was libelled for insisting in these conclusions, and in particular, the title of being beneficiary under that trust-deed was not libelled. And if the title was thus defective, it could not be supplied by substituting any statement from the reasons of reduction, or any other part of the summons in place of it.

The pursuer answered that the defender could not object to the want of a service as he had expressly admitted in his defences that she was the next heir-substitute after the death of Alexander Ross or Gray, and that the right of succession to the estate of Cromarty opened to her by his death in 1820. But farther, there was no occasion for any service to enable her to pursue this action, as she did not insist in it as heiress of entail, but as beneficiary under the trust-deed of George Ross. No service could be of any aid in support of that title, which was sufficiently established in the pursuer by the defender's admission of her being heir under the Cromarty entail, coupled with the fact, which was duly libelled in the reasons of reduction, that the residue of the trust-estate was to be invested for behoof of the heirs of entail. The heiress of entail was therefore identical with the beneficiary under the trust, and, on the face of the summons, a sufficient title was set forth.

The Lord Ordinary "repelled the first dilatory defence of want of title, reserved the two remaining defences to be discussed along with the merits, and decerned."*

---

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary repels the first defence because he thinks that it is sufficiently met by the fact that the possession of the character in which the pursuer sues, is not only set forth in the summons, but is admitted in the defences to belong to her, and after this the defender cannot urge an objection which in substance amounts to a denial, or at least to a doubt of what they themselves af-

The defender reclaimed.

No. 197

LORD GILLIES.—The question is whether a sufficient title be set forth in the summons. The only title there stated, is that the pursuer is heiress of taillie and provision under the Cromarty entail. But she now states that it is not as heiress entail, but as beneficiary under the trust-deed, that she means to insist, and that, upon looking at the reasons of reduction, enough of matter will be found to be libelled to sustain her instance in that character. I feel the greatest doubt whether it is possible to eik out a title in this manner. In the appropriate place in the summons for stating the title it is not duly libelled; and I am not prepared to allow the proper title to be gathered out of other parts of the summons.

March 9, 18
Ross v. Pau

LORD MACKENZIE.—I should feel much difficulty in adhering to this interlocutor. I think a new summons is necessary. The only title libelled is that of 'heiress of taillie and provision' under the Cromarty entail, "and as such, and otherwise, having good and undoubted right to prosecute" the reduction. If the two words "and otherwise" be thrown out of view, there is no title libelled, except that of heiress of entail, on which title the pursuer does not now propose to insist, but on that of beneficiary under the trust-deed of George Ross. I think the words "and otherwise" must be thrown out of view; and then there is no title left to insist in the action.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am clearly of opinion that as the only title libelled is that of heiress of taillie and provision under the Cromarty entail, and as it is a different title in which the pursuer now means to insist, this action must be dismissed. As to the two words "and otherwise," if they were to allow a shifting of the title, such as is now proposed, they would equally permit the pursuer to adopt any other title which she chose.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I think the interlocutor must be altered. The only title libelled is that of heiress of taillie under the Cromarty entail. No title is libelled as beneficiary under the trust-deed. I think there is no sufficient title libelled, and that the action must be dismissed.

The pursuer moved for leave to amend the libel, which the Court refused.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"Alter and recal the interlocutor submitted to review, and, in respect the summons libels only on the pursuer's character as heir of entail of Cromarty, sustain the first dilatory defence, and dismiss the action; and find the pursuer liable in the defender's expenses."

SANG and ADAM, W.S.—W. A. G. and R. ELLIS, W.S.—Agents.

mit; and he reserves the other two defences, because, although it be possible that they may ultimately supersede the necessity of considering the merits, it is possible they may not; and on the whole, the case will be put into the most convenient and an equally safe shape by being kept all together."

198. JAMES KERR (Taylor's Trustee), Pursuer.—D. P. Hope—Russell
 2, 1837. SIR DAVID HUNTER BLAIR and OTHERS, (Earl of Eglinton's Trustees), Blair. Defenders.—Keay—Moir.
 JOHN MARSHALL and OTHERS, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Anderson.

Jury Trial—Process—Jurisdiction.—Held, that in the causes which are enumerated as appropriate to Jury trial, by 59 G. III. c. 35, and the other statutes regulating such mode of trial, where the action concludes for damages only, the Court have no power to take proof, by commission, on remit, or in presentis, but must remit all such causes to be tried by jury.

2, 1837. A LEASE of the coal-field of Bartonholm, formed part of the sequestered estate of Taylor, on which James Kerr, accountant in Glasgow, was trustee. Kerr raised an action of damages against the tenants of adjoining coal-pits, by whose improper workings he alleged that an irruption of a river into the Bartonholm coal-pit had been occasioned, which had drowned it. The action contained no conclusion except for damages which were laid at £7000. The action was directed against the trustees of the late Earl of Eglinton, and against John Marshall and others.

After a record was made up, the defenders moved the Lord Ordinary to grant commission to persons of skill to take a proof, and report: alleging that the investigation which was requisite, involved technical and scientific details which were unfit for the tribunal of a jury, and also required an acquaintance with the peculiar terms and phraseology of colliers, with which a jury were unacquainted, and which could not be made familiarly intelligible to them during the diet of a trial. The pursuer resisted the motion, and contended that the action was one of those enumerated, by the statutes regulating jury trial, as appropriate thereto, and concluding for damages only, must be sent by the Court, for trial, to a jury.

The Lord Ordinary reported the question, and the Court ordered a hearing in presence.

Pleaded by the Defenders—

An analysis of part of the statutes regulating Jury trial, was necessary for determining this question. By 59 Geo. III. c. 35, § 1, a class of actions was enumerated, as to which the Court were required "after defences are lodged, to remit the whole process and productions forthwith to the Jury Court." By the next sections (2 and 3) provision was made for disposing of questions of law or relevancy, such as should either be decided, or specially reserved, before remit to the Jury Court. By § 4, power was given as to "all cases, other than the actions for damages hereinbefore enumerated, when matters of fact are to be proved, to order the whole process to be remitted to the Jury Court." By § 5, 6, and 7, No. 198 further regulations were made as to the power of the several Lords Ordinary, or the respective Divisions of the Court, to send the non-enumerated actions to the Jury Court for trial. By § 8, 9, 10, and 11, which do last referred to admiralty causes, provisions were made which did not bear on this question. By § 12 it was provided "that it shall be competent and lawful for the Jury Court, when it appears to the said Court, in the course of settling an issue or issues, or at any time before trial, in the cases remitted to them as aforesaid, that there be a question or questions of law or relevancy which ought to be previously decided, to remit back the whole process and productions to the Division of the Court of Session, the Lord Ordinary, or Judge Admiral who remitted the same to the Jury Court, that the question, or questions, of law or relevancy, may be considered and determined there: Provided always, that it shall be lawful to the said Division, Lord Ordinary, or Judge Admiral, when matters of fact shall, after such consideration or determination, remain to be proved, again to remit the whole process and all the productions, to the Jury Court, in order that an issue or issues may be prepared and tried as aforesaid: Provided farther, that it shall be competent, to the said Division and Lords Ordinary to prepare and settle an issue or issues in manner foresaid, for the purpose aforesaid; and it shall be competent for the Jury Court, when it appears to the said Court, in the course of settling an issue or issues, that a case turns upon matter of complicated accounts, or other matter to which trial by jury is not beneficially applicable, to remit back the whole process and productions as aforesaid, with their report thereon, in order that the Division, Lord Ordinary, or Judge Admiral, may proceed with the same, in such manner as shall appear to be most expedient for the administration of justice."

Prior to this section, the statute had separately treated, first, of enumerated, and second of non-enumerated actions; all which, alike, in far as they could come before the Jury Court, were cases falling under the general description of § 12, having been "remitted to the Jury Court, as aforesaid;" and to all cases so remitted, the discretionary power of retransmitting to the Court of Session, was extended, if the cause "turns upon matter of complicated accounts, or other matter to which trial by jury is not beneficially applicable." Actions in the enumerated class, might frequently be liable to either, or both, of these objections; and accordingly this discretionary power of retransmission was necessarily given in reference to them, as well as the other actions, so as to prevent a practical denial of justice to such cases, which would be produced by simply subjecting them to a mode of trial to which they were not fitted. This discretionary power was more peculiarly applicable to one of the two previous classes of actions than to the other, it was to the enumerated 1837. actions, which were generally remitted by the Lord Ordinary de plano, as soon as defences were lodged; and in the after preparation of which, it might frequently appear that they were unfit for trial by jury. Whereas in regard to the non-enumerated actions, which were not remitted until a Judge, or a Division of the Court of Session, saw it expedient in point of discretion to make the remit, it was less likely that any occasion to exercise a discretionary power of retransmitting the cause as unfit for jury trial, should emerge.

There was nothing in § 13 of the act, inconsistent with this construction. That section merely reserved the old power of the Court to order a proof by commission, or otherwise, in the non-enumerated actions, as they should see cause.

There was a reason, at the date of this statute, for rendering it imperative to send the enumerated actions to the Jury Court in the first instance, and for entrusting the Jury Court alone with the discretionary power of retransmitting them, because there then existed a jealousy as to the system of civil trial by jury, which might have too much narrowed the application of the system, if the Court of Session had possessed the absolute discretion, in all cases, of determining whether they should ever go into the Jury Court.

By subsequent statutes, the class of enumerated actions had been enlarged; but the discretionary power of retransmission, by the Jury Court, had never been limited, or altered; and by 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wil. IV. c. 69, the whole powers in the Jury Court, were transferred to the Court of Session, so that the discretionary power, as to enumerated actions, if it previously existed in the Jury Court; was now lodged in the Court of Session.

There were precedents (the defenders alleged) of cases, in which the Jury Court had exercised a discretionary power in retransmitting actions of the enumerated class, to the Court of Session; and in that of Leslie, such power had been assumed to exist, by both parties, and by the whole of the Lords Commissioners of the Jury Court, in disposing of the cause.

Pleaded by the Pursuer—

Trial by jury was useful, not only as the best mode of examining witnesses, and eliciting evidence, but also, in respect that a jury was the best tribunal for forming an opinion on all disputed matters of fact, and pre-eminently the best, for assessing the amount of damages in actions of reparation claiming pecuniary damages. The present was such an action, and the pursuer had, therefore, in common with the pursuers of the other enumerated actions, a strong interest to insist on a trial by jury. His

it was established by the statutes which had taken away all discretion No. 198.
 in the Court, in reference to the enumerated actions.

The statute 59 Geo. III. c. 35, in its first section, not only required Mar. 10, 1837
 Kerr v. Blair, enumerated actions to be remitted to the Jury Court, but by it, the Jury Court was imperatively "required to settle an issue and to try the cause by a jury." The next sections, 2d and 3d, related to the same class of actions, after which the statute proceeded to an entirely different class, non-enumerated actions, and prescribed a code of regulations as to the mode in which the discretionary power, in trying them by a jury or otherwise, should be exercised. The provisions of § 12 were just a part of this series of regulations, applying to the non-enumerated actions only; and, if it not been so, there would truly have been no distinction between the enumerated and the non-enumerated causes; for, if the plea of the defenders was allowed, then there was an absolute discretion as to all causes whatever, to exclude them from jury trial.

But the provision of § 13 rendered it evident that the power of avoid-trial by jury, was limited to the non-enumerated actions, as that section declared "that nothing in this act contained shall extend to prevent the Court of Session in either of its Divisions, or the Lords Ordinary and except in the cases concluding for damages hereinbefore enumerated), or the Judge Admiral, unless otherwise instructed as aforesaid the Court of Session, to take proof on commission, by remit, or in absentia, &c." This provision could have had no meaning unless the enumerated actions were to be held as conclusively set aside for trial by jury alone.

Even cases involving scientific detail, such as the infringement of a patent; or cases requiring the production of extensive documentary evidence, were tried frequently in England before a jury, without inconvenience; and, the legislature proceeded on that experience in taking away discretion as to the mode of trying the enumerated actions.

The provisions of several subsequent statutes confirmed this construction of 59 Geo. III. c. 35. Thus it was declared by 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, 1828, that the actions there enumerated "shall be held as causes appropriate to the Jury Court, and shall, for the purpose of being discussed and determined in that Court, be remitted at once to that Court, in manner hereinafter to be directed." These actions were, by § 29, to be remitted to the Jury Court, as soon as appearance was made for the defender; and there to be prepared in the same manner as other causes were prepared in the Court of Session. Two new judges were added to the Jury Court at the same time, for the purpose of preparing as well as trying the additional causes thereby devolved on it. And in 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Geo. IV. c. 69, which gave the jurisdiction for trial by jury, to the Court of Session, as part of its ordinary administration of justice, it was assumed that there was a class of causes which were necessarily to be tried

N. 198. by jury; as that section directed that "all causes and issues, which they had occurred before the passing of this act, must by law have been tried by jury in the Jury Court, shall be tried by jury in the Court of Session."

There were no precedents in support of the defenders' plea, which could not have failed to be, if it was well founded. In the case of the point was not mooted; and in that of Lady Mary Lindsay & Co. which was of a special nature, the existence of a power to remit the Court of Session to remit proper enumerated actions was recognised, though the case was found not to fall under the rule.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It was the object and intention of the statutes which introduced and extended civil jury trial in Scotland, to substitute a better mode of conducting proofs than formerly existed. Nothing was more unsatisfactory than the old system of proofs on commission, which were replete with irrelevant and singular matter. This Court had long felt them to be a grievance; and the other Lords felt them to be so, more sensibly still. In construing these statutes a doubtful clause occurs, I think it right to keep in view their unquested object and intention, and so to construe them as to advance the remedy which were meant to supply. The present question substantially turns on the interpretation of two sections of the statute 59 Geo. III. c. 35. By § 12, it is made "competent for the Jury Court, when it appears to the said Court, in the course of trial, that a case turns upon matter of complicated accounts, or other matter to which trial by jury is not beneficially applicable, to remit back the process" to the Court of Session. I regret the use of words so loose and variable as those of "beneficially applicable" in this clause. Do they mean that the Jury Court were to consider, whether, in respect to the matter at issue, a jury seemed inexpedient? Or, in respect to the length of time which was consumed by the proof, so as to render it too tedious for a jury? Or in what respect, do these words mean that the discretionary power of retransmitting cause to the Court of Session was to be exercised? I feel much difficulty in ascertaining the precise limits of this power; and yet the defenders must make out their case falls within the sphere of its application, or they cannot succeed in their question. But while I do not think that § 12, even considered by itself, supports their argument, I think the effect of § 13, is entirely to destroy it. That must be viewed in connexion with the preceding one, and it would be an unreasonable mode of construing the 12th section, if it was to be taken without reference to the 13th. Now that last section specially declares, that nothing in the statute prevents this Court from ordering a proof on commission, or according to any of the old forms, "save and except in the cases concluding for damages hereinafter enumerated." This provision has precisely the same effect, in my opinion, as if it contained an express prohibition against our taking proof by the old forms, in the cases of the enumerated causes. When power is given to do certain things, but with a special exception as to one class of these things, that is tantamount to a prohibition.

gard to the excepted class. And this depends on no rule of construction which is peculiar to a statute, more than to any other public document, or private deed. For instance, the case of a trust-deed, conferring powers on the trustees, whose they receive power to appoint any responsible factor, and, except he be of themselves, to give him a salary; it cannot be doubted that the effect of those words is tantamount to a prohibition against giving the salary, in case the factor appointed be one of the trustees themselves, and so falls within the exception.

No. 198.
Mar. 10, 183
Kerr v. Blah

It is for the same reason, that I consider the terms of the 13th section of the Act, (which except the enumerated actions from those in which this Court was empowered to order a proof according to the old forms,) to be the same in effect as if they prohibited us from allowing such proof in any of the enumerated actions, and left no other mode of trial open, save that by jury. If I could have allowed legal considerations to sway me in the construction of a statute (which, however, is impossible), I should have had a strong inclination to read the statute otherwise, and to have discovered the existence of some discretionary power at least, to be vested in the Court; but I am unable to see any ground for such a construction, and I conceive that all the enumerated actions must be tried by jury.

ORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is not without regret that I have felt myself constrained to form the same opinion, after a careful consideration of these statutes. I concur with your Lordship in thinking that one undoubted object and intention of these statutes was to substitute a more perfect manner of conducting proofs of stated facts, in the room of the old proofs on commission, which were extremely unsatisfactory. This object was in the view of the first Law Commission, and noticed in their report in 1810. And afterwards, in 1815, when the statute Geo. III. c. 42, was passed, another important object was pointed out as to be attained by means of a jury, which was the assessment of the amount of damages to be awarded, in actions for reparation by pecuniary damages. By the 13th section of that statute, power is given to the jury, in all issues tried by them in such actions, to assess the damages due, and the Court of Session were forever relieved of that duty. When the act 59 Geo. III. c. 35, was afterwards passed, I do not see any ground for reasonable doubt of the position, that, when a certain number of cases were enumerated and set apart from all others, as being peculiarly the subject of jury trial, and as such to be remitted at an early stage to the Jury Court, this was tantamount to a declaration by the legislature that these were cases to which jury trial was held to be beneficially applicable. The first three sections of the act enumerate these cases, and enjoin the instant transmission of them to the jury, under the single exception as to questions of law or relevancy. There is no exception as to any of them on the ground of jury trial not being beneficially applicable; but the whole are to be instantly sent to the Jury Court. For this class of causes is provided for, in these three consecutive sections, the 13th section begins the provisions as to “all cases other than the actions for damages hereinbefore enumerated.” In disposing of the non-enumerated actions, no notice is made back to the sections regulating the enumerated actions. It is a distinct and separate set of legislative provisions which is entered on. And I think every strong circumstance, corroborative of the view which I take of these statutes, that the universal understanding appears to have been, that the enumerated actions could not be tried excepting by a jury. As there has been a very large number of causes brought into Court, and disposed of under these statutes, 1837. I cannot doubt that the point which has now been stirred would have been made the subject of express decision long ago, had it not been that the universal understanding of the construction of the statutes was such as I have stated. No instance has been pointed out, in which a party objected to any of the enumerated actions going before a jury, unless in cases where questions of law or relevancy were involved.

In regard to the import of § 12, my opinion very much coincides with that of your Lordship. I think the earlier part of the section, giving the Jury Court power to retransmit a cause where questions of law or relevancy require to be previously decided, and also the power to the Court of Session to return such cause to the Jury Court, if, after settling the questions of law or relevancy, there be disputed matters of fact remaining, does clearly relate to the non-enumerated actions only. And I can see no principle of fair construction, according to which the latter part of the same section, in giving a power to the Jury Court to retransmit causes, if they involve complicated accounting, or if jury trial appears to be beneficially applicable to them, should be held to apply to a different or to a larger range of actions, than the first part of the section embraced. And I do not see how an action, where damages only are concluded for, is likely to involve a complicated accounting; nor yet, how it is possible to hold that such an action is one to which jury trial is not beneficially applicable, seeing that it is not only one of the enumerated actions, but that the legislature has expressly conferred upon juries the power of assessing damages. But if any doubt could otherwise have existed, I think it is removed by the terms of the 13th section, which must be read in connexion with the 12th. That section declares that "nothing in this act contained" shall prevent this Court from taking a proof by the old forms, "and excepting in the cases concluding for damages hereinbefore enumerated." These words ride over the whole act, and they are just a declaration, that, in the excepted cases, which are the actions of damages before enumerated, the Court should not have power as formerly to order a proof on commission or by the old forms. I think they amount to an unambiguous prohibition against our taking proof in these actions, by the old forms; so that no mode is left of doing so but by jury trial. After this, it would require the most express and imperative words in some other part of this statute, or in some subsequent statute, to authorize this Court to deal with one of the enumerated actions of damages, as with a cause which they were not bound to try by jury; and if such a provision did any where exist, I can only say, I think it would be directly contradictory to this one. Before the introduction of trial by jury was made part of the ordinary administration of justice by the Court of Session, these causes must have been tried in the Jury Court; and now, they must, for that reason, be tried by jury in this Court.

There is a section (33) in 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, which, though not referred to by either of the parties, has an important bearing, I conceive, on this question. The first part of the section provides for various special circumstances, according to which, a remit may be made by the Jury Court to the Court of Session, and then it concludes by the positive declaration, that if, after such remit, "there shall remain any main matter of fact to be ascertained between the parties, the said matter shall be tried by jury." I think it important to notice that the provisions of this act are perfectly in accordance with that which I conceive to be the true construction of the statutory enactments of 59 Geo. III. c. 35, and imply that there was a change

f cases which required to be tried by jury and in no other way. If an opposite No. 19:
 construction is to be adopted, it will open the door to a wide field of loose discus-on in every individual case whatever, whether the circumstances of that case are Mar. 10, 11 such as to render it expedient to have a trial before a jury, or a proof on commis- Kerr v. Bl on. In place of this, I think it was the object of the statutes to take away all discretionary power from this Court, in regard to the enumerated actions of damages, and it appears to me that their enactments have taken away all such discretion.

LORD GILLIES.—I have been unable to arrive at the same conclusion with your Lordship and the Lord Justice-Clerk. The question is, whether this Court possesses power, in any of the enumerated actions, to try them, without the intervention of a jury, if we are satisfied that they are causes to which jury trial is not beneficially applicable. And on looking at the various classes of actions which are enumerated, I think the Court will not lightly presume that it was the intention of the legislature peremptorily to declare that they must all be tried by jury, and that no discretion should be trusted any where to interpose, and prevent the actual justice of subjecting any individual action to that form of trial, if, in its circumstances, it was not fit to be so tried. There may be many such causes among those which belong to the enumerated class. It has been observed, indeed, that an action, concluding only for damages, can scarcely involve a complicated accounting. I am afraid, however, that that observation is not well founded. Suppose that a party obtains a warrant against another, as in meditatione fugæ, whom he alleges to be his debtor, and that he imprisons his alleged debtor, who afterwards brings an action of damages for wrongous imprisonment, in respect that he was not indebted to the party who had imprisoned him. The fact whether the imprisonment was wrongous, might altogether turn upon the state of accounts between the pursuer and defender, and these might be complicated or not, according to circumstances. Jury trial is not always the best means of unravelling complicated accounts; and yet that may be essential to the trial of an action concluding for damages only, in the circumstances now supposed; and so it equally may in any other of the enumerated actions. Indeed, it must be familiar to the experience of those who have been much in the Jury Court, that causes have frequently been brought on for trial, in which parties were urged, even after the jury were met, to adopt another mode of trial on account of the cause being unfit for a jury. Notwithstanding these considerations, however, if the statutes be indeed imperative and leave no discretion in the Court, but direct the whole enumerated cases to be tried by jury, whether that mode of trial be beneficially applicable to them or not, such enactments must undoubtedly receive effect. But we must take care to be assured that these unqualified enactments really exist, before we give them effect to the statutes.

In regard to the enumerated causes, the Court are directed by 59 Geo. III. c.
 1, § 1, to send them at once to the Jury Court, as soon as defences are given in;
 and the only limitation in this order, imposed by the two next sections, relates to a mode of deciding or reserving questions of law or relevancy which may appear, and be pointed out, at so early a stage. The course of procedure, as to the non-enumerated causes, was quite different and distinct from this; and, in particular, there was this difference between them, that, as the non-enumerated actions were left in the discretion of the Court of Session, that Court might not only decide at an early stage, on the expediency of a trial by jury, but they might also settle the issue,

1938. or issues, themselves, and send them to the Jury Court for trial ; whereas, in the enumerated causes, issues for trial were never settled before the remit was made to the Jury Court. Keeping these observations in view, the 12th section of the statute is now to be considered, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the discretionary power, given at the close of that section, relates to all causes, both enumerated and non-enumerated, or whether it relates to only one of these classes of actions, and, if so, to which of them. In the commencement, the section empowers the Jury Court, when it appears to them " in the course of settling an issue or issues, or, at any time before trial," that there are questions of law or relevancy which ought to be previously decided, to remit the cause back to the Court of Session, for such decision. And at the close of the section, the important words occur, that if it appear to the Jury Court " in the course of settling an issue or issue or issues, that a case turns upon matter of complicated accounts, or other matter to which trial by jury is not beneficially applicable, to remit back the whole process " to the Court of Session. I consider that this discretionary power of retransmission relates to all causes, enumerated and non-enumerated ; and that the legislature did not intend to subject any action whatever, whether enumerated or non-enumerated, to trial by jury, if it was a cause to which trial by jury was not beneficially applicable. But if the application of the section was to be limited to one of these classes only, then I think it was the class of enumerated actions to which it more especially applied. The other actions were not sent to the Jury Court until the Court of Session, after being acquainted with their circumstances, had judged it expedient that a trial by jury should take place ; and it was likely, that comparatively few of these cases would be such as to justify a retransmission by the Jury Court, before trial. In these cases also, the Court of Session frequently had settled the issue before making the remit. Whereas, in the enumerated actions, as they were instantly sent to the Jury Court, without reference to the individual circumstances of each case, excepting in so far as questions of law or relevancy might be raised ex facie of the summons and defences, it was more likely that a discretionary power on the Jury Court might require to be frequently exercised in retransmitting them to the Court of Session if they turned out unfit for jury trial. And the stage when this discretionary power, in terms of the latter portion of § 12, was to be exercised, was, when the Jury Court had reached the period for settling the issue or issues. That was never done, in the enumerated actions, prior to their transmission to the Jury Court ; but it was often done in the non-enumerated actions. And on taking all these considerations into view, I think the discretionary power was more requisite in regard to the enumerated actions, than to the non-enumerated ; and that the stage of preparation, when discretionary power was to be exercised, more peculiarly points out the enumerated actions as the subject of it ; so that if the words of the latter part of § 12 were to be limited to only one of these two classes of actions, I think it should be read as applicable to the enumerated actions rather than the other ; but I see no warrant for thus narrowing the construction of the statute, and I think the discretionary power applied to all actions which truly appeared to be unfit for trial by jury.

It is said, however, that the sense of § 12 is controlled by that of § 13. That section provides that, in all cases " except the cases concluding for damages hereinbefore enumerated," the Court of Session might order a proof on commission, or otherwise, according to the old forms. I do not think this section was meant to its in § 12. It appears to me to have had no other intention than ly providing, by way of precaution, that the non-enumerated actions in all respects as fully under the disposal of the Court of Session, as before the Jury Court existed. But such a provision was limited exclusively to non-enumerated actions; and as to the enumerated actions nothing can be founded upon this, because the provisions respecting them are to be found in previous Acts, not in this. I think, therefore, that nothing can be founded upon this with regard to the enumerated actions, because it was intended to relate, not to the non-enumerated actions only.

It is also important to notice, that, by 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 28, there is a repeal of the provisions of 59 Geo. III. c. 35. But the repeal is extended only to the provisions there specified, and it does not extend to the provisions of § 12, on which the present question turns, and which therefore remain in full force.

Discretionary power, if formerly in the Jury Court, is now vested in this Court. We receive that we are entitled to say whether jury trial is or is not beneficial to any action, before subjecting that action to trial by jury; and apprehensive of that discretion being improperly exercised, as I think it is, I require to be an action of damages of a very peculiar sort indeed, in which the Judge in this Court would consider to be not fitted for trial by jury.

LEWIS and COCKBURN* concurred with the LORD PRESIDENT.

BLACKBURN.—I am of opinion that the Jury Court possessed the discretionary power for which the defenders contend; and that such discretionary power was accordingly vested in this Court. It has been pleaded by the pursuer that the Jury Court possessed no discretionary power whatever over the enumerated actions. But I cannot entertain any doubt that that is an erroneous construction of the statute. The enumerated actions were sent to the Jury Court when the Jury Court came afterwards to examine them materially, is maintained, that, though they found the summons grossly irrelevant, or the case of absurdity, they had no power of retransmission, but were bound to take up an issue and send the cause to a jury? Were they bound to try the case out and out by jury? I cannot imagine it is possible to doubt that, in the enumerated actions, the Jury Court were not bound so to proceed; and that it was with the understanding and practice of every one conversant with the law that the enumerated actions were, over and over again, sent back to the Court of Session, under the discretionary power vested in the Jury Court, referred to that Court, at settling an issue, that questions of law or relevancy which required to be decided previous to trial. And I see no warrant in the words of the act for excluding from this discretionary power the enumerated actions. It is made to apply generally to “the cases remitted to them.” These words include equally the enumerated and non-enumerated actions, and it has alike been “remitted as aforesaid” before coming under the cognomen of the Jury Court. The words, therefore, expressly admit the application of discretionary power, under this branch of the section, to enumerated actions. The reason of the thing is equally clear for so admitting it. But it is

No. 198.

Mar. 10, 1837.
Kerr v. Blair.

198. in the very same section, and by a repetition of the same words, towards the close of it, that the discretionary power is given, of remitting a cause to the Court of Session, when it appears to the Jury Court, at settling the issues, to "turn upon matters of complicated accounts, or other matter to which trial by jury is not beneficially applicable." Between this part of the section and the former, I do not discover no such distinction as to induce me to read the same words, in a different sense. It appears to me that the discretionary power, given by the latter part of the section, equally with that given at the former part of it, extends to enumerated actions, as well as to those non-enumerated. I think the objection of complicated accounts might readily enough occur in some of the enumerated actions, and any of them might be of such a nature that trial by jury was not beneficially applicable to it. By all means let the word, "beneficially," be strictly interpreted, so as to exclude any supposition that one of the enumerated actions should be lightly withdrawn from a jury, wherever it might seem that in some respects a different mode of trial would be better. But, taking it thus strictly, there may be cases, among the enumerated actions, which cannot be duly and satisfactorily tried by a jury, and to which, therefore, jury trial certainly is not beneficially applicable; and as to these, it appears to me that a discretionary power was given to the Jury Court to retransmit them to the Court of Session. And such power was the less necessary as to the non-enumerated actions, because these were sent, de plano, to the Jury Court, but were only sent when the Court of Session held it expedient to remit them to the Jury Court for trial.

I do not see any inconsistency in directing that certain whole classes of causes should be remitted to the Jury Court, and that a discretionary power should remain to that Court, at a more advanced stage of each respective cause, to decide whether it should be retransmitted to the Court of Session. There still was a marked distinction established between the enumerated and non-enumerated causes. And at the date of passing the 59th Geo. III. c. 35, there might be some doubt whether it was not better to deprive the Court of Session of the discretionary power of deciding as to all causes without exception, whether any one of them should be sent to a jury trial; and to select certain causes to be remitted de plano to the Jury Court, while a discretion was at the same time vested in that Court, of determining whether any of these causes should not ultimately be transmitted back to the Court of Session. There could be no ground of apprehension that the Jury Court would be too apt to defeat its own jurisdiction by sending cases back to the Court of Session which ought to have been retained by it, and tried by jury. Whatever prejudice could have been supposed then to exist in the Court of Session against jury trial, none could exist in the Jury Court; and such discretionary power was there vested by the statute.

It does not appear to me that the provision of § 13 materially affects the present question. The exception, contained in it, is not inconsistent with the construction either of the one or the other party. There is nothing excepted, according to the tenor of the previous provisions of the statute: and in order to discover the extent of the exception, it is necessary just to construe the previous provisions, which are neither enlarged nor diminished by § 13.

But it has been said that the statute 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 28 and 33, take away the discretionary power, as to the actions there enumerated, even if it had previously existed. I do not so construe that act. It is true that by § 28, the le classes of causes enumerated are declared to be causes which are "appro- No. 198 e to the Jury Court, and shall, for the purpose of being discussed and deter-id in that court, be remitted at once to that court." But although this remit Mar. 10, 18; o directed, it cannot be construed to mean that none of the remitted causes Kerr v. Blair ever come out of the Jury Court, excepting after a verdict. By § 33 of the statute there are various cases specified, in any of which, the cause, though e enumerated class, might be retransmitted to the Court of Session. And as remit, directed by § 28, was not absolute, but subject to exceptions; and as section farther expressly states the limited extent to which the statute 59

III. c. 35, was repealed, I must hold the rest of that statute to be in full , and that if the discretionary power existed in the Jury Court, anterior to 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, it was not then taken away. I do not consider that § 33 of last statute is exhaustive of all the cases in which one of the enumerated ns may be remitted to the Court of Session. It specifies those which are red under that act, and it repeals some of the provisions which existed under previous statute; but, as it only repeals some of these, the others which were pealed must remain in force. And I conceive that the discretionary power a by the concluding portion of § 12, of 59 Geo. III. c. 35, remains unrepealed, in force. The power of retransmission from the Jury Court, in respect of trial not being beneficially applicable to a cause, is not noticed by 6 Geo. IV.
10, and I think therefore it cannot be held to be repealed.

this discretionary power was in the Jury Court, while a separate court, I give it is now vested in this Court, under the statute 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will.
c. 69, which amalgamated jury trial with the ordinary administration of justice in the Court of Session.

Whether it was prudent or not to give us this discretionary power is not the question: the question is whether or not we have it, and I think we have. But believe the cases may be, in practice, so few where we may be compelled to use the discretionary power and refuse a trial by jury, that I shall not feel urged although many years elapse before we find it necessary to use it. On abstract point of the competency of our jurisdiction, however, it appears to me it is competent.

JUD COREHOUSE.—The question under consideration is of great consequence to the due administration of justice by the method of jury trial. After all the consideration which it has received, I retain the opinion which I always held, that the Court is competent to remit a cause, though one of the enumerated actions, from the jury roll, to the common roll of the other causes depending in the Court of Session.
I will shortly state the grounds of that opinion, but not without diffidence, when I am that they are opposed to the views of your Lordship, and others of my rank, to whom so much deference is due.

The question is not whether the form of jury trial is beneficially applicable to an individual case before us; it is the abstract question, whether it is competent in any action, and under any circumstances, to retransmit one of the enumerated actions from the jury roll, on the ground that trial by jury is not beneficially applicable to such action.

In judicial procedure, causes may occur, and perhaps not rarely, which are not fit for this mode of trial. An action may be raised which may either involve complicated accounts, or a great and intricate mass of documentary evidence, or questions of abstruse science. The merits of such an action may be altogether

196. unsusceptible of adequate explanation to a judge and a jury during the period of a jury trial. And if it were necessary to confirm the position that there are such causes, I would refer to the terms of the statute 59 Geo. III. c. 35, itself, as a declaration by the legislature that there are causes to which jury trial is not beneficially applicable, as it has expressly recognised their existence, and given directions for disposing of them.

h. 1837.
Blair.

But if there be such causes, it must next be examined whether they may occur among the enumerated actions, as well as among the non-enumerated. And I have no doubt that they may; and not only so, but that actions to which jury trial is not beneficially applicable, will sometimes be so shaped as to fall within the enumerated class, for the express purpose of perplexing a jury, if this Court shall determine that it has no power to interpose in any circumstances, and prevent an action, if of the enumerated class, from being tried by jury. There is no difficulty in figuring actions, among the enumerated class, to which jury trial may not be beneficially applicable. Suppose, for example, that a merchant has dismissed a clerk, alleging that he kept irregular books, and embezzled money; that the clerk raised an action of damages for defamation, and that the merchant pleaded the veritas convicti. It may be necessary, in trying the action, to go into the accounts of the mercantile concern for ten or twenty years back, and must all this be done before a jury? Or suppose that trustees are accused of embezzling trust-funds, and they deny the allegation, and plead that their accounts exhibit a full and fair statement of their whole intrusions, and instruct that there has been no embezzlement; it is evident that a mass of accounts may be requisite for trying such an action, which might be very ill suited for the arbitration of a jury. And there are other actions, such as those relating to the alleged infringement of patents, and many more which might be mentioned, among all which, though there might be some, and even a majority, which were well fitted for trial by jury, there might evidently be others which were not fitted for being so tried. I am satisfied that among the enumerated actions there may be some of which it would be found in terms of 59 Geo. III. c. 35, § 12, that they "turn upon matter of complicated accounts, or other matter to which trial by jury is not beneficially applicable." And if there may be any such causes, that is enough to support my present argument; because it must not be forgotten, that, to subject any one cause whatever to a form of trial which is not beneficially applicable to it, is to inflict a grievous injury upon the parties concerned in such action, and is nearly tantamount to a denial of justice to them. It is not lightly to be presumed that the legislature has passed an enactment leading to this result, which, however, I fear it has done, if it has taken away all discretionary power from this Court, and made it imperative on us to try every one of the enumerated actions before a jury, whether such a mode of trial be beneficially applicable to it or not. But if the statute be imperative and unambiguous in enacting, we of course are bound to give effect to it. I shall immediately state the grounds on which I think the statute is not to be so construed; but I may notice, in passing, a suggestion which has been thrown out, that if this Court sustained the competency of its jurisdiction to withdraw any of the enumerated actions from jury trial there would result a practical evil, from the risk of a too frequent retransmission of causes from the jury roll, and a consequent narrowing of the beneficial operation of jury trial. I believe this apprehension, even if it could have any weight in determining the construction of a statute, to be altogether without foundation. Any prejudices which may formerly have existed against jury removed, so completely, that I believe there is as little hazard that any of the Ordinary, or either of the Divisions of this Court, should unwarrantably remove causes from jury trial, if fit to be so tried, as there formerly was that such removal should have been taken by the Lord Chief Commissioner whilst he presided in the Jury Court. I am satisfied that if any attempt should be made to withdraw a cause from trial by jury, which was fitted for that mode of trial, such attempt would at once be put down by any Lord Ordinary before it was assayed.

No. 198

Mar. 10, 1823
Kerr v. Blair

I would therefore consider it a subject of much regret if the discretionary power of the Court did not extend to enumerated as well as non-enumerated actions; I shall now state shortly what I consider to be the true construction of the Act affecting this question. I shall be brief, as my observations have been, in measure, anticipated.

The pursuer appears chiefly to argue that the three first sections of 59 Geo. III. refer exclusively to the enumerated causes; that the next eight sections refer solely to non-enumerated causes; and that the twelfth section is merely a continuation of this last series of clauses, and is limited to non-enumerated actions only. I do not at all see no ground whatever for holding that opinion. The words of the Act afford no warrant for it. With regard to the first clause of the section, "that it shall be competent for the Jury Court, when it appears to the Court, in the course of settling an issue or issues, or at any time before trial, in cases remitted to them as aforesaid, that there is a question or questions of relevancy, which ought to be previously decided, to remit back the whole or any part of the cause" &c. I am at a loss to find any thing in these words which restrict the operation of the power of retransmission to one class of causes more than another. It applies to all the cases "remitted to the Jury Court as aforesaid," and therefore to the enumerated as well as the non-enumerated actions, both of which are included. I conceive that there are several decisions which support this construction of the clause. In Leslie v. Blackwood,<sup>1</sup> one of the enumerated cases, a motion was made to remit the cause from the Jury Court to the Court of Session, on a question of law occurred which ought to be settled previously to trial. That motion was indeed refused, but it was refused on the merits, and not on the competency. The motion was entertained as competent, and was refused because ill-founded on the merits. Again in the case of Allan, which also was one of the enumerated actions, a motion was made in the Court to retransmit it to the Court of Session for the determination of a question of law. The motion failed, but the Lord Chief Commissioner, in disposing of it down explicitly that it would have been competent to grant the motion, if it had been well founded on the merits. And in another case, in 1823, which was for damages only, indisputably one of the enumerated actions, a motion was made to retransmit the action to the Court of Session in order to have a question of law determined. I was of counsel in that cause, and the motion was granted, and the cause was retransmitted; after which, the Lord Ordinary sustained the defences and assoilzied from the action. The Inner-House adhered to this judgment, so that the cause, thus retransmitted, was finally disposed of in the Court of Session.

<sup>1</sup> July 22, 1822 (3 Murr. 157).

1808. I consider therefore, both on principle and authority, that the words of the first clause in § 12 apply to enumerated as well as non-enumerated causes. And where is the distinction between these words and the words of the last clause in that section? The last clause is in these terms:—That “it shall be competent to the Jury Court, when it appears to the said court, in the course of settling an issue or issues, that a case turns upon matter of complicated accounts, or other matter to which trial by jury is not beneficially applicable, to remit back the whole process,” &c. On perusing these words I can discover no distinction, either express or implied, between them and those in the first clause of the section; if the first clause extended both to enumerated and non-enumerated actions, I think the last clause must necessarily apply to both of these classes of actions also.

But it is said, that, even if this would otherwise have been the just construction of § 12, it is no longer so when reference is had to § 13. I do not feel moved by this argument. That latter section had a perfectly legitimate object in view without producing any alteration on the import of § 12. It was necessary in regard to the disposal of non-enumerated causes, and it affects them only. But I shall not go more fully into this point, as it has been well explained in some of the Opinions already delivered.

But the pursuer has farther pleaded, that, by 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 28, a new enumeration of causes was made, and it was declared that all these “shall be held as causes appropriate to the Jury Court, and shall, for the purpose of being discussed and determined in that court, be remitted at once to that court,” in manner therein mentioned. It is pleaded by the pursuer that this is an imperative enactment that all such causes, when transmitted to the Jury Court, must be discussed and finally determined in that court, before a jury. But it will be observed that the statute thus founded upon does not repeal or alter the statute 59 Geo. III. c. 35, excepting to a partial extent; which in itself is, by implication, a confirmation of those parts of the statute which are not repealed or altered. And in deciding on the question, whether the general words which I have just quoted have the effect of abolishing the particular power expressly conferred by 59 Geo. III. c. 35, § 12, of retransmitting both enumerated and non-enumerated actions from the Jury Court to the Court of Session, there is one fundamental rule of construction which must be carefully kept in view. If, in the same statute, a particular thing is expressly given, in one part of it, it is not held to be taken away by subsequent general words; and, in like manner, in partially repealing the prior statute 59 Geo. III. c. 35, general words are not to be extended to take away what was particularly granted in that statute, and is not particularly repealed. Both in reference to this rule of construction, and from a consideration of the respective sections, I am of opinion that the power of retransmitting enumerated causes, so given by 59 Geo. III. c. 35, § 12, was not abolished by 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 28.

It has, however, been farther pleaded by the pursuer, that, by 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 69, § 2, a provision is made which is decisive of this question in his favour. It is there enacted, undoubtedly, that “all causes and issues, which if they had occurred before the passing of this act, must by law have been tried by jury, in the Jury Court, shall be tried by jury in the Court of Session.” But this provision just leaves the matter where it stood before. The question remains the same, what were the causes, which, prior to this act, must have been tried by jury in the Jury Court? These were the enumerated actions, but under such limits be applicable to that class of actions. These limitations were neither enlarged No. 198. narrowed by the act in question, and the point now at issue must be decided in the same manner and as if these acts had never passed.

Mar. 10, 1837
 Kerr v. Blair.

considering these various statutes I am of opinion that it is not imperative on this Court, in each and every one of the enumerated actions, to send it to trial by a jury, if it appears to be one to which trial by jury is not beneficially applicable. It is true that there may be few instances, among the enumerated actions, in which jury trial should not be resorted to; and I hope that, every year, the number of trying causes by jury will increase, so as to extend the beneficial application of that mode of trial more and more. The institution of jury trial is one to which I, and I am sure all of us, feel much admiration; and I consider it to be a great advantage to that institution, as well as to the general administration of justice, that the construction of the statute, which appears to me to be the true one, shall have the sanction of the Court. If the opposite construction be adopted, I apprehend it will have the unfortunate tendency to bring jury trial into some dis-repute, by rendering it occasionally the instrument of injustice, in consequence of being resorted to in causes to which it is not beneficially applicable.

The following five Judges, LORDS GILLIES, MACKENZIE, MEDWYN, CORE-WOOD, and MONCREIFF,* then gave their votes to the effect that the Court of Session did possess a discretionary power as to the mode of taking a proof, both in the enumerated and the non-enumerated actions.

The following six Judges, LORDS PRESIDENT, JUSTICE-CLERK, MEADOW-CROFT, FULLERTON, JEFFREY, and COCKBURN, gave their votes that the Court possessed no such discretionary power in regard to the enumerated actions.

LORD GLENLEE was not present, and LORD CUNINGHAM declined to vote, on the plea of non liquet.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Now that the question is decided, I may mention that the opinion of the Lord Chief Commissioner of the late Jury Court, is in accordance with that of the majority of this Court; and I am sure that it is highly satisfactory to all to know that the judgment which we are about to pronounce is that in which he would, if present, have concurred.

The following interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords having heard counsel in presence of the whole Court, and having considered the different acts of Parliament regarding trial by jury in civil causes, and having particular regard to the 12th and 13th sections of the act 59 Geo. III. c. 35, are of opinion, and find and declare accordingly, that, in the cases enumerated in the said acts as appropriated for trial by jury, where the conclusion is for damages, they have no power to take proof by commission, on remit, or in presentia, but must remit all such cases to be tried by jury."

WOTHERSPOON and MACK, W.S.—TOD and HILL, W.S.—J. MILLER.—Agents.

LORD JEFFREY, as also LORDS MONCREIFF and FULLERTON, delivered opinions at length. But as it does not appear that there are any cases to which the decision in this cause can be a precedent, the Reporters have only given the chief Opinions which were delivered on each side, as sufficiently indicating the reasons by which the Court were moved.

199. HERCULES INSURANCE COMPANY and ROBERT SALMOND, Pursuers
D. F. Hope—Robertson—Neaves.
 JOHN HUNTER, Defender.—M'Neill—Anderson.

10, 1837.

Dec 1837
 any v.
 R.

Process—Jury Trial—Insurance—Jurisdiction—Court.—1. In a submission and decret-arbitral, whereby it was averred, as one of the reasons of reduction, that the insurance was fraudulently effected by the defender with the intention of destroying the property by obtaining an exorbitant sum from the office; a corresponding issue was put to the jury: "Whether the insurance was effected by the defender on a fraudulent over-valuation of the machinery with the intention of destroying the same by fire?" The verdict was returned finding on this issue that the insurance was effected on a fraudulent over-valuation of the machinery, but not with the intention of destroying the same by fire.—Held that this was in substance a verdict for the defenders, and that the pursuers had failed to establish their reason of reduction. 2. From connexion with one of the parties so many Judges of one Division of the Court successively declined that a quorum cannot be had, the declaration was overruled.

10, 1837. SEQUEL of the case reported ante, XIV. pp. 147 and 1137.

The issues sent for trial, on the narrative of certain admissions, were as follows:—

OPINION.
 Cases.
 R.

1. "Whether the defender destroyed the said machinery, or caused the same to be destroyed as aforesaid, for the purpose of defrauding the pursuers of the said sum insured as aforesaid?"

2. "Whether the said insurance was effected by the defender, on a fraudulent over-valuation of the said machinery, with the intention of destroying the same by fire?"

The jury returned a verdict in the following terms:—

"Find for the defenders on the first issue, and on the second issue find that the insurance was effected by the defender upon a fraudulent over-valuation of the machinery, but not with the intention of destroying the same by fire."

Thereafter a question arose as to the import of the finding of the jury on the second issue. The pursuers moved the Court to apply the dictum, setting aside the submission and decret-arbitral in question, finding the defender liable in expenses. The defender, on the other hand, craved the Court to assoilzie him from the conclusions of the decret and to find the pursuers liable in expenses.

Pleaded for the Pursuers—

This may be in form a verdict for the defender, but in substance a verdict for the pursuers; though it do not in terms affirm the issue, it establishes that the insurance was effected fraudulently, which is a part within the issue, though less than the whole, and is relevant to set aside the submission. The jury have affirmed a leading part of the fraudulent ject ascribed in the summons to the defender in effecting the insurance, No. 199 and the verdict, as it stands, establishes a fraudulent intent sufficient to side any demand for recovery under the policy; in other words, the pursuers would have been entitled to an issue on the first part of the second issue without the second part, an affirmance of which would have made out their case; for looking to the first additional reason of reduction (ante, XIV. 148), there is a substantive allegation in point of fact as to the valuation being fraudulent, though the "intent to destroy by fire" were out of the case, and this allegation is relevant to set aside the contract and submission. If the one cannot be disjoined from the other, the court should not have received the verdict, or, at all events, the opposite party should have objected to its being received as it stood.

March 10, 1883
 Hercules
 Insurance Company v.
 Hunter.

Pleaded for the Defender—

This matter is to be considered with reference to the summons and reasons of reduction and to the discussion on the shape of the issue in question. In the issue as finally approved of, the Court limited the question to its terms; the verdict has not affirmed its terms, and therefore, on the general rule that the pursuer is bound to make out his case, it must be taken as a verdict for the defender. The Court never held the allegation as to fraudulent over-valuation, without the intent to destroy by fire being stated, relevant to set aside the submission, and they refused an alternative issue on it alone (ante, XIV. 149). The issue was given with reference to the particular description of fraud stated on the record, upon which the action was based, and this was fraudulent over-valuation with intent to destroy by fire; this intent, therefore, being an integral part of the fraud alleged, and the jury having found that there was no such intent, the verdict is directly negative of the grounds of action, and consequently of the issue. Supposing the verdict to have been ambiguous or effectual, it was for the pursuers to have made application to have it considered, and on their failing to do so, it could only be taken as a verdict for the defender.<sup>1</sup>

LORD MEADOWBANK, after stating the nature of the previous proceedings, observed—To the terms of Lord Moncreiff's charge to the jury in this case it is very important to pay particular attention, because when fully considered, as no objection was taken to it at the trial, it will be found to be nearly conclusive as to the point now in dispute. "The second issue," he says, "goes back to the terms of the insurance, and asks you whether it was effected with the intention of destroying the machinery by fire?" (His Lordship then read from these words, given in the Report, ante, XIV. 1140, to the words "by several witnesses," starting particularly to the following passage). "You are to consider the whole of the case, and by combining them, to satisfy yourselves whether it is proved that the property in question has been destroyed, not by accidental, but by intentional fire, or that the insurance was made with intent so to destroy it. The

<sup>1</sup> Adam on Jury Trial, p. 234, 235.

No 199. question, whether there was a fraudulent over-valuation, is, by express terms of the second issue, a part of the case, and of course the fact is competent to be proved. The arbiters have found that the property was valued correctly, and their decret is matter of evidence, but that decret being itself under reduction, the proof cannot be considered as thereby closed, and the Court having found that the present investigation is competent, you have to inquire, first, whether upon all the evidence before you there was an over-valuation; and secondly, whether it was made with the intention of destroying the machinery by fire. If the facts are such as to show that the fire was wilful, or that the insurance was made with the intention of destroying the property, this evidence will draw back on the question of over-valuation; for the circumstances coming before the jury operate reciprocally on each other; and it is by combining the whole, that the jury arrive at their verdict. You must judge on the whole facts, always remembering that, unless you are satisfied either that the fire was wilful or that the insurance was made with intent to destroy the property by fire, they can be of no effect to warrant a verdict for the pursuers."

The jury found for the defender on the first issue, and on the second issue they found that the insurance was effected by the defender upon a fraudulent over-valuation of the machinery, but not with the intention of destroying the same by fire. The question which has been raised for the consideration of the Court is whether the verdict upon the second issue is to be received as a verdict for the pursuers or for the defender? The pursuers contend, that the jury by affirming the fact that the contract of insurance was entered into upon a fraudulent valuation had done enough to vitiate the contract altogether, and that it would be iniquitous for the Court, after such a finding, to sanction a charge for payment of a sum arising from a fraudulent over-valuation of the property. On the other hand it is contended for the defender, that it was essential to the success of the pursuers that they should establish not only that there was a fraudulent over-valuation, but also that it was made with the intention of destroying the machinery by fire; that this was the main and substantial part of the proposition undertaken to be established, and, as that essential part of it had been negatived by the jury, the verdict was in effect a verdict against the pursuers and for the defenders. If this action had been brought by the defender on the policy, concluding for the sum thereby insured, then I think that an averment of fraudulent over-valuation made by him would have formed a relevant defence against the action, and that a verdict, finding such over-valuation proved would have been a verdict against the party insured. Whether such a verdict would have rendered the insurance void altogether, or only have limited the extent of the claim, is a matter not now before us. But the present case is presented in a very different shape, and to that shape it is important to attend in order fully to understand the effect of the verdict. This policy contained an obligation to enter into a reference, which was recognised and acted upon, and while the parties were before the arbiters, a charge of fraudulent over-valuation was made and offered to be proved. The arbiters, however, found that the value of the machinery destroyed was equal to the sum insured, and that the pursuers were liable. Now after the first issue had been settled by the Lord Ordinary, the fact of wilful destruction by fire for the purpose of defrauding the pursuers and the application for a second issue came before the Court, the effect of the decret of the arbiters was not lost sight of, and your Lordships accordingly did not send the question of fraudulent over-valuation alone to the jury, but fraudulent over-valuation with the intention of destroying the machinery by fire. 1-

No. 199

Mar. 10, 1881
Hercules
Insurance
Company v.
Hunter.

proposition has been negatived by the jury; and it will be observed that the pursuers are in petitorio, and the question is, whether they have made out the affirmative of the issue, or have obtained a verdict entitling them to a decree of reduction of the decret-arbitral. On considering all the circumstances, I have found it impossible to arrive at the conclusion that the verdict can be taken as a verdict for the pursuers, or such as to entitle them to the decree for which they contend. No doubt, being bound to hold that the verdict has established that the insurance was made on a fraudulent over-valuation, it can only be with great reluctance that a decret-arbitral can be sustained by which effect is to be given to that insurance and valuation;—but we are bound to regulate our judgment on the case only as it has been legitimately presented to us for consideration. The terms of the summons and condescendence show clearly the difficulty which was felt of attempting to reduce a decret-arbitral by which the valuation in the insurance was substantially found to be just, upon the allegation that it was not so, but a false valuation fraudulently represented. The difficulty was, that right or wrong, the arbiters, who were the judges chosen by the parties, had negatived this averment by their decree, and that it is undoubtedly incompetent for the Court of Session to review or reduce their decision simply on the ground of iniquity or error of judgment. Accordingly in all the pursuer's pleadings the circumstance of fraudulent over-valuation is conjoined with the quality of intent to destroy by fire, and it was only on that specific averment of the purpose, that the second issue was granted; and the words "or for the purpose of defrauding the pursuers of the sum insured in the event of the said machinery being so destroyed" were struck out by the Court ex proposito as not admissible in the form of the action. It was only the specific statement that the property was over-valued with the deliberate intent to burn the premises, which changed the state of the case in point of relevancy. The over-valuation was material as showing the interest and motive to make the insurance with that intent; and as it was necessarily fraudulent, if made with that view, it was so characterised in the issue. There was, however, another important reason for making the fact of fraudulent over-valuation a part of the issue; because it was necessary to leave no doubt as to the competency of proving a fact so essential, notwithstanding the decret-arbitral under reduction. It might have been a very good issue without those words; but unless the pursuers had been left clearly at liberty to prove the fraud in the valuation, their case in regard to the alleged intent to burn might have been unreasonably limited in the evidence to be offered. The ground on which the second issue was granted was not simply that there were circumstances in the making of the contract which might have prevented the insured from recovering under the policy; but that the fact of a design from the first wilfully to burn went to the root of the insurance as not a contract for indemnity against the peril contemplated, but entirely a simulate transaction, where there was no intention to await any such peril but a direct purpose wilfully to create the mischief, and cheat the company by means of the false valuation. If that intention could have been proved, there would have been no contract of insurance at all, and of course no valid submission relative to it. Whether such a matter would have been competent to the arbiters or not, is doubtful, but it was never submitted to their consideration, and the summons was amended, on the distinct statement that it only came to the knowledge of the parties after this cause was in Court.

In the trial, the pursuers, it was stated to us, led evidence to prove the affirmative of the issues, that the insurance was made with the intention of burning

189. the premises, and this not by inference merely, but directly. According 1837. been stated that the presiding Judge laid it down to the jury, in the most terms, that "unless they were satisfied either that the fire was wilful the insurance was made with intent to destroy the property by fire," it could be of no effect to warrant a verdict for the pursuers. With this before them, a charge too not excepted from, and not now objected to, they negatived the averment that the fire was wilful, or that insurance was made with intent to destroy. The verdict was, therefore, not for the pursuers of the issue.
 In fact, unless they were satisfied that the insurance was made with intent to destroy the machinery by fire, without flying in the face of the judgment of the Court in settling the issue, there could have been no verdict for the pursuers. But finding the verdict to be ambiguous, and that the jury may have meant to bring a verdict for the pursuers, see upon what principles of construction we are to proceed. "If an ambiguous verdict is given, and the plaintiff dies before it is pronounced, and the jury on being called upon to return a verdict alter it, the plaintiff might secure against its effects by electing to be which would prevent a judgment against him founded upon a defective verdict. But if the time was let go by at the trial, and the ambiguity was discovered judgment was entered up, I conceive that the plaintiff might intercept the judgment, by showing the Court that the verdict was ambiguous, and then be to enter a nonsuit. But if the judgment was allowed to become final, and the verdict was then discovered to be defective, it seems to me that it can only be considered as a verdict in favour of the defendant, and so operate conclusively against the plaintiff, just as if he had failed to prove his case, and in consequence lost his case and judgment go against him. Unless the matter is brought in the way ab-scribed to the notice of the Court, there is no proceeding, according to the practice of Westminster Hall, to bring the verdict under the eye of the Court, consequently no opportunity for the Court to discover the defective nature of the verdict."

But your Lordships will observe, that there was but one question put to the jury, though it had two qualities adjoined to it. The verdict affirms the first quality, but negatifies the second. The second was essential to the case which the pursuers were allowed and undertook to prove; and therefore when the jury negatived that, they, in reality, refused to find for the pursuers upon the issue which they were bound to do according to the charge of the presiding Judge.

Lord Moncreiff, no doubt, might have required the jury to reconsider the verdict before allowing it to be recorded, and both parties had the power of requiring him to do so, but no such motion was made, and the verdict stands as final. But if the jury had adhered to that verdict, and stated that they could agree on any other verdict, I think it sufficiently answers and exhausts the issue, and that he could not finally have refused to take it. Certainly they could have been detained for twelve hours, and then dismissed as without a verdict, while this was tendered; but both parties held it to be a good verdict on the issue, and there being no general issue before the jury, it finds all the matter of fact which was contained in it. It finds one part of that matter of fact proved, and the other not proved; and it is for us to say what is the effect of the whole. As the pursuers have failed to prove the affirmative of their issue, I think it must be taken to have its direct and immediate effect, a verdict for the defender.

<sup>1</sup> Adam on Jury Trial, p. 234.

Lord Moncreiff sat here during a part of these discussions, it may be satisfactory to your Lordships to know that his Lordship entirely concurs in this opinion; and it is also in concurrence with his views that I propose to your Lordships pronounce a special interlocutor, finding, in the first place, in the very terms of the verdict, and secondly, the pursuers having in consequence failed to establish additional grounds of reduction set forth in the amended summons, repelling the same accordingly; and before farther answer remitting to the Lord Ordinary the parties on the remaining grounds of reduction. The other Judges having concurred,

No. 199.

Mar. 10, 1837.

Jamieson v.

Stuart.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor: *—"The Lords having considered the verdict found by the jury on the issues in this cause, whereby they found for the defender on the first issue, and on the second issue they found that the insurance was effected by the defender upon a fraudulent over-valuation of the machinery, but not with the intention of destroying the same by fire; and having heard counsel thereon; in respect that the pursuers have in consequence failed to establish either of the reasons of reduction set forth in the amendment to the summons of reduction at their instance, and which are marked sexto and septimo in the said amendment, repel the same accordingly, and supersede consideration of the other reasons of reduction in the said summons, and of the question of expenses until the next session."†

G. and W. NAPIER, W.S.—JAMES WRIGHT, W.S.—Agents.

ANN JAMIESON, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—J. Anderson.
JAMES G. STUART, Defender.—Keay.

No. 200.

Process—Consistorial—Proof.—1. It is competent for the sheriffs authorized to take proofs in consistorial cases, or for the Lords Ordinary to appoint the proof to be taken in the country in any case they shall think proper. 2. Circumstances in which the Lord Ordinary allowed a consistorial proof to proceed in the country.

THIS was a declarator of marriage at the instance of Ann Jamieson against James Stuart. The pursuer did not ask for a proof of her averments, but the defender required a proof of his, whereupon the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"In respect the pur-

Mar. 10, 1837

2d Division.

Consistorial.

Lord Jeffrey.

At an early stage of this cause, Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Medwyn having declined judging, in consequence of their connexion with the Hercules Insurance Company, pursuers, Lord Moncreiff was called in under the provision in 2 Will. c. 5. After the trial had taken place, Lord Meadowbank also discovered that he ought to decline for the same reason, and declined accordingly. Lords Jeffrey and Cuninghame having been successively proposed to be called in, it appeared that their Lordships were disqualified in the same way, whereupon it was held that it being absolutely necessary to try the case, these declinatures flew off, the Judges accordingly resumed their functions.

The question of expenses was taken up early in the ensuing session, when the court found neither party entitled to expenses.

200. suer does not ask for a proof of her averments, and that the defender does of his, allows the defender a proof of all his averments, and the suer a conjunct probation; remits to the sheriffs-commissaries, one of them, to take the proof; grants warrant for letters of diligence at the defender's instance against witnesses and bawlers, reported by the first sederunt day in May next, and dispenses with minute-book."

A question then arose as to where the proof should be taken.

It appeared that the pursuer resided in Elginshire, and was in possession of no aliment from the defender; and that the witnesses proposed to be examined in defence were numerous, and all resident in counties of Banff and Aberdeen. The pursuer was desirous the proof should be taken at Edinburgh, where she could have the aid of counsel at less expense than in the country; while the defender proposed that it should be led at Aberdeen by the Sheriff of Banff, the sheriffs appointed to take proofs in consistorial causes, in the week preceding the holding of the Circuit Court, when the aid of counsel attending the North Circuit might, if necessary, be secured.

The Sheriff of Banff having been applied to accordingly by the defender, stated it to be the opinion of himself and his brethren, that he was not called upon, and, in opposition to the wish of one of the parties, that he ought not to fix a diet for taking the proof in Aberdeen, declared himself ready to fix a diet for this purpose in Edinburgh.

The defender having brought these circumstances under the notice of the Lord Ordinary, and moved for an order to have the proof led at Aberdeen, his Lordship reported the matter to the Court.

The Court instructed his Lordship, that, under the act 1st Wil. c. 69, § 41, it was competent for the sheriffs authorized to take consistorial proofs, or, if the parties were dissatisfied with their order, for the Lords Ordinary to appoint the proof to be led in the country in case they should think proper, and his Lordship accordingly pronounced the following interlocutor:—

"The Lord Ordinary having advised with the Lords of the Second Division of the Court, finds, in cases of this description, that it is competent to take a proof in the country, and, in the particular circumstances of the case, allows the proof to proceed in the country, in respect the defender states his willingness to pay the necessary expense of a counsel attending the proof on the part of the pursuer, provided one of the gentlemen attending the Circuit Court be instructed; appoints the auditor to fix upon the sum to be so paid to counsel, in the event of the parties disagreeing as to the amount to be so paid."

No. 201.

MRS MARY THOMSON, Petitioner.—*Ivory.*Mar. 10, 1839
Thomson.Judicial Factor—Pupil—Nobile Officium.—Circumstances in which authority to a factrix loco tutoris to grant a feu-right refused.

Mar. 10, 1839

2d Division
T.

IN 1833, the petitioner, Mrs Thomson, was appointed factrix loco tutoris to her sons, Robert and John Thomson, who were in pupillarity. hereafter she obtained authority from the Court to make up titles in person of Robert, for vesting in him, as the heir of his father and grandfather, the heritable subjects left by them. She now presented an application, setting forth that, in 1821, a tack had been granted by the pupil's grandfather of a certain lot of ground in favour of one Brown, the lessor becoming bound to advance to Brown the sum of £1600, to be expended, at his sight, in improvements on the premises; "it being understood and agreed upon by the parties, that the said Alexander Brown should have it in his power, at any time during the currency of that tack, upon giving six months' previous notice to the said Robert Thomson, to require from him, and the said Robert Thomson should be bound to grant, to the said Alexander Brown, an absolute feu-right of the ground thereby set, and whole buildings that might be erected thereon, but that only on this express condition, that the said Alexander Brown, or his foresaids, made repayment to the said Robert Thomson of the sum of £1600 sterling, so to be advanced, as before-mentioned." The petition farther stated, that this lease was to expire at Whitsunday, 1837, and that Brown had called upon Mrs Thomson to grant a feu-right to him of the foresaid ground, in terms of the obligation in the lease; that an agent, however, had advised him not to accept of such feu-right, unless under an authority from the Court. In these circumstances, the petitioner prayed to be authorized, "as factrix loco tutoris for the said Robert Thomas Thomson, her son, to grant an absolute feu-right of the said ground, as described in the said tack, all in terms of the obligations therein contained and above quoted."

In support of the application, it was maintained, that it would be highly expedient that the feu-right in question should be granted, and reference was made to the precedents of Somerville's factor, Feb. 6, 1836,<sup>1</sup> and Dalmahoy, July 9, 1836.<sup>2</sup>

THE COURT refused the prayer of the petition.

GIBSON-CRAIGS, WARDLAW, and DALZIEL, W.S.—Agents.

<sup>1</sup> Ante, XIV. 451.

<sup>2</sup> Ante, XIV. 1125.

1802.

ARCHIBALD GALBRAITH and OTHERS, Advocators.—

10,1837.

Sol. Gen. Rutherford—More—Monteith.

18th v.

REV. JAMES SMITH and OTHERS, Respondents.—D. F. Hope—A. Dunlop.

Interim Possession—Jurisdiction—Dissenters.—The church judicatories of a dissenting body having pronounced a sentence, declaring the minister of a church in their communion out of connexion with them—Circumstances in which the Court awarded a conjoint possession of the church by alternate diets of the minister, on the one hand, and such persons as the judicatories should appoint on the other, pending a declarator as to whether the minister's incumbency was by his agreement with the proprietors of the church, and his right of possession, had been brought to an end by that sentence.

10,1837.

REVISION.
ledersiff.
R.

DURING the persecutions in the reign of Charles II. a number of Lowlanders took refuge in Campbeltown, and formed there a Presbyterian congregation, the minister of which, after the Revolution, had a stipend modified to him out of the teinds of the parish. Till 1749 the congregation enjoyed the free choice of their own minister, but on the occasion of a vacancy which then took place, and of another which occurred in 1762, the Duke of Argyll, as patron of the parish, and as such claiming the right of presentation, presented individuals very obnoxious to the congregation, who, on the last of these occasions, opposed the settlement, and carried the matter to the General Assembly. They were, however, induced by the Duke to withdraw their opposition on condition that His Grace should, on the first opportunity, present the obnoxious minister to another charge. The Duke accordingly, a few years afterwards, offered the minister another living, but he refused to accept it. On this, the congregation, who had also suffered annoyance from an act of the Synod of Argyll regarding the days of service at the communion, resolved to build a place of worship for themselves. They accordingly purchased a piece of ground, and entered into a subscription, whereby they bound themselves respectively to purchase so many sittings in the new church, each seat to be subject to an annual duty for payment of the minister's stipend, precentor's salary, &c. They did not, till after the church was built, determine with what body they would connect themselves, but they ultimately resolved to join the Presbytery of Relief which had been formed in 1761. Having made an agreement with the Rev. James Pinkerton, a licentiate of the Church of Scotland, to be their minister at a certain specified salary, a call was given to that individual, with the concurrence of the Presbytery of Relief, by whom he was immediately afterwards ordained. The call, which was dated 9th June, 1767, was in these terms:—"We the underwritten inhabitants of the town of Campbeltown and its neighbourhood, having built a house for the public worship of God, not as separatists from the Protestant churches, or the orthy ministers and members of the Established Church in our land, No. 202. in whom we can freely hold communion, being of one mind with us in March 10, 1833 faith, worship, and institutions of Jesus Christ. We have taken the Galbraith v. Smith.

the step to vindicate our Christian, and most natural right, to choose a pastor who is to labour amongst us in holy things, in opposition to the abuse of the power of patronage, the pernicious effects of which are heavily felt in all corners, and particularly in this town; and partly that the truth and purity of the gospel may remain amongst us, and be transmitted to posterity; and being (many of us) destitute of a fixed gospel pastor with whom we can cordially join, and all of us being deeply sensible of the paucity of faithful ministers in the place, and assured from good information, and the experience of some of us of the ministerial qualifications, and of the suitableness to our capacities of the gifts of you, Mr James Pinkerton, preacher of the gospel, have agreed, with great unanimity amongst ourselves, and the concurrence of the Reverend Presbytery of Relief, to call, as by these presents we, in pursuance, and in conformity to our aforesaid declared principles, do heartily call and invite you to undertake the office of a pastor amongst us, and the charge of our souls," &c.

Shortly after Mr Pinkerton's ordination the pews in the church were disposed of by public roup. Thereafter the titles to the property, subject to the burden of the conveyances to the seats, which were in the form of regular dispositions, with procuratory and precept, were transferred by the original purchaser to certain parties as trustees for the whole "managers and members, both present and to come, of the said Relief congregation." The affairs of the church were conducted by a body of managers chosen by the proprietors at a yearly meeting. Mr Pinkerton lived till 1804, and on his death, and on two subsequent vacancies in 1822 and 1828, ministers were chosen in connexion with the Synod of Relief, the members of that communion now comprehending several Presbyteries united into one Synod, an agreement as to stipend being made with the proprietors or a committee on their behalf. The minister chosen on the last of these occasions was the respondent, Mr Smith, who was a licentiate of the Relief body, and was, like his predecessors, ordained to his charge by the Relief Presbytery of Glasgow. In 1835, on the occasion of discussing in Mr Smith's session an overture for union between the Relief and the United Secession churches, Mr Smith made some expressions stating a preference to an union with the Establishment over that with the United Secession, and also favourable to the acceptance of an endowment, which were reported to certain members of the Presbytery, and in consequence of this and of other reports, the Synod of Presbytery, by direction, as was alleged, of the Presbytery, though without any entry on the subject in their minutes, wrote to Mr Smith, requesting him to fix a day for a conference with the Presbytery.
But Mr Smith declined, and thereafter the Presbytery appointed a

302. meeting of their body to be held at Campbeltown, that they might determine on the spot the state of matters in that church in reference to its adherence to the principles of the Relief Synod, and take measures for that adherence being confirmed and strengthened, seeing that unfavourable reports on this subject are abroad, which imperatively call for the Presbytery's investigation."

The meeting thus appointed was held by the Presbytery at Campbeltown on the 15th and 16th October. The Presbytery examined a number of the managers and elders, and had produced to them the minutes of the managers and session, with a letter from Mr Smith to the managers on the subject of the overture for union with the United Secession; but the minutes of this investigation were not produced, and ultimately the Presbytery adopted a resolution thus set forth in the minutes:—"After again holding conference with the session and managers, the members expressed their sentiments to the effect, that Mr Smith had failed in his duty to his brethren when he declined holding conference with the Presbytery in September: That he erred in using unguarded expressions in session, which unhappily gave rise in the minds of his elders to the idea that he had a wish to join the National Church: That Mr Smith ought, in duty and prudence, to come forward and express his regret at having used such expressions, promise carefully to avoid such expressions in future, and declare that he cordially adheres to the determination of the session and managers to abide by the regulations and principles of the Synod of Relief as at present constituted: Which being moved and seconded, was adopted."

Mr Smith being called upon to say whether he acceded to this minute, declined to do so, and he was thereupon cited apud acta to appear before an adjourned meeting at Glasgow on the 3d November following. Mr Smith accordingly attended this meeting, at which he was again asked to accede to the minute above quoted, with the following addition explanatory of the sense in which the terms "the principles of the Synod of Relief" were used, viz. "in the sense in which they were understood at the period of Mr Smith's ordination, and in which they are received by the members of the Synod at the present day." This Mr Smith still refused to accede to, on the ground, as alleged by him, that the Synod at the present day held the principles commonly called "Voluntary," which he (Mr Smith) considered contrary to Relief principles; but he offered a declaration of his own, which he stated to be, as finally framed in the following terms:—"I pledge and oblige myself to adhere strictly to Relief principles as understood at the period of my ordination, and to do nothing that will tend to alienate the property of the Relief Church of Campbeltown from the Relief Synod: And as it has been stated, that certain expressions used by me as to endowments, and joining the Established Church in preference to the Secession, left an improper impression on the minds of some of my session, for which it is the opinion of the Presbytery, that I should express regret, while, as one of the members of this court, I may disagree with many, and claim with them the right giving my own judgment and opinion; I feel bound, as a measure for me, to regard it a matter of regret, that from any cause they should be misapprehended my meaning." No. 202

March 10, 1836
Campbell v.
Smith. 211.

The Presbytery refused to accept this declaration, and Mr Smith declining to accede to their minute, which they ultimately varied (though, alleged by Mr Smith, without his being aware of it), by leaving out the words "the members of," the following procedure took place, as set forth in the minutes of Presbytery:—"The members delivered their sentiments at great length, to the effect that some speedy and decisive step ought to be taken in the matter. It was moved and seconded, that, in the written expressions of Mr Smith's opinion, and in his verbal declarations in court, connected with his declining to give satisfaction to the Presbytery, there is sufficient evidence before the court that he is not adhering to his ordination vows, and acting on them, he ought to be cut off from connexion with the Relief body. Agreed to adjourn till eight o'clock, and appoint Messrs Thomson, Brodie, and Struthers to converse with Mr Smith.—Eight o'clock, same day. The committee reported their conference with Mr Smith. Mr Smith being called on to say whether he still refused to accede to the minute of court, declared that he still refused to accede. The Presbytery resumed, and the proceedings of the committee were read. The motion formerly submitted was then put to the vote: it was unanimously adopted. Wherefore the Presbytery did, and hereby do, declare Mr Smith out of connexion with the Relief body: Against which decision Mr Smith appealed to the first meeting of Synod, for reasons to be lodged in due time, took instruments in the clerk's hands, and craved extracts."

The stated meeting of Synod stood fixed for May, 1836, but to dispose of this appeal a pro re nata meeting was held on the 15th and 16th of December, when the sentence of the Presbytery was affirmed.

Thereafter the Presbytery having met, declared Mr Smith out of connexion with their body, and the Campbeltown church vacant, and appointed Mr Harvey, one of their number, to preach there, and intimate their deliverance. On this sentence being communicated to the managers of the church, a meeting was held by them and the elders; it was moved on the one hand, "that in consequence of Mr Smith being now cut off from the Relief Synod from all connexion with that body, he is now no longer our minister, as a Relief Church, we cannot consent to admit him to the pulpit;" and on the other, "that as the proprietors of the church had no opportunity of considering the proceedings of the Synod in regard to Mr Smith, and the question to be considered deeply involves the interest, that a general meeting of the proprietors and members of the church be called, to consider the whole circumstances of the case, and that in the meantime Mr Smith be allowed to preach in the church,

202. with a declaration that his doing so shall not interfere with the rights of either party."

1837. The first of these motions was carried, and the meeting farther resolved, "that Mr Harvey should be allowed to preach the church vacant. On this Mr Smith and two of the proprietors presented a petition to the Sheriff of Argyleshire, praying him to interdict the managers and bannock from giving access to any person except Mr Smith to preach in the church or green belonging thereto, and also to interdict Mr Harvey or any other minister of the Relief Presbytery from preaching the church vacant. The Sheriff granted interdict ad interim as craved, and appointed a record to be made up.

While this record was in preparation, an action of declarator was raised by Mr Smith and the other two applicants for the interdict, concluding, inter alia, to have it found and declared that the principles held by the Relief Presbytery when the Campbeltown church was founded and joined in their connexion were neither opposed to endowments of church establishments; that no one holding principles opposed thereto, or in any other way opposed to the principles held by the original Presbytery of Relief, was entitled to preach in the Campbeltown Relief Church, or interfere in the management of it; that the proprietors possessed the exclusive management of the same, free from any control by the Synod of Relief, and not affectable by their acts and deeds; that the Reverend Mr Smith adhered to the said principles; that the proceedings and sentences of the Presbytery and Synod were ineffectual to deprive him of his character of minister of said church, or of any rights and privileges belonging to him as such; that his incumbency had not thereby been brought to an end, and that he had right to preach in the church, and possess and enjoy all the rights and privileges belonging to the minister of the same during his incumbency.

In the process of interdict, the Sheriff (15th April, 1836) pronounced this interlocutor: "In respect the object of this process seems to be to continue and not invert the present state of possession, continues the interdict already granted, and decerns, reserving, however, to the respondents (Galbraith, &c) to apply for its recal, in the event of the pursuers (Smith, &c.) being unsuccessful in establishing the conclusion of the action of declarator which they have raised before the Supreme Court."

Of this judgment, Galbraith, &c. brought an advocacion, in which they alleged that an overwhelming majority of the proprietors and congregation adhered to the Synod. On the other hand, while it was not disputed by Smith, &c. that the adherents of the Synod constituted a decided majority of the proprietors and congregation, it was denied that their number was nearly so great as was represented.

The Lord Ordinary appointed the cause to be argued in Cases.
Pleaded for Galbraith, &c.

In forming a connexion with any religious communion, it is a necessarily implied element of the contract that the parties forming that contract are to submit, in all things regarding the doctrines and discipline of the sect, to the judgment and determination of the church judicatories of the body, whose resolutions explaining or altering the original tenets or regulations of the sect are conclusive against all the members, and must be received as probatio probata by courts of law in all questions of civil right which may be affected thereby. Courts of law are not entitled to look to the grounds of their decisions, nor to consider whether they be in accordance with the original principles of the body or no, but can only inquire whether they be truly the sentences of the Courts, or, in the case of a division, whether the court claiming to represent the body be truly composed of the majority, and this being ascertained, their decisions must be looked to merely as facts, and be held as conclusive with all parties united to the sect; and all property appropriated to the purposes of worship in connexion with the sect must be administered in accordance with the principles and determinations of the majority of the church courts.<sup>1</sup> In the present case, there can be no doubt that the church at Campbelltown was appropriated to the purposes of religious worship in connexion with the Presbytery and Synod of Relief. It has continued in that connexion since first opened, and the Reverend Mr Smith, like all his predecessors, received his character and status as minister of that church, by ordination from the Presbytery of Relief. He only possessed that church as a Relief minister, capable of ministering to a congregation in connexion with the Relief Synod; and being now cut off by a sentence of the supreme court of the body, his character of a Relief minister has come to an end. He is no longer capable of ministering to a congregation in communion with the Synod. His sole title, therefore, to officiate at the church has fallen, and even although it were competent for the civil court to consider the validity and effect of the sentence of the Synod, declaring him out of connexion, it would be a total inversion of the possession, in the meantime, if the church were allowed to be used, contrary to what has obtained since it was first opened, by a minister having no spiritual relationship to the Synod of Relief, and no longer in connexion with them, and still more if the interdict, in the terms granted by the Sheriff, were to stand, whereby every minister of the body in connexion with which the church was constituted, is prohibited from preaching therein. It is not, however, competent for the civil courts to judge of the validity of the sentence of the Synod, and the question attempted to be submitted to the decision of the court by Smith, &c. here, is one of pure spiritual jurisdiction, calling on this Court incompetently to review and alter the decision of a Church Court in a matter purely spiritual. Even, however, looking to the objections taken to the sentence of the Synod in this case, they are altogether

Mar. 10, 1881

Galbraith v. Smith.

<sup>1</sup> Aikman v. Davidson, June 27, 1805, (F.C. and M. 14584).

§ 202. untenable. There is no ground for any averment of change of principle, and as to the proceedings against Mr Smith being in violation of the regulations of the Synod, which require a regular libel, &c., this is unnecessary where the party confesses, as was done here, or where, at least the sentence of the Synod falls to be considered as proceeding on open contempt in their own presence, which may always be acted upon without formal process. But at any rate, whatever may be the effect to be given to such objections in the declarator, they ought not, in a question of interim possession, to interfere with the enforcement of a sentence of the supreme judicatory to which Mr Smith owes obedience; and there is the essential difference between the present case and those of Aikman and Bulloch, where the possession of the ministers cut off was maintained, that in these there was a schism in the body itself, and the questions raised were new to the Court, while here the Synod was unanimous, and there is no schism or division in the Relief body.

Pleaded for Smith, &c.

In all questions regarding the property or possession of a building devoted to the purposes of religious worship in a particular communion or other civil interests connected therewith, the determinations of the judicatories of the sect can have no force independent of contract, beyond what contract may attach to them. The decisions of such judicatories have no legal efficacy to affect civil interests, such as belongs by statute to the courts of the Established Church, but are exactly in the situation of resolutions of any other voluntary association, and it matters not whether the object of such association be religious, social, or literary. So long as their resolutions do not affect civil interests, the courts of law will not interfere with them, but they will as little interfere with a social or literary as with a religious association, there being no distinction in law between the latter and the former classes. The ground on which the civil courts will not interfere with such determinations of a dissenting church court, is not that they have religion for their object, but that they do not concern civil rights, which alone form the subject of adjudication in a court of law. So soon, however, as the resolutions of a voluntary association are pleaded to the effect of determining civil interests, they immediately become, whether they be resolutions of a mason lodge or the like, or sentences of a church court, the proper subject of cognizance by courts of law, so far as is necessary to decide the civil interests competently before them. Here the only question raised is as to the right to the use of a material building, and it is a perversion of terms to call that a question of pure spiritual jurisdiction. It may be that the question will depend on the sentence of the church court, but solely by reason of the contract, express or implied, whereby the right of possession may have been rendered affectable by such sentence. This, however, is still merely a civil question of contract, competent to the courts of law, who are entitled to look to the proceedings of the Relief Church courts here, (which to the effect of turning Mr. Smith out of the possession of the No. 202.

 erto had by him,) in order to ascertain and determine whether Mar. 10, 1887, dings so founded on are those contemplated by the contract, Galbraith v. Smith.
 h a civil effect has been agreed to be given. Then, in deter-
 , it is a total mistake on the part of the advocates to maintain tence of the church court must be taken as probatio probata ontracts appropriating buildings to the purposes of worship, in with a particular communion, absolute submission is come under ch courts of the body, so as to entitle them, even to change the o be inculcated in it, or that the decision of the majority of the rts is conclusive as to the principles of the sect. On the con-as finally settled, in the ultimate decision of the case of Craigie House of Lords,<sup>1</sup> that it is an essential condition of such on of buildings as places of worship in connexion with parti-
 , that the principles and doctrines of the sect existing at the : appropriation, be maintained inviolate, the maintenance of ; the great object of the appropriation,—that the only determi-such judicatories to which civil effect can be held to have been to be given, are determinations in accordance with the rules oles of the sect; and that in the event of difference of opinion, inations of the majority of the church judicatories have no con-thority, but that it is the province of courts of law to decide eir determinations are or are not in accordance with the prinhe maintenance of which the place of worship was erected, and any inversion of it in opposition to these principles. Applying ent case the rules so laid down, and appealed to in subsequent inally settled,<sup>2</sup> it is to be observed that in the declarator, ., undertake to establish that the foundation of the sentence m was his adherence to the principles which they contend to those of the Relief Presbytery when this church was constitu-the sentence of cutting off, even if regularly pronounced, is not a nature effectual to bring Mr. Smith's incumbency under his ith the proprietors to an end, nor to dissolve the pastoral relaetween him and the congregation; that it was, moreover, proa total violation of the rules of the Synod, being for an offence erious nature, "violation of his ordination vows," though that r the first time in the sentence finding him guilty of it, without el, or trial, all required by their own regulations; that the of there being a confession, or of the sentence proceeding on are both negatived by the very terms of the sentence itself, and ether the proceedings are in violation alike of the fundamental

<sup>1</sup> McClellan v. Aikman, July 21, 1820, 2 Bligh, 529; See also prior judgment, <sup>2</sup> McClellan v. Aikman, 1 Dow, 1.

<sup>3</sup> Wentworth v. Jacob and Walker, 247.

1822. principles, and of the regulations of the body, adherence to which is an essential element in any sentences of the church courts, in order that they may have any civil effect in regard to the use and possession of the church in question. In these circumstances the point to be here decided is whether civil effect is to be given, ad interim, to the proceedings of the Presbytery and Synod of Relief, pending the declarator for heretice, decided whether they are of a kind to which any civil effect is due. The true rule in such a case is not to alter the existing possession now in the hands of Smith, by giving a civil effect to the sentences of these church courts pending the declarator. This was the rule followed in the cases of Man and of Bulloch,<sup>1</sup> and there is no valid ground of distinction here, because, although the Synod in the present case was unanimous, the principle laid down in the House of Lords makes that circumstance of no consequence, while there are serious objections to the regularity of the procedure here, which did not occur in these cases.

The Lord Ordinary, on considering the cases, made avizandum to them to the Court, issuing at the same time the subjoined note.*

<sup>1</sup> Aikman v. Davidson, June 27, 1805 (F.C. and M. 14584); Bulloch v. Smith, January 31, 1809, (F.C.)

* "As the Lord Ordinary is not prepared to recall the interdict, at least is of opinion that sufficient grounds have not been shown for disturbing Smith's possession as minister of the church at Campbeltown during the pendency of the process of declarator, he thinks it the most advisable course to adjourn the cause.

"The way in which the advocates have prepared their case is at least attended with inconvenience. It has evidently occasioned expense and trouble to respondents; but it has, besides, tended to perplex and extend the discussion unnecessarily. Certainly it is true, that the advocates, in the debate, from the opening on all the history and merits of the cause, of which pleading the Lord Ordinary has full notes before him; but the most awkward result is, that the ground now taken in justification of the proceedings of the Relief Presbytery and Synod is essentially different from any thing previously maintained, and is not easily to be found in the terms of the sentence itself. Whether it is solid and available or not, it does not appear to have been the ground of judgment contemplated.

"The advocates represent this cause as of very great importance to all associations of Dissenters in this country, and seem to be of opinion, that even to entertain the question of interdict is inconsistent with their privileges. The Lord Ordinary doubts much if it will be found to be of the importance attached to it unless it should turn out in the declarator that the trial of it is to be made that of something different from the apparent merits of the cause itself; and in the view which he has of the possessory question, it does not appear to involve more general question than such as the Court have frequently dealt with before.

"The advocates, and the Ecclesiastical Body to which they state themselves as belonging, need be under no alarm lest the Court should interfere with the spiritual determinations of their Presbytery and Synod, in matters of a purely spiritual nature. The Lord Ordinary is well assured that this is what the Court never will do, and for himself, he has too deep a sense of the importance and extent of the laws of toleration to give any judgment which he could imagine to have any such tendency. But the soil and fabric of a church are a subject of civil property; and when a question arises either as to the absolute right and title in

LORD MEADOWBANK.—Your Lordship having been pleased to call upon me to deliver my judgment upon this case, I can have no difficulty in stating the facts which have occurred to me on going through this very voluminous record, No. 202.
—
March 10. 1837.
Galbraith v.
Smith.

subject, or as to the right to possess it, while the question of property is under consideration, the Court must necessarily judge of such questions, by applying to this case the principles of title and contract, with due regard to its great peculiarity, the same principles of municipal law which regulate similar questions on other contracts; and they must not be deterred or excused from doing so, merely because the dispute comes out of the spiritual relations of the parties, and the spiritual objects for which the building was acquired, or because the discussion may involve the necessity of taking some view of ecclesiastical affairs.

"This is a case of contract simply, and it is perfectly manifest that no aid can be obtained in the argument, on the one side or the other, from the law applicable to the Established Church, which rests on public statutes.

"The advocates lay the basis of their argument on an assumption, which they would like to be proved, that, by the contract, the church in question is held as a trust for a congregation of Christians in inseparable connexion with the Presbytery and the Relief, and that all Mr Smith's status and rights as minister in it are absolutely dependent on his remaining in that connexion;—then it is farther assumed to be settled law, that, in the case of a difference among the proprietors of such a building, the orders or determinations of the Presbytery and Synod, whatever they may be, however they may have been arrived at, and whatever may have been the ground of charge or point of difference, must be absolutely conclusive and binding on the proprietors and the minister, and must constrain the civil court at once to decide the civil question accordingly;—and it is finally assumed, that the sentence of the Synod in this case is a sentence of deposition, or equivalent thereto, and that the appointment of Mr Harvie to preach the church vacant is a spiritual proceeding, with which the civil court ought not to interfere.

"However probable the grounds may be thought to be on which the first assumption is made, it is distinctly controverted in the extent maintained, on facts and reasonings which will require investigation and discussion. The Lord Ordinary is desirous not to prejudge any question which must be tried in the declarator, and therefore he gives no opinion on that question of fact at present. But suppose it could be held, notwithstanding the denial, that, previous to the dispute, the church, the minister, the proprietors, and the congregation, were in such connexion with the Relief Synod as to be permanently under their ecclesiastical jurisdiction, the advocates go a great deal too fast in assuming the law to be so broadly laid as they allege. They seem to have misled themselves, by looking only at the first judgment of the Court in the case of Craigdallie v. Aikman; but it is impossible to read the judgment of the House of Lords remitting that cause, the ultimate interlocutor of the Court, February 21, 1815. (Respondent's case, p. 75,) and the speech of Lord Eldon in affirming it, without seeing that it was not there that all consideration of the grounds of dispute or the nature of the proceedings must be excluded, and that there may be much room for discussion before it is clear that a similar judgment must be pronounced in this case. The Lord Ordinary desires to express no opinion on the matters actually alleged as being relevant or insufficient to warrant the plea of the respondents; but to show the doubtful nature of the point here taken by the advocates as conclusive in point of law. Under the case of Craigdallie in the question of possession, he will make the proposition that the Synod had actually resolved to join the Secession Church, and he says, that, attending to the original principles of the Relief Church, and the principles delivered by Lord Eldon, it would be difficult to hold that Mr Smith is deprived of his condition and rights as minister of the Campbeltown Church, or that any portion of the proprietors could be deprived of their property because he or they declined to concur in such a union, and it is also a ques-

in such a case ; and very sure he is, that it is a thing altogether of a different kind and leading to consequences essentially different, from the sentence pronounced. But there is not even any act of the Synod dissolving Mr Smith's moral relation to his congregation, supposing that to have been done ; for this the Lord Ordinary must consider as raising a farther very serious case of the advocates for recall of the interdict. He is aware of the case of Mr Dalziel (but not in Bulloch's), similar words only with those used here. But in that case, the minister had voluntarily separated himself from the Synod, and rested his case on the departure from principle which he sought to prove against them ; and yet an interdict against altering the possession of the church. The question here is, Whether the anomalous sentence pronounced (recall, suspension, or deposition) of cutting Mr Smith off from communion with the Relief Synod, is sufficient, de plano, to compel a change in the possession of the church. It appears to the Lord Ordinary that this must be solved in favour of the Synod, even on the showing of the advocates, if the step by which he is to be removed from the church is to be considered as wholly or partly a civil, and a spiritual proceeding. That it is in its main purpose and effect civil to the Lord Ordinary.

" The Relief Presbytery and Synod have no property in, or control over, this church as a subject of property. It belongs to the proprietors, and to the purposes of the trust. Put the case, then, that all the persons who are that every one person connected with it, concurred with Mr Smith, in separating from him, what would be the effect of a sentence of the Synod, cutting off Mr Smith from their connexion? Manifestly none at all, but that he and his people would lose the benefit of such a spiritual connexion. Could the Synod, under the colour of such a proceeding, to come to the pulpit of the church and declare the place vacant, till another minister, willing to be associated with them, should be appointed? Surely not. The statement here is, that the majority of the proprietors and congregation adhere to the Synod. It is so. But that does not alter the force of the illustration to prove the nature of possession, under such a sentence, is a civil, and not an ecclesiastical proceeding. Neither of the parties here say that the point is to be determined by the proprietors ; and the cases do not warrant such a rule. Yet in the same sentence it is undeniable that in the case supposed, the civil and an v. Craigdallie and others, and the rest of the cases to which we have been referred. No. 202

First, I take it to be clearly and finally settled, that a trust may be legally established, a civil right created for behoof of a body of Dissenting Christians professing certain tenets, and agreeing to have those civil rights fixed by and dependent upon the observance of such rules and regulations as are inherent in, and calculated to maintain, the principles they support. March 10, 18: Galbraith v. Smith.

Secondly, That it is a legal object of such a trust that it may profess to be constituted with a view to perpetuity, even by placing in the hands of a recognised body the right and power of controlling and modifying those rules and regulations, in conformity with the fundamental principles of that sect of dissenting Christians to which those constituting the trust may have professed to adhere, and that the civil court will not take cognizance of the proceedings and determinations of those ecclesiastical judicatories, as they may be termed, upon matters of doctrine and discipline, but hold them to be probatio probata of the principles of the sect.

Thirdly, That the original deed or other instrument by which the trust is created need not, in order to be effectual, specify within itself the particular conditions of its creation, but that these objects may be ascertained, in order to their recognition and enforcement by courts of law, by facts and circumstances, and by a train of proceedings indicative of the purposes and the views of the parties.

Fourthly, That in order to confer upon a party the right of enforcing the objects majority or minority of those maintaining the property on its own purposes, could not bear to be spoken of.

---

"The case of the advocates gets some plausibility from the particular form of the interdict asked and granted—to prohibit all persons, except Mr Smith, from preaching in the church, or on the green, and particularly Mr Harvie, from preaching the church vacant. Perhaps the form of words may not be the best chosen possible. But even the form may be justified, on this ground, that the Presbytery, by cutting Mr Smith off from their connexion, had no right to interfere with his liberty in his own church, unless they can establish the point that the effect of such a sentence was to invert instantly the civil rights connected with the church; and as to the substance of the thing, however it may be expressed, both parties agree that it is simply whether there are grounds for turning Mr Smith, and the professors who adhere to him, out of possession of the premises, while it is yet substance in the declarator whether Mr Smith's contract can be so infringed, and whether the trust stands for the one class of proprietors or the other. The notion that excluding Mr Smith from the church is no inversion of the possession, because he cannot preach there as a minister in connexion with the Relief Synod, is little better than a play upon words.

The matter being thus reduced to a question of civil rights, the Lord Ordinary looks to the precedents, and he sees that, in the case of Craigdallie, and more remarkably in that of Bulloch, January 31, 1809, even after the first judgment in Craigdallie, interdicts against any change of possession were granted, and that the right of possession was also preserved in the case of M'Crie, February 24, 1809, final judgment. The present case appears to the Lord Ordinary to be much stronger for not altering the possession than any one of those cases, because the inversion of the church and congregation is more doubtful, and the grounds of objection to the proceedings against Mr Smith, and the change of principle by the judgment, are much more tangible. Very possibly the advocates may ultimately lose out their case; but it must be fairly tried, and not seized summarily."

to in the papers, and in the case of Aikman and Craigdallie.

In the present case it is unnecessary to discuss any question of title. no doubt that each of the parties has a persona standi, and both have interest to enforce the object for which they are contending; but I have thought it indispensably necessary for me, even in this question of possession, to state how those settled doctrines to which I have referred are to be affected by the judgment we are now to pronounce in favour either of the one party or the other. Your Lordships will therefore permit me to state, in the first place, in point of fact, that I have no doubt that the meeting-house at Campbeltown was originally created, and the endowment connected with it thereafter created, for the use and congregation of dissenting Christians, to be in all future time connected with the subordination to, that body which the contributors and congregation recognised as the Synod of Relief. This object of the trust, I may state generally, and then going into particulars, is sufficiently ascertained by a consideration of the facts of the case of the parties exactly as they were in Craigdallie's case (and, in fact, the resemblance here is, mutatis mutandis, little else than a transcript of the case there), and from the call and ordination of the different clergymen, and from the fact that Smith himself, under authority of the Synod, and whose sole title of in-licence to preach which he had received from the judicatories of the church. Secondly, It is admitted, nay, it is maintained by both parties, that the tenets of the Relief church are those of the Church of Scotland, and the Faith and Formulae of the latter constitute the foundation of the faith of these, your Lordships know well, the rights of presbyteries, synods, and assemblies, in all matters of discipline and doctrine, are declared to be binding, and while these judicatories in the Established Church possess the power of determining the ecclesiastical relation between pastors and congregations, so in the Church of Relief they possess a power equally as irreversible. Of the effect of the ecclesiastical relation, in the Established right to the character or function in which alone he had acquired the civil No. 202.

latter must follow of course the loss of the former.

or the same effect is to be produced upon the pastors of Relief congrega- March 10, 1837.
 en deprived by their ecclesiastical superiors of the character and functions Galbraith v.
 Smith.

men, if bodies having a persona standi, and a legal interest to maintain its, come before your Lordships, proving that it was a fundamental printhe Relief Church that the right of deprivation lay with the Synod—that d exercised their ecclesiastical power—and contending that the pastor bered of his function, could no longer be maintained in the civil possession , which, by the agreement of parties, had been created solely for the pur-maintaining a congregation in connexion with the Relief Church, is the
 we are now required to determine.

respect, I am humbly of opinion, that the Established Church and the church are precisely in the same situation. The difference between the prebend to be simply, that the one is an endowed church, where the civil is from the provision of the state, while, in the other, it has been consti-the voluntary agreement and obligation of the parties. But in both, it is to the function, as determined by the ecclesiastical authorities of the spectively, upon which the civil and patrimonial rights of the parties in ect must altogether depend ; so, accordingly, in England the law was so by Lord Mansfield, in a case where a mandamus was applied for to re-clergyman to a Dissenting meeting-house. “ The right,” his Lordship o the function is the substance, and draws after it every thing as a pertieto. The use of the meeting-house and pulpit follows by necessary con-the right to the function of the minister, preacher, or pastor.”<sup>1</sup> pon the same principle, the late Lord Justice-Clerk Macqueen pronounced nent, as Lord Ordinary, in the case of Auchincloss in the year 1792.

 oss, it appears, was deposed from the office of a minister by the Associate ry of Stirling in the month of September, 1790. A portion of his con-adhered to him, and a petition was therefore presented by some of the mbers of the congregation to the sheriff of Stirling, praying that he should ed to remove from the manse, glebe, and pertinents, and deliver up the the church. The petition was finally refused by the sheriff-depute, 2d r, 1790 ; but a bill of advocation being presented, and an action of decla-ed at the instance of Auchincloss and that portion of the congregation lhered to him, the Lord Justice-Clerk Braxfield, in the year 1792, prothe following judgment:—“ In respect the Lord Ordinary does not con-ompetent for this Court to review the decisions of Associate congregations, y called Burghers, when sentences are pronounced by them in their ecclecharacter ; therefore, sustains the defences,” &c. and found expenses due.
 it adhered, on advising petition and answers, and Auchincloss thereupon d the meeting-house.

case, it is quite plain that the civil right was by Lord Braxfield deter-depend altogether and exclusively on the right to the ecclesiastical functhe judgment of the Dissenting judicatory taking away that function

<sup>1</sup> 3 Barrows, 1265.

202. being, by the principle and rule of the Dissenting sect, final and conclusive right of Auchincloss to the meeting-house and endowment was necessary and determined. In that case, no doubt, the term depose had been employed by the Burgher Synod in dissolving their connexion with Auchincloss; and the ordinary, in his note, seems to be of opinion, that the want of it in this case operate to the prejudice of the argument maintained by the advocates. I think this is altogether a mistake. The meaning of depose is just the same, although, in the judicatories of the Established Church, it has, by long and constant usage, obtained a technical, and, when applied to ecclesiastical affairs, particularly solemn signification. In fact, in those judicatories there is the same term employed, when a clergyman is deprived of his function, or his connexion with his congregation, or with the church, dissolved and abrogated; the reverse in the case of different bodies of Dissenters. There, if a minister is cut off from his connexion with the body for a moral offence, the terms employed are those of depose and deposition; but it seems that when this is done merely in consequence of a difference of opinion, or contumacy, or other not inferring moral delinquency, terms are employed less offensive in tone and character, such as dropping the name of the party from the roll, or cutting him out of connexion with the body. Accordingly, in the case of Mr Craigdallie, the former words were employed with respect to Mr Jarvie's connexion with the Associate Synod was thereby held by this Court to be dissolved, and who and his adherents were finally removed from possession of the Burgher meeting-house and endowments at Perth, and the latter are the terms which are employed in the present case by the Relief Presbytery to the termination of Mr Smith's connexion with that body, the abrogation of his license to him to preach, and the extinction of that ecclesiastical relation between him and his congregation which was altogether dependent upon this function which the Synod had first conferred, and then taken away, and whose right to exercise himself had expressly recognised and acknowledged, both at accepting his ordination and receiving his ordination.

I pray your Lordships also to observe, that in this case the determination of the Synod was unanimously pronounced, and there is no room for maintenance of argument, as was done in the cases of Bulloch and Craigdallie, to which more immediately refer in the sequel, that here had been a schism in the judicatory of the dissenting body, one party adhering to, and the other against the original tenets, for maintaining which the trust then in question was constituted; and it was therefore prima facie incumbent upon the Court to maintain, not merely what was the original tenet of the body, but which of the parties continued to adhere to it, and by so doing had, in truth, become the Associate Synod. Here the unanimous decision must, upon every principle, be taken as probatum probata of what is the true doctrine of the sect; and, upon general principle, and in a preliminary question of possession, I should have thought that, if the points I have before referred to had not even been finally and determined, as I take them to have been, the party who, by his own act, has been deprived of that character, under which alone he got possession of the meeting-house, and that is the only question before us at present, is bound to give it up for the use of those in whose favour a right was constituted, of a nature exclusive of any interference on his part, cut off as he is from his connexion with the Relief Church.

While I state this generally, however, I am free to admit, that, upon a consideration of the circumstances in which Craigdallie's case was ultimately determined in a Court, though not upon the terms of the judgment of the House of Lords, admitting the case for consideration, that it might be thought and contended, that, supposing the respondents to have distinctly averred that the whole of the Relief

No 202.

Mar. 10, 1837
Galbraith v. Smith.

mod had concurred in abandoning the original tenets they professed, by becoming Mahomedans, Unitarians, or Episcopalians, it would have been incumbent upon your Lordships, after due inquiry, and being ascertained of the fact, to have pronounced judgment finding that that judicatory was no longer the Relief Presbytery, and that the respondents or others, as the case might be, as adhering to their original tenets, were entitled to enforce the maintenance of a trust in consonance with the principles and objects for which it was originally constituted.

But this is an extreme case, which cannot admit of being supposed, and is not applicable to the presbyteries and synods of the Established Church, as to the presbyteries and synods of the Dissenters; and your Lordships might just as well be asked to consider what would be the effect upon the civil rights of a clergyman imposed by the Church of Scotland, after that church had in their ecclesiastical judicatories become unanimously reconciled to the See of Rome, or become professors of any Heathen superstition. At present we have nothing resembling this before us. Here the supreme ecclesiastical judicatory has been unanimous on the matters of doctrine and discipline, and against their judgment, which, the principles of the sect is final and conclusive, we have nothing but the simple attestation of this single individual and his few adherents. Indeed Mr Smith appears to me pretty much in the situation of a bishop in the early days of the church, mentioned by Gibbon, whose name I think was Paul of Zamosata, Bishop of Antioch, who, having been deposed for schism, appealed to the Emperor Aurelian against the judgment of his ecclesiastical superiors; but Aurelian, having convoked a conclave of some seventy or eighty bishops, whose opinions were unanimous in one way, while Paul stood alone in support of his own opinion, held, that a sentence of deposition, affording evidence which must be held probatio probata the loss of the function (and through which alone he had a right to the temporalities of the see), ordered him to be removed from the possession of the office.

In like manner, in the present case, I repeat, that upon general principles, I must hold that the judgment of the Relief Synod is, if not probatio probata, at all events, prima facie evidence of the principles of the sect;—that from their judgment alone we can gather what were and what are the doctrines and principles of the Relief church;—that by having his connexion with them cut off, after an appeal, too, referred by himself from the decision of the Presbytery to the highest judicatory of the body, by whom the original sentence was confirmed, he must be held to have abandoned their principles, by professing which he originally acquired the right to the function which has now been abrogated and taken away; and, therefore, in maintaining himself in possession of that civil right, which was incident to the function, he is endeavouring to invert the original objects of the trust in a way the most offensive to the feelings of those who, continuing in connexion with the Relief church, are entitled to be recognised as the party for whose benefit the church was originally constituted.

It is, however, now proper, that, having had opportunities of knowing intimately every circumstance connected with the cases referred to in the papers, I should

202. state to your Lordships what appears to me to be material in each of affecting the judgment we are called upon to pronounce, and upon which ties have in some things been but inaccurately informed. But before do feel it to be incumbent upon me to vindicate a respectable and pious body the Synod of Burgher Seceders, from what is unquestionably a very unfounded calumny, to which they have been subjected in the case for the ents. That calumny is the more offensive, that, whether the statement be false, it has, and can have, no connexion whatsoever with the questions at our consideration; and thoroughly aware as I am of the whole circumstances which it is founded, it would be with deep regret if I did not avail myself opportunity which is now offered me of vindicating the character of the im concerned from the aspersions to which I have referred, and which I believe to be as unfounded in fact, as they are totally and entirely dissimilar with the subject of discussion. I am sorry the learned gentleman by whose paper is drawn is not in his place at the bar, because I shall immediately your Lordships, that nothing but utter and entire ignorance of the subject he refers could palliate the statement, which your Lordships will find at 1 and 75th pages of the case for Smith and others. After an extract from report of the case of Craigdallie, it is said—"It is not now disputed that the rents of the Synod in that case practised a gross deception on the Court's principles which they entertained—denying their abandonment of the principles of the sect—or that the change in the preamble to the formula really ad the doctrine which the minority contended was involved in it. At the day it is acknowledged, that the change did import a repudiation of the principle originally maintained by the Secession, of the duty of the state to the cause of religion, and support an establishment for that end, and was in stance a declaration of the voluntary principle now openly defended by them it is unlawful and antichristian for the civil powers to give any support to it. That this was truly an abandonment of the principles of the sect, on a most important point, no one can deny; and if then admitted, it would, as we immediately see, have led to a decision directly the reverse of what was then pronounced. By most dishonest ingenuity, however, in framing the preamble their formula, which two of the members of the synod themselves (Dr Dick and Dr Peddie), who held the voluntary principle involved in it, justly describe 'cover to duplicity,' and by concealment in Court, in denying any real change adherents of the synod persuaded the judges that there was no intelligible distinction between the sentiments of the two parties, and, consequently, that the minority must be viewed as withdrawing themselves from the communion of the without any cause; and on this footing the case was decided."

Now, what may have been said years afterwards by Dr Dick or Dr Peddie neither know nor care. It may be very likely that these gentlemen, at the age of thirty years or better, having changed their own tenets, might have wished to vindicate their new lights by pretending that they were only following out that were entertained by others of their body in the year 1799. And for us know, such might have been the views of some of their brethren, or of some of their brethren, at that remote period; but in order to have authorized them that the proceedings in that year were of the nature they are alleged in the case to have been, it was incumbent upon the respondents, at least, to have shown some principle was recognised, or some declaration made by the associates;

as, to the effect alleged, although clothed in ambiguous and doubtful terms, by No. 202 ch this voluntary principle, as it is termed, was in truth, though not ostensibly, nt to be recognised, sanctioned, and promulgated. Now, I beg leave to tell <sup>Mar. 10, 18</sup>
 r Lordships, that the only questions which then agitated the judicatories of <sup>Galbraith v.</sup> Smith.
 gher Seceders were, first, as to the extent of the power assigned in the Confes-of Faith, as recognised in 1648, to suppress blasphemies and heresies, to pret corruptions and abuses in worship, when taken in connexion with the words he Solemn League and Covenant, by which, for these purposes, it was declared e lawful for the civil magistrate to have recourse to the sword; and, secondly, ether the obligations imposed by the Solemn League and Covenant were the e upon the present generation as upon their fathers who swore them. These g the only two questions in agitation, the synod resolved, 1st, That they dis-roved of all doctrines which are understood "as favouring persecution for con-nce sake, and ascribing an exorbitant power of religious interference to the civil gistrate;" and, with respect to the other question, they declared, that while the od "hold the obligations of our covenant upon posterity, they do not interfere h the controversy with respect to the nature and kind of it, and recommended all their brethren to suppress that controversy as tending to engender strife rather n godly edifying." These were the only matters determined on by the Synod; I while I remember well, that both by the late Sir Ilay Campbell in giving judg-nt, and by the different counsel employed for those in connexion with the mino-y of the Synod, every sort of improper motive was attributed to them, views of ovation of all kinds, and even disloyalty to the sovereign; neither by these rned persons, nor by the Rev. Mr Jarvie, or the Rev. Mr Watson, or by any e else, was it ever alleged, that the views, and proceedings, and resolutions of y Synod did import a "repudiation of the religious principle originally maintainby the Secession, of the duty of the state to advance the cause of religion, and port an establishment for that end." Your Lordship will observe, that I don't what may have been the views of Dr Peddie or Dr Dick, or any other individ, upon these or any other matters, that it is within our competency to imagine believe; but what I do say is, that, as a body, no deception was or could have n practised upon the Court as relative to this matter, because no question was r agitated or maintained, in which any thing with respect to an established and lowed religion could have been promulgated or laid down. Accordingly, I beg ve to read to your Lordships the notes of an opinion given by Lord Hermand l the other judges who were present at the decision of the case of Craigdallie en returned from the House of Lords, and which proves the accuracy of the tement I have now made to your Lordships.

"LORD HERMAND.—Of opinion that no deviation on the part of Aikman. Site e to judge of what he understands, and if party will not explain what it is he ans, presumes he has no cause. I am satisfied that, formerly misled by Fraser's tion (a petition to the Associate Synod on the subject which was by it reject-), which, if adopted, would have been a deviation, seems to him just that, if the railing party becomes Mahometan or Episcopal, though retaining name, subjects ould go to minority. Therefore, enquire what done—goes through it. Do they an to say, that we should carry fire and sword into England, and knock down heocracy to Establish Presbyterian religion?—Satisfied no disaffection to rnement."

202. "LORD BALMUTO.—This is not a question of religion; Section 12 is a civil magistrate nothing to do with religion. Cannot see where any deviation." —

1637. "LORD BALGHEAL.—Anticipated by Lord Hermand. This is a question of fact and have pursuers made out their allegations? Think not. Simply, is any thing in preamble which contains a deviation? No; it is dictated by common sense and principles of Christianity. Look to the feelings of pursuers when under discussion.

"LORD SUCOOTH.—At a loss what conclusion to arrive at. Do not differ from what is said as to the preamble,—but does not see how that is to affect the question."

And now I beg leave to mention the case (the import of which I think Lord Mencrieff has rather misapprehended) in the order in which they occurred.

The first is the case of Bulloch, which came into Court in the month of December, 1799, by a bill of suspension and interdict at the suit of some of the managers of a meeting-house at Kilpatrick, praying for an interdict against Mr Watson and others, whose connexion with the Associate Presbytery had been dissolved, and that they should be interdicted from letting the seats of the meeting-house; and that the suspensors should be maintained in the interim possession. Lord Ashaville granted the interdict; but that interdict was recalled upon a petition in opposition to a very small minority, but the bill was appointed to be answered; and by an interlocutor of the 17th of January, 1800, Lord Glenlee took the case to report upon the bill, answers, and replies. These papers came to be advised on the 27th of May thereafter, when it appears from the notes upon the late Lord Meadowbank's papers, that the vote stood thus:—For passing the bill, Dunsinnan, Craig Methven, Glenlee, Meadowbank, Cullen, and Bennetysse. For refusing under any circumstances, Justice-Clerk, Polkemaet, Armadale, Balmuto, Hermand, Ashaville, and President. But it was discovered that there was a supposed informality in the prayer of the bill, and so it stood refused by a majority. A reclaiming petition was then drawn by myself, then a very few months at the bar; and I found it stated in one of the subsequent papers in the case of Craighallie, that this petition would have been appointed to be answered, but for an inaccuracy, which in a very young counsel perhaps may have been excused, that it omitted, as the forms of Court required, to transcribe the interlocutor reclaimed against. This was the fate, therefore, of the case which first came into Court, the deliberations having been mixed up with a good deal of political discussion, which had really nothing to do with the merits of the question; and upon the ground which I have already shown your Lordships to be untenable, that all such cases were to be determined with a view solely to the extent of the patrimonial rights of the parties, and without having regard to the ecclesiastical principles or uses, for the maintenance and purposes of which the trust had been originally constituted.

An action of declarator was no doubt afterwards raised in that case, but it was not determined till after the decision in the case of Craighallie was carried by appeal to the House of Lords.

That case (viz. Aikman v. Craighallie) came before Lord Armadale, and his Lordship proceeding upon the doctrine that the right to the disposal of the subject held in trust belongs to the majority of contributors to the foundation, appointed a condescendence of the contributors of the parties to be given in, as well as of all the other circumstances connected with the constitution of the trust.

In the mean-time, the question of interim possession was brought before the

Sheriff of Perth, afterwards Lord Advocate Colquhoun, who pronounced a judgment, giving the right of possession to Mr Jarvie the one half of each Sunday, and to Mr Aikman the other half, for these gentlemen were colleagues, the charge being collegiate. The principal cause was first determined on 16th November, 1803, when the Court was thus divided :—Polkemmet, Cullen, Bannatyne, Meadowbank, Woodhouselee, for sustaining the defence of Aikman and others, that the trust was one constituted for behoof of a congregation in communion with the Associate Presbytery ; while the President, Justice-Clerk, Armadale, Balmuto, Hermand, Dunsinnan, Craig, and Glenlee, voted for finding the right of disposal belonged to a majority of the contributors ; but of these, it is stated in Lord Meadowbank's notes, Craig, and particularly Armadale, voted “ on the imperfect terms of the titles as expressive of the trust. I thought the object and practice interpretative of the titles.” A very short petition, signed by Mr Henry Erskine, referring mainly to the argument in the information, was appointed to be answered by a vote, at which Lord Bannatyne was added to the former minority, and Lord Armadale “ signified a change of opinion, and thought it was not an absolute property in the contributors, but for behoof of a congregation of Christians in communion with the Associate Synod.” Answers to this petition, signed by the late Lord Kinnedder, came along with it to be advised by the Court on 1st of February, 1804, when, by the majority by which the petition was appointed to be answered the following interlocutor was pronounced :—“ Alter the interlocutor complained of, and find in terms of the petitioners' libel, that the property in the subjects in question is held in trust for a society of persons who contributed their money, either by specific subscriptions or by contributions at the church doors, for purchasing the ground, and building, repairing, and upholding the house or houses thereon, or for paying off the debts contracted for these purposes, such persons always by themselves, or along with others joining with them, forming a congregation of Christians, continuing in communion with, and subject to the discipline of a body of dissenting Protestants, calling themselves the Associate Presbytery and Synod of Burgher Seceders ; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly.

Against this interlocutor a very full petition was given in by my friend at the table (Mr Thomas Thomson) on the part of Craigdallie, which was no doubt extremely well drawn ; but in which, I recollect, by a singular mistake, my learned friend argued his case upon the supposition that his client, James Craigdallie, was the same person who had been an original contributor and trustee, but who had been for sixty years at rest in his grave, and this petition was answered by a long paper written by myself. When the case came to be advised, the last interlocutor was adhered to, and I believe by the very same state of the vote, because I find it stated in the Lord Chancellor's speech, that, in point of numbers, the Court was equally divided, though, from the Lord President being in the minority, judgment went for the defender.

I have thought it right to state the circumstances so fully to your Lordships, because, although this case was taken up and determined with the very view of clearing and settling a general question, by a most culpable neglect on the part of the reporters, all notice of it has been entirely omitted in the Faculty Decisions. Your Lordships will find the fact I have now mentioned expressly stated in Lord President Blair's judgment in the case of Bulloch, when it was finally determined in the First Division of the Court in the year 1809. No doubt, in that case the decision was contrary to what it had been in the case of Craigdallie, but it was

No. 20

Mar. 10, 1

Galbraith v

Smith.

1837. pronounced before the remit in the case from the House of Lords, which finally extinguished the doctrine, that the rights of the parties were at all dependent upon the amount and extent of their contributions, and established, beyond all future question, that the civil rights of the parties were to be settled simply upon a proof of their adherence to, or departure from, the principles on which the trust was originally constituted. It is unnecessary that I should trouble your Lordships with the precise terms of the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Craigdallie, but it was to this effect, that it was proved as matter of fact, first, That the purposes of the parties in constituting the trust was that of founding a place of religious worship for the uses of a congregation agreeing in religious opinions: Secondly, That this body, consisting of the contributors and congregations, had, both before and after the establishment of the trust, belonged to and formed a branch of the dissenting body of Burgher Seceders, and had acceded to and continued in communion with the Associate Synod. But the House of Lords found further, as matter of fact, that it did not appear to what purposes the subject should be applied, if the whole, or a part only, of the persons using the same should change their religious opinions, principles, and persuasions, and should cease to adhere to the Associate Synod; and, with these findings, the case was remitted for reconsideration to this Court.

The pursuers (the party who were in opposition to the majority of the Synod and who had renounced its authority) presented a petition to apply the judgment in which it was fairly admitted that the House of Lords had upset that ground of their action, which rested upon the proposition that the rights of the parties were to be determined by their numerical majority according to the amount of their contributions, and that the subjects must ultimately be decreed to belong to those who continued in communion with the Associate Synod, upon the principles on which the Secession was originally formed.

Aikman's party, of course, agreed in this explanation of the views of the House of Lords, but it would have been competent for them to have shown, as matter of fact, that it having been a fundamental rule of the sect, that in the supreme judicatory alone was vested the power of determining all questions of doctrine and discipline, so the judgment of the Synod was to be received as probatio probantis of their adherence to their original principles, it being incompetent for the Civil Court to review the decisions in such matters of the ecclesiastical judicature. But they were advised at once to join issue with their opponents upon the fact, that there had been no apostacy on the part of the Synod, and that the tenets which it, and those adhering to it, professed, were the original tenets of the Burgher Secession. Accordingly, a condescendence was ordered to be given in by the pursuers of what they averred as to change of doctrine; and, upon advising the pleadings of the parties, the Court pronounced a judgment, finding that there had been no deviation, on the part of the Synod, from their original standards and principles; and, therefore, sustained the defences of Aikman, and ordained the others to be removed from the possession of the subject.

It is unnecessary that I should trouble your Lordships with the words of the judgment, but I would recommend it to the consideration of the respondents in this case; because the findings of the interlocutor seem to afford ample refutation of the calumnious charges which they have thought fit so unnecessarily to bring against the respectable persons of whom the Associate Synod was at that time composed.

The case went back to the House of Lords, and there the judgment of the Court of Session was finally affirmed by Lord Eldon, who, according to his own statement, had bestowed the utmost pains in considering the questions involved in determination in all their bearings. I shall not trouble your Lordships by referring to the Lord Chancellor's observations, which are to be found in the Reports (1 Dow, p. 16; 2 Bligh, 544, 545). But it is desirable that your Lordships should see the light in which that judgment was considered by the same great lawyer some years afterwards in the case of Foley v. Wontner,<sup>1</sup> which was a case of a similar description with that of Aikman, and where his Lordship thus laid down the law:—"One of the most difficult questions in these cases is, what is to be the course when the doctrines, which it was originally matter of agreement should be inculcated, are not adhered to by all the congregation; some of them having changed their religious opinions. I take it to be now settled, by a decision in the House of Lords,<sup>2</sup> on appeal from Scotland, that the chapel must remain devoted to the doctrine originally agreed on."

And again, in the case of the Attorney-General v. Pearson, 3 Merivale, p. 399, his Lordship says:—"When an institution exists for the purpose of religious worship, and it cannot be discovered from the deed declaring the trust, what form or species of religious worship was intended, the Court can find no other means of deciding the question than through the medium of an enquiry into what has been the usage of the congregation in respect of it; and if the usage turns out, on inquiry, to be such as can be supported, I take it to be the duty of the Court to administer the trust in such manner as best to establish the usage, considering it as matter of implied contract between the members of that congregation."

Afterwards he adds:—"I do not apprehend that it is in the power of individuals, having the management of that institution, at any time to alter the purpose for which it was founded, or to say to the remaining members, We have changed our opinions; and you, who assemble in this place for the purpose of hearing the doctrines, and joining in the worship prescribed by the founder, shall no longer enjoy the benefit he intended for you, unless you conform to the alterations which we have taken place in our opinions." He says also, "that the nature of the original institution of the body must be looked to as a guide for the decision of the Court."

And, last of all, he observes:—"Where a congregation becomes dissentient among themselves, the nature of the original institution must alone be looked to as a guide for the decision of the Court; and that to refer to any other criterion—as the sense of the existing majority—would be to make a new institution, which is altogether beyond the reach, and inconsistent with the duties and character of the Court."

Your Lordships have here distinct evidence, therefore, that in all such cases Lord Eldon held the law to be settled by the case of Craigdallie; and I find that it has since, and that recently (April, 1836), been so recognised and acted upon by the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, where, after the most learned judgments delivered by the bench, the same principles were laid down and enforced in the 1837. Your Lordships will therefore consider, in how very different a situation we are now placed from that in which our predecessors stood, when the Kilpatrick and Perth cases were first brought forward six-and-thirty years ago. At that time questions of this kind were altogether new, and the majority of the Court was of the opinion, that the civil interests of the parties were to be determined, not by a consideration of the religious purposes for which the subjects had been originally destined, but according to the amount of the pecuniary contributions which the parties respectively had embarked in the concern. Accordingly, in the question of interim possession, it was but natural that the Court should proceed with reference to that state of their opinions. But the matter is very different now. The judgments of the House of Lords have placed the matter on quite a different foundation, and their Lordships have taught us the principles on which all such cases are to be adjudicated, and from which, in my humble opinion, we have no right to depart.

<sup>1</sup> 2 Jacob and Walker, 247.

<sup>2</sup> Craigdallie v. Aikman, &c.

1292. case of the Rev. Francis Dill and others, against the Rev. David Watson, or, as has been termed, "The Clough Case."

In truth, therefore, we now stand as the Court stood the day that the judgment in the case of Craigdallie was pronounced in the year 1815, and would ask your Lordships, whether if one or a dozen of cases similar to that then determined had for the first time come into Court upon that day, and the point of possession had come before their Lordships, they would not, and must not, have applied the principle they had then recognised, and removed from the interim possession the different subjects the individuals who had dropped their connexion with the Associate Synod? But the case before us now is in precisely the same situation. The subjects here, it is admitted, were destined for the purposes of a religious community in connexion with the Synod of Relief. The Synod of Relief as a body has adopted no new profession whatsoever. It is not even pretended that it has done so. The respondent, Smith, was inducted as pastor over the congregation, solely in virtue of the license to preach which he had received from the Relief Synod, and the induction and ordination under their authority which subsequently took place. To the authority of that body he was bound to submit in questions ecclesiastical. In fact, as to the matters which have given rise to the question, by pleading before the Presbytery, and then appealing to the Synod, he again solemnly recognised their power to determine the matter at issue between him and his brethren. By that supreme ecclesiastical judicatory he was in effect deprived of his license, and of all ecclesiastical connexion with it, in virtue of which alone his relation of pastor over a Relief congregation was originally created, and must for ever depend. Now, as I find all this to be quite clear, as a matter of fact uncontroverted, and as I understand it in point of law uncontrovertible, I think that the advocates have made out a case prima facie which requires of us to place them in possession of this meeting-house, which it is their object to apply to the purposes of a congregation in communion with the Synod of Relief, and to remove from that possession the respondent, who has lost all title to retain it, just as much as if he had been reconciled to the Church of Rome, or had declared himself an Episcopal.

I am sorry for having detained your Lordships at so great length, and for having been compelled to deliver my opinion in a manner so very loose and desultory; but I was prevented, from the pressure of the rest of the business of the Court.

in opening the record till yesterday, and bestowing upon it that time which No. 202 ould have been required for condensing, and arranging in a more satisfactory Mar. 10, 18 dner, an exposition of the views I entertain upon the subject. At the same time, Galbraith v.
 never imperfectly I may have been able to convey to your Lordships a view of Smith. judgment I have formed, I beg leave to state, that my opinion in the case is y clear and decided.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—If we were to decide all the points argued in the pers, this would be a very important case indeed; but we are not warranted to licate any opinion on the merits involved in the declarator. The question to be cided here is, whether, under all the circumstances in which this person has en dealt with, his application against being summarily ousted was competent, and urther the interdict granted was well-founded? I am perfectly aware that there a great deal of argument in the papers as to what is the subject of the declarator ow in dependence. But the only question here is, are we to maintain Mr Smith in ossession of his pulpit, or are we to recal the interdict, and invert certainly the ossession? I have heard with much satisfaction the speech of Lord Meadow-ank, which may be of great service when we come to the merits. I confine myelf, however, to the question of possession. On looking to the cases of Craigallie and Bulloch, I see that, in similar circumstances, the possession of the minister was maintained; and, therefore, I think we have great authority for the iew I take, that Mr Smith's possession ought not to be disturbed pending the iscussion of the declarator. The final decision in the case of Craigdallie settled he law, and did not affirm our first decision. In both cases, however, the posses-ion was maintained, and there are strong authorities for adhering to the interloator of the Sheriff.

LORD GLENLEE.—I found great difficulty in determining what would be the sue of the declarator, and, therefore, I am rather for letting this lie over till it decided.

LORD MEDWYN.—I have a great difficulty in coming to any conclusion on a eat deal of what has been argued. The Presbytery declare Mr Smith out of onnexion. The managers and elders resolve not to admit him. But an inter-ct is obtained, and observe what it is—an interdict against giving access to any e but Mr Smith, and it prohibits Mr Harvey from preaching in the church.
 ow, when I consider that this is the case of a church in connexion with the elief Synod, and that the great body of the congregation adhere to the Synod, it a strong case to keep Mr Smith in possession. It is difficult to say that the pos-sion is in the minister, and not also in the proprietors. If the parties here ere in the same situation as in the case of Craigdallie, I would follow the same le; but they are not in the same situation. That decision is partly in favour and partly against Smith. The point taken in the first cases was, Who have e majority? and in the cases of Bulloch and Aikman, each claimed a majority interest also. Now, by the final decision in the case of Craigdallie v. Aikman, e majority is not to rule, and so far it is in favour of Mr Smith; and, although the hole Synod had concurred in deserting their original principles, yet, according to e decision of the House of Lords in the Craigdallie case, we are bound to inquire to that, and maintain the use of the church in accordance with these principles. So if this decision is favourable to Mr Smith. But, again, in that, and all the other es, there was a schism in the body. Now, here there is no division in the dy, but an unanimous judgment of the Presbytery and Synod. That makes a

202. great difference as to the question of interim possession, and I would wish to adopt some middle course. In the case of Dr M'Crie, an arrangement was made for a joint possession by the contending parties, and I think something of the same sort might be adopted here.

Dean of Faculty Hope, for Smith, &c.—We have no objection to such an arrangement, and made an offer to that effect when the cause was before the Sheriff, but it was rejected.

The other Judges concurring in this suggestion, the Court (March 1837. delayed for a few days, that the parties might adjust the terms of an interlocutor for giving effect to it, and this day the following judgment was pronounced :—

“ The Lords, upon the report of Lord Moncreiff, having advised the cases for the parties, and heard counsel, advocate the cause, and recall the interlocutor pronounced by the Sheriff; and find that, till otherwise ordered by the Court, the advocates and respondents shall enjoy an equal possession of the meeting-house and pulpit in question, commencing on Sabbath, the 19th day of March, the advocates having the use on that day of the said meeting-house for the forenoon and evening diets, and the respondents for the afternoon of that day; and on the succeeding Sabbath, the 26th March, the respondents having in like manner the use of the meeting-house for the forenoon and evening diets, and the advocates for the afternoon diet, and so on alternately on each succeeding Sabbath throughout the year; but under this qualification, that, on the occasions of the ordinary administration of the sacrament, the advocates shall have the exclusive use of the meeting-house on the Communion Sabbath, and relative days of service on the summer sacrament; and that the respondents shall have the like exclusive use of the meeting-house on the occasion of the winter sacrament; and declaring that, in the meantime, no steps shall be taken to preach or declare the said meeting-house vacant; it being understood that this shall not interfere with any right on the part of the advocates to have a stated pastor appointed to them, provided he shall not be appointed a minister of the said meeting-house; and, to the effect aforesaid, grant the interdict applied for, and, quoad ultra, refuse the same in hoc statu, and decern: Quoad ultra, remit this process to the action of declarator raised at the instance of the respondents, and now depending before Lord Moncreiff, with power to his Lordship to determine all questions of expenses, hinc inde, at the issue of the cause: And, further, allow the decree now pronounced in regard to the question of interdict, and as regulating the interim possession, to be extracted ad interim.”

WILLIAM ROBERT JACK, Pursuer.—*D. F. Hope—Russell.
WILLIAM UMPHERSTON and JOHN KERR, Defenders.—*Sol.- Gen. Rutherford—Ivory.

No. 203.

Mar. 11, 1837
 Jack v.
 Umpherston.

Reduction—Process—Justice of Peace.—A master presented a petition to the Justices of the Peace, complaining of his servant's desertion, and craving warrant to apprehend him for examination, and, on proof of the desertion, craving warrant to imprison him until he found caution to return to his service; the servant was apprehended, and, after some procedure, warrant of imprisonment was granted, as prayed for; the master, by minute lodged in process, abandoned the warrant as a warrant of imprisonment; the servant raised a reduction of the whole proceedings: that, as the decree could be put to execution without being extracted, reduction was a competent form of review though no extract had been taken.

WILLIAM UMPHERSTON and JOHN KERR, millwrights in Dundee, Mar. 11, 1837 presented a petition to the Justices of the Peace of Forfarshire, stating 1st Division.
 William Robert Jack had deserted from their service, without giving Ld. Cockburn.
 14 days' notice as he was bound to do, and craving warrant to apprehend and bring him up for examination, and, on proof of his desertion, praying warrant for committing him to some legal place of custody until he found caution to return to their service for 14 days at least, reserving their claims for damages and expenses. The justices granted warrant to apprehend Jack and bring him up for examination; this warrant was indorsed by Lanarkshire Justice of the Peace, and Jack was apprehended at Glasgow and conveyed in custody to Dundee, where, after a proof on the merits, and an interval of some days, during part of which Jack was allowed to be at liberty on finding caution for £5, de judicio sisti, the Justices pronounced this judgment: "Find it proved that the work people at the petitioners' work are paid their wages every fortnight, viz., on Saturday evening for the two weeks preceding: Find that sufficient evidence has been adduced, that it has been the invariable practice at the petitioners' work, for the workmen to give a fortnight's intimation before leaving the service, and for the masters to give the same intimation to the servants before dismissing them from the service: Find it farther proved, that the respondent received payment of his wages on Saturday the 1st instant, for the two weeks preceding, and failed to return to his service on the Monday following: Find that the respondent deserted his service without having given the petitioners the requisite previous notice of 14 days: Find, therefore, that the respondent has illegally deserted his service; and therefore grant warrant for committing him prisoner to the gaol of Dundee, therein to be detained until he shall find sufficient caution and surety acted in the Justice of Peace court-books of Forfarshire, under the penalty of £5 sterling, that he shall return to the petitioners' service, and continue therein for the space of 14 days after so coming to the petitioners' service, reserving to the petitioners their

1837. claim against the said respondent for the expense of these proceedings, and for the damages they have sustained in consequence of his desertion, and decern." After this judgment was pronounced, Umpherston and Kerr lodged a minute in process to the effect that they did not intend to put the warrant in force, and abandoned it as a warrant of imprisonment.

Jack raised a reduction of these whole proceedings. The action also concluded for declarator that the apprehending him, detaining him in custody, carrying him in custody from Glasgow to Dundee, requiring him there to find bail, and the other proceedings there adopted against him were "illegal, malicious, oppressive, unwarrantable, and unjust," and that the defenders were liable in damages. These conclusions were also expressed as to depend upon the conclusions of reduction being sustained, but were stated independently of the reductive conclusions.

Umpherston and Kerr pleaded, in defence, that the proceedings having ended in a final judgment, which was not extracted, reduction was an incompetent remedy; that this was so decided in the case of Coutts, and that the form of a reduction had been resorted to by Jack, in order to avoid the legitimate mode of review by advocacy, in which case Jack would have been required to find caution in common form; and that the defenders had a substantial interest in compelling Jack to resort to that mode of review, in place of attempting the present form which was irregular. His action ought therefore to be dismissed.

Jack answered (1.) that in the case of Coutts the proceedings were in the Sheriff Court, where decrees were extractable; but that, in this instance, the proceedings were before the Justices of the Peace, and the warrants of which he complained were always put in force without extract, the original warrant being delivered to the party who was to execute it. And as the defenders had abandoned all intention of enforcing imprisonment under the warrant, it was not likely they should ever attempt to obtain an extract of it. In these circumstances it was competent for him to pursue a reduction of the decree though unextracted. But (2.) the action contained other conclusions, especially for damages, which did not depend on the reductive conclusions, and in which he was entitled to insist, whatever might be decided as to the reductive conclusions.

The Lord Ordinary "sustained the first defence, which is of a dilatory nature, viz., that the decree or decrees of the inferior court not being extracted, the reduction is incompetent, dismissed the action and decerned: and found the pursuer liable in expenses."*

* Dec. 5, 1835. (ante, XIV. 110).

* "NOTE.—The Second Division of the Court decided in the case of Coutts 5th December, 1835, that reduction was not a competent mode of obtaining redress against the decree of an inferior court not extracted. But in that case the decree was not a final one, whereas here it is; and it is contended by the pursuer that this difference makes that case inapplicable, while it is maintained by the defenders that

The pursuer reclaimed.

No. 203.

LORD GILLIES.—When there is a decree pronounced, of the ordinary sort, so as to be capable of extract, then I understand it to be fixed that there can be no reduction brought, before extract; there must be advocacy. But I do not think it follows, from this, that when a decree is pronounced which is not extractable, the rule must apply. This Court should not lightly cut off the old established mode of reviewing decrees by a process of reduction; and although this form is not now to be applied to an unextracted decree, which is extractable, and requires to be extracted before being put to execution, I think it ought to apply to an unextracted decree which is not extractable, or which may be put to execution without being extracted. For, I consider that such decree, before extract, stands upon the same footing, in so far as a process of reduction is concerned, as any other decree, which is extractable, stands upon, after it has been extracted.

Mar. 11, 1837.
Jack v.
Umpherston.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I also concur. And I think the pursuer's right to bring a reduction might be supported on the separate ground that the defenders have substantially abandoned the decree. The case is therefore ended and over, to all intents, and I do not see of what use a process of advocacy would be, or a process of suspension either, or any other process but a reduction. The case of Coutts stood in different circumstances from this.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I am of the same opinion. The case of Coutts was not the same with this case, but essentially different. The decree in that case could not have been put to execution until extracted. The decree in this case could be put to execution without being extracted. I think the case of Coutts was well decided; but it is quite consistent with the rule established by it, to hold that the process of reduction is competent here.

THE COURT altered the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and found the process of reduction competent; and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed as should be just.

GREIG and MORTON, W.S.—FLEMING and JOHNSTON, W.S.—Agents.

principle and the object of the decision was to fix, that extract was necessary in all cases. The Lord Ordinary has proceeded on this last view, which seems to me to be warranted by what passed on the bench when the case of Coutts was decided. The effect, and generally the object, of proceeding by reduction where there has been no extract, is to evade finding caution in an advocacy or suspension; and if this be incorrect, the practice ought to be checked, because it appears to be on the increase. There are several cases in the same situation at this moment, and the Lord Ordinary hopes that the preceding interlocutor will be submitted to review, in order that the point may be fixed."

No. 204.

MRS ELIZABETH BIRNIE OF CRAIGIE, Pursuer.—A. McNeill.
 LAURENCE CRAIGIE, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—A. Murray.

Mar. 11, 1837.

Craigie v.
ralgie.

entts v. His
reditors.

Husband and Wife—Aliment.—A woman, having obtained decree of divorce against her husband, insisted in a conclusion for suitable aliment: she had a bond of annuity from him, for £40, but she alleged this to be inadequate, as he possessed considerable funds; he averred that he was in a state of utter destitution; she declined to go into a proof on the subject:—Held, in respect of her so declining a proof, that there were no grounds established, hoc statu, for awarding aliment.

Mar. 11, 1837.

or Division.

MRS ELIZABETH BIRNIE OF CRAIGIE, raised an action concluding her husband should be divorced for adultery, and should be ordered to pay to her a suitable aliment. She obtained decree of divorce, and in regard to the aliment, the Lord Ordinary "having heard counsel for parties, decerned against the defender for twenty pounds sterling of aliment, with the expense of extract, if necessary, and granted warrant for extract ad interim, and appointed the defender, by the first box-day, to give in a condescendence of his means and effects."

The defender reclaimed against this interlocutor, and also appended the reclaiming note a condescendence, stating that he was utterly destitute of funds, and that a bond of annuity for £40, which he had some time ago granted to the pursuer, was annually paid, not by any funds of his own, but solely by the aid of his friends. He pleaded, therefore, no award of aliment should be made against him. The pursuer presented answers to the condescendence in which she alleged that the defender was possessed of considerable funds. On advising these counter-arguments, the Court intimated to the pursuer that unless she undertook to prove her averments as to the defender's funds, they could not make an award of aliment, in the face of the most pointed allegation by him that he was in a state of complete destitution. The pursuer declined to go into a proof, and the Court, in respect of her so declining, recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and found that there were no grounds established, hoc statu, for awarding aliment against the defender.

FISHER and DUNCAN, S.S.C.—BELLS and RUTHERFORD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 205.

ROBERT YEATTS, Pursuer.—Sandford.
 HIS CREDITORS, Defenders.—Robertson—Mure.

Mar. 11, 1837

1st Division.

Cessio.—A pursuer who had suffered imprisonment for 20 months, and found entitled to the benefit of the cessio; and it being impossible for him to report the oath, before the end of the session, the Court granted a writ for his liberation, without caution.

ROY and WOOD, W.S.—A. NAIRN, S.S.C.—Agents.

JAMES BROWN, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—G. Dundas.
 MR EVAN J. M. MACGREGOR and OTHERS, Defenders.—D. F. Hope—
Neaves.

No. 206.

Mar. 11, 1837

Brown v.
Macgregor.

Entail—Adjudication—Faculty.—1. An entailer disposed his lands to himself in liferent, and to his son in fee, whom failing, to a series of substitute heirs of entail, including not only descendants of his body, but also collateral relations; the structure of the deed showed that the entailer considered the institute to be included under the term “heirs of entail;” the irritant and resolute clauses provided that if “the heirs descending of my body, or any of the other heirs of tailzie fore-mentioned shall contravene, &c., the person or persons so contravening shall forfeit, &c. :”—Held, by a majority of the Whole Court, that these words did not apply to the institute, although he was, in one sense, an “heir descending of the body” of the entailer, because, both in respect of the strict construction applicable to entails, and also in respect of the sense in which these words were actually used in the deed, they applied to no heirs but heirs of entail,—and such words could not be extended to include the institute, however clearly it might appear that the entailer had supposed them to be sufficient to include him.—2. Question, (1.) on the assumption that the prohibition against altering the order of succession was not imposed on the institute, but that prohibitions, duly fenced, against sales or leases, were imposed on him, is it competent for a creditor to adjudge the fee of an entailed estate in payment of his debt? or (2.) failing this, is it competent to adjudge the debtor’s faculty of altering the order of succession, and thereby set aside the entail?

In 1814 the late Sir John Murray Macgregor, Bart., of Macgregor, Mar. 11, 1837 executed a deed of entail of the lands of Lanrick and others, by which “disposed these lands “to himself in liferent, and to his son, Evan 1st Division.
 Macgregor Murray, in fee;” whom failing, to John Atholl Bannan Ld. Corehouse Macgregor Murray, his grandson, and a certain series of substitute heirs, including not only descendants of the entailer’s body, but also collateral relations.

Immediately after the destination, there were inserted several conditions as to bearing the name and arms, &c., each of which was imposed on “the whole heirs of tailzie under the above destination, and the heirs whomsoever succeeding in virtue of the tailzie.” The prohibitory clauses in the entail, 1st, excluded rights of terce or courtesy on the death of any “heir of tailzie” in possession; and provided, 2d, “That it shall not be in the power of any of the heirs of entail hereby substituted to me, to alter, innovate, or change this present deed of tailzie, or other deed or deed to be made by me, or order of succession hereby prescribed, which may therein be appointed, or to do any act or deed that may alter or infer any alteration, innovation, or change thereof, directly, or indirectly. But with this exception always, that, in case any presumptive heir or heirs, who might succeed to the said lands and estates, should be forfeited or attainted of treason,” &c.—then the heir in possession should renew the entail, excluding the attainted party. “3d, That it shall be in the power of the said Evan John Macgregor Murray, or John

Q. 206. Atholl Bannatyne Macgregor Murray, or any of the other heirs substituted to me in manner foresaid, who shall succeed to my lands and estates, to sell, alienate, wadset, impignorate, or dispose of the lands and estates, or any part thereof, either irredeemably or in reversion, onerously or gratuitously, or to gift or dispose of the said grant securities affecting the same, or to burden the said lands and estates, in whole or in part, with debts or sums of money, interest, annualrents, or any other burden or servitude whatever, nor to contract debts, nor grant deeds, nor to incur the guilt of treason or misprision of treason, nor in short to do any act or deed, directly or indirectly, whether of a public or private nature, whereby the said lands or estates shall be burdened, affected, forfeited, escheated, or evicted from their present manner of way whatever, or this present tailzie or course of succession hereby prescribed, in any shape prejudiced, altered, or infringed. That it shall not be in the power of any of the said heirs of tailzie to accept always my son, the said Evan John Macgregor Murray, whose taste and judgment I have the utmost confidence, to be the heir down trees," &c.

The irritant and resolute clauses were in these terms:—"In case the heirs descending of my body, or any of the other heirs before mentioned, shall contravene any one of the particulars specified, &c., that then, and in any one of these cases, not only the said acts, &c., shall be null, &c., against the other heirs of tailzie; but the person or persons so contravening, &c., shall ipso facto stand seised and forfeit all right, &c., to said lands, &c."

The enabling clauses gave power to "each of the said whole entail above mentioned" to make certain provisions on spouses and younger children. Power was also given to "the several heirs who shall succeed," &c., to make excambions of land on certain conditions, and it was also "specially provided and declared, that the said John Macgregor Murray, or John Atholl Bannatyne Macgregor, and the other heirs of tailzie and provision, shall have power, and are hereby authorized, to excamb the lands of Gart, either in whole or in part, upon receiving an equivalent therefor in lands more or less to my said estates, and the difference in value (if any) in money at the event of such excambion not taking place, my said heirs shall be entitled, and are hereby authorized, to sell the said lands of Gart," &c.

The deed reserved power to the entailer "not only to alter the course of succession, as to all the heirs of tailzie before specified, but also to sell or burden, &c." The deed also contained a provision that if the entailer died without making up titles to all the lands in the entail it should be obligatory on "my heirs-at-law, and other heirs," to make up titles, and denude themselves "in favour of the said heirs of tailzie." The obligation to record the entail was imposed on "the said Evan Macgregor Murray, my son, and, failing him, the said John Atholl Bannatyne Macgregor Murray, and all the other heirs of tailzie." The precept of seisin directed infeftment to be given to the granter in liferent, and "to the said Evan John Macgregor Murray, my son, whom failing, the said John Atholl Bannatyne Macgregor Murray in fee, and the other heirs of tailzie above mentioned."

No. 206
Mar. 11, 1835
Brown v.
Macgregor.

Sir John Macgregor died without altering the entail, and his son, Sir Evan, who also succeeded as heir-at-law to some unentailed heritage, expedite a charter under the precutory of entail, and was infeft in 1824. The entail was duly recorded.

Sir Evan afterwards became one of three co-acceptors of a bill for £1000, which was protested for non-payment, and assigned to James Brown, accountant in Edinburgh, who, being advised that the entail was ineffectual, raised a summons of adjudication of the lands contained in the deed of entail; against which action, defences were lodged by Sir Evan, the institute, and by his son John, the first substitute, who pleaded, that the entail was valid and effectual, and that nothing but the life-interest of Sir Evan could be adjudged.

Cases were ordered by the Lord Ordinary.

Pleaded by the Pursuer—

1. The clause of prohibition against altering the order of succession was directed against "the heirs of entail hereby substituted" to the entailer. This did not reach Sir Evan, who was the institute, and was not an heir of entail.<sup>1</sup>

2. There was no other part of the deed which effectually applied this prohibition to Sir Evan. It was true that the next clause, which was directed nominatim against him, prohibited selling, burdening, contracting debt, committing treason, &c., and summed up the detail of these prohibitions with the following brief and general words:—"Nor, in sort, to do any act or deed, directly or indirectly, of a public or private nature whereby the said lands may be burdened, affected, forfeited, &c., in any manner of way whatever, or this present tailzie or course of succession thereby prescribed, in any shape prejudiced, altered, or infringed." But, even in an ordinary deed, the general summary at the end would be construed with reference to the particulars which preceded it, and could not be extended to a different species of prohibitions, especially where such species was already appropriately provided for, in a separate clause which was wholly framed in reference to it. Much more must such a rule of construction be applied, against extending the fetters of an entail.<sup>2</sup> And

<sup>1</sup> Edmonstone, Nov. 24, 1769 (4409), reversed April 16, 1770; Leslie, 1752; John v. Tailzie, No. 49; Erskine, Feb. 14, 1755 (4406); L. Elibank, July 2, 1833 (ante, XI. 858), affirmed Mar. 19, 1835 (1 S. and M.L. Appeal Cases, 1); Moreland, July 2, 1833 (ante, XI. 863), reversed March 31, 1835 (1 S. and M.L. 29).
<sup>2</sup> Dick, Jan. 14, 1812, F.C. Bruce, Jan. 15, 1799 (15539); Barclay, May 1831 (1 Shaw, App. Ca. No. 8).

206. this deed was essentially distinguished from those of the Roxburgh Lochbry entails by the existence of the separate prohibitory clauses, respecting the order of succession, as well as by the enumeration of particulars, which immediately preceded the general summary.

3. If there was no prohibition against Sir Evan's altering the succession, there was no effectual entail, in any question between him and his creditors. He had the power to make up a new investiture, under which he must enjoy all the rights of a fee-simple proprietor; and this alone warranted an adjudication of the estate, as it was incongruous to hold that a party could possess an absolute control over his estate, and that his creditors should not have power to adjudge it from him. He was barred from opposing such an adjudication, and, a fortiori, as his substitute was barred from doing so; especially as the entail was absolutely defeasible at the will of Sir Evan, and the heirs had merely a right of succession. Besides, it had been held,<sup>1</sup> that a defect in any one of the three main prohibitions of an entail, amounted to a nullifying of the whole entail, even in questions inter heredes; and at least, such defect in reference to the order of succession, which was of the essence of an entail, must have that effect, in a question with creditors. But, separately, the pursuer had recently raised an action to adjudge Sir Evan's faculty of altering the order of succession, by which means the pursuer might defeat the entail, precisely by that species of deed, which was prohibited, in case the Court should consider any other mode of defeating it, to be inept.

4. But even if the entail were otherwise good, its irritant and resolutive clauses were so framed as not to include Sir Evan. They were only directed against "the heirs descending of my body, or any of the other heirs of tailie before mentioned." This reached only to heirs of entail, and not to the institute.<sup>2</sup> The heirs of entail consisted, partly of heirs of the body, and partly of collaterals, so that every word of the clause received full meaning without being extended to the institute. And, though the institute happened to be an heir of the body, it was plain that the only kind of heirs, against whom the irritant clauses were directed, or who were at all contemplated in the deed of entail, were the heirs of entail alone.<sup>3</sup>

Pleaded by the Defenders—

1. The prohibition against altering the order of succession was repeated in two separate clauses of the deed, the last of which, being directed against Sir Evan nominatim, was chiefly relied on by the defenders, and it did not refer to the previous one, but possessed a complete and independent sense by itself.

Sharpe, April 18, 1835 (1 S. and M.L. 504).

<sup>2</sup> See references under the first plea.

<sup>3</sup> 3 Ersk. 8, 47; Steel, June 27, 1817; 5 Dow, 72.

the last clause, there were embodied all the great prohibitions No. 206.
tail, against selling, or burdening, or altering the order of succession.

These were briefly but comprehensively expressed by the Max. 11, 181 prohibition against doing "any act or deed, directly or indirect- Brown v. Macgregor er of a public or private nature, whereby the said lands or may be burdened, affected, forfeited, escheated, or evicted from any manner of way whatever, or this present tailzie or course of is hereby prescribed, in any shape prejudiced, altered or in-

This amounted to an express prohibition against altering the succession. It was even more specific than the phraseology of the 1685, c. 22, required, or than had been expressly sustained in James of Roxburghe<sup>1</sup> and Lochbuy.<sup>2</sup> And as there was no given words, or order of arrangement, which was essential to an entail, though if a sufficient prohibition against Sir Evan's altering the entail was found within the deed.

Even if a defect occurred in this member of the entail, the prohibition against selling and burdening were directed against Sir Evan himself, and were duly fenced. The present action, being an adjudication of the debt of Sir Evan, must therefore be unavailing: and both Sir Evan's son, or any heir-substitute, had a title and interest to defeat the action. Even if there was one mode of defeating the entail, by the succession, the heirs-substitute had an interest to plead that the entail was duly fortified against every other species of attack.<sup>3</sup> And as to the new action to adjudge the faculty of altering the order of succession, such power of alteration inhered in the testator, and was strictly limited to Sir Evan, and could no more be adjudged than his power of altering his last will. But the merits of that action were not hujus modi. The irritant and resolute clauses were so expressed as to include Sir Evan. He was the only son of the entailer, and had taken up his residence, and some heritage, as heir-at-law. He had been mentioned in the deed, besides the heirs of tailzie, in various previous parts of the deed, especially in the prohibitions; and the irritant and resolute clauses referred to "the heirs descending of my body, or any of the other heirs of tailzie before mentioned." These words, by their true import, included Sir Evan, who was an heir descending of the body before mentioned, and undoubtedly the sense in which the entailer used these words was intended to include him. But there were various decisions<sup>4</sup> importing that an interest might be included under any designation such as "person," &c.

<sup>1</sup> 23, 1807 (M. Tailzie, Appx. No. 13).

<sup>2</sup> 23, 1807 (M. Tailzie, Appx. No. 14).

<sup>3</sup> James v. James, March 8, 1821 (F.C.); Cathcart, July 18, 1831 (5 W. & S. App. 1).

<sup>4</sup> James v. James, Feb. 27, 1799 (15473); Douglas, Nov. 14, 1823 (ante, II. 487, or 51).

1837. which unequivocally applied to him, and there was one recent case<sup>1</sup> which was almost a direct precedent for including the institute, under the very words of this deed.

The Lord Ordinary "repelled the defences; decreed in terms of the libel; and found the pursuer entitled to expenses." *

<sup>1</sup> Baughn, Jan. 14, 1834 (ante, XII. 231).

* "NOTE.—It appears to the Lord Ordinary perfectly clear, that there is no prohibition in this entail against altering the order of succession, effectually imposed on Sir Evan John Murray Macgregor, the institute. There is a very careful and anxious clause against alteration and innovation, and all acts and deeds directly or indirectly importing them, but that clause is expressly limited to the heirs of entail substituted to the maker, and, therefore, as is admitted, it cannot bind the institute.

"A second prohibition is directed against alienating, burdening, contracting debt, and committing treason, or misprision of treason, and, of the acts and deeds of that nature, a special and detailed enumeration is given. Then follows a general clause, professing to be a summary or abridgement of that special enumeration, 'not, in short, to do any act or deed by which the lands may be burdened, affected, &c. or this present tailzie or course of succession prejudiced, altered, or infringed.' Now, there is no rule of law better established than that laid down by Mr Erskine, namely, that in all deeds and instruments whatever, a general clause, following a particular enumeration, is not to be extended further than the particulars enumerated. Therefore, it is certain, that the general clause at the end of the second prohibition must be restricted to deeds of alienation, debts, and crimes, and cannot include the acts which form the subject of the first prohibition. The second prohibition, therefore, though directed against the institute, as well as the heirs, cannot supply the defect which exists in the first. It is this rule of law that distinguishes the present case from that of Roxburgh and others, in which clauses expressed in general terms, but not preceded by special enumerations, were found to have a more extensive operation, and to render effectual the entails in which they occurred.

"The irritant and resolute clause appears to be exposed to the same fatal objection of not being expressly directed against the institute. It provides, that in case 'the heirs descending of my body, or any of the other heirs of tailzie before mentioned, shall contravene the prohibitions, the acts of contravention shall be null, and the contravener shall forfeit his right.' The defenders maintain, that as the institute, though not an heir of tailzie, is an heir descending of the entailer's body, the clause is sufficiently broad to comprehend him; but, in that argument, the principle is overlooked, that while the construction to support the fetters of an entail must be of the strictest nature, the construction to break the fetters is directly the reverse. In the former, no aid can be obtained from inference or presumed intention, in the latter, these are the sources from which the meaning of the words used, may and ought to be collected.

"By the clause of destination, the estate is conveyed to heirs of two descriptions, one being, heirs descending of the entailer's body, and the other, heirs not descending of his body, but both, by virtue of the conveyance, heirs of entail. It is plain, that the irritant and resolute clause is directed against both descriptions of heirs, and against them exclusively, it has no application to persons not being heirs of the entail, though heirs of the entailer's body. It is very true, that the entailer intended to fetter the institute, as well as the heirs of entail, but he attempted to do so under the erroneous belief that the institute was an heir of entail, as is evidently demonstrated by a long series of provisions in the deed, and more especially, by the clause relative to the cutting of timber. It is thought, therefore, to be contrary to the established rule of interpretation to hold the words 'heirs descending of the body' in this clause, as importing heirs of line, heirs of

On considering the cause their Lordships expressed an opinion that it No. 206.
 could be proper to advise with the Judges of the Second Division before Mar. 11, 1861 deciding it, especially in reference to the effect of the case of Baugh's Brown v. Macgregor.
 After having so advised, the Court made a general remit of the cause to the Lord Ordinary with a view to have farther argument on the effect of any defect in the prohibition against altering the order of succession. His Lordship ordered supplementary cases, and reported them to the Court, after which the following interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords order the cases to be laid before the whole Judges, with a view to determine the following questions:—Whether the interlocutor of Lord Core-house, Ordinary, ought to be adhered to on both or either of the grounds, that in the entail founded on by the defender, there is no prohibition against altering the order of succession, and that the irritant and resolutive clause of that entail is not applicable to the institute; or on any other grounds? or, Whether the said interlocutor ought to be altered, and, if altered, what judgment ought to be pronounced in place thereof?"

The following Opinions were returned.

LORDS JUSTICE-CLERK, MEADOWBANK, FULLERTON, MONCREIFF, JEFFREY, DOCKBURN, and CUNNINGHAME.

"This is an action by the pursuer for adjudging the lands mentioned in the summons, for a debt due to him by Sir Evan Macgregor, the proprietor in the fee of those lands. The defence stated for Sir Evan Macgregor, and for his eldest son as the next heir of entail, is, that the estate is possessed by Sir Evan solely by virtue of a strict entail, whereby he is effectually restrained from contracting conquest, heirs in mobilibus, or any description of heirs, except heirs of entail, of whom alone there was any question in this deed; and, if that be so, the present case becomes identical with that of Duntreath, and a numerous series of precedents to the same effect. On this point the case of Dougaldston, on the one hand, and that of Baldastard, on the other, afford an apt illustration. A 'person' contravening in the one case, and a 'member of tailzie' contravening in the other, are both terms in themselves sufficiently comprehensive to include the institute, as well as the heirs. But in the case of Dougaldston, there was nothing in the context to limit the term 'person,' so as to exclude the institute, whereas, in the case of Baldastard, it appeared by reasonable inference, from a comparison of various clauses, and from the whole structure of the deed, that the term 'members of tailzie' was employed to denote heirs being members of tailzie. But the inference in this case is much clearer than in that of Baldastard; for, it is undeniable, 1st, that Sir John Murray Macgregor, in the clause in question, had no heirs in contemplation but heirs of entail; and, 2dly, that he conceived his son, Evan John, to be an heir of entail. The Lord Ordinary is aware, that an opinion in the case of Bauch v.

---

 Murray, to which the highest respect is due, is opposed to what is now stated; but he cannot acquiesce in that view. The case of Baldastard shows that it is not enough that the entailer should have intended to fetter the institute, and that he made use of a term which, in one view, is large enough to include him, if it is clear from inference that he used that term in a different sense, and one totally inapplicable to the institute. The case of Bauch cannot be regarded as a precedent here, as the decision of the Inner-House rests on a separate and unexceptionable ground."

debts for which the estate may be adjudged, under the pain of irritancy or forfeiture, and all such debts are declared to be null and void, and adjudication for payment of them is declared to be incompetent.

"The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, in general terms, repels the defence and decerns in terms of the libel. And the material question now before the Court, and upon which our opinion is required, is, whether that interlocutor ought to be adhered to, or altered.

"From the pleadings of the parties, and the note of the Lord Ordinary, it appears that three points of law may be involved in this question. The pursuer maintains, that the entail founded on is essentially defective in two respects, in as far as it can be stated to have relation to the acts and deeds of Sir Evan Macgregor, the proprietor in the fee: 1. Because it contains no clause prohibiting him, as institute, from altering the order of succession; and, 2. Because the irritant and resolute clauses are not so conceived, as to apply to him as the institute or disponent, but apply only to heirs of entail.

"If the first of these points were established, it would constitute a very serious defect in the entail. But, in order to render the objection effectual to sustain the present action of adjudication, it requires that the Court should determine the question, of more general and abstract law, viz. whether an entail, which does not contain an effectual prohibition against altering the order of succession, can be of any effect at all, even in those points in which it might be found to be in other respects technically correct and sufficient. The second objection taken to the sufficiency of the entail, if well founded, is at once decisive against the grounds of defence to the present action. For this is a question with onerous creditors, proceeding to adjudge the estate, for payment of their debts contracted by the proprietor in the fee. And the law has been long and well settled, that, unless the prohibitions of the entail, whether against selling or against contracting debts, are duly fortified, both by an irritant clause declaring the deeds done in contravention of them to be null and void, and by a resolute clause declaring that the party contravening shall forfeit all right to the estate, unless these clauses are so expressed, as to comprehend the acts of the individual whose acts or deeds are objected to as contraventions, they can be of no effect at all against the rights or the diligence of onerous creditors or purchasers.

"We therefore think it proper, in answer to the question, Whether the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to or altered, to direct our attention, in the first place, to this last point, viz. Whether the irritant and resolute clauses are effectual against the acts and deeds of Sir Evan Macgregor in the present case? And we are of opinion, that they are not sufficient.

"By the conception of the deed of entail, it is quite clear that the estate is given to Sir Evan Macgregor directly as disponent, or heir, and not as an heir or an heir of tailzie. The entailor disposes 'to myself in liferent, during all the days of my life, and to Evan John Macgregor Murray, &c., whom failing, &c. &c. in fee. And, after the cases of Wellwood, February 23, 1791; the Marchioness of Titchfield v. Cuming, May 22, 1798; Miller v. Cathcart, February 12, 1799, and other cases, there can be no doubt that these words constituted Sir Evan the disponent, or institute, and not an heir of tailzie.

"This being clear, the question, whether he is effectually put under all the fetters and irritancies, depends on principles which have been firmly settled, ever since the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Edmonstone of Dun-

1. It is unnecessary to go into the particulars of that well known case. The No. 206.
 al rule laid down by it is, that prohibitions, or irritancies, applied only to of tailzie, do not affect the institute, however clear it may be, from other Mar. 11, 183 es of the deed, or the general conception of it, that the entailer intended to Brown v.
 de the institute in the operation of the clauses. This rests on the broad Macgregor iple, that all such clauses are of the strictest construction, and therefore cane extended, by any implication of intention, either to persons or to cases not ssly comprehended in them. And this has been held so decidedly, that even s introduced incidentally into the clauses themselves, which might seem to ate such an intention, or the use of words of an ambiguous nature, have been ys held not to be sufficient.

The general rule had been decided in two cases before the case of Dun-
 h. But that important judgment has been followed by very many cases, ighout which there has never for a moment been any departure from the iple. Nice cases have arisen, in the question whether the party was institute ir of tailzie, such as Wellwood, M'Culloch, &c. And nice cases have also n on the question, whether special and express words used did apply to the ute or not. But no doubt has ever existed that, if the party were clearly ute, and if the clause in question were not applied to him as institute, but ied to the heirs of tailzie, no words merely indicating that the entailer may considered him as an heir of tailzie, and in that view intended him to be id, will render the clause effectual against him. It is needless to go through detail of all the cases. It is impossible to read the case of Wellwood, or the of Titchfield, or the case of Miller v. Cathcart, or the case of Baldastard, out seeing that, if any implication of intention would have done, the entailer indicated, in one and all of them, that he meant the institute to be bound, considered him as an heir of tailzie as much as the substitutes named. But principle of strict construction necessarily carried with it another rule, that most liberal construction must be given in favour of liberty, so that any iguous words, or loose expressions even introduced into the clauses, shall not ccepted instead of the direct words proper for imposing the fetters on the inte. For example, in the entail of Gordonstone, the prohibition was, that it ld not be lawful 'to the heirs of tailzie above designed, male or female, nor to heirs who shall happen to succeed to the lands and dignity,' to do any of the ibited acts, 'it being always understood, that although the before-named per-be designed heirs of tailzie, and be to succeed to my estate as such,' yet they have no greater powers than liferenters. The institute in that case was an of the entailer, and did succeed to the lands and dignity. But, in that entail, as not an heir but disponee; and the restraining clauses being applied to of tailzie, it was found that he was not bound by them.

So also in the case of Miller v. Cathcart, James Taylor, the institute, was ed in many of the clauses as 'James Taylor and all the other heirs of entail,' in one clause it was said expressly, 'notwithstanding the before written con-ns, limitations, and restrictions, put upon the said James Taylor and the other e-mentioned heirs of entail,' &c., power was given to the said heirs to do cer-things. But the restraining, and irritant, and resolute clauses themselves applied to heirs of tailzie; and it was therefore found 'that the said James art Taylor being institute in the entail was not affected by the fetters thereof,' therefore, that the entail could not be pleaded in bar of payment of his debts.
 The case of Baldastard was an extremely strong case, and particularly illus-

296. 1837. p. 6
 native of the principle, that even the use of words in the disputed clause itself, which in some sense might include the institute, cannot be construed to have that effect, if it appears from the connexion in which they stand, that they were merely used as a form of describing the heirs of tailzie. 'Heirs and members of tailzie' might in a popular sense comprehend the institute; but it was held, both here and in the House of Lords, that the word 'members' was limited by the connexion in which it stood with 'heirs,' and therefore could not be taken as importing more than heirs 'being members' of tailzie, and describing persons who were 'members' because they were 'heirs.'

"The few cases in which the institute has been found to be bound, are cases in which the words employed, not only did directly apply to the institute, but could not, from the form in which they were used, admit of any other construction. It was in the case of Syme v. Ronaldson Dickson, February 27, 1799, although that was certainly a nice case upon the resolutive clause. But, while the prohibitions were expressly laid on the institute by name, the commencement of the irritant and resolutive clauses expressly included him, running thus:—'In case of said son, or any of the heirs of tailzie,' &c. should contravene, the deeds should be null, and 'the person, or persons, heirs of tailzie foresaid, so contravening,' &c. should forfeit. The case turned on the word 'person' in the singular number, which was held to stand apart from the words following on it, and, in this view, necessarily to relate to the institute, the son, and to no one else. The late case of Dougaldston was perhaps clearer, though also not decided without difficulty. For the irritant and resolutive clauses provided, that in case the said Henry Glassford 'or any of the heirs of tailzie and provision substituted to him,' should contravene, not only the deeds should be null, 'but also each and every heir or person, so contravening,' should forfeit. The majority of the Court who decided that case held that, from the context, it was impossible that the word 'person' could apply to any other person but Henry Glassford the institute, named in the beginning of the clause.

"The ruling principle, however, was again recognised in the case of Lord Elibank v. Murray, July 2, 1833. Another case<sup>1</sup> of importance was, indeed, decided on the same day, in which the Court, resting on a general clause, which was thought to express a positive intention that the whole clauses should be binding on William Morehead the institute, came to an opposite conclusion. But the House of Lords, even in that strong case, looking simply at the terms of the clause itself, which in its commencement was directed against heirs of tailzie alone, found that it did not reach the institute.

"We are aware, that the decision in the case of Baugh v. Murray, January 16, 1834, may seem to have involved a question of a somewhat similar nature with that which is now before the Court. But that case was taken up as a very special case: The judges were not agreed upon it; and while it does not appear from the report that the decisions on the subject were brought fully before them, there seems to have been an impression, that in the shape of the cause the Court were not under the necessity of deciding any point, except that nothing had been done to make the provision effectual against the entailed estate. At any rate, upon full consideration, we cannot hold that case to regulate the decision of the present case.

Attending to the principles of the law universally recognised, and to the whole of the decisions, we are of opinion that the irritant and resolute clauses in the present case cannot be held to affect the institute. The prohibitory clause as to selling or contracting debt, no doubt, applies to him nominatim, as it did in all of the cases which have been referred to, and very remarkably in the case of Morehead. But the irritant and resolute clauses are very differently constructed. They run thus :—‘ That in case the heirs descending of my body, or any of the other heirs of tailzie before-mentioned, shall contravene,’ &c. ; not only the institute shall be null, and the estate shall not be affected by them, ‘ but also the person or persons so contravening,’ shall forfeit all right, &c. It is perfectly clear that unless the first words of these two clauses shall be held to comprehend the institute, there is neither a good irritant, nor a good resolute clause. For, independently of other cases, the same word ‘ person ’ was used in the resolute clause in the case of Morehead, and was found to be of no effect under much more difficult circumstances. It clearly would have been so found by the Court, but for the irritant clause, which alone raised the difficulty. But the first question here is, whether there is a good irritant clause, any defect in which is alone sufficient to vitiate the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. If the words had run simply, ‘ In any of the heirs of tailzie shall contravene,’ the case would have been identical with Morehead in this point, without the difficulty of it ; and there could have been no doubt of it. The only question is, whether, attending to the strict principles of the law, the prefixed words, in the connexion in which they stand, can be held to alter the construction : ‘ That, in case the heirs descending of my body, or of the other heirs of tailzie before-mentioned,’ &c. It is apparent that the words, ‘ the heirs descending of my body,’ do not specially describe the institute, but describe a class of heirs belonging to this entail. For the case stated is that the institute contravenes the entail. They have no reference to general descent, but to natural birth, or succession at common law, but have a special application to the heirs of this entail, and nothing else. Yet it is of heirs only that the entail speaks—of heirs, no doubt, descending of his body, but of these heirs as heirs of the institute, contradistinguished from the other heirs of tailzie called. There might be numerous classes of heirs of tailzie descending of the entailer’s body, who are without special destination ; and there might also be numerous classes of heirs of tailzie not descending of his body, within it. And what he says is, that, if the heirs descending of his body, or any of the other heirs of tailzie before-mentioned, shall contravene, the nullity and forfeiture shall take place.

<sup>1</sup> Morehead v. Morehead.

We are of opinion, that, in consistency with the principles which have been established in all the cases since Duntreath, the words, ‘ the heirs descending of my body,’ can only be construed to mean such heirs of his body as were heirs of the institute, and so might be distinguished from the other heirs of tailzie. And it appears to us, that to construe the term ‘ heirs ’ in this entail as specifically designating the institute, merely because he is in fact an heir of the entailer’s body, would not be consistent with the principles on which so many previous cases have been determined. He is not an heir in this entail. He does not take the estate by service as heir ; and though a description here given of other persons who are heirs, who are also heirs of tailzie, might comprehend him in a natural sense, it does not at all comprehend him in any relation to the right or the character by which he takes and possesses the estate in question.

Having come to a decided opinion, that the irritant and resolute clauses do not affect Sir Evan Macgregor, and therefore that the entail cannot be pleaded

No. 206.

Mar. 11, 1837

Brown v.

Macgregor.

1836. against the debts contracted by him, or the diligence of his creditors, we think it necessary to decide also on the objection taken, that there is no sufficient clause against altering the order of succession, or on the abstract question raised to the effect of that objection in the present action, supposing it to be well-founded. On the ground which we have fully explained, we are of opinion, that the petition is entitled to decree in his action, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be adhered to."

LORD GLENLEE.—"Although I cannot take it upon me to dissent from the foregoing opinion, yet it is not without great hesitation that I concur in it. I doubt very much whether the principle which governed the Dunrobin case, and various others, can justly be applied to this individual case."

"I understand very well, that if the tailzie applies the irritancies to persons described by an established and known technical designation, we are not by implication to consider any person as included in the designation, other than those who fall under it, according to its proper technical meaning. But if the tailzie does not apply the irritancies to a description of persons so worded, as in itself, without interpretation, to point out clearly who they are, and if we are at all obliged to find out this by implication, and presumptions of intention, it ought to be toti lege perspecta, that we form our judgment on the matter."

"Now, the irritant clause in this case is not directed simply against 'any of the heirs of tailzie,' but against 'any of the heirs of tailzie before-mentioned,' which throws us back to the prohibitory clause."

"The first prohibition, which is against alienations, &c. &c. is directed against the institute, and first substitute nominatim, and the 'other heirs of tailzie substituted to me in manner foresaid, and succeeding to my said lands.'"

"The remaining prohibitions appear to be directed against the heirs of tailzie above described, that is the 'heirs of tailzie substituted to the maker of the entail.' Now, as there is not, technically speaking, any person in the whole tailzie who is an heir substituted to the maker of the entail, we are forced, from implication and presumption, to interpret his meaning; and I do not see why, considering his peculiar mode of expression, we are to confine that meaning to heirs of tailzie, properly so called, and not to include, as he himself evidently intended, the institute as well as them; and, in short, as signifying the whole persons called to the succession."

When these Opinions were returned the cause was advised by their Lordships of the First Division.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I have read the opinions of the consulted Judges with great care, and although my own opinion in this case is greatly shaken, yet I am not able to say I have changed it, nor can I adopt the opinion that has been given by the consulted Judges. I shall express my views, however, very briefly.

The entailor calls all his descendants, beginning with his eldest son, going through his younger sons, and ending with, "whom all failing, the heirs whatsoever of my body." He then in the irritant clause applies the irritancy first to the heirs "descending of my body." That expression, if taken by itself, is quite sufficient to include and express the institute. It means clearly all persons being his heirs by descent from his body, that is, all his descendants. It is void of ambiguity.

technical difficulty. How then do you limit it? By adding to it the words "or heirs of entail," and then applying to the clause a sort of interpretation that I have here used for the first time. In the first place, by the strict verbal reading of the Duntreath case, rejecting inference, you take the words "heirs of entail," standing alone, and so hold that expression to exclude the institute. Then, secondly, you have recourse to free construction, and by inference from the words "other heirs of entail," you conclude that the entailer, in using the words "heirs of my body," meant only heirs of entail, and so you arrive at a conclusion in certain defeasance of the entailer's true meaning. Now, I am not able to give this kind of what I may call double-dealing interpretation, applying both verbal interpretation, and free interpretation by inference to the same sentence. I know of no example of this. The Duntreath case, and the cases following, afford none. I think you may interpret, word by word, as in these cases, giving inference and explanation of one word by another; but you cannot, at the present moment, adopt inference from the very words which you have, by rejection of inference, interpreted in a way contrary to the entailer's meaning. Perhaps, it would be sufficient to say, that if you adopt free construction at all, you must look to the entailer's true meaning, and nothing else, and cannot defeat that meaning by interpretation of any kind.*

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur with the majority of the consulted Judges. The heir, Sir Evan, is undoubtedly, in one sense, an heir descending of the entailer's body, but, according to the principle of construction which must be applied to entails, I cannot find any words sufficient to extend the irritant and resolute clauses to him. He was the institute, and his sole connexion with the entail was of the institute, and not that of an heir.

LORD GILLIES.—I concur with the majority of the consulted Judges.

LORD COREHOUSE.—The majority of the consulted Judges are of opinion that the interlocutor pronounced by me ought to be adhered to; and I shall only say I remain of the same opinion as when I pronounced that interlocutor.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the reclaiming note; adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, except as to expenses; and of new adjudge, decern, and declare in terms of the libel, but find neither party entitled to expenses; and to that extent recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary."

A. and C. DOUGLAS, W.S.—T. THOMSON, W.S.—Agents.

---

* This Opinion was revised by his Lordship.

tures on which the securities were held :—Held, that the factor should be appointed with the usual powers only, leaving him to make up his titles as best advised. 2. Expenses of opposing the prayer for unusual powers should be paid out of the funds of the minors. 3. Under a petition to appoint a factor, “or any other person your Lordships may think proper to appoint, made of a different person, without ordering fresh intimation of the

Mar. 11, 1837. IN 1820 the late Charles Nairne, W.S., was appointed tutoris to Philip-David and James Hay, sons of Captain Hay. He invested the funds falling under the factory, partly on heritable and dispositions in security, and partly on moveable securities. Heritable bonds were taken payable to “the said Charles Nairne loco tutoris foresaid, or to his successors in office, or to his assigns.” Infestment was taken under the disposition, “in favour of the said Charles Nairne, as factor loco tutoris foresaid.” On the death of Charles Nairne, a petition was presented in name of Philip-David Hay, residing in Ireland, and his father, as his administrator-in-law, to James Hay, W.S., as their mandatary, stating that the young James Hay, junior, was absent from the country, and that it seemed expedient to have a factor loco tutoris appointed to the petitioner Philip-David Hay, a factor loco absentis to James, so that there might be a power to uplift and discharge the heritable securities. And as Philip-David Hay was to attain majority in June 1837, it was expedient to provide means for then uplifting his share of the funds invested. The petition prayed the Court “to appoint the said James Hay, or any other person your Lordships may think proper, to be appointed loco tutoris to the said Philip-David Hay, and James Hay, junior.”

he subjects held in security thereof ; and, if necessary for that purpose, No. 207. obtain a renewal in his name, as factor foresaid, of the investitures on Mar. 11, 1887 on which the said securities are held ; and also to audit the final accounts of Hay v.
 said deceased Charles Nairne, as factor loco tutoris foresaid, &c. and Boreland.
 xoner," &c.

Answers were lodged by Mrs Murray and her son, the debtors in one the heritable bonds, and proprietors of the heritable subject therewith joined. They objected to the unusual powers prayed for, in respect they were not necessary, and therefore it would be irregular to grant them;<sup>1</sup> that there was a real right remaining in hereditate jacenti of the deceased factor loco tutoris ; and the new factor might make up a title to this, in conformity with previous cases,<sup>2</sup> he must do so by a declarator and adjudication, followed by charter and sasine ; at least, it could not be done by powers summarily given to such factor in the interlocutor appointing him to the office. They also stated that the petitioner, Philip-David was near majority, so that there could be no appointment of a factor loco tutoris, as it was in his power to choose a curator for himself.<sup>3</sup>

ORD PRESIDENT.—The former factor loco tutoris was infest. There may be difficulty in transferring de plano the feudal security to the new factor as prayed for in this petition. I think the Court ought not to grant the extraordinary powers prayed for, but should appoint a factor with the usual powers, leaving him thereto make up a title to the feudal subjects as he shall be best advised.
 The other Judges concurred.

The respondents moved for an award of expenses out of the funds of the minors, in respect that their appearance had been rendered necessary on the terms of the petition, and had been useful for the interests of the minors. The Court awarded expenses as craved.

It was then stated from the bar, that, in place of the factor suggested in the petition, the parties desired that Henry G. Watson, accountant, should be appointed.

The following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Appoint Henry George Watson, accountant in Edinburgh, to be factor loco absentis to the said Philip-David, and James Hay, junior, with the usual powers, and to make up the title to the heritable property as he shall be advised, he finding caution in terms of the Act of Sederunt, before extract, and decern ; and allow the expenses of the answers to be paid out of the funds of the minors."

J. NAIRNE, W.S.—A. and C. DOUGLAS, W.S.—Agents.

---

1 B., Jan. 27, 1829 (ante, VII. 320) ; M'Lellan, Feb. 25, 1832 (ante, X.

Dalziel, March 11, 1756 (16204) ; Drummond, June 30, 1758 (16206).
Macnetyne, May 19, 1827 (ante, V. 684).

No. 208.

MRS GRACE HAY OF ANDERSON, and HUSBAND, Petitioners.—

A. McNeill.

1837.

Anderson v.

II.

JAMES HILL and OTHERS, Respondents.—Paterson.

may v.

his Creditors.

1st Division.

Appeal—Process.—A petition was presented praying for leave to appeal against the judgment reported ante, p. 481; the Court refused the petition with expenses.

G. DUNLOP, W.S.—LOCKHART, HUNTER, and WHITEHEAD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 209.

— RENNY, Pursuer.—*H. G. Bell.*HIS CREDITORS, Defenders.—Mackenzie.

Cessio—Process.—Where a creditor, defender in a process of cessio, raised 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56, gives in a list of persons whom he alleges to be creditors of the pursuer, and who have not received letters of intimation through the office, nor been cited,—Held that the pursuer is bound, before proceeding to cite them, and that the notice in the Gazette does not supersede the notice of this; but that the creditor-defender will be liable for all the expense occasioned by this objection, if the parties in the list are not creditors of the pursuer.

Jan. 11, 1837.

1st Division.

IN a process of cessio, raised before the Court of Session, under 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56, a defender gave in a list of persons whom he alleged to be creditors of the pursuer, but who had not been cited, or certified by letter through the post-office, and who had got no notice except from general intimation in the Gazette. He therefore moved the Court for reference to A. S., 11th July, 1828, § 102, and the practice which followed thereon, to direct the parties contained in that list to be cited before proceeding further. The pursuer answered that the provision in A. S. had no reference to proceedings under the late statute; that he had cited all persons whom he knew to be creditors; and that the intimation in the Gazette, under the new form of process, was meant to supply any omission which was not mala fide made.

It was observed by the Court that all the creditors must be cited; the pursuer was bound to know who his creditors were; and that, in the mean-time, he must cite the parties contained in the list, under the condition that the defender who gave in the list would be subjected to all the expenses thereby occasioned, if these parties were not creditors of the pursuer. The Court directed accordingly.

—Agents.

WILLIAM DUNN, Pursuer.—D. F. Hope—Robertson.

JAMES HAMILTON, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—A. Dunlop.

ARCHIBALD ARTHUR, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford.

MES M'DONALD and HUGH M'KAY, Defenders.—Keay—M'Neill.

No. 210.

Mar. 11, 1837

Dunn v.

Hamilton.

Nuisance—River—Jury Trial.—1. An inferior heritor complained of a dye-c on the grounds of a superior heritor, as creating a nuisance to the stream, h flowed through both their properties, and he raised an action of inter-
; a jury trial followed, at which a verdict was found for the superior heritor, a bill of exceptions to the charge of the presiding Judge was presented;— l, that there are primary and secondary uses of a running stream; that its in supporting animal life in man and beast is primary, and should not be ficed to its use for manufactures, which is secondary only; and, in respect the Judge, in charging the Jury, had not duly attended to this distinction, had otherwise given too large and indefinite latitude to the right of a superior or to pollute a stream for manufacturing purposes—bill of exceptions sustained ist the charge, and new trial allowed. 2. Terms of the direction to the Jury h were, on these grounds, held exceptionable. 3. Circumstances in which, that “if the water was still fitted for all common uses, and all the uses to h it had hitherto been applied, the pursuer was not entitled, in order to put the works of the defenders, to suggest some peculiar use not actually existsuch as that of bleaching and finishing, for which alone the said water might nfitted; and therefore, that on this ground of unfitness for bleaching and ning, considered by itself, the pursuer was not entitled to a verdict.”

Landlord and Tenant—Homologation—Nuisance.—1. A landlord let premises tenant for nineteen years, “to be used for the purpose of bleaching, dyeing, inting, and any other operations connected with bleaching, dyeing, or print-or for agriculture:” the tenant let the premises at an advance of rent, to sub-its; in an action against the landlord the tenant and the sub-tenants, for inter-alleging that the operations of the sub-tenants amounted to nuisance, the land-lodged separate defences, stating that the operations of the sub-tenants did no y to the water; or, at all events, if any injury occasionally happened, it arose the fault of the sub-tenants, for which he was not responsible; the tenant also d separate defences, stating that if any nuisance was committed, it was without rity from him: an issue was taken for the landlord and tenant, separate from for the sub-tenants; viz. “whether the landlord or tenant, by themselves or er, or others authorized by them, did wrongfully pollute and spoil the water, ” at the trial the Judge directed the Jury, that, even if nuisance was proved at the sub-tenants, still as there was nothing but the lease to connect the land-and the tenant therewith, there was no ground in law for holding that they, or of them, had authorized, or were answerable for that nuisance; a verdict was t for the defenders:—Held, by a majority, under a bill of exceptions, that the was erroneous; and that, besides the act of granting the lease, the tenor of ndlord's defences, alleging the water to have sustained no injury, was a ground for holding him to have authorized the nuisance, if there was a nuisance; hat, in the circumstances, the case of the tenant could not be separated from
of the landlord, and a new trial should be granted as to both.

1822, the late James Hamilton of Barns entered into a contract of Mar. 11, 1837.
with Archibald Arthur, printer at Anderston, whereby he let to “all and whole that bleachfield, with the buildings thereon, lying south side of the road leading from Edinbarnet lint-mill to Faifley, presently possessed by Alexander Colquhoun, bleacher there, and 1st Division.

Lord Jeffrey.
Jury Cause.

210. that for and during the complete term and space of nineteen years, and after the term of Whitsunday, 1823, which is hereby declared the term of the said Archibald Arthur's entry thereto; declaring also that the said subjects hereby let are to be used for the purpose of bleaching, dyeing, or printing, and any other operations connected with bleaching, dyeing, or printing, or for agriculture." This tack was granted usual, with absolute warrandice by Hamilton. Arthur, on the other part, bound himself "to pay the sum of £60 yearly, in name of rent for the premises." Arthur also bound himself that he should keep the buildings and fences in good condition; crop the land contained in the lease, as there prescribed; "and leave the lands, at the expiration of the lease, fitted in all respects for the purposes foresaid, and shall not use of them in no other way than as before specified without the consent in writing of the said James Hamilton, or his assigns."

Arthur possessed the lands till 1826, in which year he granted a new tack, at a rent of £112, for the first year, and £120 for each year afterwards, to James M'Donald and others. The whole of this was paid to Arthur, who bound himself to pay the rent due to his landlord, and to it. The sub-tack was granted expressly "under the several conditions and provisions particularly specified and contained" in the principal tack. The sub-tenants were bound, within six months of their entry, either to erect additional buildings, to the value of £800, on the premises, or to find security for payment of the sub-rent. They entered into possession, and their sub-tack afterwards was acquired by James M'Donald and H. M'Kay, carrying on business under the firm of M'Donald and M'Kay. They were turkey-red dyers, the dyeing material chiefly used by them being madder. Other stuffs were also used at their work, as oil, ash, shumac, vitriol, alum, soda, soap, indigo, bullock's blood, coppers, sheep's dung. The extent to which these articles were used was different in different years. In 1827 the quantity of madder employed was 100 cwts.; in 1828, 774 cwts.; in 1829, 1832 cwts.; in 1835, 1976 cwts. and from January to August, 1836, the consumpt was 1303 cwts. A jury trial, after-mentioned, took place in autumn 1836.

The work, which was let to M'Donald and M'Kay, was situated on the Cochino or Cochney Burn, which flowed through Hamilton's estate. That burn, sometimes called the East Burn, was afterwards joined within the lands of the pursuer, William Dunn of Duntocher, by another burn, called the West Burn, and the united stream flowed down through the lands of Dunn, who had erected extensive spinning-mills and other factories on his property along the stream. There were also villages on its banks, within Dunn's property, containing a population of 3000 persons and upwards.

According to one measurement of the size of the streams, which was taken in summer 1836, when they were rather low, the discharge per minute, was of the East Burn, 49 cubic feet, and of the West Burn ic feet. For the purpose of removing or diminishing the contamination which might be occasioned to the water, by the refuse from their works, M'Donald and M'Kay had recourse to various precautions, such as settling ponds. Some of these were not adopted until after an action of interdict had been raised by Dunn in 1834. That action was directed against James Hamilton, now of Barns, the son of the grantor of the lease to Arthur; and also against Arthur, the principal tenant, and Donald and M'Kay, the sub-tenants. The summons set forth, that, part of the property of Hamilton, there was a work occupied by Donald and M'Kay, on the side of the Cochno Burn; that, within these few years, it had been changed from a bleachfield to a turkey-dye-work; "that, from the said work, the defenders, or one or more of them, have taken upon them to discharge into the said burn great quantities of the most impure, noxious, and deleterious substances, consisting of madder roots or other substances of that description;" whereby the stream was rendered totally unfit for the use of man or beast; fish in it were killed; its colour turned to blood, and its smell rendered most offensive. The conclusions of the action were, that "the said James Hamilton, and Archibald Arthur, and M'Donald and M'Kay (as individuals and partners) should be interdicted from discharging any madder-roots, or water impregnated with the same, or other dye-stuff, or deleterious or noxious or impure stuff of any kind, into the said burn, whereby the said burn, in its progress through the pursuer's property, may be polluted or rendered unfit for domestic use, or manufacturing purposes, its amenity diminished, or the property of the pursuer in any way injured," reserving all claim for damages.

Against this action, Hamilton of Barns stated in defence that the premises had "been used as a dye-work and bleachfield for a period beyond the years of prescription, with a certain interval as to the dyeing operation,—that the present lease was granted in 1822, the purposes for which the premises were to be used being specified to be for bleaching, dyeing, printing, and other operations connected therewith—that all these operations were carried on, and considerable expense laid out on the work, to the knowledge of the pursuer, without a whisper of complaint from him, till immediately before intenting this action—that the water discharged from the dye-work passes through a filter before entering the stream—that, from the moment it passes the dye-work, it is drunk by the cattle of the defender's tenants, and those on an intervening property, without the slightest injury,—that the pursuer has himself a dye-work and a gas-work on the stream, a little below the point where it enters his property, the discharges from which are much more noxious and injurious than those complained of,—and that, in point of fact, no injury is done to the water by the operations carried on in the dye-work occupied by the defender's tenants.

At all events, if any injury occasionally happens, it must be owing to

No. 210

Mar. 11, 1835

Dunn v.

Hamilton

216. the negligence or misconduct of the tenants themselves, in exercising their powers under the lease, which are in no degree necessarily productive of injury to the water, and for this they alone are responsible; at the same time, the defender is perfectly willing to concur in any measures which may be recommended by men of skill as necessary to secure against such occasional injury, if it do occur, which the defender does not admit to be the case. In the mean time he pleads in defence—

“ 1. The operations authorized by him in his lease to the co-defendants are within the proper exercise of his powers as proprietor.

“ 2. By prescriptive usage, he has a right to discharge the matters complained of from his work.

“ 3. The pursuer is barred by acquiescence from now challenging the operations complained of.

“ 4. No actual injury is suffered, to warrant the conclusions of the court.

“ 5. The defender is not responsible for the consequence of any improper negligence or misconduct by his tenants.

“ 6. If any injury be suffered, the utmost extent of what the pursuer can demand is, that precautionary measures be taken at the sight of men of skill to prevent its recurrence.”

Arthur stated in defence that his actual possession of the premises had only been from 1828 to 1826; that he had used them only as a bleachfield during that period, and had not in the least injured the water in the burn; and that he had not granted, under the sub-tack, any broader right than he himself held under the principal tack from Hamilton. He stated that he did not know in what manner the sub-tenants, or their assignees, might have carried on their business; nor whether they had polluted the burn; but “ if these parties, or any others, have made an improper use of the water, or committed any other illegal act, it has been without authority from the defender.” He pleaded, that, in so far as regarded the right to use the burn for the purposes specified in the tack, it rested with Hamilton to defend it, under his obligation of warrantree; and that as he (Arthur) had not polluted the burn, nor authorized any pollution, he was entitled to be assolized.

McDonald and McKay stated that though the refuse from their works was necessarily, to a certain extent, discharged into the burn, they had adopted unusual, and even unnecessary, precautions to limit it as much as possible; and that though the water was occasionally tinged by such discharge, it was not rendered noxious, unwholesome, or unfit for other purposes. They denied the pursuer's allegations on that subject. They alleged that their works were not more injurious to the water than a bleachfield would be; and that they had been used as a bleachfield and dye-work beyond the long prescription. They also alleged that the pursuer had acquiesced for eight years in their use of the works, during which period they had made expensive erections for carrying them on.

pleaded (1.) that they made only a lawful use of the stream; (2.) that the pursuer was barred from challenge by acquiescence; (3.) that the general use of the stream in carrying off the impurities of the manufactories, and of the population on its banks, justified them in their use of it; and (4.) that the utmost which the pursuer could demand was the taking of such precautionary measures as men of skill might suggest for removing all ground of complaint, if any existed.

No. 210,
 Mar. 11, 1831
 Duff v.
 Hamilton.

In preparing issues for a trial by jury, it was contended by Hamilton, the landlord, and Arthur, the principal tenant, that their position was different from that of M'Donald and M'Kay, the sub-tenants, whose operations were the subject of complaint; that even though the sub-tenants should be found to have polluted the stream, a separate question remained whether they, the landlord and principal tenant, had so sanctioned the operations by which the stream was polluted, as to be identified with the sub-tenants, or otherwise liable to interdict; and that there was a separate issue should be taken for the case of the landlord and principal tenant. The pursuer opposed this, but a separate issue was refused, and the two following issues were adjusted, the first applying to M'Donald and M'Kay alone; the second to Hamilton and Arthur alone:— It being admitted that the pursuer is proprietor of the lands of Dun-r and Fairley, situated on the site of the Cochney, Duntocher or Muir Burn, and that one of the streams which unite to form the said burn passes through the property of the defender, Hamilton.

It being also admitted, that on the said property of the defender, Hamilton, there are certain premises and buildings erected, of which the defender, Arthur, is or was tenant, and the defenders M'Donald and M'Kay, are sub-tenants.

Whether, during the year 1826 and subsequently, or during any part of the said period, the defenders, M'Donald and M'Kay, did, by certain operations carried on in the said premises and buildings, wrongfully pollute and spoil the water of the said burn, so as to injure the quality of the water of the same, to the nuisance of the pursuer, as proprietor of the lands aforesaid?

Whether, during the said period, the defender, Hamilton, or his predecessors, or the defender, Arthur, by themselves, or another, or authorized by them, did wrongfully pollute and spoil the water of the said burn, so as to injure the quality of the water of the same, to the nuisance of the pursuer, as proprietor of the said lands?"

The cause was tried on Circuit at Glasgow, before Lord Jeffrey and a special Jury, and a verdict was returned in favour of the defenders on both issues. Exceptions were taken to the charge of the presiding Judge, and a bill of exceptions was presented, in which six exceptions were stated. In charging the Jury his Lordship observed, in regard to the law applicable, "that the difficulty of all such cases arose from the apparent conflict of two plain principles; one, that every man had a right to use

216. his own property in the way most for his own advantage ; the other, that 1837. no one should so use his property as to hurt his neighbour ; and that though at first sight it might appear that the latter maxim ought always to prevail, where it seemed to be in competition with the former, this was far from being the case universally ; and that, though it might be stated as the rule, it was liable to many considerable exceptions. Thus a man might, in many cases, build so as to shut out the prospect from his neighbour's house, or even the light from his windows, to the great diminution of its value, or by forming or extending a town and common manufactory beside it, entirely destroy its privacy, and render the air less pure and agreeable. There were similar exceptions to the right of an inferior heritor to receive the water of a stream, in a state absolutely as pure, and in as great quantity as those on its upper course. The upper heritors were obviously entitled to diminish its quantity, by taking from it what was necessary either for their own drinking, or that of their cattle, as well as for cooking, washing, &c. ; and they were as clearly entitled to impair its purity, by manuring their lands on the banks (with substances not poisonous), or other necessary operations : and the said Lord Jeffrey did proceed accordingly to direct the said jury in point of law—(last Exception),—" That, for all the necessary purposes of the occupation of land and of ordinary life, not only was the abstraction of the water of a running stream permitted to the proprietors on the banks of that stream, as it passed their property, but also such deterioration of the water, as might be ultimately fatal to its use by the inferior heritors : That one of the natural uses of a running stream was to remove the mass of impurities necessarily accumulated from the houses of persons living on its banks, and which impurities the superior proprietors were entitled to let into it, either by leaving them on the surface, or by the use of common sewers or drains ; and that the soil might thus be sent down, not only in small quantities, and to the lesser injury of the lower heritor, but, by the progressive accumulation of inhabited houses, in very large quantities, and to the entire destruction of any domestic use of the water by such lower heritor, without any right on his part to object : That human society could not go on, if this accumulation of unavoidable pollutions could be prevented by an inferior heritor ; and any such attempt was illegal, because each party on the banks of a stream was entitled to let into that stream those impurities which that stream was destined by nature, as a common sewer, to receive."

The first exception was taken to the direction beginning with the words
 " That for all the necessary purposes," &c.

In support of the exception the pursuer pleaded that the direction was erroneous, especially in stating that an upper heritor might lawfully occasion " such deterioration of the water as might be ultimately fatal to its use by the inferior heritors." There were primary and secondary purposes to which a running stream was subservient. The primary one was port of life in man and beast by furnishing them with water, as much a necessary of life as food. Every running stream so far, the common property of all the heritors through whose it flowed. They had a right to apply it to this primary use, no upper heritor was entitled to render it unfit for such primary use of his operations, particularly such as those relating to manu-

N6: 211
Mar. 11, 18
Dunn v.
Hamilton

And, in general, a lower heritor had a right to object to any use of the water by an upper heritor, which either hurt the quality or diminished the quantity of the stream; or unfitted it for any purpose to which in its natural state it would have been applied or injured its amenity. On these grounds, the remaining part of the declaration to the jury was also erroneous as it laid down, in general, that it might be used to carry off the mass of impurities accumulated by houses on its banks; a position which might be true in respect of considerable size, such as the Clyde, but not to minor streams like the Cochno.<sup>1</sup>

Defenders, M'Donald and M'Kay, answered, that, at this part of the charge, the attention of the jury was called only to that species of pollution which arose from using the water "for all the necessary purposes of the occupation of land and of ordinary life," as distinguished from pollution arising from manufactures, which was subsequently adverted to. Only under that limitation that the pollution was stated to be necessary; and, as so limited, the doctrine was well-founded. There were cases<sup>2</sup> directly sanctioning the use of a minor stream for carrying off impurities from dwellinghouses, and, unless running streams were to be so used, an upper heritor would be deprived of the legitimate use of his property, and the natural advantage inherent in his position.

GILLIES.*—This is a case which deserves the most serious consideration of the Court, and which has been very carefully considered by us. I am of opinion that this exception is well-founded. The doctrine laid down goes so far, that, for all the necessary purposes of the occupation of land, and of life, deterioration of the water might lawfully be made by an upper heritor, though carried to such extent "as might be ultimately fatal to its use by the lower heritors." I cannot assent to the doctrine thus broadly and unqualifiedly. In the case of Russell,<sup>3</sup> it was held by Lord Justice-Clerk Braxfield that there was a certain order, according to which the several uses of water might

---

Glenlee, March 10, 1804 (12834); Ogilvy, Nov. 24, 1781 (12824); Dunn, March 5, 1793 (12824); Miller, Nov. 1791 (12823); Russell, Nov.
1823; Mason, Jan. 31, 1832 (3 Barn. & Ad. 304).
Dunn, Nov. 12, 1826 (ante, IV. 167; or 169, new ed.); Russell, Nov.
1823).

1791, Bell's 8vo Cases, 338.

Opinions of the Court were delivered at once on all the exceptions, but for the sake of greater distinctness the Reporters have inserted the Opinions applicable to each exception immediately after the pleadings thereupon.

210. be classed, as primary or secondary; and that when these came into collision with each other, the right of an inferior heritor to apply water to its primary uses was not to be sacrificed to the right of a superior heritor to apply it to its secondary uses. The primary uses of water were those by which it was applied to the support and aliment of animal life in man and beast. That is a distinction of essential importance in disposing of such a question as this, but it is not duly adverted to in the charge which is under review. It is only said, in general, that the abstraction of the water, or such deterioration of it, may be permitted to the superior heritor for necessary purposes, "as might be ultimately fatal to its use by the inferior heritors." To this doctrine, as it is laid down in the charge, I cannot give my assent. The charge then proceeds to lay it down that one of the natural uses of a running stream, was to remove impurities from houses on the banks, and the such soil, whether sent through sewers, or along the surface, might be sent down where there was an accumulation of dwellings, in large quantities, "and to the entire destruction of any domestic use of the water by such lower heritor without any right on his part to object." This doctrine is too broadly laid down to be supported. There may, in some circumstances, be questions of difficulty and nicety connected with this branch of the law of nuisance; and a question belonging to this class was considered by the Court in the case of Downie, where the right of sending soil from dwellinghouses on the banks of the Water of Leith was maintained in favour of the upper heritors. But the Water of Leith was a considerable stream, though it had suffered diminution from an opus manufactum, of old date, the mill-lead for supplying the large mills near the spot where the question arose. And the water had been previously polluted before reaching the point where the soil from the dwellinghouses fell into it. These were some of the specialities in that case which distinguished it from the present. And indeed nothing is here said as to the size of the stream at the place where the alleged nuisance occurs. But that is a circumstance of the utmost moment in the determination of its fitness for carrying off impurities without nuisance. The quantity of pollutions which might be altogether immaterial in such rivers as the Tay or the Spey, might in a small rivulet, create a nuisance altogether intolerable. And, on considering the unqualified terms in which the doctrine on this subject was stated to the jury, I am of opinion that it cannot be sustained, and that the exception against it is well founded.

LOrDS PRESIDENT, MACKENZIE, and CORNHORSE, concurred.

2d Exception.—The presiding Judge "did farther direct the said jury, in point of law, that there was a distinction between the intentional pollution of the water of a running stream by the establishment of manufactures, set on foot for the purpose of gain, on the banks of such stream, and that pollution, which necessarily arose from the ordinary occupancy of land, and the common incidents of domestic life: but that this distinction did not go so far as that any pollution occasioned by carrying on a manufacture for gain, however small the extent of that pollution might be, was in itself absolutely illegal, or could be complained of by a lower heritor; and that though statements had sometimes been made that might appear to countenance such a proposition, it was his opinion that there was no law for so rigid a doctrine: That it was not easy to define the nits within which a due regard to the interest of the upper ry might justify such pollutions, but he thought he was safe in em, that if a person established a useful manufactory on the stream, and if this manufactory did not pollute the water more gle large family might have done, by sending down ordinary , such use of the water on the part of the owner of the manu-uld not be objected to by an heritor who had built, or meant to ouse on the banks of the stream below." His Lordship at the : warned the jury that they were not to be influenced by the ion that manufactures were entitled to favour; and that if they fied that the pursuer's private rights were invaded, they were protect them without regard to the consequences.

No. 210
 Mar. 11, 18
 Dunn v.
 Hamilton.

ort of this exception the pursuer pleaded that it laid down nogible in regard to the law of nuisance, and, in particular, that the hat a large manufactory was not a nuisance so long as it did not stream "more than a single large family might have done, by own ordinary pollutions," could not be sustained. There was stated by which the jury could form any definite idea of the pollution which a large family might create; this was a subject efinite that each of the jurymen, in applying the standard laid the judge for testing the nuisance, might be applying a very test, while all were believing that they followed the direction hem. And, in truth, there were no elements of comparison bee pollutions occasioned by the domestic uses of a large family occasioned by the uses of a manufacture; so that the doctrine down, even if it had been capable of being followed and acted jury at all, was an erroneous doctrine.

fenders, M'Donald and M'Kay, answered, that this part of the ast be taken in connexion with that which preceded. In laying ically, that it was too rigid a doctrine to hold any pollution, r small," to be a nuisance, there was nothing stated which was . In regard to the vagueness of the doctrine, that was inherent w of nuisance, and inseparable from it. And although there something indefinite in the comparison between the pollution ght be created by a manufactory and that which might be occaa large family, it was a method of giving as much definiteness ject admitted of; and no exception against it could be sustain-the Court were to hold that the ordinary pollutions sent from family into a stream running past their dwelling were always
 e.

HILLIES.—I entirely concur in that part of the charge which points out on between the pollution arising from manufactures and that arising ordinary occupancy of land, or the common incidents of domestic life.
 gard to what follows, as the doctrine is qualified by the condition that 1837. it would be too rigid to say that any pollution, from a manufactory, "however small the extent of that pollution might be," was a nuisance, I cannot dissent from that general position. There is no stream in the whole world which is in a state of absolute purity; and as the case of pollution which is put in the charge, might be one where the pollution was inconceivably small, it is impossible to dispute that it would be too rigid a doctrine to hold such pollution a nuisance. At the same time I do not see how a direction which is so qualified could materially aid the jury in making up their minds whether there was a nuisance in the case under their consideration. But then the charge proceeds to say that the same amount of pollution which would not be a nuisance, if created by a large family living on the banks of the stream, would not be a nuisance if created by a manufactory. To that doctrine I cannot acquiesce. It loses sight of the essential distinction between the primary and secondary uses of water, which must be kept in view. The pollution arising from this manufactory, where the process of turkey-red dyeing was carried on, cannot be considered less than a nuisance, if it renders the water unfit for its primary uses when it reaches the ground of the inferior heritor. It would be a sacrifice of the primary uses of water to its mere secondary uses, if this were not held a nuisance. If the pollution arose from the vicinity of a family, perhaps the inferior heritor might have complained on the ground of nuisance: but I have no doubt of his right to complain where such pollution arises from a manufactory, as there is a difference, in principle, between the effect of pollution, springing from the latter cause, and that which springs from the former, so far as the law of nuisance is concerned.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I concur entirely. The canon which has been laid down in this cause for trying whether the pollution amounted to a nuisance is altogether new to me. It was stated to the jury that if the amount of pollution coming from the manufactory was no greater than a single large family, living on the banks, might have created in sending ordinary pollutions down the stream, there was no nuisance. I am at a loss to understand what gauge was to be applied in order to ascertain the extent of pollution which would thus be admissible short of nuisance. Nothing is said as to the size of the family, which might vary very much according to the notions which different people entertain as to the term "a large family." And no reference is made to the size of the stream, though it is evident that ten of the largest families in Scotland living on the banks of the Tay, would create less nuisance by sending down all their ordinary pollutions into it, than one small family would occasion to a minor rivulet by using it for the same purpose. I think the doctrine overlooks the old canon upon this subject, which has been already adverted to by Lord Gillies, and which considers that the uses of water are primary or secondary, and that the former must not be sacrificed to the latter. To use water for drinking, for domestic purposes, and for sustaining animal life, is to apply it to its primary use. And if any manufactory on the ground of an upper heritor unfit the water for these primary uses, to the lower heritors, they may complain of it as a nuisance. This doctrine was distinctly recognised in the cases of Russell and Stein, which are fully reported in Bell's Octavo Cases. Some rence of opinion prevailed among the Judges as to the facts; but the doctrine expressly laid down by Lord Justice-Clerk Braxfield and Lord Eskgrove, and stated to by all the other Judges. And as it appears to me that the doctrine, No. 210.

<sup>1</sup> Russell, Nov. 1791 (Bell's Octavo Cases, 338); Miller, Nov. 1791 (Id. 384).

Mar. 11, 183
Dunn v.
Hamilton. that part of the charge against which the second exception was taken, is not consistent with this well-established rule of law, I think the exception ought to be sustained.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

2d Exception.—“ And the said Lord Jeffrey did further observe to the jury, that though the issue was merely, whether the defenders’ operations were ‘ to the nuisance of the pursuer,’ the conclusion of the action was, interdict only; and that there was no claim for past damages before them, though such a claim might have been competently combined with the conclusion for interdict de futuro; and also pointed out to them, that appeared from the record, that, before the issue was taken, certain improvements and precautions had been adopted by the defenders, with a view to prevent any injury to the pursuer from their works; and that they averred that such precautions were sufficient to prevent such injury, while the pursuer denied that they were sufficient; and with reference to these observations, the said Lord Jeffrey did thereafter direct the jury, in point of law—That if, after the period when the complaint upon the part of the pursuer in this case had been made, as to the use of the water, but before the issue was taken, precautions had been taken upon the part of the defenders, which had reduced the pollution below what amounted to a nuisance, although that pollution had formerly amounted to such nuisance, these precautions formed a defence against the complaint of nuisance, and would entitle the defenders to a verdict; and further, that if the precautions employed at the date of the trial of the said issues were greater than they had been at first, and that the jury were satisfied, in the exercise of a sound discretion, that, on looking at the case as it then stood, and the state of the water at the period of the said trial, there was no reason for putting down the works of the defenders, which was substantially the object of the action; that, with reference to the conclusions of the action, and the terms of the issues, they were entitled to take this also into their consideration.”

The exception taken commenced with the words, “ That if, after the trial,” &c.

The pursuers objected to this direction, (1.) because it was beyond the province of the jury to look to the conclusions of the action, whether they were merely for interdict, or otherwise; or to look to the consequences of the action, such as putting down the works, which the pursuer denied would result from it. The sole province of the jury was to give an answer, upon the evidence, to the issues under trial. (2.) If there were grounds to justify a complaint for nuisance, at the date of raising the action, and prior thereto, the jury were bound to find for the pursuer, notwithstanding

219. any subsequent precautions; both, because the issue, by its expression, drew back to the year 1826; and because, it was enough to justify an action for interdict if a nuisance existed when the action was raised; otherwise, the nuisance might only be abated during the dependence of any such action, and immediately revived as soon as it was over.

The defenders, M'Kay and M'Donald, answered, (1.) that the reference to the conclusions of the action was competently made, in the circumstances, by way of aiding the judge in construing the import of the issues, in doing which it was necessary to keep in view that they had been taken in an action concluding for interdict, and not for damages; and (2.) that, as the issues drew back to 1826, and interdict as at present time, and for the future also, was concluded for, the jury were bound to keep in view, not merely the state of the water as in 1826, but any subsequent alterations in the works which might have abated the nuisance, because the jury were bound to answer as to the nuisance only in 1826, but at any part of the subsequent period, until the date of trial.

LORD GILLIES.—I entirely dissent from that part of the charge which is under this exception. It assumes that, although a nuisance had existed at the time, so that the action as raised, was well-founded, yet if the precautions which were actually employed at the date of the trial, were sufficient, to abate the nuisance, the defenders were to have a verdict in their favour. So that even although the pursuer's action was well-founded when raised, and when the defenders entered into the contract of litiscontestation with him, yet if the defenders afterwards, before settling the issues, were so sensible of their being in the wrong, that they made an alteration in their works, and thereby abated the nuisance, the result would be that the defenders should have a verdict in their favour, and the pursuer's action would be defeated. The consequence of this might very likely be that, as soon as the verdict was gained by the defenders, they would recommence the nuisance; and, if the pursuer were to attempt again so abortive a process as an action for interdicting a nuisance, the defenders would once more remove the nuisance before coming to the jury, and once more would gain a verdict in their favour. At least they would be as well entitled to gain such a verdict the second time as the first; but I think they were not entitled to gain a verdict either on the one occasion or the other. I think this exception ought to be sanctioned.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion; and as the issue expressed embraced a period antecedent to the action, it was impossible that any operation subsequent to the action, could entitle the defenders to a verdict as to the existence of a nuisance anterior to it.

LORDS PRESIDENT and CORRIHOUSE expressed their concurrence.

4th Exception.—It had appeared in evidence, at the trial, that the amount of pollution or deterioration of the water, varied at different periods, and in reference to this circumstance, the following direction was given:—

"And the said Lord Jeffrey did further direct the said jury, in point law, that it was matter for the consideration of the jury, that the pollution of the water in this case was not constant but fluctuating, and that they were satisfied this truly was so in point of fact, that, in point of law, there might be cases in which, although the intensity of the offence might be such as, if permanent, would amount to an intolerable nuisance, the long intervals at which it occurred, or the shortness of its duration at each return, might still protect the establishment, to which it was essential, from being interdicted as a nuisance; and that, if they were satisfied that, in this case, there were fluctuations and intermissions of character and extent, then that they should find a verdict for the defenders."

No. 210.

Mar. 11, 1888

Dunn v.
Hamilton.

The pursuer objected to this part of the charge, both on account of being altogether vague, in regard to the kind of intermissions which might render the pollution less than a nuisance; and also, because he was not bound to submit to a pollution, recurring at any intervals which might suit the convenience or pleasure of the upper tenant or heritor. It was implied, in the charge, that, if permanent, such pollution would be a nuisance; and if so, the pursuer was not bound to submit to it for any period whatever; nor was there even any guarantee, as to the duration, that these arbitrary periods would continue the same as in time past.

Donald and M'Kay answered, that every nuisance was a question of circumstances, and of degree. One of the elements to be considered was the intensity of the pollution of the water; but another was its permanency. The same pollution, whether of smoke in the atmosphere, or in the stream, which would not be a nuisance, though occurring once a-year, might be a nuisance if of hourly occurrence. The charge had adverted to the circumstance of permanency, as one element in the definition of nuisance, deserving the attention of the jury; and it was not objectionable in doing so. In regard to the alleged vagueness, that was inherent in the nature of the subject.

LORD GILLIES.—In regard to this exception, I certainly feel considerably at a loss to know what was the law actually laid down by it. Nothing is said which gives the smallest clue to what is to be understood by the "long intervals" at which the pollution might recur, or the "shortness of duration" at each recurrence.

Whether it was to be considered as occurring at long intervals, if it happened once a-year, once a-month, or ten times a-day, is not said; nor what is to be considered length of duration. But although I feel, therefore, that this part of the charge is too loose, and on that account is objectionable, I am not prepared to make any other observation upon it than this.

THE PRESIDENT, MACKENZIE, and COREHOUSE expressed their concurrence.

Exception.—"And further, the said Lord Jeffrey did direct the jury, in point of law, that, although the water of the stream in question had, in the opinion of the jury, in point of fact, been rendered unfit for the operations of the defenders, for the purposes of bleaching and finishing; yet, if the water was still fitted for all common uses, and uses to which it had hitherto been applied, the pursuer was not entitled in order to put down the works of the defenders, to suggest some peculiar use not actually existing, such as that of bleaching and finishing, which alone the said water might be unfitted; and, therefore, this ground of unfitness for bleaching and finishing, considered by the pursuer was not entitled to a verdict."

The pursuer pleaded, that this direction was erroneous, as he was entitled to receive the water from the upper heritor, not only fit for purposes to which it had hitherto been applied, but fit for every purpose to which water, in its state of natural purity, could be applied. Its commercial value was instantly affected, if it was rendered unfit for any purpose to which it would otherwise be applicable; and, in point of amenity, the pursuer had also a right to object to any deterioration.

M'Donald and M'Kay answered, that every question of nuisance was a question of circumstances. The pursuer had large manufactures on the stream; the water was only used by them (defenders) in the way as the pursuer himself used it; and if it remained fit for all common uses, and for all the uses to which the pursuer at present applied, he had no ground of complaint, although it was possible to establish a manufacture for which it might prove unfitted.

LORD GILLIES.—I think this exception should not be sustained, and the doctrine laid down in charging the jury was well founded.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. Where there is no abatement actually existing, in the present state of things, it is not enough for the pursuer to put a hypothetical case, and say that there may possibly be an abuse if it ever happens.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I concur. It is not enough for the pursuer to say he afterwards shall erect a bleachfield, the state of the water will then be a nuisance. We do not know what may be the nature of any such work erected—we know nothing at all about it; and the pursuer is not entitled to an interdict in respect of the mere possible erection of a work, which may be built.

LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

6th Exception.—"And the said Lord Jeffrey did further direct the jury, in point of law, that with respect to the liability of the landlord and the principal tenant, under the second issue,—assuming that it had been actual nuisance proved—as there was nothing to connect the defenders with the supposed nuisance, but the lease and sub-lease, granted by them respectively, there was no ground in law for holding that either of them, had authorized, or were answerable for that nuisance. That the other defenders, the persons in occupation, did not stand liable." of agents or servants of the landlord or principal tenant, and that No. 214 if they might have misused the manufactory, the landlord was not Mar. 11, 18 or a nuisance by the tenant in occupation, unless that nuisance Dunn v. was sanctioned by him. That as the lease in this case said nothing Hamilton.

 of turkey-red dyeing, but simply related to dyeing, which did not constitute the establishment of any dye-work poisonous to the water, this did not imply a license to carry on the dye-work in such a way as to be a nuisance. That the question then was, Whether it was possible to carry on dye-work on this stream at an ordinary profit, without committing a nuisance? That the pursuer having led no evidence that this could not be done, the defenders, in this second issue, were entitled to a presumption in their favour, and that if the jury were satisfied, in point of fact, that dye-work might be carried on in these premises without a nuisance, no injury might be prevented without much expense, then the landlord was not liable for any negligence in the carrying on of the work; there was no proof to connect him or the principal tenant with carrying on dye-work except the lease, they were not responsible in the carrying on of that work, or for any nuisance thereby occa-exception related solely to the landlord, Hamilton, and the principal tenant, Arthur.

The pursuer, in support of the exception, pleaded, that these defenders were fully identified with the sub-tenants. When the action was raised, they had disclaimed the operations of the sub-tenants, and admitted the operations to be a nuisance, and unwarranted by the lease, they have raised the pure question, whether the operations were sanctioned by the lease or not; and, if unsanctioned by the lease, they might maintain that no interdict should apply to them. But, in place of this, so, they had taken an opposite course. Hamilton had specially in his defences that "no injury was done to the water by the operations carried on in the dye-work;" and Arthur, who drew twice as much sum in name of sub-rent as he paid in name of rent, and took the tenants bound to erect additional buildings to the extent of £800, would not be allowed now to separate his interests from theirs. But, instead of these circumstances, if, on the one hand, the operations of the sub-tenants were not sanctioned by the lease or sub-lease, then Hamilton and Arthur had no interest to oppose an interdict which prohibited them from doing, or authorizing to be done, an unlawful operation; and if, on the other hand, the operations were sanctioned by the lease and sub-lease, then they had no right to oppose an interdict which was not merely justifiable, but necessary, against them, as well as against the tenants. There were, therefore, no just grounds on which the landlord and principal tenant could be separated from that of the tenants, in the event of it being proved that the operations of the tenants amounted to a nuisance.

210. Hamilton answered. His predecessor had let a lease of the premises "to be used for the purpose of bleaching, dyeing, or printing, and any operations connected with bleaching, dyeing, or printing, or for any other purpose." To enter into such contract of lease was a lawful exercise of the right of property, provided that such operations could be carried on without nuisance. Arthur had occupied the premises, until 1826, without any allegation of nuisance; and there was no evidence led to prove that the whole powers conferred by the lease could not be used without any nuisance. But unless this was proved, the actual abuse of power by the sub-tenant if they had abused it, could no more expose the landlord to an interdict than the mere act of signing the lease could have done; for the landlord was in no way connected with these operations except by having granted the lease, and he did not reap any benefit whatever from the increase payable under the sub-lease. At the date when the action was brought, therefore, the pursuer had no ground for claiming interdict against defender Hamilton, who was entitled to object to any interdict granted against him, if not warranted by his having either done, or threatened to do, what was unlawful. In regard to what happened after the action

<sup>1</sup> Henderson and Thomson v. Shaw Stewart, June 23, 1818. This case has not hitherto been reported; a short report of it is now subjoined, which has been prepared from the Session papers:—

No. 211.

HENDERSON and THOMSON, Pursuers.—Greenshields.
SIR MICHAEL SHAW STEWART and OTHERS, Defenders.—Shaw Stewart

Lease—Reparation.—A proprietor granted a lease of a mill and mill-lan to a tenant, his heirs and assignees, for a period of 99 years; the lease empowered the tenant "to erect dams for collecting the water" in certain lands, "he always paying damages to the tenants and possessors of the adjacent lands occasioned thereby." The tenant erected a dam of great extent, and afterwards assigned away the lease. Some time after the new tenant was in possession, the embankment of the dam gave way, and the water rushing out, occasioned extensive injury to some inferior property; the parties injured, raised an action of damages against the tenant, and against the representative of the granter of the tack, as liable jointly and severally with the tenant, or at least subsidarily for him; they alleged that the injury was occasioned by the culpable negligence of the tenant in failing to keep the dam in a state of sufficient repair:—Held, that, assuming this to be true, the injury had resulted solely from the fault of the tenant, which was not authorized by the lease, and for which, therefore, the landlord was not responsible.

June 23, 1818. BY a lease dated January 29, 1796, Sir John Shaw Stewart of Greenock, James Boyle and Co., merchants in Greenock, and "their heirs and assigns" granted all and hail that mill called the Easter Mill of Greenock, with the mill-lan and mill-lan lands, ascribed mill-lan, dues, services, and sequels of the same, with the mill-lan and mill-lan belonging to the said mill, with the pertinents, as the said mill and mill-lan were formerly possessed by Robert Bain and now by the said pursuers, and that for the full time and space of 99 years, to be peaceably bruiked and enjoyed by the aforesaid company, &c., with liberty also to the tacksmen and assigns of the said company to erect dams for collecting the water in the burn of Crawford's Burn in the Muirs of Greenock, they always paying the damages to the tenants and possessors of the adjacent lands occasioned thereby." Power was given to the ed, in framing the landlord's defences, that could not justify the action, otherwise unfounded. But besides, there was nothing in the defences to take down the mill and houses, "and to convert them into any use they pleased," condition of always having buildings on the mill-lands, of equal value. The party let was part of an entailed estate. The rent due for the first eight years to be £6. 5s., and thereafter, in money, £4. 9s., and in oatmeal, eight bolls and a firloot. The landlord bound himself to warrant the tack "at all hands and inst all deadly."

No. 210

Mar. 11, 1816
Dunn v. Hamilton.

No. 211

June 23, 1816
Henderson v Stewart.

This lease was afterwards vested, by assignation, in Matthew and James Bryce. The rights of the cedents were conveyed to them, "together with the buildings and others erected upon the site of the foresaid mill, damhead, and inlair thereto adjoining, and embankment by us at the back of the Whin hill, together with the water-wheel," &c.

The cedents of Messrs Bryce, had erected an earthen embankment, forming a reservoir for collecting the water in the Muirs of Greenock, belonging to Sir John Shaw Stewart. This erection was not made on the premises contained in the tack, but on a distinct part of the estate of Sir John, in virtue of the power granted, to erect dams and collect water. The reservoir extended over three Scots acres; the depth of water, at the centre, was twenty feet; and the average depth, from six to eight feet. The site of the reservoir was several hundred feet above Cartsdyke, where Messrs Henderson and Thomson had a tan-work.

In the night of March 15th, 1816, after a heavy fall of rain, the embankment gave way; and the water rushed down, and injured or destroyed the property of Henderson and Thomson and others.

Henderson and Thomson raised an action of damages against Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, who was now the landlord under the tack, and the representative of Sir John Stewart, as heir of entail. The amount concluded for, in their action, and in a similar action raised by another party, was £1258. Both actions were also directed against Messrs Bryce the tenants; the pursuers maintaining that Sir Michael was either liable jointly and severally with his tenants, or at least subsidiarily after they were discussed.

The pursuers alleged that since the tack was acquired by Messrs Bryce they had neglected duly to repair the embankment, and had failed to keep a servant there for the purpose of permitting the escape of any excess of water, by means of sluices constructed for that purpose, or otherwise to open the sluices when necessary; and, in particular, that, on the night when the embankment gave way, the sluices were not opened. They alleged also that Sir Michael had failed to cause attention to be paid to the repair of the embankment and opening of the sluices, although all this was necessary for the security of the pursuers and others.

Sir Michael pleaded separate defences from the tenants, and contended, in substance, that "it was implied in any permission which his predecessors granted, that the dam should be sufficient and kept in proper repair; and if it was not, the reservoir was just as unauthorized by him, as any act from which injury or violence could result to the pursuers or the public."

Memorials were ordered, and the pursuers pleaded, that, in exercising any of the rights of property, a proprietor was bound to have regard to the security of his neighbours and the public. He was equally liable in damages for injury done by his own culpable negligence, and for that done by the culpable negligence of his tenants. And when, in place of exercising the rights of property directly, he, for numerous cause, conferred on tenants the right to exercise them, he could not oblige by shift from himself the responsibility resulting from their being exercised by a tenant, with such culpable negligence, as to occasion injury to third parties.

See Black, Dec. 14, 1866 (13974); Brown, Feb. 5, 1813, F.C.; Lord Keith, June 10, 1812, 2 Black, Feb. 9, 1804 (13905); Innes, Feb. 6, 1798 (13189).

210. show that Hamilton had ever sanctioned any one unlawful operation of sub-tenants. He had no personal cognizance of their actual operations and was entitled, if not even bound, to believe them lawful, till the contrary was proved. And if the whole defences were taken together they must be, they amounted precisely to this, that the premises were let, for similar purposes to those in this lease, for a period exceeding prescription; that, no injury was done to the water, but that, "at all times if any injury occasionally happens, it must be owing to the negligent misconduct of the tenants themselves, in exercising their powers under the lease, which are in no degree necessarily productive of injury

211. In the present instance it must be assumed, hoc statu, that the embankment way, in consequence of the culpable negligence of the tenants; and the landlord's responsibility was the more apparent, as the operation of making the dam was expressly sanctioned by the lease, and it was foreseen to be so hazardous, that an express obligation was inserted, binding the tenant to pay damages to the owners of the adjacent lands. In this case the landlord was bound, in an unusual manner, to a vigilant superintendence of the mode in which the operation of embanking was carried on, because, from the magnitude of the operation, it necessarily involved the interests of third parties to a very great extent, and it was therefore more than ordinarily hazardous.

Sir Michael pleaded, that, by the terms of the lease granted by his predecessor, all the powers conferred on the tenant were lawful in themselves, if exercised in a lawful manner. If the tenant exercised any of them in an unlawful manner, he acted under no authority derived from the landlord, but committed a fault of his own, acting with himself alone. The common rule, culpa tenet suos auctores, applies to this case, so as to exempt the landlord, as effectually as any third party, from responsibility for a fault in which he had no share or participation. And if any other rule was to be followed, the responsibility of landlords would be without limit, and one might be ruined, by the fault of one of his tenants, however impossible it might have been for him to prevent it from being committed. In the present case the hardship would be peculiarly apparent as the tenants possessed a right of way for 99 years, granted by Sir Michael's predecessor, and transmissible to his assigns, so as altogether to exclude any defectus persone.

In regard to the clause binding the tenants to pay damages to "the tenants and possessors of the adjacent lands," it merely referred to the surface damages which might be occasioned in forming and feeding the dam. But even if it had a wider application, it could not have increased, though in some views it might have diminished, the landlord's responsibility. In England, the law affecting the landlord's responsibility placed it on the same footing as the defender now occupies.

LORD GILLIES, Ordinary, "sustained the defences pleaded for the tenant, Michael Shaw Stewart, absolved him from the hailable conclusions of the Lords decessors." His Lordship also subjected the pursuers in expenses.

The pursuers presented a reclaiming petition, which, on June 23, 1811, the Court refused without answers.

J. GRAIG, W.S.—W. PATRICK, W.S.—Agents.

<sup>1</sup> Balmagowne, July, 1611; Smith, March 8, 1810, F.C.; Dig. l. 9, t. 3.

<sup>2</sup> Blackst. 4, 14; Tenant, June 30, 1791, 4 T. R. 318; Payne, Nov. 15, 1794, 1 Blackst. 350.

ter, and for this they alone are responsible." There was nothing in these defences which could in any way affect the separate defence of the landlord; and besides, the objection to the charge, so far as regarded the readings, resolved into an objection to an observation on evidence, and was not an exception to the law laid down by the judge, which, looking at the lease and sub-lease as the only evidence against the landlord and principal tenant, was incontrovertible.

The fact that a separate issue had been taken, as to the landlord and principal tenant, showed that their case was viewed as distinct from that of the sub-tenants. In the charge at the trial the presiding judge was therefore well-founded in the direction he gave, which was, merely, that nothing connected them with the operations complained of, except the lease and sub-lease, the verdict must be in their favour on the second issue, if the purposes specified in the lease, for which the premises were let, were such as they could be applied to without committing a nuisance; and that no operations of the nature of a nuisance were to be presumed to be in the contemplation of any landlord in letting a lease for purposes on its face lawful.

Arthur made a similar answer, but with this difference, that, in his defences he had made no allegation whatever as to the operations of the sub-tenants, except that if they injured the water, they were not authorized by him.

LORD GILLIES.—This exception requires particular attention from the Court, and it is perhaps attended with more difficulty than the others. The charge to the jury stated that "the lease said nothing as to turkey-red dyeing, but simply related to dyeing, which did not mean the establishment of any work poisonous to the water," and was no license to carry on a nuisance. If this were a question merely of interpretation of the terms of the lease, I think they do not authorize a nuisance, and had the landlord simply rested upon this, and disclaimed the operations of the sub-tenants, and admitted the nuisance, or merely said they were authorized to act according to the terms of the lease and not otherwise, I might have been satisfied that his case was separate from theirs, and his defence well founded. It was clearly proper to call him for his interest, however free he might personally be from connection with the nuisance; because, in asking interdict against the sub-tenants as to their use of the stream under his lease, he is the party having the permanent interest in the subjects let, and it was proper to call him. But, when so called, he was not content himself with the defence to which I have referred; and of course was open to him to take whatever line of defence he chose. So far from admitting the nuisance, he specially alleges that there is none; for his defences bear "in point of fact, no injury is done to the water by the operations carried on in the dyework occupied by the defender's tenants." And he subjoins a distinct plea in law, that "no actual injury is suffered to warrant the conclusions of the jury." By this conduct he does necessarily imply an approbation of the uses which the dye-work had been put. By maintaining that the sub-tenants have committed a nuisance in their mode of exercising the powers contained in the lease of the premises, I think he has identified his case with theirs, in a question of

No. 21

Mar. 11, 18
Dunn v.
Hamilton.

2216. nuisance and interdict, which turns altogether upon the use to which I actually put the work. I would, therefore, incline to sustain this excepti

1897. LORD MACKENZIE.—In regard to this exception I am rather inclined that the direction given at the trial was right. The second issue was during the said period, the defender, Hamilton, or his predecessors, or others, Arthur, by themselves, or another, or others authorized by them, did fully pollute and spoil the water of the said burn, so as to injure the quality of the same, to the nuisance of the pursuer, as proprietor of the said The question, therefore, was, whether the landlord and principal tenants selves, or by others authorized by them, did wrongfully pollute the water this means whether the pollution was made by persons authorized by them period when the pollution took place, and that any thing stated in the after the action was brought into Court, would not warrant a verdict against if they had not previously authorized that pollution.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I concur with Lord Gillies as to the sixth exception appears to me to involve the only difficult point in the case. I am clear opinion that no man is entitled to ask an interdict against another, merely because says that that other has no interest to object to be interdicted from whatful. A man must show either that he has actually suffered, or has such cause to apprehend the risk of suffering, at the hands of another, before entitled to ask an interdict against him. The question here is whether Hamiltonized these operations. The learned judge who presided at the jury trial he did not, because the terms of the lease do not authorize them. But somewhat different view of this question. I think that we are entitled to view the terms of the defence along with those of the lease. The defender that he authorized all operations under the lease which did not amount to a and in the defences he states that the operations of the sub-tenants did not to nuisance. This, by fair implication, imports that he authorized the operations of the sub-tenants. I, therefore, feel much doubt as to the direction given at trial; and I think the exception should be sustained.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This exception is the only one as to which I have experienced any difficulty; but I am of the same opinion with the majority of Lordships. I rather think that the learned judge at the trial had omitted to order, at this part of the charge, that the action was for interdict only and damages. His Lordship observed to the jury, that the pursuer had led to that it was impossible to carry on the dye-work at an ordinary profit without committing a nuisance (which, by the by, was laying rather more upon the defender than he was bound to perform); and then his Lordship afterwards observed "the landlord was not liable for any negligence in the carrying on of the dye-work." Now it appears to me that this consideration would have been proper in a case of an action of damages, but not in this action, which only concluded for interdict. And, on the whole, I think this exception also should be sustained.

The LORD PRESIDENT also observed, that, if a party only asked an interdict against what was unlawful in itself, no other party had a right to object to the interdicted from doing what was unlawful; and that this general rule applied to the party opposing the interdict had committed the thing complained of. Now it appears to me that this consideration would have been proper in a case of an action of damages, but not in this action, which only concluded for interdict. And, on the whole, I think this exception also should be sustained.

No. 210

May 11, 193

M'Whic v. McWhell.

Maxwell, 1971

f

No. 212

2 11 10

11, 18

2d Divisio

Jury Cause

212. new trial should not be granted, on the ground of the verdict 11, 1837. against evidence, but the Court, after hearing parties on the i Sir v. the evidence, holding that sufficient cause had been shown why Hall. dict should not be set aside, refused the motion.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The sole ground of the rule which has been is that the verdict was against evidence, and on that ground alone the motion be disposed of. The principles on which such application is to be determined fully explained in the valuable work of the Lord Chief Commissioner of jury in civil causes. I had occasion, at an early period of our new system my views as to the principles on which we ought to proceed in such a case have been approved of by his Lordship, and I trust are conformable to the and authorities of the law of England. (His Lordship here referred to Jury Trial, p. 249, et seq.) The sound judicial discretion to be exercised Court will not warrant a new trial on this ground, merely because a verdict has been disapproved of by the judge who tried the case, or because the Court argument, are disposed to differ from the jury; and certainly not where there has been a contrariety of evidence, and where those who afterwards hear the fully discussed are not satisfied that upon the evidence adduced at the trial a different verdict ought not to have been returned. Now to apply these principles to the present case, it is impossible for me to hold that the verdict in question is against evidence. That there was a contrariety of evidence is certainly true, and especially by opposite sets of scientific witnesses adduced by the parties, differing of maps, &c. But there was a strong body of witnesses giving evidence as to knowledge and general understanding and belief, which Lord Gifford held to be of importance in reference to such an investigation, and as to the acts and intentions of individuals, all in favour of the defender in the issue, and in support of the verdict. Keeping in view the evidence afforded by the maps, &c., it is a grave consideration how far mere scientific opinions, from however skillful witnesses they have come, ought to overrule all other evidence in regard to the facts here put in issue. We all know that in the case of the Tay fishings the evidence of the same engineer who is here adduced, which fixed the position of the Tay I believe above Newburgh, was entirely disregarded, and the limit of the Tay and its estuary fixed at Abertay, the natural bar of that river, on which the Court, acting as a jury, held to be sufficient. (His Lordship here referred farther to the evidence.) On the whole, in the exercise of that discretion with which we are intrusted, I do not feel warranted in granting a new trial being one thing to grant a rule to show cause, and quite another thing to grant that rule absolute.

The other Judges having concurred,

THE COURT discharged the rule.

WILLIAM MARTIN, S.S.C.—ALEXANDER GOLDIE, W.S.—Agents.

<sup>1</sup> Dec. 20, 1836, ante, p. 299.

No. 213

WILLIAM ANDERSON, Complainer.—*D. F. Hope—Ivory.*JOHN HARVEY, Respondent.—Keay—M'Neill—Marshall.

Mar. 11, 18

Anderson v.

Harvey.

Public Officer—Interdict—Stat. 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 112, and 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 77.—In an application at the instance of a Town-Clerk, acting as clerk of police court, to have a party who had been appointed to the latter office by Police Commissioners for the town, interdicted from discharging its duties,—instances in which interdict granted, and bill of suspension passed to try question as to the right of appointment.

By the Leith Police Act, 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 112, appointing Commissioners of Police for the burgh, it is provided in sect. 35, “that it shall be the duty of the said Commissioners, and they are hereby authorized and empowered to appoint a clerk, collector, treasurer, assessor, and all other persons necessary towards the execution of this Act &c., “and generally to execute the whole matters by this act committed to their charge.” By sect. 137, it is enacted “that the town-clerk of Leith appointed by the said Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town Council of the city of Edinburgh, shall be clerk to the courts of police to be held under the authority of this act, and shall have such suitable salary as may be fixed by the said Commissioners, provided that nothing contained in this clause shall be construed to apply to the clerk of the court of the sheriff-substitute.” And by sect. 138, it is farther enacted, “that if the said town-clerk shall neglect or refuse to discharge his duties of clerk to the police court, a representation to that effect shall be made to the said sheriff-substitute, or by the said magistrates to the said Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council of Edinburgh, and the said Lord Provost and Magistrates shall, after due inquiry, make due provision for the discharge of the said duties, by appointing a proper person to perform the same; or if the said Lord Provost and Magistrates shall neglect or refuse to take the necessary steps for the said purpose, within twenty-one days after such representation, it shall and may be lawful for the commissioners to appoint a proper person to discharge the said duties.”

By the Burgh Reform Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 77, providing for the municipal government of various towns, including Leith, it is enacted, “that it shall be lawful for the magistrates and council of any such burgh or town to elect a town-clerk for such burgh or town, for the period of one year, without prejudice to his re-election, and also without prejudice to the lawful right of any existing town-clerk, in any such burgh or town, to hold the office of town-clerk, or clerk to the magistrates and council ad idem aut culpam.”

By the Leith Police Acts prior to the 7 and 8 Geo. IV., the Commissioners were empowered to appoint clerks and other officers. In the case of successive appointments of a clerk to the board, including that of

March 11, 18

2D DIVISION

Bill-Chamberlain

Lord Cunningham

same.

T.

1837. the late Mr Hugh Veitch in 1809, the choice of the Commissioners fell upon the person who happened at the time to be town-clerk of Leith. Mr Veitch was the town-clerk of Leith at the time of the passing of the act of Geo. IV., holding his appointment from the Magistrates of Edinburgh, and discharging at the same time the duties of clerk of police. The complainer Anderson held for some years a commission from him as town-clerk depute, and in June, 1836, when Veitch's health totally failed, was conjoined with him in the office of town-clerk by the Magistrates and Town Council of Leith, in virtue of the powers conferred upon them by the 2<sup>d</sup> and 3<sup>d</sup> Will. IV. c. 77, and he thereafter discharged the whole duties of the office, including those of clerk of police. Mr Veitch died on the 15th January, 1837, and on the 21st Anderson was appointed town-clerk by the Leith Magistrates and Council, and in right of this appointment assumed the office of clerk of the police court, officiating regularly as such, and receiving possession of the records of court. On the 27th the Commissioners of Police held a meeting, and, by a majority, passed a resolution to the effect that they alone had the right to appoint their clerk. They accordingly appointed the respondent Harvey, who had been formerly named as the clerk for keeping their books and authenticating extracts, &c.

In these circumstances, Anderson presented a bill of suspension and interdict, founding on the 137th and 138th sections of the existing police act, stating the circumstances of his appointment, and praying for letters of suspension, and in the mean-time for an interdict prohibiting and discharging Harvey from acting or attempting to act as clerk of the police court of Leith.

Interim interdict having been granted, the Police Commissioners sided themselves as parties in name of their clerk, Harvey, and contended in answer:—

The complainer has, in the circumstances, no right or title to make the present application. By the existing as well as previous police acts, the Commissioners are expressly authorized to appoint their clerk, whose office is perfectly distinct from that of town-clerk of Leith, and requires and has hitherto received a separate appointment from the Board. The two offices are not so identified that the appointment of town-clerk carries with it the appointment of clerk of police, for if such were the case, the party appointed town-clerk might be compelled to discharge the duties of clerk of police or be removed, which is an impossible supposition. By the sections founded on of the act 7 and 8 Geo. IV., provision was made for "the clerk appointed by the Magistrates and Town Council of Edinburgh" being continued in the clerkship of police; but that provision must now fail entirely, since the right of appointing the town-clerk of Leith is no longer in the Magistrates of Edinburgh, and the complainer was in point of fact appointed by the Magistrates of Leith under the 26th section of the Burgh Reform Act. This section, however infer upon these parties the appointment to the separate and entirely No. 213.

ent office of clerk to the Police Court of Leith. While, therefore, Mar. 11, 1831 Magistrates of Leith acquired no power to appoint, the Magistrates Anderson v.
Edinburgh confessedly had no longer such power, consequently the Harvey.
ntment to the office in question came to be vested in the Commisrs, and fell to be made by them under the 35th section of the Police

Though the bill should be passed, yet, as the complainer has ex-no regular appointment from parties entitled to give it, while the ndent holds his appointment from the Commissioners, who are essly authorized by the Police Act, the interdict ought not to be ted.

he complainer replied—

is clear that the bill ought to be passed to try the question as to the t of appointment to the clerkship of police, which under the 137th ision of the act, must be held to be with the Magistrates of Leith, ccessors of the Magistrates of Edinburgh in the right of naming the -clerk of Leith, this provision importing a restrictive and not a destrative quality in the appointment to that office. The complainer, ever, is also entitled to the interdict prayed for, in virtue of his ap-tment as town-clerk, both prior and subsequent to the death of ch, and in respect of his having officiated as clerk of police and g in possession of the office.

he Lord Ordinary passed the bill and continued the interdict, adding s interlocutor the subjoined note.*

“ It is not disputed that the complainer is at present the lawfully elected and acting town-clerk of Leith. No doubt he is chosen by the Town Council of
; but the Magistrates and Town Council of Edinburgh do not now elect any -clerk of Leith; they have abandoned or acquiesced in the Parliamentary fer of the patronage of this office to the Town Council of Leith.

The present case then depends on the proper construction that falls to be put e 137th section of the Leith Police Act, which provides that the town-clerk ith, ‘ appointed by the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town Council of the of Edinburgh, shall be clerk to the courts of police,’ &c. &c.; and the ques-comes to be whether the derivation of the clerk’s appointment, set forth in clause (corresponding with the state of the office at that time), is to be held as trictive quality in his appointment of clerk to the police-court, or merely as a nstrative addition, pointing out more clearly the legitimate and acting town-for the time as the party who was to officiate in the police-court.

At present, the Lord Ordinary’s impression is, that the latter is the sound pretation of the clause. At the date of the Leith Police Act, in 1827, the istrates and Town Council of Edinburgh appointed the Magistrates of Leith as the town-clerk. But that was altered by one of the Scots Municipal Acts in 1833 (3 and 4 Will. IV. cap. 77). The Parliamentary electors then ight in Leith to choose their Councillors, and the latter were authorized to the Magistrates, while the new Town Council were also empowered by 26 to choose the town-clerk, ‘ without prejudice to the lawful right of any ing town-clerk in any such burgh or town, to hold his office of town-clerk, rk to the magistrates and council ad vitam aut culpam.’

Now, it can hardly be questioned that the Magistrates of Leith, as now chosen, 1833/4

213. The respondent reclaimed.

1837. LORD MEADOWBANK.—I have some difficulty. Under the former statutes, there was a clerk who assisted in the police duties who was not appointed by the Magistrates of Edinburgh, but by the Commissioners of Police, pointed the town-clerk of Leith, but not necessarily so, to that office. I want to show that there was no inability in the town-clerk to act as police clerk. Then came the act of 7th and 8th George IV., wherein certain matters were settled by arrangement between Edinburgh and Leith. (His Lordship recited sections 137 and 138 of the act.) The subsequent Burgh Reform Act contains special reference to the Police Act. It merely gives the right of naming a police clerk to Leith as a newly created burgh, and are we by implication to take away the right of naming not only the town-clerk, but also the clerk of police? If such power was transferred to the Magistrates of Leith. Have any other cases been decided on this double right contended for? In regard to the question of possession, Harvey appointed by the Commissioners; and a suspension is brought by Anderson, who is here in petitorio. The question is, who has the prima facie title? Under the words of the public act, under which alone Anderson can pretend, I think Harvey has the better title, and am for refusing the interdict against him.

LORD MEDWYN.—This is certainly a question of possession. Anderson some time past had been acting as police-clerk, under a commission from the Commissioners, though holding no commission in his own name, and was then appointed town-clerk. On Veitch's death he was made town-clerk, continuing to act in the police court. A bill of suspension has been brought, and most have all the police powers transferred to them which their predecessors had. They were appointed by the Magistrates and Council of Edinburgh. The powers given to magistrates by the police statute are held as bestowed on the Magistrates of Leith holding that office according to law, for the time.

---

"On the same principle it would rather appear that a similar construction is applicable to the right given to the town-clerk to be clerk to the police court. The privilege of acting as such must be presumed to have been bestowed on the town-clerk for the time; and although the town-clerk was described in the act as appointed by the Magistrates of Edinburgh, it is not to be inferred that the privilege of officiating in the police-court was not transferable to any party holding the office of sole town-clerk when the nomination passed from the hands of other patrons than the Magistrates of Edinburgh.

"The concluding words also of the 26th clause of the general Municipal Act rather lead to this construction, as it saves the rights of existing town-clerks, vitam aut culpam, thus sanctioning an inference, that after their death, town-clerks shall have all the public and statutory rights and privileges of town-clerks.

"Farther, if the present town-clerk has not a legal right to act as clerk to the police-courts, it is very doubtful if the Commissioners have any right to appoint a clerk for these courts. The 35th and 44th sections of the act relate only to the proper administrative business of the Commissioners, for which a clerk is necessary, and not to the police-courts, where the Commissioners do not officiate.

"These views may very possibly be liable to question; but even if it is proper that such a case as the present should be discussed deliberate, expedite letters and a completed record. If so, it is apprehended, that in the time possession should be given to the clerk appointed by the judges of the court where he is to officiate."

ed to try the question, and the matter for determination by the Court now is No. 213 ely as to the interim possession. (His Lordship referred to the provisions of act 7 and 8 Geo. IV.) I am satisfied that the 137th section was not meant Mar. 15, 18 apply to the sole case of Veitch. The next section seems to me to show that Potts v.
 appointment of clerk of police was to be a permanent one, and that the town-k of Leith was to be the person to discharge its duties; and I cannot but hold effect of this clause to be the same when the town-clerk is elected by the Ma-rates of Leith instead of the Magistrates of Edinburgh. In the circumstances the case, I think that Anderson, being town-clerk of Leith, is prima facie ened to act as clerk of police, and indeed has been acting as such. By continuing interdict against Harvey we shall not be inverting the possession.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It has not been established that Harvey is in such session of this office that by continuing the interdict against him we are turning a out. Anderson is really in possession, and I think we ought to refuse the claiming note.

LORD GLENLEE concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

ALEX. ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—JOHN HARVEY, S.S.C.—JAMES STUART, S.S.C.—Agents.

JURY SITTINGS.

WILLIAM POTTS and ROBERT SCURFIELD, Pursuers.—Robertson— No. 214
Moir.

OLLOCK, GILMOUR, and COMPANY, Defenders.—M'Neill—Marshall.

Proof—Scientific Witness—Ship—Liability of Owners.—1. Witnesses to the and practice of sailing, such as captains in the navy, &c. allowed to be in rt while evidence was leading of the facts as to the bearing of which they were speak, but not during the speeches of counsel. 2. Question as to the liability the owners of a vessel beyond the value of their ship and freight for loss or large sustained by any other vessel or its cargo through collision with it.

This was an action at the instance of the owners of a vessel called the Mar. 15, 18 wing against the owners of the Oxford, setting forth that the Red-while homeward bound from Quebec and in the middle of the 2d Division had been run down and destroyed by the gross negligence, mis- Lord Justice management, and non-adherence on the part of the master or others who Clark.
R.

1837. were in charge of the Oxford, to the established laws and sailing, whereby the pursuers sustained loss and damage to the £2470, as the value of the Redwing, and of the freight of her cargo, concluding for payment of the said sum.

The defence was, that the pursuers' claim was groundless, in that the collision was not occasioned by any negligence or error on the part of those in charge of the Oxford; and that it was an unavoidable accident, or was occasioned by the negligence and error of the persons in charge of the Redwing.

The following issues were sent for trial:—

“It being admitted that on the morning of the 12th day of 1835, a vessel called the Redwing, the property of the pursuer and Scurfield, came in collision with a barque called the Oxford, property of the defenders, in consequence of which collision the Redwing became a total wreck, and was abandoned;—and

“It being admitted that the said vessel and freight were insured by the other pursuers to the extent of £2300 sterling, and that the said sum has been paid to the pursuers, Potts and Scurfield, by the insurers;—

“Whether the loss of the said vessel Redwing was caused by fault, negligence, or want of skill of the master or mariners on board the said barque Oxford, and was to the loss and damage of the pursuers or any of them?

“Sum claimed £2470, 9s., or,

“Whether the said barque Oxford was not of the value of £9s.? And whether the cargo on board of the Redwing at the time said collision was of the value of £550, or part of the said sum?”*

Robertson, for the Pursuers, requested that certain captains of navy and shipmasters, who were to give evidence as to the law practice of sailing, should be allowed to be in Court during the trial, which he stated to have been done in the case of Innes v. Tutein.<sup>1</sup>

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think such witnesses should not be in Court during the opening speech, but if they are to be asked in regard to evidence in the trial they ought to be in Court to hear that evidence, as in the case of the witnesses.

---

* This issue has reference to a provision in the 53 Geo. III. c. 159, whereby it is in substance enacted, that the owners of a vessel shall not be liable for loss or damage sustained, through any act or neglect to which they are not liable, by any other vessel or the cargo thereof, beyond the value of their own cargo, the freight due, or to grow due, for and during the voyage which is in question. In the course of the trial the Lord Justice-Clerk intimated that the law involved in this issue would be reserved; and no evidence or argument was laid before the jury.

<sup>1</sup> 4 Murray, 161.

witnesses in question sat in Court accordingly during the leading evidence as to the situation, &c. of the vessels. No. 214.

appeared that the only matter really in dispute was, whether, when the vessels first came in sight, the Redwing was to windward or to lee of the Oxford. Individuals of the crews of both vessels were examined by the parties respectively, but their evidence was directly contradictory. The case was settled without being put into the hands of the jury on the footing that the pursuer should allow the defender to take the first issue, while the latter withdrew any claim for damages.

Mar. 16, 1835
Russel v.
Shirreffs.

W. POLLOCK, S.S.C.—THOMSONS and ELDER, W.S.—Agents.

JAMES RUSSEL, Pursuer.—D. F. Hope—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford. No. 215.
LUMSDEN SHIRREFFS, Defender.—Robertson—M'Neill—Moir.

Declaration—Agent and Client.—In an action of damages against a country gentleman for posting as a calumniator and coward a client of the firm of which he was a partner, for having made certain statements regarding a business transaction with the firm alleged by the defender to be calumnious, and having refused him personal satisfaction therefor—Verdict for the pursuer with £500 damages.

The defender Shirreffs was an advocate in Aberdeen, and was the partner of a firm which was employed in business by the pursuer Russel. Statements in regard to a transaction with the firm were made by the pursuer, which were alleged by Shirreffs to be calumnious, and for which he demanded personal satisfaction. This satisfaction being refused, he thereafter posted Russel as a calumniator and coward. Founding issue, proceeding, Russel then pursued Shirreffs for damages. The defence was, the fact of the posting being admitted, that the pursuer, under the circumstances, was not liable in damages.

Mar. 16, 1835
2D DIVISION.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
R.

The following issue was sent to the jury:—

It being admitted, that at Mintlaw, on the 14th December, 1835, the defender did put up and publish a placard, containing the following words, viz.—‘James Russel of Aden, &c. Esquire, having indulged in calumnies against me, and having, after correspondence betwixt us, refused to see my friend (who accompanied me from Aberdeen to Old Deer, or to receive any communication from me upon the subject, I publish and post him as a calumniator and a coward.—Old Deer, 14th December, 1835;’ And on the 15th day of the said month and year did put up and publish, in each of the following places in the city of Aberdeen, viz. in the Newsroom of the County Buildings in Union Street, in the Newsroom called the Athenæum in Castle Street,—and in the shop of Mrs Laing, perfumer in Union Street, a placard containing the following words, viz.—‘James Russel of Aden, Esquire, having

215. indulged in false calumnies against me, and, having, after a 47, 1837. correspondence with me upon the subject, refused to apologize my friend (who, in consequence, accompanied me yesterday even Aberdeen to Old Deer), or to receive any communication in regard to it, I now publish and post him as a calumniator and (Signed) Jn. L. Shirreffs.—Union Street, Aberdeen, 15th I 1835 :—

Q. Whether the said words, or any of them, contained in the cards, are of and concerning the pursuer, and are false and to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?

" Damages laid at £5000."

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have no doubt, in point of law, that the one individual by another, in such terms as appear in the admission process, establishes on the face of it a heavy injury. The language is uninjuriously to the party to whom it is addressed. It is no doubt comperson who is brought to answer for such a proceeding in a court o-justify or palliate it by evidence; and you have to say here whethedence has been adduced by the defender. (His Lordship then refevidence in the case.) If you think the proceeding cannot be justify-have the question of the amount of damages. It is not the province o-visit any party with vindictive damages, but looking to the nature of d-situation of the parties, and to what has led to the proceeding in quesportion such rational and fair damages as the party may be entitled to-party who has found himself injured by the proceedings of professio-gives his opinion with reference to these proceedings, he is not to be m-immediate threat of being made personally responsible. Thus, if you pursuer, as I rather think you must do, you will have to find certai-though not vindictive.

Verdict for the pursuer, with £500 damages.

H. INGLIS and DONALD, W.S.—GORDON and BARRON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 216.

ANDREW M'GILL, Pursuer.—D. F. Hope—Robertson
CHARLES FERRIER and OTHERS, Defenders.—M'Neill—An

Meditatione Fugæ Warrant—Reparation—Diligence—Landlord
—1. In an action of damages for wrongous imprisonment by a tenant of against the trustee thereon under a voluntary trust-deed, and two agents by him, where it appeared, inter alia, that the trustee had applied for incarcerate the pursuer as in meditatione fugæ, till he found security for certain arrears and current rents, but for the prospective rents under a lease fifteen years to run—Held that this application was irregular. 2. In a —Verdict for the pursuer, with £200 damages against the principal defendant, and £100 each against the other two defendants.

This was an action of damages for wrongous apprehension and detention in jail, brought by M'Gill, sometime tenant on the estate of M'Neill Gallochoilly, against Charles Ferrier, trustee on that estate, and Lean and Colville, writers in Campbeltown, his agents. The defence was that the proceedings complained of were legal, and warranted by the circumstances.

No. 216.

Mar. 17, 1835

2<sup>d</sup> Division

Lord Justice-Clerk.

R.

M'Gill v.
Ferrier.

The following issue was sent to the jury :—

“ Whether, on or about the 24th day of April, 1835, the defenders, any of them, wrongfully apprehended or incarcerated the pursuer, or wrongfully caused him to be apprehended or incarcerated, and detained in the jail of Campbeltown from the said day till on or about the 12th day of June, 1835, or during any part of the said period, to the loss, injury, or damage of the pursuer ?

“ Damages laid at £3000.”

It appeared, inter alia, from the pursuer's evidence, that M'Gill was tenant on the estate of Gallochoilly in Argyleshire, under a lease, commencing at Martinmas, 1831, which the defenders asserted to be for years, but the term of endurance whereof was disputed by M'Gill: after three years of the lease had run, there being an arrear of £122 at Martinmas, 1834, M'Gill intimated his intention of giving it up, and emigrating to America, whereupon Ferrier, in April, 1835, made an affidavit to the effect, that M'Gill and his co-tenants were indebted to him, as trustee on the estate of Gallochoilly, in the sum just mentioned as due at Martinmas last, and also in the sum of £111 as the rent due at Martinmas, 1835, and also the like sum of £111 yearly, “ for the fifteen years consequent to the said term of Martinmas, 1835,” that is, for the remainder of the 19 years' lease; and, farther, that M'Gill was in meditation of doing so.

Thereafter Ferrier caused the defender, Colville, to present, at his instance, a petition to the Sheriff of Argyle, setting forth, that M'Gill and his co-tenants were owing the arrears of rent, the current rent, and prospective rents above-mentioned, and praying as follows :—“ May it therefore please your Lordship, on considering this petition and the said affidavit, to grant warrant to bring the said Andrew M'Gill before you for examination, and thereafter to grant warrant for imprisoning him in the tolbooth of Campbeltown till he find sufficient caution to the amount of the said debts, acted in your Lordship's court-books, de jure sibi, in any action for payment of said debts already brought, or to be brought, against him at the petitioner's instance in a competent court within six months of the date of said warrant of imprisonment, and find him liable in expenses.”

On advising this petition and affidavit, the Sheriff granted warrant to bring M'Gill to jail, “ there to remain till he finds caution acted in the books of court to the amount of the debts mentioned in the petition, de jure sibi, in any action for payment of the said debts,” &c. There-

216. upon McGill was incarcerated during 49 days, in the course of various procedure took place, and thereafter he was liberated. 217. 1837. of suspension and liberation which was passed by the Court of Session. The defenders led no evidence, but contended, with reference to Ferrier's demand for caution to the extent of the whole rent of fifteen years to run of the pursuer's lease, that he was entitled to make such demand in security of the prospective rents of the lease.<sup>1</sup>

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, in charging the jury, observed :—The main point in the pursuer's case is founded on the prayer of Mr Ferrier's petition in requiring caution to the amount of fifteen years' rent prospectively. I have case pointed out to me warranting such a proceeding, and indeed the difficult one. Should it be decided in favour of the legality of this point there would be the absurdity involved of making tenants absolutely liable for rents during all the years of a lease to run, notwithstanding that the crop in a sterile season is a good defence. I therefore direct you that this point in so far as it regarded caution for the rent of the subsequent years of the lease was irregular, and the defender, Ferrier, is consequently responsible for the result.<sup>2</sup>

THE JURY returned a verdict for the pursuer, with £200 damages against the defender Ferrier, and found for the other two defenders.

E. and A. McMillan, W.S.—W. and J. B. Douglas, W.S.—Agents.

No. 217.

WILLIAM DUNLOP and Co., Pursuers.—D. F. Hope—Neave
GEORGE ANTHONY LAMBERT and OTHERS, Defenders.—Sol.
Rutherford—Robertson—Logan.

Carrier—Ship—Insurance—Jettison—Title to Pursue—Proof.—1. In Newcastle ordered a puncheon of spirits from a dealer in Edinburgh, who packed the puncheon on board a steamer plying from Lenth to Newcastle, obtained a bill of lading which he transmitted to the purchaser along with a charging him with price, freight, and insurance; the seller, at the same time, a bill for the amount, which the purchaser accepted; the puncheon was on the deck; during the voyage a violent storm arose, and the puncheon was overboard, along with almost the whole of the cargo in the hold, for the purpose of lightening the vessel; the seller immediately afterwards sent another puncheon of spirits to the purchaser at Newcastle, intimating that no farther price was charged, except in so far as the second puncheon exceeded the first in value; the seller then raised an action against the purchaser, for the value of the first puncheon, alleging it to have been lost by improper stowage; at a trial before a jury,—Direction by the presiding Judge law.

<sup>1</sup> Cameron v. Stewart, Nov. 18, 1823 (ante, II. 497; new ed. 439); Ward v. Wilson, March 10, 1829 (ante, VII. 566); Dick v. Stewart, 1836 (ante, XIV. 218).

<sup>2</sup> A Bill of Exceptions was tendered by the defender Ferrier to this effect:—

jury should not find the shipowners liable for the value of the puncheon to the pursuers, because, if, on the one hand, it was lost by the fault of the shipowners, they were liable to the purchaser at Newcastle, at whose risk the puncheon was, at the date of shipment; and if, on the other hand, it was lost by a peril of the sea, the shipowners were not liable for its value to any party whatever. 2. Where a contract is proved scripto—Held incompetent to qualify it, in reference to the interests of a third party, by allowing one of the parties to the contract to ask the jury what was his understanding of its import.

No. 217

Mar. 21, 1834

Dunlop v.

Lambert.

WILLIAM DUNLOP and Co., wine and spirit merchants in Edinburgh, sued an action against George Anthony Lambert and others, owners of the Ardincaple steamer, which plied between Leith and Newcastle, claiming for payment of £75, 9s., as the value of a puncheon of whisky shipped on 31st August, 1833, on board the steamer, to the address of Matthew Robson, Newcastle, and not duly delivered. The summons were that the defenders “undertook by their agreement, and were answerable to the said Matthew Robson, for the safe delivery of the said puncheon:” that the puncheon was improperly left on deck, in place of being stowed in the hold, and that “it was washed or thrown overboard, or otherwise lost or destroyed, in consequence of the improper stowage or other fault or neglect of the defenders, or their servants for whom they were responsible;” that the pursuers had reshipped another puncheon of equal value to Robson “in lieu or payment of the one so lost by the defenders;” and that the defenders were liable to them for the value of the cask which was lost.

1st Division

Ld. President

The defenders denied that the cask had been lost through improper stowage, or through any fault of theirs, and alleged it to have been thrown overboard along with almost the whole of the cargo, for the safety of the vessel, in a violent storm; and that its value, along with the rest of the goods thus jettisoned, must form the subject of a general average on the ship, freight, and cargo. They pleaded, separately, that the pursuers had no title to insist for the value of the puncheon, as it was at Robson’s risk at the date of shipment, and he alone was entitled to call them to account for the value of it. The subsequent shipment of a second puncheon to the pursuers to Robson, neither increased nor diminished the liability of the defenders to Robson in regard to the first puncheon.

The following issues were sent to trial:—

1. Whether, on or about the 31st day of August, 1833, the pursuers shipped a puncheon of spirits on board the Ardincaple of Newcastle, a vessel belonging to the defenders, for the purpose of being conveyed to Newcastle, and delivered to Matthew Robson, Newcastle? and,

2. Whether the defenders wrongfully failed to deliver the said puncheon to the said Matthew Robson, and are indebted and resting owing to the pursuers in the sum of £75, 9s., or any part thereof, with interest thereon, as the value of the said puncheon of spirits?”

At the trial it appeared that part of the Ardincaple’s cargo consisted of three puncheons of spirits, three of which were stowed in the hold, and the Newcastle, 10s., insurance,  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, 8s." Robson had directed insurance to be effected.

The pursuers also put in the deposition of Robson, taken on oath, to which no objection was made; but when one of the interrogatories was read in Court, which was to the effect, Whether the pursuers undertook the risk of the puncheon during its transit to the castle?—the defenders objected, that by the written evidence in process the nature of the contract and the relative risk was plain. Soon as the pursuers shipped the puncheon at Leith on board of a sailing ship, the risk was thereafter that of the purchaser, as owner of the goods; and accordingly he had been charged with the cost of it, which would not have attached to him had they not been at his instance. It was true that by competent written evidence, if such had been produced, the pursuers might have proved that their contract with Robson was such that the risk remained with them; but no such evidence was produced, and it was incompetent, by parole proof, to qualify the tenor of the contract. The pursuers answered, that, as Robson was one of the parties to the contract, it was competent to ask him what was his understanding as to its import; so as to prevent a third party from coming in to an effect different from that which was understood by the parties themselves.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question is, at whose risk the puncheon was during the voyage. The understanding of one of the parties, cannot affect the nature of the agreement itself, which is proved scripto. The question is therefore, incompetent.

owing goods on board of steamers, the evidence given, was liable to the observation that the greater part of the witnesses had experience regard to sailing vessels only; and that, while it appeared to be common to ship goods on the decks of steamers than of sailing vessels, it was thought by the witness who had had most connexion with the navigation, that the deck of a steamer was safer than that of a sailing vessel, because it was surrounded by higher bulwarks, and because there was less free room required on deck for the navigation of a steamer, by machinery playing under the deck, than for the navigation of a vessel propelled by sails, which could not be duly worked where the deck was encumbered with goods. But nothing appeared on the proof to establish an actual distinction as recognised in trade between the risk of goods deck-laden in a steamer, and goods deck-laden in a sailing vessel.

No. 21

---

 Mar. 21, 1
 Dunlop v.
 Lambert.

It appeared on the proof that the Ardincaple was well found and fitted for sailing from Leith, but that on her voyage to Newcastle she encountered a violent tempest which exposed her for a considerable time to imminent peril. At one time, a sea broke over her larboard side with such violence as not only to do great injury to the rigging, paddle-boxes, and various parts of the deck, but also to sweep overboard every man on deck but the man at the helm. Nine persons were thus washed overboard, including the master, were drowned. When the vessel, with above 30 passengers on board, was labouring in great distress, she was obliged to heave the cargo overboard and lighten her, for the safety of the passengers and the ship. The two puncheons on deck were thrown over, as well as the whole cargo in the hold, excepting the puncheons stowed there. It was the intention, at one time, to run the contents of these puncheons, and let them mix with the water in which they were, which was six feet deep, so that the whole might be pumped out, and the bungs of the puncheons were started for that purpose, but this attention was abandoned, either because the sailors refused to pump if the spirits were mixed with the water, which they said would kill them while at the pump; or else, because it was found expedient to run the puncheons forward in the ship, and depress her towards the bow, to draw the water towards the most effective pump; or, on both of these considerations united. In the end, the wind drove the Ardincaple, after having had her mainmast and funnel carried away by the board, and losing her anchors, besides sustaining great damage, was towed into Shields harbour by two sailing smacks.

Of the witnesses deposed that the risk of the two puncheons on being exposed to be thrown overboard would have been just the same if they had been in the hold.

Regarding the loss of the puncheon, the pursuers sent off another to Robson; its price was higher, by a few pounds, than that of the first puncheon, and Robson was only charged with the difference of

117. The defenders led no evidence. They pleaded that it was established, by the proof, that the pursuers had no title to demand the value of the puncheon, whether it was lost through the fault of the defenders or not. The puncheon was at the risk of Robson, the purchaser, from the moment of shipment, and he had, accordingly, been charged by the pursuers with freight and insurance. Assuming the pursuers' statement to be true, that the puncheon was lost through the defenders' fault, it follows that no claim could lie against the insurers, as it was not lost through sea-risk; and, therefore, even if the pursuers were themselves the insurers, they had no title, in that character, to claim the value of the puncheon. But if, on the other hand, the puncheon was lost without any fault of the defenders, still the loss was to Robson, the purchaser and proprietor of the spirits, and not to the pursuers; and besides, the defenders in that case, were not liable to any party whatever. Though the pursuers had subsequently sent a second puncheon, without charging a second price, that might have happened from some private circumstances, not disclosed in the proof; or it might have arisen from an erroneous idea of their liability, or from other causes; but, from whatever cause it arose, it could not affect the liability of the defenders for the first puncheon, which remained the same as before. And thus it was Robson alone who was entitled to call them to account. But, separately, it was proved that the puncheon was lost, not from defective stowage, or any fault imputable to the defenders, but in consequence of having been properly jettisoned along with almost the whole cargo for the safety of the passengers, and the ship. The puncheon would equally have been sacrificed if it had been originally in the hold; and the pursuers had no more claim on them for a puncheon so thrown into the sea, to save the ship, than they could have had, if the ship containing the puncheon, had gone to the bottom. For the whole goods jettisoned, a proportional liability attached to the ship, freight, and cargo; but that was not the species of liability founded on in these issues, and, therefore, on the second issue, there ought to be a verdict for the defenders as they had not wrongfully failed to deliver the puncheon.

LORD PRESIDENT in charging the jury, made the following observations.—

The first issue appears to be substantially admitted by the defenders, to the effect that the puncheon of whisky was shipped on board their vessel for the purpose of being conveyed to Newcastle and delivered to Matthew Robson. The second issue is that which is contested, whether the defenders wrongfully failed to deliver the puncheon to Robson, and are indebted to the pursuers for the value of it?

In answering this question, you will keep in view, in the first place, that after the pursuers had shipped the puncheon on board of the Ardincaple, a regular carrying vessel, addressed to Robson, and had procured a bill of lading bearing that the puncheon was deliverable to him or his assignees, which they forthwith transmitted to him, the risk of that puncheon during the voyage was Robson's and not theirs. They had fulfilled their order from Robson, and if the puncheon was lost of the sea, the loss was his and not theirs. Their responsibility as the No. 217.

 the puncheon was at an end.

A point to be noticed is the manner in which the puncheon was stowed Mar. 21, 1887 of the Ardincaple. It can scarcely be said to have been stowed at all, as Dunlop v. Lambert.

secured in the hold, but merely placed upon the deck of the vessel. It tly proved to be the practice of trade that goods which are placed on ad of being stowed in the hold, are at the risk of the owners of the ship, e has been a special agreement authorizing them to be deck-laden. This isistent with common sense, as such goods are evidently exposed to ard on the deck than in the hold; so much so, that a policy of insurance old if goods were deck-laden, without that being specially agreed to in

And of all goods which could be placed on deck, there are scarcely ere less fit for that exposed situation, than a puncheon of spirits, which nt temptation in the way of the sailors.

npt has been made to establish a distinction between steam vessels and sels as to the practice of carrying goods on deck, and as to the under-trade in regard to the risk of goods so carried. It does not appear to y such distinction has been made out. And, therefore, in so far as conmproper stowage of the puncheon, and any responsibility resulting from towage, it appears to me that there was improper stowage by the defend-at the relative responsibility attaches to them.

does not solve the question whether the defenders wrongfully failed to puncheon to Robson; and still less, whether they are liable for the e puncheon to the pursuers. It rather appears to me on the evidence mcheon was lost, not from improper stowage, but from a peril of the sea, oned along with almost the whole of the cargo for the safety of the ship gers. But even supposing that the puncheon was lost from improper he value of it appears to be due not to the pursuers, but to Robson. The after it was shipped and the bill of lading transmitted to Robson, was y and at his risk. The pursuers had no more right or interest remain-puncheon, than they had in any other part of the cargo. And accord-son was charged by them with the cost of insurance, which could only the footing of its being his property and at his risk. In these circumhink the pursuers have no title to recover the value of the puncheon. If, hand, you think that their statement is proved, that it was lost owing to stowage and not owing to a peril of the sea, then, although the defenders or the value of it, it is to Robson alone that they are liable, and not to rs. The pursuers cannot claim its value as proprietors, for they were the proprietors. And even if they were themselves the underwriters who e puncheon, they cannot claim its value in that character, because no lia-shed to them as underwriters, if the puncheon was lost through improper ad not through any peril of the sea. But if, on the other hand, you hold ent of the defenders to be sufficiently proved, that the puncheon was y improper stowage, but by a peril of the sea, then the defenders are not ts value to any person whatever.

whole circumstances, it does not appear to me to be of importance whe-puncheon was lost by a peril of the sea, or by improper stowage, as in the pursuers appear to have no right to recover the value of it.

And to the second puncheon which was sent by the pursuers to Robson,

"On the last point of the second issue, we find that the defenders are to the pursuers for the value of the spirits, because they were not, at the loss, the rightful owners of the goods in question, their invoice shewing their right in the whisky ceased at the time of shipment."

J. MURDOCH, S.S.C.—SARGENT AND ADAM, W.B.—Agents.

No. 218. ALEXANDER MURRAY, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford.
ROBERT DUNCAN DOUGLAS (Clerk to the Road-Trustees of the of Peebles), Defender.—D. F. Hope—Anderson.

Road-Trustees—Reparation.—In an action of damages by the tacksmen of the toll-bar, against the road-trustees, for wrongfully shutting up one of the roads after letting the toll-duties thereon to him,—Verdict for the pursuer, and assessed at £30.

Mar. 21, 1837. ALEXANDER MURRAY, tacksmen of the Craighurn toll-bar, in the district of the county of Peebles, raised an action of damages against the road-trustees, alleging that, on April 21, 1835, they had let to him the toll-duties on the road from Whitsunday, 1835, to Whitsunday, 1836, the tolls leviable on that road, one of which was the old Kingside-Edge road, and that, in the following, they had wrongfully shut up that road, so as to cause damage in the proceeds of the toll-bar, amounting to £60. He asked for payment of £60 in name of reparation.

The trustees pleaded in defence, that the toll-duties on that road were not let to the pursuer, the road having been shut up for a period “Whether, on or about the 21st day of April, 1835, the defenders No: 218.

to the pursuer the toll-duties leviable during the said period at the Mar. 28, 1835 bar on carriages, cattle, and sheep passing along the old Kingside- Falconer v. Cochran lge road, leading from said bar to Howgate; and on or about the 1st y of September, 1835, wrongfully shut up or obstructed, or wrongfully actioned the shutting up or obstruction of the road last aforesaid, to the is, injury, and damage of the pursuer?”

The defenders led no evidence, and

THE JURY found for the pursuer; damages £30.

R. KENNEDY, W.S.—W. MACKENZIE, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN FALCONER, Pursuer.—Maitland—Penney.

JOHN COCHRAN, Defender.—D. F. Hope—Shand.

No. 219.

Reparation—Assault—Jury Trial.—1. Circumstances in which a sum of £20 as awarded in name of damages and solatium for a personal assault, committed der the influence of verbal provocation. 2. It is not admissible for an opening unsel to make a statement to the jury, of a fact which he could not be allowed prove, in respect of its not being in the record.

JOHN FALCONER, surgeon, near Lasswade, raised an action of damages Mar. 23, 1835 account of a personal assault committed on him by John Cochran, 1st Division mer, at Roslin. The damages were laid at £300. Ld. President

Cochran alleged in defence, that Falconer had truly received no iny; or at least that he had given so gross provocation that a sum of s and expenses, was ample compensation, which sum he accordingly dered.

The following issue went to trial:—

“Whether at Loanhead, in the house of the pursuer, and near the ne; or at either of the said places, and on or about the 8th day of June, 36, the defender assaulted and struck the pursuer, to the loss, injury, a damage of the pursuer?”

Evidence was led on both sides at the trial, from which it appeared Falconer and Cochran, with other two persons, had been drinking ether in a public-house from about a quarter of an hour past 9 o'clock the evening of Wednesday the 8th of June, till about 12 o'clock.
ey drank about 9 gills of whisky, and 9 bottles of strong ale, and were much intoxicated. Some indecent conversation passed among them, is rather appeared that Falconer had taken the chief share in this, and he made reflections on Cochran, as if he were the father of a bastard, and which had irritated him considerably. Cochran had also got an altercation with another of the party, which at one time threat-

1837. 219. oned to lead to violence, but this was prevented. At length Falconer left the party, apparently at the request of one of the number, who was apprehensive of a "disturbance" between him and Cochran. He went to his own house, which was within a dozen yards of the public-house, and he was preparing to go to bed, when a knock was heard at the door. The assault occurred almost within a minute, or at least within a very short time indeed, after he had reached home. Falconer's servant opened the door, and Cochran, who had knocked, asked if Falconer was in. Falconer, hearing Cochran's voice, asked him to come in, which Cochran refused to do, but asked Falconer to come out, which Falconer declined. Cochran then went into the house, and, being a powerful man, he seized Falconer by the collar of the coat, and dragged him out into the street, where he knocked him down into the kennel, and kicked him down. After Falconer got to his feet, Cochran struck him again; but with some difficulty, Falconer got back into his own house and shut the door, against which Cochran kicked for some time, and demanded admittance. During the assault Cochran repeatedly made use of very violent and abusive language, saying, among other things, "if it was not to vex me the morn, I would take your life." The latter part of the assault on Falconer's person was committed in presence of his wife, who was agitated by it. Falconer was bleeding at the nose and mouth, and below the left ear, when he got to his own house. He had sustained no serious personal injury, however, being perfectly well next day, and taking a full share of exercise as usual.

When the Dean of Faculty was opening for the defender, Cochran, he was stopped when proceeding to state to the jury that Cochran had been fined for this same assault in the sum of £5, under a prosecution at the instance of the fiscal.

Maitland, for the pursuer, objected to the competency of opening on this subject at all, as it was not stated on the record, and no proof of it could be permitted; but it was irregular to open on that which could not be put in proof.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is not admissible to make the statement, as no proof of it can be allowed.

LORD PRESIDENT, in charging the jury, observed, that no verbal provocation could entirely justify blows, either in a criminal or a civil court, though gross provocation would, in the former court, alleviate the punishment, and in the latter would diminish the damages. His Lordship considered it a case in which gross verbal provocation and insult had led to a drunken brawl; and after pointing out these alleviating circumstances, his Lordship left it in the hands of the jury to deal with the question of damages in the exercise of a sound discretion.

THE JURY found for the pursuer, and assessed the damages at £20.

JAMES BAILLIE and JOHN GRINDLAY, Pursuers.—D. F. Hope—Patterson.

No. 220

WILLIAM YOUNG and OTHERS, Defenders.—M'Neill—Cheape.

Mar. 23, 18
Baillie v.
Young.

Bankrupt.—Fraud.—A creditor, who was ranked on a sequestrated estate, concurred in discharging the bankrupt on a composition of 3s. per pound, and granted receipt for the composition on his own debt at that rate, and discharged it; the bankrupt afterwards raised an action against him for payment of a debt due by him to the bankrupt prior to the sequestration, but which was not given up by the bankrupt among the debts due to him; the creditor then raised a reduction of the discharge under the composition contract, and the receipt for the composition on his debt, as having been fraudulently obtained;—Verdict found, in the circumstances, that the discharge and receipt were obtained by fraud, or fraudulent concealment, on the part of the bankrupt.

In January, 1827, the estates of William Young of the Omoa Iron Works, were sequestrated, and Edward Bailton, agent in Glasgow, was appointed trustee. In June, 1827, the sequestration was wound up under a composition-contract for payment of 3s. per pound, and Young was, in common form, discharged, except as to payment of the composition. In 1831, James Baillie, surgeon in Motherwell, holder of a bill for £76, 14. 6d., and John Grindlay, writer in Hamilton, holder of a bill for £50, obtained respectively from Young the sums of £13, 3s. and £7, 10s., as a composition on their debts, and granted receipts and discharges to Young. Soon afterwards Young raised an action against Baillie for payment of £84 as the price of iron-rails furnished by him, in June, 1826, to Baillie, which were never paid. Baillie denied the debt, but it was proved under a jury trial at the Glasgow Circuit in October, 1827, that the rails had been furnished and had never been paid for. Young did not give up this debt of £84 in the state of affairs shown to his creditors in 1827, upon which state the offer of composition was made and accepted, and in reference to which he had undergone the requisite examinations and taken the relative oath, before obtaining his discharge. One of the books, called a foundry-book, which contained, inter alia, entries relative to the furnishing of the rails, was not exhibited by Young to his creditors. After the verdict in favour of Young, a reduction was moved by Baillie, and also by Grindlay, for the purpose of setting aside the discharge under the composition-contract as having been unduly procured by Young whilst he knew and recollected the existence of the debt of £84, but refrained from giving it up in the state of his affairs, by defrauding his creditors, and particularly Baillie, whom he induced to agree to a composition of 3s. per pound on the debt due by Young to him, while he afterwards claimed 20s. per pound on the debt due by him to Young. The reduction also struck at the receipts and relative discharges granted at obtaining payment of the composition, and

Mar. 23, 18
1st Division
Ld. President

220. also at a restriction of one of the debts which had been marked in terms of diligence. The trustee and all the creditors ranked; were called parties along with Young.

Young alleged that the omission to give up the debt of £84 was merely from the confusion of his affairs, and was an inadvertent oversight, and he contended that Baillie must have been all along perfectly aware that he was owing £84 to him (Young), and had acted fraudulently, claiming any composition on the bill for £76, 14s. 6d., and afterwards denying the debt of £84. He alleged Grindlay to be merely the agent of Baillie, and this, apparently, was admitted.

The following issue went to trial:—"It being admitted that on 19th January, 1827, the estate of the defender was sequestrated, and that on the 9th of June, 1827, the defender obtained his discharge under a composition-contract:

"It being also admitted that the pursuers held two promissory notes for the sum of £76, 14s. 6d., and £50 sterling; and on the 9th May, 1831, the pursuer, John Grindlay, drew the sum of £7, 10s., under the said contract, and granted the receipt, No. 9 of process; and on 18th May, 1831, the pursuer, James Baillie, drew the sum of £13, 10s., and granted the receipt, No. 7 of process, and the note of restriction, No. 1 of process:

"Whether the said discharge, and the said two receipts and note of restriction, or any of them, were obtained by fraud, or fraudulent concealment, on the part of the defender?"

The case was of a special nature. No evidence was led by Young, who rested his defence on the plea that nothing was proved which showed he had committed any thing but an inadvertent omission in failing to give up the debt of £84 under the sequestration.

THE JURY found for the pursuers.

J. ROSS, S.S.C.—T. LEHURN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 221. HON. MRS MARIA HAY MACKENZIE, and HUGH MUNRO, Suspenders.—D. F. Hope—Keay—H. J. Robertson.
ARCHIBALD HORNE (Judicial Factor on Cromarty Estate), and OTHER Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford Ivory—M'Neill—A. Wood—Anderson—Tait.

Salmon-Fishings—River—Sea.—Verdict finding that certain parties wrongfully fished for salmon in the Frith of Cromarty, with stake-nets, &c., in respect that the position of the nets was in a situation prohibited by statute.

Jan. 28, 1837.

1st DIVISION. THE Hon. Mrs Maria Hay Mackenzie of Cromarty, was heritably infeft in the salmon-fishings of the river Conon, and craves of the and Hugh Munro of Teaninich was her tacksman. They presented No. 221.

 bill of suspension and interdict against Archibald Horne, judicial factor Mar. 28, 1837.
 the estate of Cromarty, and others, alleging that these parties practised Collins v. Hamilton.
 mode of fishing which was illegal, being carried on by means of stake-nets, &c., placed along the shores of the Cromarty Frith, which was just continuation of the river Conon, and therefore were in situations prohibited by statute. The respondents maintained that their nets were not prohibited situations. The following issue went to trial, in the question with Archibald Horne, and a similar issue was tried at the same time with each of the other respondents. "Whether the defender, or his predecessors in office, have or has wrongfully fished for salmon in the frith of Cromarty, opposite the lands and estate of Cromarty, and others, during the years 1824, 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1828, or during any part thereof, by means of stake-nets, bag-nets, yairs, or other engines, placed in situations prohibited by statute?"

After a trial, which lasted for three days,* the Jury found for the respondents.

BURNES, S.S.C.—J. and W. FERRIER, W.S.—GIBSON-CRAIGS, WARDLAW, and DALZIEL, W.S.—TAIT and CRICHTON, W.S.—W. MACKENZIE, W.S.—Agents.

EDWARD COLLINS, Pursuer.—D. F. Hope—Robertson—A. M'Neill. No. 222.
 JAMES HAMILTON and ARCHIBALD ARTHUR, Defenders.—Maitland—
A. Dunlop.

M'DONALD and M'KAY, Defenders.—M'Neill.

Nuisance—River.—1. In an action concluding solely for damages, and under an issue whether certain operations of the defenders have been "to the nuisance of pursuer, and to his loss, injury, and damage," unless he prove "damage," he is entitled to a verdict. 2. Rule for determining questions of nuisance in respect of operations by a superior heritor on a stream complained of by parties below entitled to the use of the stream.

Lease—Reparation.—Under a lease of premises situated on a stream, declaring they were to be used "for the purpose of bleaching, dyeing, or printing, and other operations connected with bleaching, dyeing, or printing," if the tenant establish a dyework which creates a nuisance to the injury of the proprietors or tenants of inferior properties, such operations held not to be authorized by the lease, so as to render the landlord responsible for the damages thereby occasioned.

THE late Mr Hamilton of Barns, father of the defender, Hamilton, in April 14—1837.
 1837, let to the other defender, Arthur, his heirs and assignees, for 19 years, certain premises, described as a "bleachfield," and situated on a 1st DIVISION stream called the Cochno or Cochney Burn, with a declaration contained Ld. Cockburn in the lease, "that the said subjects hereby let are to be used for the R.

A bill of exceptions was subsequently presented, in reporting which a fuller report of the trial will be given.

222. purpose of bleaching, dyeing, or printing, and any other operation connected with bleaching, dyeing, or printing, or for agriculture." The lease contained a clause of absolute warrandice, and the rent stipulated was £60 per annua. The same subjects had previously been possessed by one Colquhoun, under a lease granted in 1802, at the same rent of £60, it being stipulated in the lease that the premises should not be used for any other purpose than a bleachfield or printfield without the express consent in writing of the landlord. Arthur occupied the subjects let in 1826, using them exclusively as a bleachfield. In that year he sublet them to the defender, M'Donald, and certain other parties, set forth in the sub tack, as "intending to carry on business as printers, at Cochno, at a subrent of £112 for the first year, and £120 for each year afterwards, thus obtaining a surplus rent of £60. The sub tack was granted under the several conditions and provisions particularly specified and contained in the principal tack; and it shortly afterwards became vested in the defenders M'Donald and M'Kay, who, after entering to possession of the premises, used them for the purpose of carrying on a Turkey-red dye-work. In this manufacture they employed large quantities of madder root. In 1827 they had used 310 cwts.; in 1828, 774, and in 1829, 1832, which was nearly as large a quantity as had been consumed in any subsequent year. At first they were in use, after the colouring matter had been extracted, to discharge the exhausted madder roots direct into the stream. In 1829, however, they constructed a settling pond, into which the grosser particles subsided, and were from time to time drawn out, and heaped upon the banks and adjacent ground. The Cochno Burn, on which this dye-work is situated, after passing for about three quarters of a mile through or amongst the lands of the defender Hamilton, enters the property of Mr Dunn of Duntocher, and shortly afterwards unites with a much larger stream, called the West Cochno Burn, or more commonly the West Burn, after which junction it receives the name of the Duntocher Burn, and the Dalmuir Burn. The quantity of water discharged by these streams was, according to one measurement—the Cochno Burn 962 gallons per minute, and the West Burn 5600 gallons per minute; and, according to another measurement—the Cochno Burn 630 gallons per minute, the West Burn 8000 gallons per minute, and another small stream which joined previously, 180 gallons per minute. The water of these united streams turns the wheels of several extensive cotton-mills belonging to Mr Dunn, passing through a considerable number of mill-dams, in which it is, to a certain extent, and for certain periods, detained. On Mr Dunn's property, and on the banks of the stream, there is situated a large village, and besides Mr Dunn's cotton-mills, five in number, there are also on the stream, below the works of the defenders, a forge-mill, a small dye-work, a clay-mill, and a grain-mill. From the defenders' works to the Clyde, into which the stream empties itself, there is a run of about three and a-half miles, with a very considerable rent (nearly 400 feet) and at a place called Dalmuir, about three miles No. 222.

 now the defenders' works, are certain works occupied by the pursuer April 14—19 Collins, as tenant under Mr Dunn, to whom they belong. The uppermost 1837.
 of the pursuer's works is used as a mill for the manufacture of brown Collins v. cartridge paper, and inferior descriptions of fine paper. Immediately Hamilton.
 adjoining this mill are certain buildings used as a chipping and grinding mill, in which dye-woods of various descriptions, including certain red woods, called cam-wood and bar-wood, are chipped, rasped, and ground, which last-mentioned operation (first begun to be carried on at Dalmuir a few years since), the woods are reduced to a fine dust. These mills are supplied with water, by separate troughs, from a dam immediately above and closely adjoining them. In the chipping and grinding mill the water is only used to turn the wheel, which is situated inside of the mill, but separated by a wooden partition from the space in which the chipping and grinding operations are conducted. After turning this wheel the water passes into a lower dam, from which it is run to another paper mill of the pursuer's, situated at a little distance below, in which fine papers alone are made, and the water is there used for setting the machinery in motion and for washing the pulp. A main proportion of the water used for this latter purpose is taken from the upper dam above-mentioned, and passed through filters into open ponds, situated a little way from the chipping and grinding mill, and from thence is conducted in pipes to the lower paper mill, the proportion being one-fifth filtered to four-fifths unfiltered.

In December, 1833, Collins, under form of notarial protest, intimated M'Donald and M'Kay that their operations were productive of great damage to him, by the injury to his paper, caused by the colouring matter discharged from their dye-work; and in September, 1834, he raised an action of damages against these parties, and also against Arthur, the principal tenant, and Hamilton, the landlord. The summons set forth generally, "that of late the defenders, or one or other of them, have taken upon them, without any right, title, authority, or warrant of law, to discharge great quantities of madder-roots, or other dye-stuff, or other noxious and deleterious stuff, or water impregnated with the same, into the said burn, whereby it has been polluted in an extreme degree; and, as the pursuer has found, to his great loss and damage, has been rendered almost totally unfit for the purposes of his manufacture, or domestic use, or for the sustenance of man or beast; and the paper made by the pursuer has been rendered altogether unmarketable, or of a inferior quality, and the character of the pursuer's works and his manufacture have been greatly injured and deteriorated in the trade;" and concluded against them conjunctly and severally for damages, laid at £1000.

At the trial, M'Donald and M'Kay denied that their operations were the cause of any damage to Collins. Hamilton likewise denied that Collins

p. 222.

p. 110.

p. 110.

p. 110.

had suffered injury from their operations, and stated further that "even if damage had been caused by matters discharged from the dye-works, could only have been in consequence of negligence or misconduct on the part of the tenant, for which the defender is not responsible;" and Arthur, while he set forth that he did not know whether M'Donald or M'Kay had or had not polluted the water, stated that "if these parties or any others, have made an improper use of the water, or committed any other illegal act, it was without authority from the defender."

A record having been made up, and a draft issue prepared, applicable equally to all the defenders, a question of law was raised by Hamilton the landlord, and Arthur the principal tenant, as to how far any liability could attach to them, or, at all events, whether they were not entitled to a separate issue applicable to their case alone. The Lord Ordinary (Fullerton) reported this matter to the Court, adding the subjoined note. Their Lordships, while they held that the question of law could not properly be determined before sending the cause to a Jury, were of opinion that the landlord and principal tenant were entitled to a separate issue, and accordingly the following issues were ordered to be tried:—

"It being admitted that the pursuer is a paper-maker on the Dalma Burn tocher burn, and that one of the streams which unite to form the burn passes from the Cochney loch through the property of the defender James Hamilton:—

"It being also admitted that on the said property there are certain premises and buildings erected thereon, let by the predecessor of the defender, James Hamilton, of which the defender Arthur is or was tenant, and the defenders M'Donald and M'Kay are sub-tenants:—

"1. Whether, during the year 1826, and subsequently, or during any part of the said period, the defenders M'Donald and M'Kay did, by certain operations carried on in the said premises and buildings, wrongfully pollute and spoil the water of the said burn, so as to injure the quality of the water of the same, to the nuisance of the pursuer, a paper-maker aforesaid, and to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer."

"2. Whether the said operations, so carried on by the defenders

---

* "This is an action of damages brought by the pursuer against the defenders for polluting, by their operations of dyeing, a stream on which the pursuer's paper-manufactory is situate, and rendering it unfit for the purposes of the manufactory. It is directed not only against the defenders M'Donald and M'Kay, the tenants and occupiers, by whom these operations in dyeing are actually carried on, but against Mr Hamilton, the proprietor of the premises, and Mr Arthur, a former tenant of those premises, who assigned or sub-let them to M'Donald and M'Kay. The ground of action against Messrs Hamilton and Arthur is, that by letting the premises expressly for various purposes, and, inter alia, for the purpose of dyeing work, they are necessarily liable for the consequences of the acts of the actual possessors. This liability is denied by the defenders, and the Lord Ordinary thought it expedient to afford the parties an opportunity of having the judgment of the Court on that point of law, before sending the case to a jury."

Donald and M'Kay, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer, No. 222.
 re, in whole or in part, wrongfully authorized by the defenders James amilton or his predecessor, and Archibald Arthur, or either of them ?" April 14—19, 1837.

The cause came on for trial at the Glasgow Autumn Circuit, 1836, Collins v.
 Hamilton.

mediately after the trial of certain issues in an action of interdict at the tance of Mr Dunn the pursuer's landlord, against the same defenders, reference to the same operations ;<sup>1</sup> but after it had been proceeded in a day, it was broken off by the illness of the Judge. It again came on trial at Glasgow before Lord Cockburn and a special jury, at the last ing Circuit, and occupied five days.

The pursuer, after giving in evidence the lease to Colquhoun in 1802, to Arthur in 1822, the sub-tack by Arthur, and the schedule of pro-in December, 1833, all above-mentioned, with certain other documents, the record, adduced a variety of witnesses to establish that he and his ier, who had carried on the business of paper-making at Dalmuir for a g period, had acquired a very high character in the market, as manurers of paper excellent both for colour and quality ;—that latterly, ough improvements had been made in the machinery, and equally d materials used, the character of the paper had greatly fallen off ; it was often of a low colour, and unequal in colour, and that consi-ble quantities of it were frequently stained, chiefly with a number of ll red spots ; that the water of the Cochney burn above the defenders' ks was remarkable for its purity, and well fitted for the manufacture paper ; that a large quantity of a dark red or purple-coloured stuff, posed of particles of madder-root, was constantly discharged from the nders' works ; deeply discolouring the whole stream for a considerable e below the works, and that, although the intensity of the colour lished in going down the stream, it was distinctly traceable the whole to the pursuer's works, and was perceptible in the water even after nd passed through his filters ; that the water at the pursuer's works no longer fit for making the finer sorts of papers, and could not up the colour required for such papers ; that quantities of chipped der-roots were found deposited in different parts of the channel of stream, and had been found in the flannel bags attached to the ends he pipes in the paper work ; that an oily scum seen on the surface of stream immediately below the defenders' works was also traced down to pursuer's dam, and that the colouring matter of the red spots in the was madder.

regard to this last point, Dr Thomson, Professor of Chemistry in ew College, and Mr Graham, Lecturer on Chemistry in the Ander-Institution, Glasgow, deponed, that they had cut out from certain of the damaged paper several of the spots and tested them, and had ascertained that the colouring matter was madder.

<sup>1</sup> See ante, p. 853.

222. In regard to the amount of damage suffered, the pursuer, bridle 16-19. proving that on one or two occasions parcels of paper had been returned, and that certain parties who had been in use to deal with him had ceased to do so, led evidence to show that, in 1825, the market price of his finest paper, of the kind called superfine foolscap, bore a certain proportion to the prices of the same description of Kent paper, which are the standard prices of the trade, and that this proportion had since that constantly fallen, till now, when it was 38 per cent below the Kent prices, the decrease having been chiefly within one or two years, and the average prices since 1825 being as follows:—1825, £1, 3, 9½d. per ream; 1826, £1, 1s. 1½d.; 1827, £1, 0s. 11½d.; 1828, £1, 0s. 7½d.; 1829, £1, 0s. 2½d.; 1830, 18s. 10d.; 1831, 17s. 4d.; 1832, 17s. 1½d.; 1833, 17s. 4d.; 1834, 16s. 1d.; 1835, 14s. 9½d. He farther proved that the defects in certain specimens of paper produced by him, and manufactured at his works, would be reduced the selling price 10 per cent, and the defects in other specimens 20 per cent below what paper of the same kind without these defects would have brought. He also gave in evidence the amount of fine superfine paper, manufactured and sold, between 1825 and 1836 at lower mill, which averaged for these years about £20,000 per annum, being a considerable increase on the average of the previous years, when for the six years immediately preceding was about £15,500 per annum.
 No damage was claimed in regard to the paper manufactured at upper paper-mill. No proof was given of any complaint having been made to the occupying tenants of the dye-work earlier than 1833, when a verbal complaint was deponed to have been made to them, and no intimation of any injury was proved to have been given to the landlord till after the service of the notarial protest on the tenants in December 1833.

The defenders, M'Donald and M'Kay, on their part, adduced a number of witnesses, who deponed, that they had occasion repeatedly to see the stream while the defenders' works were in full operation, and that while, immediately below the works, it was very deeply coloured by the discharge therefrom, the discolouration began very soon to subside—almost entirely disappeared at about 50 yards below the works, and was totally imperceptible after the junction with the West Burn. For samples of the water were produced, taken from different parts of the stream; that the West Burn was, to a certain degree, tinged with brownness, which rendered water peculiarly unfit for paper-making, as it could not be removed by filtration; and that considerable quantities of water, and other impurities from the village, were discharged into the stream, which alone were sufficient to render the water unfit for manufacturing the finer papers, and incapable of raising a high colour in paper manufactured with it. Two scientific witnesses, Dr Christison, Professor of Materia Medica in the University of Edinburgh, and

No. 222.

April 14—19,
1837.Collins v.
Hamilton.

regory, Lecturer on Chemistry in Dublin, had analyzed the water of the stream at various points, and found that there was no vegetable matter in solution, other than the usual ingredients of that description common to all the streams of the country, and existing in the Cochney burn before reaching the defenders' works. They deponed, that the matter discolouring the stream immediately below the defenders' works consisted of the finer particles of the exhausted madder-root used there, held in mechanical suspension in the water, but which entirely subsided by the time it had flowed down to the uppermost of Mr Dunn's dams, about three quarters of a mile below the defenders' works, and before it joined the West Burn, when it was as pure as above the works. These gentlemen also tested the red spots on the damaged paper (but without cutting the pieces), and were decidedly of opinion that the colouring substance was not madder; that it possessed the characters of cam-wood, bar-wood, and that, whatever it might be, there could be no doubt that it was a substance retaining all its original colour, while the madder-roots, being used at the defenders' works, had the colour so effectually extracted, that the strongest chemical agents were necessary to detect its existence, which they could only do in a very slight degree. No questions were put on either side to the respective chemical witnesses as to the tests employed by them. Another witness deponed, that the substance causing the spots was on the surface of the paper, and so could not have been imposed after the pulp had assumed the character of a pressed sheet; and it was proved that no such spots had ever been detected on the paper made in the upper paper-mill above the grinding-mill, though the papers were such as to have shown such stains, had these occurred.

It was admitted by the pursuer, that his books, taking every thing into account, including prices of materials, from 1826 to 1836, showed a profit never increasing than otherwise.

The defenders, Hamilton and Arthur, led no evidence, but rested their case on the plea in law, that the lease and sub-lease only authorized legal use of the premises, and that they were not responsible for any illegal use to which the occupying tenants might have put the premises.<sup>1</sup>

The pursuer, besides submitting an argument on the respective rights of upper and lower heritors in regard to the use of a stream, and contending on the evidence that he had established his case, specially pleaded in law, and craved a direction from the Judge on the point, that, even if the jury should not be satisfied that he had proved actual "damage," he was entitled to ask from them a verdict finding that the defenders' opera-

<sup>1</sup> For the argument on this plea, see the case of Dunn v. Hamilton, ante, p.

222. tions had been wrongfully conducted to his "nuisance," the 18-19, put to the jury in the issue being distinct as to "loss and damage," "nuisance," and admitting of a verdict as to one, though the jury not be satisfied as to the other.

On the second issue, he contended that the lease and sub-the pleadings of the defenders, Hamilton and Arthur, gave authority to carry on the operations complained of, which rendered liable for the damage suffered in consequence.

Lord Cockburn charged the Jury as follows:

After this most protracted discussion, I shall endeavour to bring my charge within as narrow a compass as is consistent with the duty I have to perform.
 I shall take first the case of the sub-tenants under the first issue. The issue is, "Whether, during the year 1826, and subsequently, or during of the said period, the defenders, McDonald and McKay, did, by certain carried on in the said premises and buildings, wrongfully pollute and water of the said burn, so as to injure the quality of the water of the said nuisance of the pursuer as a paper-maker aforesaid, and so the loss, or damage of the pursuer?" There may be works which would be held nuisance though no damage had actually been produced, as it may be damage will be produced. On the other hand, things which are nuisance own nature, and are doing damage, may not be wrongful, because they protected by prescription, acquiescence, &c. Here we are free of all go that kind. The pursuer undertakes to prove loss by nuisance, and wrongfully done. He must establish the three qualities of nuisance, dam-wrong. If he do not prove damage, then I state to you in point of law this action of damages he is not entitled to a verdict. Again, if there be proved, the parties creating it must show on their part that it is not done. The only defence here against the alleged wrongfulness is that it nuisance, and the question is, whether the dye-work as conducted has been productive of damage to the works below. What will be held to differs in different circumstances. In regard to rivers there are differ-in which the results will be different. 1. The river may be a public immemorially abandoned to public works; 2. It may be a private river for the primary purposes to which water is applicable. These two cases as in the one scarcely any thing would be a nuisance, and, in the other scarcely any thing which would not be a nuisance. 3. There is, how-intermediate case, which on the facts you may consider to be that bering, where the stream has been partly appropriated to manufacturing, and is in part applicable to the primary uses. Such a case is regulated rule, that no person is entitled to destroy or materially impair any manufactures previously existing, either by establishing a new process carrying on one already existing to a greater extent than formerly. On other hand, a party complaining of being injured is not entitled to his liability to injury by giving up precautions previously used, or by neglecting warning to the party injuring him. It is always for the Jury to apply.
 It is often of great difficulty to do so, but the rule can never be dis-about violation of law and infringement of private rights. Manufactories grow under the protection of that rule, and it must inviolably be observed. It is for a alone to say if, in point of fact, these defenders did create a nuisance. His Lordship then went generally over the evidence, stating his opinion that the pursuer had not made out his case, and proceeded—) If you are satisfied that

No. 222
April 14—1
1837.
Collins v.
Hamilton.

injury has been done by the operations of the defenders, that settles the whole matter. If, again, there be pollution, the question of damage I leave entirely to you. But I must state to you that it is the duty of a pursuer who comes into court demanding damages, which is the only action here, to prove his loss. I do not say he is bound to give it a name in pounds, shillings, and pence. But he must make out some actual loss. Now I have never seen a pursuer of an action for damages do so little to show direct loss as has been done here. The giving out of paper, and the drawing in of money and of profit, are both increased. It is very true if he can say, But for you I would have made more profit, that is loss. But has he established that? It seems to me that he has not given the means of estimating damages, and a jury should avoid giving damages when not sustained.

On the second issue I shall merely trouble you with a single word. The question there is, "Whether the said operations, so carried on by the defenders, Donald and M'Kay, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer, were, in whole or in part, wrongfully authorized by the defenders, James Hamilton, or his predecessor, and Archibald Arthur, or either of them?" If you are of opinion, after the first issue, that no wrong has been done, you must of necessity find for the defenders here. If, on the other hand, you think damage has been proven, then you are called on to consider this second issue. In so far as the pursuer rests his case upon this, viz. that in law the mere granting of the lease, or of the sub-lease, makes the granters liable respectively for the damage occasioned by the tenant, I lay it down to you that no such liability is implied in these acts. In addition to granting the lease and sub-lease, you shall be satisfied either that pollution of the stream down at Dalmuir was intended by Mr Hamilton or Archibald Arthur, or that it was the necessary consequence of their letting or sub-letting, and they are responsible. But if you be not satisfied that the pollution was intended, but that it was the necessary consequence of what they did, so that nothing can be proved against them except the mere granting of the tack or sub-tack, then I say that in law this act does not make them liable. Now on the evidence what do we have here? Except the lease and sub-lease I see nothing whatever. By that, however, there was only given the legal use. If I let a house to a tenant to do anything he likes with it, that only means to do any thing legal he likes. The rights here were necessarily limited to the legal use of the premises. A landlord will no doubt authorize his tenant to commit nuisance otherwise than by his lease, and if the pursuer here had shown that Hamilton and Arthur had been guilty of engaging M'Donald and M'Kay to pollute the stream so as to create a nuisance, he would be entitled to succeed against them, assuming nuisance to be proved. What are they said to have done? Only that they did not put the work down, and that they say they do not believe that it is a nuisance. Neither do I. They are not wrong, but is that a ground for finding for the pursuer? Quoad these two points, I think the claim perfectly absurd.

The pursuer took an exception to the above charge in so far as the

HC 222. Jury were directed that, unless he had proved damage, he was not entitled to a verdict,* and in so far as regarded the liability of the landlord as principal tenant.

1919, 1837.
Hutton v.
Hutton's
Executors

THE JURY returned a verdict for the defenders on both issues.

W. B. CAMPBELL, W.S.—PATRICK and CRAWFORD, W.S.—J. BOWMAN, W.S.— CAMPBELL and M'DOWALL, W.S.—Agents.

SUMMER SESSION,

1837.

No. 223. WILLIAM JOHNSTON, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Forryth
DUNDAS'S TRUSTEES, Defenders.—M'Neill—W. Bell.

Arrestment—Agent and Principal.—A merchant consigned to a commission agent a certain quantity of oil for sale and return; the agent sold the oil in his own name on the merchant's account to two different parties; a creditor of the merchant thereafter used arrestments in the hands of the agent, the price of the oil not having been recovered from either of the purchasers at the date thereof.—Held that the arrestments were ineffectual, and that the circumstance of the agent having taken a bill from one of the purchasers, and discounted it prior to the arrestment for his own accommodation, made no difference in regard to the efficacy of the arrestment.

May 12, 1837. IN November and December, 1818, William Gallaway, then merchant in Leith, consigned to Archibald Newall, commission-agent in Glasgow, for sale and return on the ordinary footing of mercantile agency, certain quantities of oil, the bills of lading pertaining to which were transmitted at the same time indorsed over to Newall. He held no del credere commission. On the security of these consignments Gallaway obtained various advances from Newall.

2<sup>d</sup> DIVISION.
Ld. Moncreiff.
T.

Sales of oil were thereafter made on Gallaway's account, and particularly to two parties named Aitken and Brown. A quantity was sold to Aitken on open account for a price of £78, 4s. 5d., to become due on 17th April, 1819, the transaction being entered in Newall's journal as follows:—

“ 1818. December 14.

“ Robert Aitken To sales account, William Gallaway—For four casks whale-oil, . . . . . £78 4 5”

* This exception was abandoned when the bill was prepared.

In the ledger the sale was not entered in name of Gallaway. Newall had a certain quantity of barilla, the property of Aitken, but whether in security of the price or not did not appear from the ledger. No. 228
May 12, 1822
Johnston v.
Dundas's
Trustees.

Another quantity of oil was sold on 29th April, 1819, for the sum of £102, 10s., to Brown, on whom Newall drew a bill for the price, payable 1st August, four months after date, which bill he immediately thereafter discounted with a bank, for his own accommodation, not charging the discount against Gallaway.

Up to 17th June, 1819, no settlement of accounts had taken place between Gallaway and Newall. Of that date, William Jeffrey, accountant Glasgow, on the dependence of an action raised by him against Gallaway, arrested in the hands of Newall "the sum of £1500, more or less, due and addebted by him to the said William Gallaway, or to any person or persons for his use and behoof, together also with all and sundry moveable goods, &c. pertaining, or in any manner of way belonging, to the said William Gallaway." Exclusive of the transaction regarding the oil, Newall was due Gallaway, at the date of the arrestment, the sum of £52 by account-current, subject to certain deductions, and he also held a quantity of casks belonging to Gallaway in value about £60.

In order to relieve Gallaway's funds from the nexus thus imposed on them, the late Mr James Dundas, Accountant-general of Excise, in September, 1819, became cautioner in a loosing of the arrestment. Thereafter the action at Jeffrey's instance proceeded, and in November, 1824, a decree was obtained against Gallaway for a sum of £295. Jeffrey thereupon brought an action of forthcoming against Newall, and Dundas the cautioner, which was afterwards insisted in by the pursuer Johnston, as trustee on Jeffrey's sequestrated estate, against the present defenders, the testamentary trustees of Mr Dundas, who pleaded in defence—

1. Mr Dundas's trustees are not liable except for the funds belonging to the common debtor which were in the hands of the arrestee Newall at the date of the execution of arrestment.

2. In ascertaining the amount of the sum covered by the cautionary obligation, the trustees are entitled to claim deduction of all sums contracted to be paid by the arrestee out of the funds of the common debtor prior to the date of the arrestment, although not actually paid when the arrestment was used.

3. The trustees are not liable for the sum of £78 as the price of the barilla sold by Newall to Aitken, in respect it was not in the arrestee's hands at the date of the arrestment, and there is no legal evidence that the barilla referred to in Newall's ledger was impledged in security of that debt, or, supposing it had been so impledged, that it was a security in which the common debtor had an arrestable interest.

4. Nor are they liable for the sum of £102, 10s. as the price of oil sold by Newall to Brown, in respect that it likewise was not in the hands

1836. of the arrested, and not put to the common debtor's credit until 1837. months after the arrestment, when the bill became payable. The circumstance of Newall having taken a bill for the price was insufficient to make the proceeds of the bill subject to the diligence of arrestment.
 The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding,
 "subjoined note:"—"Finds, 1mo, That the defenders are entitled to

"1. The Lord Ordinary thinks that the deduction of £12, 10s. 6d. must be allowed, for the reasons assigned by the accountant, that the value of all the being stated in the duly evidence referred to as £60 at the date of the loss, the pursuer cannot take from Newall both the value of all the casks, and the
 of part of them.

"2. The question as to the £12, 12s., claimed as paid on account of demurrage is not quite simple, chiefly from the awkward state of the record. It is clear from the letters quoted by the accountant, that, in December, 1818, Gallaway while he denied that the claim was just, expressly authorized Newall to grant obligation in security of it, and to resist any action that might be brought. In his first revised answers for Mr Dundas (referred to by the accountant) it was said that an action having been brought, Newall consigned the money, defended the action, and obtained absolver, but that the consigned money was exhausted the expenses, to which clearly it might be applied, and this statement was not terminis denied by the pursuer. Very awkwardly the same statement is now tained in the record as last closed; but the Lord Ordinary decides the point the ground that, at the date of the arrestment, Newall was under the obligation Gallaway's authority, and that it has not been shown that he ever was released from it so as to set the money free.

"3. The Lord Ordinary thinks it clear that the sum of £10, 6s. 9d. allowed by the accountant for cellerage to the date of the loosing, must be sustained as a deduction. He thinks that from the terms of the account-current it might be presumed that any prior claim on that account had been settled, and though the question is not free from difficulty, he is, on the whole, of opinion, that after the arrestment was loosed on caution, no farther enquiry can be instituted as to the situation of the casks, and no deduction can be allowed on account of their remaining in Newall's hands. Gallaway might have removed them if he pleased, and Newall was not bound to keep them. Mr Dundas was cautioner for Gallaway that their value at the date of the bond should be made forthcoming. The case of the ship arrested, Anderson, Child, and Company v. Pott,<sup>1</sup> &c. February 4th, 1825, is not the same with this. But there are some principles in it which do seem to apply.

"4. The Lord Ordinary has very little doubt, that in so far as the question as to the price of the oil sold to Aitken depends simply on the sale made, but the price outstanding, it was not covered by the arrestment, and the defenders are not answerable for it. The goods were consigned to Newall simply for sale as an agent. He was under no del credere guarantee. There might be arrangements by which the purchaser would have acted incorrectly if he had paid otherwise than through Newall. But the debt was due by Aitken to Gallaway, and only due to Newall as Gallaway's agent. It is apprehended that an arrestment by a creditor of Gallaway in Aitken's hands would have been good, unless something else appeared than what is shown in this process. But if Newall really held property

<sup>1</sup> Ante, III. 497 (new ed. 317.)

duction from the sum of £52, 5s. 9d., claimed as a sum due by the arrestee Newall to Gallaway, at the date of the arrestment, by an account-current previously stated, of the following sums, viz. £12, 10s. as the value of a quantity of oil-casks paid for by Newall on account of Gallaway; £12, 12s. paid by Newall on account of a claim for demurrage, for which he was authorized by Gallaway before the arrestment to grant his obligation; and £10, 6s. 9d., on account of cellar-rent of certain empty casks up to the date of the loosing of the arrestment: Finds, 2dō, That the sum of £78, 7s. 5d., the price of a quantity of oil consigned by Gallaway to Newall, and sold by him to Aitken on Gallaway's account, which price had not been paid at the date of the arrestment, cannot in the present question be considered as having been funds of Gallaway in

No. 1
May 12,
Johnston
Dundas
Trustee

of Aitken, expressly deposited in security of that price previous to the arrestment, the Lord Ordinary sees that the question might be different. It would be a singular case of arrestment, but it might have relevancy. He gives no opinion upon it at present, because the fact is positively denied; and he does not think that the general words in an extrajudicial certificate by Newall is any evidence at all against the representatives of Dundas the cautioner; and the entry in the books, as to the freight of the barilla, rather leads to the inference that it was not received till long after the arrestment. But it is a fact which admits of evidence if it be true.

“The question as to the £102, 10s. 2d., the price of oil sold to Brown, is not without difficulty. If it were the simple case of goods consigned for sale, and sold by Newall to Brown on a credit of four months, the Lord Ordinary should have little doubt that the price could not be taken as in manibus of Newall when the arrestment was laid. But Newall took a bill at four months for nearly the precise sum from Brown. The bill bears no reference to Gallaway, or to his affairs; but Newall discounted it, and it appears clearly that he applied the proceeds in payment of a debt of his own; he did not charge the discount against Gallaway, and, in fact, never brought either the bill or the proceeds of it into any account with Gallaway. In this state of the matter the pursuer says, that when Newall got the bill, and raised the proceeds of it in consequence of the sale of the oil, he must be taken to have become debtor to Gallaway for that amount. There may be some doubt in the question, whether, by taking the bill, he did not make it necessary for Brown to settle the debt with him, and so interpose himself as direct debtor to Gallaway. But the Lord Ordinary is inclined to think that the taking of the bill made really no essential difference on the transaction, and that, at the date of the arrestment, Newall was not debtor to Gallaway for the money. The bill was taken to Newall himself, and it is said merely for his own accommodation. It might never have been paid; and though Newall got the proceeds by discounting it on his own account, he must have replaced the money if it had not been paid, and the transaction as to Gallaway would have been exactly as it would have been if no bill had been granted. Then who would have sustained the loss if Brown was unable to pay? Evidently Gallaway, as the owner and vender of the goods, Newall being under no guarantee; from which it seems to follow, that the money still in the hands of Brown was a debt by him to Gallaway, and that Newall did not hold it as a price received and payable by him. In short, till the bill was paid the price was not paid, and consequently Newall did not hold it at the date of the arrestment.

“The last point in the interlocutor requires no farther observation. The Lord Ordinary thinks that the value must be taken at £60, and that it cannot be diminished by any thing which occurred after the loosing.”

the hands of Newall at that day: Finds it averred, that Newall held a quantity of barilla, the precise value of which is not condescended on, in security of the price of the said oil; but finds it not legally instructed that such barilla was so held in security of the said price at the date of the arrestment; but in respect of the averment, and that the pursuer's counsel did in the debate point at some further evidence being taken in this matter, before farther answer on this part of the accounting, allows the pursuer to state in a minute whether he will undertake to prove the fact, and by what evidence: 3<sup>do</sup>, Finds, That the sum of £102, 10s. 2d., being the price of oil consigned by Gallaway to Newall, and sold by Newall to Brown before the arrestment, but which price was not then payable, ought not to be considered in this question as funds of Gallaway in the hands of Newall at that date; and finds, That the circumstance of Newall having taken a bill for £102, 10s. from Brown, and discounted the same, and received the proceeds, is not relevant for establishing that he then held the price of the said oil as funds of Gallaway: Finds, 4th, That the pursuer is entitled to the sum of £60 as the fair value of the empty casks admitted to have been held by the arrestee at the date of the arrestment, such value being taken as at the date of the loosing thereof, after giving allowance for the cellar-rent till that time, and for the price of a part of the casks paid by Newall as above found due; and finds, That the defenders are not entitled to any abatement from such value either for cellarge or depreciation posterior to the loosing of the arrestment; and, with these findings, appoints the cause to be enrolled, and in the mean time reserves the question of expenses."

The pursuer reclaimed against the second and third findings of the interlocutor, viz. in so far as it found that the two sums of £78 and £102, being the prices of oil consigned by Gallaway to Newall, and by Newall sold to Aitken and Brown, cannot be considered as having been funds in the possession of Newall at the date of the arrestment, and so not arrestable in his hands.

At the advising (November 19, 1836) the Court, considering the question to be one of difficulty, ordered cases.

Argued for the Pursuer—

Although Newall was originally employed merely as a mercantile agent to make sales for Gallaway, he obtained an ex facie absolute title of property in the oil in question by the indorsation to himself of the bills of lading, being subject, however, to an equitable obligation to account to Gallaway. And the indorsation was for value, in so far as advances were made to Gallaway on the credit of these bills of lading. The sale to Aitken was made in Newall's own name, in whom was vested the ius exigendi. In these circumstances, what was attached by the arrestment was Gallaway's right to claim an account from Newall of the price of the oil; and this obligation to account, like other personal ations, was an arrestable interest at the date of the arrestment, No. 223 igh the price had not then become payable.<sup>1</sup> In the case of May 12, 1883 il sold to Brown, the arrestment was equally effectual; for here Johnston v.

 Newall acted as a trustee formally and lawfully vested with the Dundas's erty of the oil by the indorsement of the bills of lading. He was Trustees.
 intable to Gallaway for any balance recovered by him, which obli-n was effectually arrested; and this is a still stronger case than the
 ; as Newall may be said, on taking a bill for the price, to have Gallaway's money in his pocket, an accepted bill being in law pay-
 ; of the debt due to the holder. Even if Newall should be considererely as a mercantile factor who has made advances on the security ods consigned to him for sale, in that character he held a lien over goods, in consequence of which neither his constituent nor the itors of his constituent, had any right to come between him and the hasers, or to make any farther claim than for an accounting after fying the lien; which claim of accounting, and nothing else, could ttached by their diligence.<sup>2</sup>

argued for the Defender—

he principle contended for by the pursuer, and recognised in the of Gordon v. Innes, cannot apply to the present case. Newall was the trustee of Gallaway, who was never denuded, but a mere merile factor or agent empowered to sell the oil for him; and, although wall might be authorized to make the sales in his own name, this ld not prevent Gallaway from interposing whenever he pleased, and only demanding payment from the purchasers of the oil, but repay-Newall his advances, and superseding him entirely in the agency.
 ollows, therefore, that the arrestments in question, used in the hands Newall, must be ineffectual.<sup>3</sup> The only distinction between the transon with Aitken and that with Brown is the granting of the bill.
 v, conceding that this bill was granted to Newall as the price of Gal-ay's oil, the aspect of the case does not seem to be altered. It can-be held that a mercantile arrangement, such as the present, should e the legal effect of denuding the consigner, and vesting the consigwith goods consigned, and with the bills taken as their price. The ignee may be entitled to draw bills in his own name for the price of goods sold, and even, as in the present instance, to discount those for his own accommodation, or to relieve himself of advances made is principal; but the latter, whenever he pleases, may require the

---

<sup>1</sup> Gordon v. Innes, Feb. 13, 1740 (M. 715).

<sup>2</sup> Bell II, 114 and 116; Drinkwater v. Goodwin, May 12, 1775, 1 Cowper, 251; us v. Amber, 2 Espinasse, 493; Hudson v. Granger, 5 Barnwell and rson, 27.

<sup>3</sup> See Cross v. Moir, 1775, (M. 757); Lothian v. McCree, Nov. 27, 1828 (ante, 32).

agent to close accounts with him, and on paying the advances and commission, may demand delivery of the unsold portion of the goods, and the bills which have been taken for the rest; and this demand he has right to make directly against the purchasers, even after they have accepted bills for the price to the factor or agent.<sup>1</sup>

The cause was this day again put out for advising.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Upon reconsidering this case, I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to. The great point endeavoured to be made out by the pursuer is, that Newall is to be viewed as an ordinary trustee liable to account to Gallaway; and, as it has been settled, that arrestment is competent in the hands of such a trustee, so it ought to be found here. But the question is, quo effectu, or in what manner was Newall bound to account to Gallaway? He held no del credere commission. As a factor employed in the usual way, he was bound to render an account to the individual for whom he sold the oil; but an arrestment in his hands was not available at the time when no part of the price of the oils sold had been paid to him. Under the circumstances, there does not appear to me to be any peculiarity in the fact of a bill having been granted by Brown and discounted by Newall, to distinguish the transaction with him from that with the other purchaser.

LORD GLENLEE.—I am of the same opinion. The Lord Ordinary proceeded on the principle, that there existed no debt till the money was received by Newall from the purchasers. It was a contingent debt, and an arrestment of it premature. In this case not only dies non venit, but nec cessit nec venit. Supposing Newall to act correctly, there was no debt in his hands till the money was received. There was no existing claim against him till the contingency occurred. Where no debt has existed at the time of using the arrestments, I can see no principle for holding them good; and I think this is the view on which the Lord Ordinary has decided.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD MEDWYN.—My difficulties have not been removed. There is no dispute about the facts. Newall was a mercantile agent and factor for Gallaway; and I agree that the circumstance of a bill having been taken from Brown makes no difference on his case. Certain goods are sent to Newall, and sold for behoof of Gallaway; but the money is not recovered from the purchasers till after the date of the arrestments. What then are the obligations thence arising? Gallaway had, at that date, a direct action against the purchasers, and also against Newall, for recovery of the price of the goods. In these circumstances, as Gallaway had no claims, might not arrestments of either of those claims take place at the instance of a creditor of his? If I could view this as a contingent debt, I would entirely

<sup>1</sup> Dunlop v. Jap, Feb. 21, 1752 (M. 741); Pewtress v. Thorold, July 13, 1786 (M. 756, Note); Haddow v. Campbell, Dec. 7, 1796 (M. 763); Dick v. Goodall, June 1, 1815 (F.C.); Lothian, supra; Kyle's Trustees, Nov. 14, 1827 (ante, VI. 40); Cameron, Feb. 4, 1830 (ante, VIII. 410), Cullen v. Maclean, June 18, 1833 (ante, XI. 733), Bell, II. 71.

h Lord Glenlee; but this is not the same case as that of Cunningham. No. 223 to come under the ordinary principle, that when a person has sold goods, May 12, 183 he is bound to account, this obligation is arrestable. The case of Grier-Clyne v. amsay was the first in which it was fixed that an obligation to account is Clyne's Trust After that came the cases of M'Cree, of Cameron, and Kyle's Trust rred to by the parties. I should have great difficulty in holding the in-the present case not arrestable. In Innes v. Gordon, arrestment was competent, because diligence was not due.

E COURT, by a majority, adhered, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary, reserving the question of expenses.

D. FISHER, S.S.C.—MACLEAN and GIFFEN, W.S.—Agents.

DAVID CLYNE, Pursuer.—D. F. Hope—Steele—R. Robertson. No. 224
 E'S TRUSTEES, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Moncreiff.

bed—Clause.—In an action to have a deed reduced on the head of death-ns of certain previous settlements which held to show that, at the date of bbed deed, they were to be held as not subsisting, and as insufficient to claim of the heir insisting in the reduction.

ugust, 1815, the late David Clyne, S.S.C. executed a mortis causa May 12, 183 ion of his whole property, setting forth as follows:—"I, David 2D DIVISIO solicitor in the Supreme Courts of Scotland, in the event of my Ld. Cockbur asing my parents without leaving lawful heirs of my own body, T.
 by give, grant, assign, dispo, convey, and make over, to and in of William Clyne, merchant in Thurso, my father, and Margaret n, his spouse, my mother, during their mutual lives, and to the liver of them two, and after the death of the longest liver, to and ar of any person or persons, or for such uses, ends, and purposes, y name and appoint, by any deed I may execute at any time of
 , and even on deathbed; and in case of my dying without having d such deed, then to and in favour of such person or persons as named and appointed in any deed that shall be executed (accord-law or agreement between themselves in such deed) by my said
 ; and for the same uses, ends, and purposes, with the same , and under the same provisions and declarations that may be d, and, contained in any such deed that may be so executed by 1834. them; which deed of theirs, when so executed, I do hereby declare 1837. form a part hereof, and that this my deed shall be as effectual for 1838. conveying my whole means and estate, and regulating the succession of same, in the same way and manner as shall be appointed by the deed of my parents, as if their said deed were already executed herein copied verbatim, any law or practice to the contrary not standing. All and Whole the estate, heritable and moveable," &c. deed farther bore:—"I do hereby nominate and appoint the said William Clyne and Margaret Swanson, and longest liver of them, after their death the foresaid persons to be named by myself; and in such nomination, the persons to be named and appointed by the said William Clyne and Margaret Swanson as aforesaid, to be my sole executors and intromitters with my whole moveable and personal estate, with power to intromit with and dispose of the same, to pursue for and receive same, to grant discharges thereof, and to complete titles thereto, &c. cords; declaring that the present disposition is granted under the value of payment of all my just and lawful debts, with my funeral expenses.

 Reserving full power and liberty to me, at any time of my life, and on deathbed, to revoke, alter, or innovate these presents, in whole or part, as I may think fit; but declaring that the same, in so far as altered, shall be valid and effectual, though found lying in my own private custody, or in the custody of any other person for my behoof, at death."

In September of the same year, Mr Clyne's parents executed a last disposition and settlement, setting forth as follows:—"We, William Clyne, merchant in Thurso, and Margaret Swanson, his spouse, for love and affection which we have and bear to each other, and to David Clyne, solicitor in the Supreme Courts of Scotland, our only surviving child, and for other causes and considerations hereunto moving us, hereby with consent severally give, grant, assign, dispoise, convey, and make over to and in favour of each other during all the days of the life time of the longest liver; and after the death of the longest liver to in favour of the said David Clyne and the heirs of his body and his assigns; whom failing, to and in favour of George Miller, Esq. of Whitehead &c., as trustees, for the uses and purposes after-mentioned—All of sundry our heritable and moveable estate," &c. The deed then directed the trustees, after payment of debts, and of a certain legacy, to divide the whole estate into ten equal shares, and to make over these to certain parties therein specified, including one share to the children of Alexander Clyne, father of the pursuer, David Clyne. The granters respectively nominated and appointed the survivor, whom failing, their sons, David Clyne, and his foresaids, whom failing, the other trustees, to be their sole executors and intromitters, "reserving full power and liberty to and to the survivor of us, but only with the express advice and consent and David Clyne and not otherwise (and it is hereby declared, No. 224. said Margaret Swanson, in case she shall survive her said husband the said David Clyne have predeceased her, shall have no power to make any alteration upon this present deed, except by and with the concurrence and consent of the trustees, or their quorum), at any time of his life, and even on deathbed, to revoke, alter, or innovate these provisions whole or in part.”

May 12, 1837
Clyne v.
Clyne's Trustees.

A codicil to this deed was executed in October, 1826, whereby the said David Clyne, “with the express advice and consent of our son, David Clyne,” appointed two additional trustees, and altered one of the provisions of the deed. This codicil was subscribed by the granters and by the said David Clyne “in token of his consent thereto.”

David Clyne's parents predeceased him in 1829, without making any other settlement, and, on 1st November, 1833, he executed a deed, conveying to certain defenders, as trustees, for certain purposes, his whole heritable and moveable property (including a house in Albany Street), amounting to the value of £17,000. The trustees were directed, inter alia, to pay an annuity of £10 to his relation and heir-at-law, David Clyne. The deed contained the following clause of revocation:—“And I do hereby revoke and recall the foresaid settlement executed by myself on 22d October, 1815, and another settlement executed by me in voluntary conjunction with my parents upon the 30th day of October, 1826 years, and all other deeds and settlements, if any, in so far only as they interfere with the present deed.”

On the same day on which this deed was executed, Mr Clyne died. His heir-at-law, David Clyne, the annuitant above-mentioned, brought an action against the trustees to have the deed reduced on the head of the annuity. Against this action the following preliminary defences were

1. The pursuer is barred from challenging the deed under reduction, in consequence of the settlements executed by Mr Clyne and his parents. These settlements were not absolutely revoked by the deed under reduction, but only in so far as they interfered with the last deed, and if this settlement could be reduced by the pursuer, the former settlements would revive.

2. The pursuer has no legitimate interest to reduce the deed now under reduction, as his interest is much greater under the last settlement than it is under the former deeds, which would necessarily regulate Mr Clyne's succession if the settlement now under reduction were reduced. The deed under reduction having been executed agreeably to the powers in the settlements of 1815, the defenders have, in their possession, a sufficient title to exclude the challenge here brought forward on the part of the pursuer.

3. The defenders having been appointed to lodge a condescendence of the

224. grounds of these pleas, a record was made up and closed on the ordinary defences,<sup>1</sup> whereupon the Lord Ordinary ordered cases.

Pleaded for the Pursuer—

1. The deed of August, 1815, was made operative only in the Mr Clyne predeceasing his parents without issue; and on his death of them, it lapsed and became null. Looking to the terms of the deed of September, 1815, it likewise was exhausted by Clyne's death under it on the death of his father in 1829, and can form no basis of the pursuer's challenge of the deed under reduction. The settlement cannot be received as a nomination by Clyne under his deed of 1815; it has been long settled that a liege postule disposition executed in the name of the disponent cannot be filled up on deathbed;<sup>2</sup> and on that principle heirs cannot be named on deathbed, when without such nomination the succession would fall to the heir-at-law.

2. Supposing the deeds of 1815 to have been subsisting at the time of the execution of the deathbed settlement, they must be held to have been recalled and annulled by the clause of revocation in that settlement.

Pleaded for the Defenders—

1. The deeds of Mr Clyne and his parents, in 1815, and the deed of 1826, form a complete and effectual settlement of the property in question so as to exclude the pursuer's claim, on the deed of 1833 being produced; and in this view they are to be considered both in connection with each other, and by reference to the particular clauses of each. A deed made on deathbed can only be reduced when it is strictly a conveyance of heritable estate made to the heir's prejudice; a deed relative to heritable estate made on deathbed, and yet not come within the heir's challenge; the form of conveying heritable estate is fixed by law, and consequently any deed requiring that form, and effectual without it, may be validly executed on deathbed. Now it has been settled that the purposes of a trust constituted by disposition may be declared by testament, or by any deed not requiring dispositive words, if a reservation to that effect is inserted in the conveyance;<sup>3</sup> but the declaration of the purposes of the deed, by the nomination of the party having the substantial interest in the deed, is more essential to the disposition than the nomination of a trustee, which is a mere form;<sup>4</sup> therefore, a fortiori, in the present case Mr Clyne was entitled to make the nomination of trustees on deathbed, and this nomination is effectual to exclude.

2. The doctrine by which a clause of revocation in a deathbed deed

<sup>1</sup> See ante, XIV. 31.

<sup>2</sup> Birmies, June 22, 1678, (M. 3242); Pennycook, Jan. 18, 1687, (M. 3).

<sup>3</sup> Coutts v. Crawford, (June 12, 1795) as reversed, March 12, 1806, &c.

<sup>4</sup> Willoch v. Ochterlony, Dec. 14, 1769 (M. 5539); Brack v. Hogg, Nov. 1827 (ante, VI. 113), &c.

<sup>5</sup> See Fordyce v. Cockburn, July 5, 1827 (ante, V. 897, new ed. 832).

and effectual where the heir challenges and sets aside the deed itself, was No. 224.
 reluctantly recognised, and is not to be stretched; the present case differs May 12, 1837 materially from the case of Coutts, and others of a similar description, in Clyne v.
 the terms of the deed and the clause of revocation, the previous settle- Clyne's Trustees.
 ments having in particular been revoked only in so far as they interfered with the last deed, and is therefore not to be ruled by these cases.

The parties were not at one as to the value of the heritage conveyed by the deed of 1833, but as the determination of this matter of fact was not essential to the disposal of the dilatory defences, it was reserved.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, with the unjoined note:—"Repels the dilatory defences, and decerns, but without prejudice as to any question which may arise respecting the amount of the heritage claimed by the pursuer, which is hereby reserved to be discussed with the defences on the merits, or otherwise, hereafter: Finds the defenders liable in expenses."

The defenders reclaimed.

LORD GLENLEE.—If it had been distinctly made out that the pursuer was barred by a subsisting deed, which would have prevented his claim on the reduction of a deathbed deed, the defenders might have succeeded in their argument; but it has not been made out that such deed was in existence at the date of the last settlement, and therefore the pursuer is not prevented from claiming.

The other Judges having concurred,

THE COURT adhered, finding the defenders liable in expenses.

L. M. MACARA, W.S.—D. MANSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

---

"It is stated by the defenders that there is no heritage except a house in Albany Street, Edinburgh, and that this is not so valuable as the annuity of £10, which the deathbed deed gives the pursuer, though he be about fifty years old. The Lord Ordinary wished this matter of fact to be fixed before deciding any thing else, but both parties were averse to this; and therefore, as its determination is not necessary for the disposal of the dilatory defences, it, or any such matter, has been reserved."

1837. MRS MARION SCOTT OF M'MILLAN, and HUSBAND, and OTHERS, S penders.—Whigham.
JAMES PRICE and MANDATARY, Chargers.—D. F. Hope—Mackenzie

Fee and Liferent—Trust—Clause.—A testator left one son and two daughters the son was insolvent, and the testator conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, directing them to pay an alimentary annuity to the son: the conveyance contained a clause "excepting always the liferent use and possession of the house in M., &c., now occupied by myself, and which I hereby give and bequeath to my said son, in liferent, during all the days of his life, if he choose to fix his permanent residence at M., he being always bound to pay my said trustees the sum of £20 of yearly rent therefor; as also excepting household furniture, &c., which are hereby given and bequeathed to my said son in liferent, so long as he shall continue to reside in the said house at M., and which shall thereafter, or upon my said son dying without lawful issue of his body, then belong to my daughters, Mrs S. and Mrs K. equally between them: fee:" the children of either of these daughters, predeceasing the son, were to take their mother's share: the son had no issue up to the period when one of his creditors used diligence for attaching the furniture: a bill of suspension and interdiction was presented by the daughters:—Bill passed; in respect that the fee of the furniture was not in the son, but in the trustees.

Reputed Ownership—Fee and Liferent.—The liferenter of furniture does not, by possession of it in virtue of his liferent, subject it to the diligence of his creditors, on the ground of reputed ownership.—Question whether a creditor, whose debt was contracted before the debtor's possession of the moveables began, could found on the reputed ownership of these moveables, as a ground for attaching them, although he had not contracted on the faith of such ownership.

13, 1837. THE late Thomas M'Millan of Shorthope, had one son, Thomas M'Millan, jun., and two daughters. In 1830 he executed an entail of Shorthope, in Division. favour of his son, and, of the same date, he also executed a trust-disposition
Cunningham. and settlement, embracing all his other means and estate heritable and move-
B. able. The trust was for paying his own debts, making provisions on his other children, and other purposes. The trust-deed disposed and conveyed to the trustees, "all lands and heritages, &c.; as also, all debts and sums of money, &c., together with the whole moveable goods and gear of every denomination that may belong to me at the time of my death, excepting always the liferent use and possession of the house in Musselburgh, offices, garden and tail of land adjoining thereto, which are now occupied by myself, and which I hereby give and bequeath to the said Thomas M'Millan, my son, in liferent, during all the days of his life, if he choose to fix his permanent residence at Musselburgh, he being always bound to pay my said trustees the sum of £20 of yearly rent therefor, and which sum my said trustees shall be entitled to retain out of the annuity herein- after mentioned to the said Thomas M'Millan; as also excepting the household furniture or plenishing, including silver-plate and heirship moveables which shall pertain and belong to me at the time of my de- cease, which are hereby given and bequeathed to the said Thomas M'Millan, my son, in liferent, so long as he shall continue to reside in se at Musselburgh, and which shall thereafter, or upon the No. 22:

 s M'Millan dying without lawful issue of his body, then be- May 13, 18: daughters, Mrs Scott, and Mrs Kemp, equally between them Scott v. Pri children of any of my said daughters who may predecease the s M'Millan, my son, coming in place of, and drawing the would have belonged to their mother." The son, Thomas, a state of insolvency, and the trust-deed farther directed an £150 to be paid to him, which was declared to be alimentary, ctable by his debts : and powers were given to the trustees, proper, to apply such sum as appeared prudent, in obtaining from his creditors.

died in 1832, and Thomas M'Millan, jun. entered into pose house at Musselburgh, and continued to reside there. He ossession of the household furniture, &c. In 1836, James in London, and James Lindsay, W.S., his mandatary, ob-ree for £35, against M'Millan, jun., being a debt contracted d were afterwards proceeding with a poinding of part of the hen a bill of suspension and interdict was presented at the Mrs Scott or M'Millan, one of the two sisters of M'Millan, 'Millan Kemp and others, the children of the other sister Mrs deceased. Up to this date M'Millan, jun. had had no issue.
 ders pleaded—(1.) By the conception of the trust-settlement, e furniture was conveyed to them, though under conditions it contingently defeat it, but until these conditions were fee was in them. And, at all events, if the fee was not in it was in the trustees. It could not be in Thomas M'Millan, r, both because the intention of the testator, who was aware insolvency, clearly was not to give him the fee ; and also bectual right was expressly limited to something considerably liferent, as it was liable to be wholly forfeited as soon as he side in the house at Musselburgh, which cost him a rent of ght so narrowed as this, especially where third parties had an he limitations, would not have warranted the Court in hold-re was a fee in him, even had a fee to his children nascituri dded to it ; and the doctrine by which such a fee was reared a parent having a full right of liferent, was one which the l never extend. As the fee, therefore, was not in M'Millan, editors could not carry it off by diligence.—(2.) There was no ver for a plea, founded on reputed ownership, on account of possession of moveables, when he enjoyed that possession inof the will of the fiar ; and, in this instance, the suspenders, , had it not in their power to prevent the full possession which un, had hitherto had ; and such possession was fair and proper and besides, the debt of the charger was contracted long bensible ownership existed, and not on the faith of it ; so that s not available to him.

Price answered—(1.) The right of Thomas M'Millan, jun. was excepted out of the grant to the trustees, and, as the clause of exception disposed both of the liferent and of the fee of the furniture, neither the liferent fee could be in the trustees. The only question, therefore, was, whether the fee was in Thomas M'Millan, or his sisters. But it could not be in the sisters, because, if M'Millan left lawful issue, their right was wholly evacuated. And as, according to the true intention of the testator, it was the effect of his leaving lawful issue, whether he continued to reside in the house at Musselburgh or not, the case was reduced precisely to this point, that it was a direct conveyance of the liferent of the furniture to M'Millan, and the fee to his children nascituri, which was just a conveyance of the fee to him, and rendered the diligence of his creditors effectual, without regard to any ulterior substitutions which might result. But (2.) as M'Millan had been in possession of the furniture for several years, and was therefore the ostensible owner, it was liable to the diligence of his creditors, on the ground of reputed ownership.* And it was immaterial whether a debt was originally contracted by him while enjoying that reputed ownership, or whether a creditor, in an earlier debt, merely forbore for a time to use diligence, on the faith that his debtor was the owner; in either case the plea of reputed ownership applied.

The Lord Ordinary, "in respect of the terms of the settlement of the late Thomas M'Millan produced, relative to the furniture now attempted to be poulded, passed the bill, and continued the interdict."

The charger reclaimed; and it was intimated by both parties that they meant to abide by the judgment pronounced in the Bill Chamber.

* 1 Bell, 240; Brown, June 2, 1792 (14963); Duncan, June 27, 1809 (F.C.), Lewis, Feb. 13, 1736: (Eich. voce Legacy, No. 1); M'Kay, Jan. 13, 1835 (ante XIII. 246); 3 Ersk. 8, 45.

* 4 St. 10, 21; 1 Bell, 249, 253, and 255.

* "NOTE.—As there is no dispute as to the facts here, and as the whole question turns on the import of a settlement produced, while the claim of the charger only amounts to £35, it may be convenient for both parties to know the grounds on which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded in passing the bill, so as the case may be brought in a summary and economical form before the Inner-House, if the charger wishes to litigate the case farther.

"The present is a case, then, in which a debtor is in possession of a house at Musselburgh, and of the furniture therein, which formerly belonged to his father. The father executed his settlement in 1830, and died in 1832, and it is material to observe that the debts founded on by the charger were contracted prior to these dates.

"By the settlement, Thomas M'Millan, senior, conveyed his whole estate and effects, heritable and moveable, to trustees, excepting only the estate of Shorrock, which he entailed on his only son, Thomas M'Millan, junior, the common debts, and the house and furniture to be immediately adverted to. The terms of the settlement in all its provisions, show that the granter was well aware of his insolvent circumstances. Thus, the trustees were directed to pay an annuity of £150 to the son, which was declared alimentary, and not affectable by his debts, and the trustees had a discretionary power to augment the annuity

THE PRESIDENT.—This is a case which requires very considerable attention by the Court. The terms of the deed are, in some respects, of a very unusual tenor. There was one extremely simple method which the testator might have adopted, of protecting the whole trust-property from the diligence of his son's creditors, by merely conveying it to trustees, and directing them to grant a lease to his son of the house and furniture for a rent of £20, or on such other terms as he chose. Instead of following this safe and familiar method, he has framed a deed, so intricate in its structure, that it is difficult to extricate the precise rights of the respective parties interested under it. In regard to the first branch of the clause of the deed, which relates to the dwellinghouse, I doubt whether there is an effectual protection, even of the liferent, to the son. The house is given to the trustees, reserving always the liferent use and possession of the house in Musselburgh,

No. 21

May 13, 1881
Scott v. P

event, if they saw fit. They were also empowered to lay out a sum in paying his debts or procuring a discharge to him from his creditors.

The maker of the settlement, however, excepted from the conveyance to his son his house in Musselburgh, and also the furniture therein. The clause as to the subjects is not fully quoted either in the bill or answers, but it deserves to be noticed. There is a clear limitation of the son's right to the house to a mere liferent during his life, if he chose to fix his permanent residence there, as he is liable for a rent of £20 for it, to be taken out of his annuity; and in like manner the concluding part of the clause as to the furniture in its legal construction, as well as in its plain and obvious meaning, only gave the debtor the use of the furniture during his life, if he resided in this house.

At the charger, who states himself to be a creditor of Thomas McMillan, in debts contracted long anterior to his father's death, now proposes to pounce on the furniture, and in support of his right to do so, he maintains two pleas.—First, that the right of fee in this furniture is given by the settlement to the debtor; and, secondly, that, at all events, in consequence of the possession of the furniture by Thomas McMillan, a plea of reputed ownership arises, which bars the suspensory from the creditor as to the pouncing. Both of these pleas appear to be untenable.

First, The settlement being a testamentary deed, must be construed according to the obvious or presumed meaning of the granter. But it is impossible to hold that the granter intended to give the debtor more than a qualified or temporary right to the possession of the house. The debtor did not even get a liferent; no doubt it may turn out that his possession may endure for his life, but that depends on making the house his permanent residence. If he went elsewhere, the house would fall under the administration of the trustees, and the furniture would be available by the contingent fars. In this view the present case differs from all the cases founded on by the chargers.

It is said, however, that the debtor at present having possession of this furniture may sell or dispose of it at pleasure—but the latter inference cannot be admitted. Possibly he may have the power to sell or put away some of the articles if he so act dishonestly, but he certainly has no legal right to sell articles given to him merely for temporary use.

Second, The plea founded on reputed ownership, is equally untenable in the circumstances of this case. In general such a plea is only available to a creditor who has trusted and given credit to the debtor, on the faith that he was a proprietor of valuable goods, ostensibly in his possession; but that plea is excluded here, as the charger's debt was contracted years before the debtor got this furniture. He only got a qualified and temporary right, conferred on him, by his father's settlement. According to the charger's plea, no relative or third party wishing to give a little in the unfortunate situation of the debtor here, the accommodation of a little money could be any stipulation, protect it from the diligence of his old creditors. The Lord Ordinary cannot sanction that doctrine."

offices, garden, &c., which I hereby give and bequeath to the said Thomas M'Millan, my son, in liferent." I feel much doubt whether these are apt terms to convey the liferent of a heritable subject. I think a legacy or bequest of the fee of heritance might just as well be made, as a legacy or bequest of the liferent of it. But it is unnecessary to go more into this, as the question before us turns upon the structure of the second branch of the clause of exception, that which relates to the furniture. That exception is expressed in these terms:—"As also, excepting the household furniture, &c. which are hereby given and bequeathed to the said Thomas M'Millan, my son, in liferent, so long as he shall continue to reside in the said house at Musselburgh, and which shall thereafter, or upon the said Thomas M'Millan dying without lawful issue of his body, then belong to my daughters, equally between them, in fee." This clause contains an exception both of the fee and liferent of the furniture, and the question is, where are these respective interests now vested? From the latter part of the words which I have now read, it appears to be only in the event of the son dying without issue, that the daughters are to take the fee. I consider them, therefore, to be merely conditional institutes. Their fee will only emerge if the son dies without lawful issue. When then is the fee in the mean time? The son has expressly received a liferent right, if he continues to reside in that house, as he has hitherto done; and if he leaves lawful issue, the fee is, by implication, though not expressly, to go to such issue. I therefore consider that there is great weight in the argument of the chargers, that the fee in the mean time, not being in the conditional institutes, is and must be in the son. But the deed is as awkwardly framed, as any I have ever seen.

LORD GILLIES.—I feel this to be a very puzzling case. The pecuniary interest at stake is small; but the principles of law involved in the question, are not the less important on that account, and I have often felt much less difficulty in disposing of actions embracing large property, than in disposing of this case. It is true, as your Lordship has observed, that the testator, by framing a different deed, might easily and simply have attained his object: but it is only with the deed which he has chosen to frame, that we have now to deal. We must take that deed as it stands, and the question is, where is the fee of this furniture? If it be in the son, then the diligence of his creditors is effectual to attach it. In regard to the bequest of a liferent of the house to the son, it is quite true that no mere bequest of heritance is good by the law of Scotland. But considering that there was a general conveyance, including the house, to the trustees; that the son was the heir at law, whose interest in the heritance will be let in, wherever the trust-conveyance does not shut it out; and that the bequest was tantamount to a direction to the trustees, that the liferent of the house was meant for the son; I think there would be ground for holding that he had a right to the species of liferent there expressed, if that question was before us. But it is not as to the house that the question arises; it is only as to the furniture. It will be observed that the trust-settlement sets out with a general conveyance of the whole property of the truster, heritable and moveable, excepting only the estate of Shorthope, to the trustees. In an after part of the deed the exception occurs which has given rise to the present question, and the extent of that exception must now be attended to. In regard to the house itself, nothing is excepted out of the conveyance to the trustees, but the liferent use and possession of it; and if the same terms had occurred as to the furniture, and if it had also been conveyed to the trustees, excepting only the liferent use and possession of it, there would have been no difficulty.

No. 225.

May 13, 1837
Scott v. Price

of volcanic activity.

of the clause of exception, and, although the question to be decided by the second of these, I think it material to attend also to the first, in true construction of it appears to throw light upon the true construction second. The first exception contains only something less than a life interest. It is the life interest, only on condition of the son's residing in at Musselburgh, for which he was to pay a rent of £20. Now, as the intent of the bequest to the son, so far as regards the house, I think it to every other right in the house is vested in the trustees for the purpose of the trust. It appears to me that there is no warrant for holding that it is, or that it is taken out of the trust, and thrown nobody knows where, satisfied, therefore, that the fee of the house is in the trustees, and I do not to consider the question as to the fee of the furniture. The exception in the trust-conveyance is in these terms:—"As also excepting the household or plenishing, &c., which are hereby given and bequeathed to the said Mr. Millan, my son, in life, so long as he shall continue to reside in the house at Musselburgh, and which shall thereafter, or upon the said Mr. Millan dying without lawful issue of his body, then belong to my daughter Scott and Mrs. Kemp, equally in fee;" and the children of a predeceased were to come in place of their mother. Reading this exception, with reference to the bequest which it was intended to carry into effect, what is the main intent of that bequest? It bestows the life interest of the furniture, &c., on the son, if he lives in the house specified; but if he ceases to live there, or dies without leaving lawful issue, it bestows the fee upon the daughters; and the bequest ends. There is nothing expressly stated as a bequest to the son, in any case whatever. There is a limited bequest of a certain interest to the son himself, and, in certain events, to the daughters, and nothing beyond as I apprehend, is excepted, or meant to be excepted, out of the trust. Every other right in the subject is in the trustees. Every right is conveyed which is not excepted and bequeathed in favour of the son or daughters. I consider that the fee of the furniture is not given to the children nasciturus to the son, but is either given conditionally to the daughters, or else it rests in and in the trustees.

But, farther, even if the fee was given to the son's children nasciturus, I think the common rule on that subject cannot apply to the special circumstance of this case. There is not a full right even of life interest granted to the son. It is only "so long as he shall continue to reside in the said house at Musselburgh; if he ceases to live there, the fee is given to the testator's daughters. The first disposal of the fee. It is afterwards provided, that, if the son dies without issue, the fee is in that case to be given to the daughters; any right in the children nasciturus of the son is only given by implication, and in case of the son's dying the condition of living in the house at Musselburgh. In these circumstances it seems impossible to hold that the son is entitled absolutely to sell the furniture, and defeat the right of the daughters, who are living persons, and not nasciturus; and who, moreover, are third parties as to this question. There is a life interest to a parent, and a fee to his own children nasciturus, has been so often held, that the life interest totally absorbs the right of fee intended for the children, and becomes a constructive fee in the parent, yet that doctrine never has been applied so as to permit the life interest to absorb a fee bestowed on living third parties. And it is perfectly clear that it was not the intention of the testator to bestow furniture upon the son. He has limited his son to a right, which is a less than a liferent. So that, in holding the fee not to be in the son, I am holding the bequest according to the intention of the testator. And I do not think that there is any necessitas juris for holding the fee to be in the son, where there was no possibility of holding it to be any where else. The existence of a conditional fee in the daughters would save it from being in pendent; but there are some grounds for taking that view, I rather incline to hold that the fee is in the trustees. I, therefore, reject the first plea of the charger, which is that the fee is in the son.

I now come to the second plea, founded on an allegation of reputed ownership, which I think is quite untenable. If the right of the son be merely that of a liferenter, his possession is upon a perfectly fair and lawful title, which implies no negligence or fault of any kind against the father. Such possession does not subject the fee to be carried off by the liferenter's creditors on the plea of reputed ownership.

And I would rather repel the plea, upon the ground which I have stated, than upon the ground that the creditors' debt was anterior to the commencement of the reputed ownership. I am not sure that there is any sound distinction between the right of a creditor whose debt was contracted during the continuance of the reputed ownership, and the right of a creditor whose debt was contracted prior thereto; and I prefer to repel the plea upon the single ground which I have stated only.

FOREHOUSE.—I concur with Lords Gillies and Mackenzie in holding that the fee is in the trustees, and that the interlocutor ought, therefore, to be granted. But I think it a case attended with great difficulty. The settlement is of a complicated nature. It is in the form of a general conveyance of the testator's real and moveable property, heritable and moveable, to trustees, under an exception in favour of the son, first, to the house at Musselburgh, and, second, to the furniture, as well as the use of the house, providing that the son's interest, both in the house and furniture, shall fall, if he ceases to reside in that same house. The two exceptions must be viewed in their bearing upon each other. There is less than a liferent use of the house, given to the son. It is only given so long as he continues to live in the house, during which period he is to pay £20 of rent. As nothing in regard to the house is excepted out of the trust-conveyance, the fee of the house is clearly in the trustees. Then the use of exception occurs as to the furniture. It is true that the same exceptions are not used in respect to it which are used in respect to the house; but it was clearly the intention of the testator, who was aware of his son's intention, not to bestow the fee of the furniture on him. And I am of opinion, from the whole clauses of the deed, that the testator meant the exception, as to the furniture, to be merely a qualified liferent, similar to the qualified right of the son in the house, and that it is impossible to hold the fee to be in the son. I think that there is some straining necessary, in order to read the deed so that the right in the furniture is just to be viewed as equally limited with his right in the house; but the duty of construing this settlement is one which presents a choice of difficulties, and the construction which I have adopted seems to involve less difficulty than any other.

THE COURT adhered.

DAVIDSON and SYME, W.S.—J. LINDSAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 225.

May 13, 1837
Scott v. Price.

No. 226.

ELIZABETH CRAIGIE, Pursuer.—*Robertson.*EDWARD HOGGAN, Defender.—Pyper.

May 13, 1837.

Single v.

Hoggan.

Dunn v. Dunn.

Process—Marriage.—A reclaiming note being presented against a declarator of marriage, and a motion being made to send the note to the roll—motion refused, in respect that it was not warranted by any rule or

May 13, 1837.

2d Division.

L. Fullerton.

B.

In a process of declarator of marriage, decree having been pronounced in terms of the libel, the defender reclaimed. The pursuer moved, the note appeared in the single bills, that it should be sent to the roll, in respect of the nature of the action.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am not aware that there is any rule or practice in declarators of marriage to be sent to the summar roll; it is to the short of such processes belong, and this process should now be sent there.

The other Judges concurred, and the process was accordingly sent to the roll.

DAVIDSON and SYME, W.S.—A. DUNLOP, W.S.—Agents.

No. 227. GEORGE SCOTT, Senior, and GEORGE SCOTT, Junior, Pursuers.—Gen. Rutherford—Milne.

ROBERT DUNN and OTHERS, Defenders.—D. F. Hope—Mail Monteith.

Process—Reduction—Pleas in Law—Judicial Examination.—1. In an of reduction where the Lord Ordinary had found that an alternative for relief could not be maintained, because there was no plea in law applicable, the Court recalled this finding, and remitted to His Lordship, with power to receive a new plea, although the record was closed.—2. Circumstances in an application to have defenders judicially examined was refused.

May 13, 1837.

2d Division.

Ld. Cockburn.

T.

THE pursuer, George Scott, senior, accepted to the defender D bill of exchange bearing to be dated 25th December, 1833, for value received, payable twelve months after date. This bill was in by Dunn to the defender James Muir, and by him to the defender bald M'Nilidge.

In April, 1834, Scott executed a bond of interdiction of himself son the pursuer, George Scott, junior, which was duly recorded.

On the bill falling due, payment being refused by the accept holder, M'Nilidge, protested it for non-payment, and thereafter to letters of horning and poinding against Scott, senior, and against and Muir, upon which he gave a charge to Scott. Of this charge, senior and junior, brought a suspension; and they also raised against Dunn, Muir, and M'Nilidge, to have the bill of exchange est, letters of horning and poinding, and the charge and execution of No. 227.

 ge reduced, first, for the reason of style; secondly, on the ground of <sup>May 13, 1837.</sup> interdiction; thirdly, on the ground of facility and circumvention, the <sup>Scott v. Dunn</sup> in question having been impetrated by the fraud of the defenders tly from Scott, who was stated to be facile and easily cajoled with or; fourthly, on the ground of the bill having been indorsed by Muir Dunn, and by him to M'Nilidge, without valne, and merely for the pose of covering their joint fraud; and farther concluding, in the nt of M'Nilidge succeeding in getting decret against Scott, senior, in concussing him into payment of the proceeds of the bill, then to e the two defenders Dunn and Muir ordained, conjunctly and seve-y, to free and relieve the said Scott of the decret, or, in the event of ment, to pay back to him the sum in the bill.

n the pursuers' condescendence it was alleged generally that the elder tt was facile and easily imposed upon, and circumstances were stated er which the bill in question was impetrated from him by Dunn and ir; it was also stated that M'Nilidge was aware of these circumstances of Scott's facility, and that he took up the bill merely to act as agent Dunn or Muir in recovering the proceeds, and was not a bona fide rous holder. Pleas in law were stated with reference to the third and th reasons of reduction, and also to show the competency of a reduc-of the bill, not only in a question with Dunn and Muir, who had l means for obtaining it as set forth in the record, but also in a queswith M'Nilidge, in respect that he gave no value for the same, and in agreeing to become the holder and recover payment, he did so ely as agent or trustee for the other defenders. There was no plea a reference to the second reason of reduction, or to the conclusion for ef.

Dunn, Muir, and M'Nilidge respectively made appearance, and plead:
 inter alia, in defence against the action:

1. Interdiction is confined to heritage, and is not a lègal ground for aicing the bill in question.

2. In so far as the action libels other reasons of reduction, relevant ands have not been set forth; and even if such had been the case, tt, junior, would have no title to pursue.

M'Nilidge pleaded separately—

1. Even assuming that the averments in the summons constituted relet grounds of reduction, as in a question with the original parties to the
 , they could not affect the bill or the diligence proceeding in it, as in uestion with himself, who was a bonâ fide onerous indorsee.

2. The averment that he (M'Nilidge) did not pay full value for the and only be proved by his writ or oath, and he is entitled to all the lages of bona fide onerous indorsees.

In the course of the procedure before the Lord Ordinary, the pursuers

287. moved his Lordship to have the defenders or one or other of them judicially examined. This application was refused.

1837-38. The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding a note subjoined:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the process and heard parties, finds that the pursuer is not entitled hoc statu to have the defenders judicially examined: Finds that the bill in question is not reducible under this record ex capite interdictionis: Finds that, under the record, the alternative conclusion for relief cannot be maintained: Annuls the defenders therefrom and decerns; quoad the ground of reduction founded on alleged fraud and facility, before answer, remits the case to the issue-clerks to frame, or to endeavour to frame, an issue or issues against all or any of the defenders, reserving to the pursuer any right he may have to prove the alleged want of value given by the indorsee, as a separate ground of reduction, by the writ or oath of the said indorsee, and also reserving all questions of expenses incurred hinc inde."

"This is a complicated case, and the Lord Ordinary cannot safely or conveniently decide more of it, in its present state, than he has done.

"1. The pursuer may renew his motion for a judicial examination in any changed state of the case; but the Lord Ordinary sees no principle and no precedent for his being found entitled to this in existing circumstances.

"2. The reason of reduction founded on the interdiction won't do; 1st, because there is no plea applicable to it; 2dly, because, though there were, this transaction is not struck at by the interdiction. But though this reason of reduction be disallowed, it does not follow that the interdicator must be turned altogether out of the process, because he is perhaps entitled to appear along with his ward, in relation to the bills on other grounds, and therefore this point is left open for the present.

"3. The conclusion for relief cannot be maintained, because there is no plea for it.

"4. The Lord Ordinary thinks that the defenders must ultimately get any expenses they may have incurred in discussing these two last points, but he declines from giving them now, because he thinks that adjusting this matter would obstruct the progress of the case towards its final settlement.

"5. It is doubtful whether there be a proper case raised in the record against the defender, M'Nilidge, on fraud and circumvention, because, although the pursuer charges him sufficiently with fraud, it is not clear that the summons is supported by the condescendence. But, as there must be a remit on this reason of reduction, in so far as the other two defenders are concerned, the Lord Ordinary thinks it better to send it to the jury clerks, quoad the whole three, in the first instance, and before answer, in order that the sufficiency of the condescendence to support the charge against M'Nilidge, may be subjected to a more minute examination.

"6. No doubt if M'Nilidge be well founded in his plea, that the fraud, though it were correctly charged, is only proveable by his writ or oath, there can be no remit quoad him. But the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that this is one of the cases in which the pursuer is restricted to these two modes of proof alone. In judging of this, it must be recollected that this is an action of reduction, and the whole circumstances must be looked to; and, among others, the averment that he is only a trustee for the persons primarily guilty of the fraud, which is to have given rise to the contract, and so is liable to the objections competent against them."

the pursuers reclaimed, and contended, inter alia, that the conclusion No. 227.
 relief had been improperly dismissed, and that it was competent after May 16, 1837.
 record was closed to add a new plea in law with reference to this con- Forsyth v.
 on. His Creditors

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—“ Adhere to the interlocutor submitted to review, in so far as it finds that the pursuer is not entitled hoc statu to have the defenders judicially examined, and that the bill is not reducible ex capite interdictionis ; quoad ultra, recall the said interlocutor and remit to the Lord Ordinary with power to receive a new plea in law, applicable to the conclusion for relief, upon such conditions as to him shall seem proper, and to hear as to conjoining the suspension process against the defender M'Nilidge with this process, and thereafter to remit the whole cause to the jury roll, if his Lordship shall see cause, reserving all questions of expenses.”

GREIG and MORTON, W.S.—J. CULLEN, W.S.—T. S. ANDERSON, W.S.—Agents.

— FORSYTH, Pursuer.—A. S. Logan.
 HIS CREDITORS, Defenders.—Paterson.

No. 228

cessio.—When a process of cessio is raised under 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56, and statutory induciæ expire during vacation—Question whether it is competent for Lord Ordinary on the bills to hear the cause on the merits, and give decree.

DURING the Spring vacation of 1837, Forsyth raised a process of May 16, 1837 before the Court of Session, under the Act 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56. 1ST DIVISION statutory intimation of 30 days expired during the vacation, and Lord Jeffrey Forsyth moved the Lord Ordinary on the bills, to hear his cause pleaded Bill Chamber on the merits, and to pronounce judgment, in respect, inter alia, that by of the statute, all powers requisite for the purposes of the Act, which competent to the Inner House, during session, were made competo the Lord Ordinary, on the bills during vacation. The creditors ended that it was incompetent for his Lordship to hear the cause, and Lordship, being doubtful of the competency of entertaining the applion, reported the point to the Court, a proceeding to which both par-assented. His Lordship now brought the case before the Court, but as intimated from the bar, that, as there was no doubt of the compeof making the application now to their Lordships, and this was to immediately done by the pursuer in common form, the pursuer waived application in the Bill Chamber.

done by the

done by the

An Act of Sederunt was this day passed for regulating the enrolment of causes commencement of a Session, where the first sederunt day is at the end of a See Appendix.

228. The Court therefore superseded the case, but it was observed by their Lordships that the point involved was one of much importance, that it would be proper for them to hold a consultation with the other Judges in order to lay down a rule for the guidance of Lords Ordinary during the vacation.

—Agents.

229. JAMES KERR, Petitioner.—Mackenzie.
ANDREW ANDERSON, Respondent.

Cessio—Reparation—Real injury.—A farm-servant committed a severe personal assault on his fellow-servant, for which he was both punished with imprisonment in the criminal court, and subjected in damages in the civil court; for the civil debt, he sustained an imprisonment of above six months, in addition to penal imprisonment; he was an unmarried man:—Circumstances in which held that he was not entitled to the benefit of a decree of cessio, except on condition of obliging himself to pay to his fellow-servant 2s. per week, out of his wages, which amounted to 5s. per week, in money, besides bed and board; but limiting the obligation to such period as he should be himself in the receipt of such wages.

1837. JAMES KERR, a farm-servant, committed a severe assault on Andrew Anderson, a fellow-servant. Anderson prosecuted him for damages before the Sheriff of Edinburgh, and obtained a decree for £30, besides £13, 6s. 8d. of expenses. For this debt, Anderson imprisoned Kerr, on May 6, 1836. After detaining him in jail for two months, Anderson lodged a complaint with the procurator-fiscal, who prosecuted Kerr criminally for the assault before the Sheriff of Edinburgh, and Kerr was sentenced to four months imprisonment. He was then transferred from the debtor's ward, to the criminal's ward. When the period of imprisonment was expiring, Anderson of new arrested him as his debtor, and re-transferred him to the debtor's ward. Kerr had no funds, and, in January 1837, having been constantly confined since May 6, 1836, he presented a petition to the Sheriff of Edinburgh, for decree of cessio bonorum, under 6 and 7 Wm. IV. c. 56. His debts, besides that to Anderson, did not exceed £2. On his examination he stated that he had no funds; that his wages, before the assault, were paid to him half-yearly, but, since the assault, were paid weekly, being at the rate of 5s. per week, besides bed and board, but including washing; that the change in the mode of paying his wages arose from certain weekly payments which he had to make, for washing &c. The examination farther contained the following statement: "The declarant, that he has no objections to pay 2s. a-week to Anderson, for each week that he is engaged at the rate of 5s. a-week. And being touched by his agent, the declarant then states, that he is not able to pay anything to Anderson."

Anderson offered to consent to Kerr's liberation, on condition of agreeing to pay 4s. per week out of his wages; and maintained that as a creditor for damages arising out of real injury, he had a right to No. 229.

 subject to any decree of cessio which was not qualified with a condition May 16, 1857 of the petitioner's paying to him a weekly sum out of his wages. Kerr v. refused to agree to pay any thing, alleging that, in so far as his conduct Anderson. had been criminal, it had been punished in the criminal court; and, both on that account, and also on account of his protracted imprisonment, he was now entitled to an unqualified decree of cessio, although the civil debt which he owed to Anderson had originated ex delicto; leaving it open, of course, to Anderson to attach any property or effects of the petitioner, if he should ever come to be possessed of any.

The Sheriff "found the pursuer entitled to the benefit of the process cessio bonorum, as prayed for, in the petition."

Anderson presented a reclaiming note which came before Lord Macnair, in vacation, as Ordinary on the Bills, and his Lordship "having considered this reclaiming note, and heard the counsel for the pursuer, and his agent for the reclamer; hereby intimates to the parties, that he will report the case to the First Division of the Court, in May next, on the question, whether, in the circumstances of the case, the pursuer ought to remain in the benefit of the cessio, without being laid under an obligation, as a condition of that benefit, that he should pay a certain weekly sum out of his wages to the reclamer, the incarcerating creditor, he being a creditor for damages, on account of real injury."

The pursuer was liberated under an interim application during the proceedings in the Bill Chamber.

The cause came to be advised, under the interlocutor of Lord Macnair.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a curious case. The pursuer himself offered to pay per week out of his wages, when he was under examination before the Sheriff; immediately upon that, he got a jog from his agent, and then he stated he was unable to pay any thing. He is an unmarried man, and I take his own spontane-offer as a tolerably good test of his being able to pay that amount weekly. I will limit his liability, however, to such period as he may be in service, and in receipt of wages. It is pleaded for him that he has suffered a protracted imprisonment. Undoubtedly he has, but he committed a severe assault upon Anderson, and Anderson has got no satisfaction for any part of the debt which arose out of that assault. In these circumstances, I think the pursuer ought not to receive the benefit of the cessio, without imposing on him the condition of paying 2s. per week to Anderson, so long as he is in receipt of wages. The petition should, at least, be refused hoc statu.

LORD CORNHILL.—I am of the same opinion. The pursuer, being incarcerated for a debt which originated in the perpetration of a crime, would, in former times, have been denied the benefit of this process altogether. And although that has been equitably and humanely relaxed, still, it is not consistent with equity that the pursuer should be liberated except upon condition of being subjected in payment of a portion of his weekly wages to the person on whom he committed the assault. It does not appear to me that the sum of 2s. per week, out 1829. of wages which amount to 5s. in money, besides bed and board, is unreasonably high. I would, therefore, hoc statu, refuse the cessio except on the condition that the decree shall be qualified with the pursuer's liability to pay this proportion of his wages.

LORD GILLIES.—My only difficulty is, whether a decree which qualifies the pursuer's liberation with this condition, does not, in truth, deprive him for the means of adequately supporting himself.

LORD MACKENZIE was understood to consider the question to be attended with difficulty, but to incline to refuse the cessio hoc statu, unless the pursuer agreed to pay the weekly sum of 2s. from his wages. His Lordship observed, that he reported the case, because it was pleaded on the one hand, that a mere labouring man was never subjected in payment of a part of his wages, under any circumstances;<sup>1</sup> and on the other, that this was always done, where a creditor for damages on account of real injury, opposed the cessio; and thus it appeared that a great question was raised by the parties.

The Court were about to pronounce an interlocutor, refusing the cessio, hoc statu, when the pursuer intimated that he would rather come under the obligation to pay 2s. per week out of his wages, than have the cessio refused.

LORD CORNHOUSE.—Then the Court are relieved from deciding the question referred to by Lord Mackenzie.

The pursuer then lodged a minute binding himself to pay 2s. per week to Anderson, so long as he enjoyed 5s. of weekly wages, besides bed and board; and the Court pronounced an interlocutor in terms of the minute.

GIBSON-CRAIGS, WARDLAW, and DALZIEL, W.S.—W. MARTIN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 230. EBENEZER JAMES LAWSON, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Thomson
ROBERT COLDSTREAM, Defender.—D. F. Hope—Marshall.

Cautioner—Curator bonis.—1. Where the curator bonis of an absent party made an illegal agreement with the person who was heir presumptive of the party, which was to the prejudice of the judicial cautioner of the curator, and the agreement was acted on for a term of years,—Held that the cautioner was thereby liberated, in any question with that person. 2. Circumstances in which this was applied.

May 17, 1837. DAVID LAWSON, youngest son of Patrick Lawson, enlisted as a soldier in 1794, and was sent abroad with his regiment, in 1795. His age was from 40 to 46 years, at the time of enlistment. He was then a party to a process before the Court of Session, under which he claimed one-third of the property of his father.

1st Division.
Ld. Cornhouse.
B.

<sup>1</sup> See Russell, March 11, 1834, (ante, XII. 543.)

re of the heritable and moveable property of his father, in terms of his No. 230. her's marriage-contract. After going abroad, his agent in that process, May 17, 1887.
 ter Halkerston, S.S.C., was, in May 1796, appointed curator bonis to Lawson v. in his absence, and David Lawson was found entitled, in the above Coldstream. cess, to one-fourth of the heritable and moveable estate. In March, 1796, Robert Coldstream, merchant in Leith, became cautioner for Hal-kerton's curatorial intromissions. In 1797, 1799, 1808, 1809, 1811, and 1812, Halkerston lodged his curatorial accounts in Court. During is period several applications were made for recalling Halkerston's ratory, partly by James Lawson, the brother of David Lawson, and rtly after the death of James, by his son Ebenezer James Lawson. enezer was a pupil at the date of his father's death. Some of these applications were irregularly framed in various respects; but there was presented in 1808 by Ebenezer James Lawson, and his sister-german ry Lawson, and Roger Aytoun, W.S., who had been appointed their for loco tutoris, which was regular in point of form. It prayed for a al of the curatory, or at least an order on Halkerston to apply the erest of the funds in his hands for behoof of the petitioners. It did however, allege any specific acts of malversation or negligence inst Halkerston, and, as there was no presumption then of David wson's death, the petition, after answers were lodged, was refused with enses.

The factor loco tutoris of Ebenezer, raised an action of cognition and of part of the heritage left by his grandfather Patriek Lawson, under ich it was sold for a price of £1375. Halkerston thereafter, in 1802, ight an action against Roger Aytoun and the pupil Ebenezer, conclu-g for payment of one-fourth share of that sum to him, as curator bonis

David Lawson. The Lord Ordinary, in 1810, decerned in terms he libel, and, a reclaiming petition being presented for the defenders, Court "in respect that it has been offered on the part of the itioner, Ebenezer James Lawson, the apparent heir of David Lawson, make the sum in question furthcoming to the said David Lawson, if should ever appear, and for that effect to grant an heritable bond over property of the petitioner, and to pay the interest thereof annually the pursuer, as curator bonis, while he remains in that office, therefore alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and assoilzie the itioner from the conclusions of this action, and decern and remit to week's Ordinary in the Outer House, in place of Lord Cullen, adjust the terms of the heritable security now to be granted."

 After this interlocutor a heritable bond for £440, being the fourth of the price, and relative interest, was granted in February, 1812, Ebenezer James Lawson and his factor loco tutoris, acknowledging to have been received from Halkerston "as curator bonis for David Lawson," and binding Ebenezer James Lawson "to pay to the David Lawson, and his heirs or assignees, secluding his executors, 220. the said sum of £440 sterling of principal at the term of Whitsunday next, 1812;" and farther binding "the said Ebenezer James Lawson and his foresaids, to pay to the said Peter Halkerston, so long as he should continue to hold the office of curator bonis for the said David Lawson or to any other curator to be appointed to him, and thereafter to the said David Lawson himself, and to his foresaids, the legal interest of the said principal sum of £440 sterling, from the said term of Whitsunday last, 1811, to the said term of payment," &c.

Subsequently to this, Aytoun continued to pay interest on this honorable bond to Halkerston until 1816, at which period his office fell, because Ebenezer James Lawson attained majority. Lawson paid no farther interest on the bond, and a correspondence ensued between Halkerston and him in regard to that subject, which terminated with the following letter from him to Halkerston, in 1818:—"Mr Aytoun has informed me, that you are threatening to put my bond upon record and to charge me with horning, unless the arrears of interest due upon it are immediately paid. I consider that a great deal too much interest has been paid you already, and that there is no occasion whatever to exact any more money from me. My uncle, to a certainty, is now dead, and has left no debt. If you draw this money from me, you must just let it out again to some other person, and it must come back to me as before. I see no use for this operation of drawing and redrawing, except to put a little money in your pocket; and if you stir another step upon my bond, I will direct a petition and complaint to be lodged against you, and an inquiry made as to the application of the money you have already received."

After this letter Halkerston made no farther demand for interest, but allowed Ebenezer James Lawson to retain the subsequent interest without challenge.

On the other hand, Ebenezer James Lawson took no farther steps to bring Halkerston's curatory to an end, or to call him to account until 1830. He then intimated a claim for a considerable balance on his intromissions as due by Halkerston, and also intimated this claim, in a correspondence with Coldstream as Halkerston's cautioner. During the interval from 1796 until 1830, no notice of any sort had been made to Coldstream, that any dissatisfaction was felt with the conduct of Halkerston, or that any irregularity had been committed by him, or that any balance was due by him. Halkerston alleged that if any balance was due at all it was very trifling, and he disputed Lawson's title to call him to account, as there was no evidence of the death of his uncle David Lawson, on whose estate he, Halkerston, was curator. Ebenezer James Lawson obtained himself decerned executor-dative qua next of kin to David Lawson, and raised an action of accounting against Halkerston in 1832. This action was not intimated to Coldstream. After a record was closed, Halkerston died before decree, in a state of insolvency. Ebenezer es Lawson then raised an action as "nephew and executor qua No. 23014 of kin decerned to the deceased David Lawson," concluding May 17, 1837.

Coldstream, as the cautioner of Halkerston, to hold count and Lawson v.
ing for Halkerston's curatorial intromissions, and to pay over the Coldstream.
remaining due upon them.

fence against this action Coldstream pleaded, 1st, That there was ence of the death of David Lawson; and as his age was not ad-to exceed 77 there was no legal presumption of his death. The was therefore not in titulo to call the defender to account, or to n a valid discharge; 2d, That the balance claimed was a balance missions with moveable estate, and it was the pursuer's sister ho alone could pursue for it, as the pursuer had elected and taken table succession of his uncle David; 3d, That the summons was perly framed, as it did not set forth the date of David Lawson's death, though Halkerston's office subsisted till then, and it was l that it should be stated; 4th, That the pursuer had so conduct-self towards Halkerston as to liberate the defender from his ry obligation. Though aware of Halkerston's irregularity he ed duly to call him to account. And in 1816 he had made an greement with him, by which the pursuer, on the one hand, had ossession of the whole interests on the heritable bond which fell alkerston's curatory, and Halkerston, on the other hand, had l from doing his duty by enforcing his rights as curator, lest the should present a petition and complaint against him for past city. At that date Halkerston was solvent; and, as it was highly r and prejudicial to the defender to enter into this agreement at as especially so when coupled with the fact that the pursuer had matters to continue in this state for above fourteen years, and kerston had ultimately died insolvent without having been duly account.

pursuer answered—1. That David Lawson must be presumed to both in respect of his age, in 1795, when he was last heard of, spect of the absolute cessation of all intelligence respecting him at period. But, to remove all difficulty in regard to this, he, purs willing to find caution to repeat in case of David Lawson's rece. 2. The pursuer was confirmed executor-dative, qua next of oh entitled him to maintain the action. 3. It was unnecessary, he circumstances, impossible, to specify the date of David Lawath; but as the pursuer was his heir, and was also confirmed as utor, the date of the death was immaterial in a question with the
; and, 4. It was the duty of Coldstream, the cautioner, to take t Halkerston did not commit irregularities, as he was liable for on's faithful performance of his duty. The pursuer's entering possession of the estate in 1816 was not prejudicial to the interests rston's cautioner, but, on the contrary, limited the extent of his

236. liability thereafter, as he was exonerated, pro tanto, in any case the pursuer; and there was nothing else imputable to the pursuer, mere delay to call Halkerston to account, which could not find a defender, especially as the defender even yet disputed the pursuer's appearance. And separately, if any personal objection affected the defender, it could reach his own interests only, and not those of his sister, whom he was accountable for the moveable succession of David Lawson in so far as he should recover it; the office of executor implying that he was trustee for the next of kin.

The Lord Ordinary "repelled the first defence, in respect of which Lawson has not been heard of since the year 1795 or 1796, as being made at that period; and farther, because the pursuer offers caution, in case of David Lawson's appearance: Repelled the second defence, in respect the pursuer is decerned executor qua nearest of kin to David Lawson: Repelled the third defence as to the fact of summons: But, in respect of the agreement between the pursuer and Halkerston in 1818, by which the pursuer was allowed to retain the interest of his heritable bond, and afterwards to get possession of a part of his uncle's estate, while Halkerston was allowed to be curator loco absentis for many years, and until his bankruptcy in 1832, sustained the fourth defence, assolized the defender, and decerned the pursuer liable in expenses, subject to modification."

* "NOTE.—David Lawson went abroad in 1795. Halkerston was his curator loco absentis in March, 1796, and the defender became his creditor. In 1808, attempts were made to remove Halkerston, but they were unsuccessful, which might have been anticipated, because some of those applications were irregular in point of form; and as to those which were regular, only fourteen years elapsed since David Lawson went abroad, and there was no distinct proof of acts of malversation or negligence on the part of Halkerston. But it was shown that Halkerston had been irregular in the performance of his duty, or at least that there was room for enquiry; and in these circumstances, the pursuer, debtor to the absentee for the interest of an heritable bond, wrote to Halkerston in 1818, in the following terms:—'Mr Aytoun has informed me, that you are threatening to put my bond upon record, and to charge me with horns for the arrears of interest due upon it are immediately paid. I consider that you deal too much interest has been paid you already, and that there is no more whatever to exact any more money from me. My uncle, to a certain degree, is dead, and has left no debt. If you draw this money from me, you must put it out again to some other person, and it must come back to me as his, and he has no use for this operation of drawing and redrawing, except to put a list in your pocket; and if you stir another step upon my bond, I will direct an enquiry and complaint to be lodged against you, and an enquiry made as to the use of the money you have already received.' Halkerston acceded to this, contrary to his duty, he allowed the pursuer to retain the interest of the bond, and to assume possession of the heritable property of the absentee, account; and, on the other hand, he was allowed to retain the office of curator loco absentis, and was not called to account for his intromissions, before his bankruptcy in or prior to 1832. It appears to the Lord Ordinary that this was a misnomer on the part of the pursuer, or rather an illegal agreement between the pursuer reclaimed. The Court did not call on counsel in support No. 230.

of interlocutor.

May 17, 1837.
Lawson v.
Coldstream.

THE PRESIDENT.—This is one of the clearest cases I ever saw. The interests of the pursuer's sister are not here, and he himself pursues as executor qua nearest. But the action cannot be maintained at his instance. Where the creditor principal debtor make a private agreement between themselves, which affects the rights and interests of the cautioner, he is no longer bound by his ordinary obligation. The pursuer and Halkerston made and acted on an agreement of that nature here, and the defender has thereby been liberated.

MR GILLIES.—The agreement following on the pursuer's letter of 1818 was, and was injurious to the cautioner. It would not have released Halkerston from a question with the pursuer, as Halkerston was a party to the agreement, and never could have pleaded it as setting him free from liability for any balance of curatorial funds in his hands. But the position of the defender, the cautioner, is altogether different. He was no party to the agreement. He was injured by it, and he has been deprived of any efficient recourse against Halkerston, and we presume, that, at the date of the agreement, he could have had an efficient remedy against Halkerston had he been certiorated that it was necessary for him to seek it. He is now here certans de damno vitando, and I think him freed from litigation by the conduct of the pursuer.

MRS MACKENZIE and COREHOUSE concurred.

The Solicitor-General, for Pursuer, submitted to the Court, in reference to an objection of the defender, that this judgment was not meant to affect any right of the cautioner competent to the pursuer's sister.

MR GILLIES.—The sister is not a party before us; her interests are not affected by this action.

MR MACKENZIE.—Our judgment does not touch her.

MRS PRESIDENT and COREHOUSE concurred.

THE COURT adhered, and awarded additional expenses.

J. MOWBRAY and A. HOWDEN, W.S.—A. SNODY, S.S.C.—Agents.

---

...rator, to the prejudice of the cautioner. It was equivalent to an extra judica-tion of the curatory, and, therefore, a discharge of the cautioner. This is very different from mere taciturnity for 34 years, which perhaps might not have liberated the defender."

17, 1837. REV. JOHN BURNS, D.D., and OTHERS, Pursuers.
Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Miller.
JAMES EWING and MAGISTRATES of GLASGOW, Defenders.
Ivory.

Poor—Parish—Stat. 39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 88—Consuetude.—The lands having been disjoined by Act of Parliament from a parish adjacent to which they had been annexed to the royalty of the city, subject to city burdens, and to assessment for the poor therein—Circumstances in which the lands were acquired by the magistrates of that city, and of the buildings thereon, were such as to exempt them from their previous liability for the assessments for the poor of their original parish, but that the magistrates and town-council of the city were bound to contribute their share of the whole assessments from the common good of the city.

17, 1837. TOWARDS the close of last century, the property of certain lands situated in the Barony parish, in the neighbourhood of Glasgow, was acquired by the magistrates of that city. The lands were thereupon and became a populous portion of the town, continuing before to the Barony parish burdens, including the assessment for the poor. In June, 1800, an Act was passed (39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 88) extending the royalty of the city of Glasgow over these lands. The preamble stated this to be just and reasonable, inter alia, "for the better apportioning of the public burdens and benefits among all the inhabitants of the place." By the 2d section the Magistrates were empowered to levy "the same malls, duties, customs, conversion of statute-labour, and other taxes," within the extended royalty, as they already did in the original royalty. By the 3d section it was enacted, "that the said Magistrates and Town-Council shall hereafter pay, from the money raised by the conversion of the statute-labour within the said city, to the legally appointed to repair and maintain the public roads in the district of the Barony parish of Glasgow, £5 sterling yearly, as compensation for the statute-labour of the said annexed lands; and shall from the funds of the community of the said city, relieve the holders and occupiers of houses or lands in the said extended royalty, of the rates payable by them to the said Barony parish, as having been levied thereof before passing this Act." By the 8th section the Magistrates received power "to appoint stent-masters, assessors and collectors, to assess and to levy from the proprietors and occupiers or possessors of the said annexed grounds, and of all such houses as are built, or to be built, upon the foresaid grounds hereby annexed to and included within the said royalty, an equal and rateable portion of all the trades' stent, poors' rates, conversion of statute-labour, and other taxes payable by the inhabitants of the city of Glasgow, in the same manner as they are now levied within the present royalty." The 10th section provided that the lands of the newly extended royalty, besides the

No. 231

May 17, 1831
Burns v.
Ewing.

levied by the collectors of the town for the houses erected thereon, "shall remain liable and be subjected to the payment of a rateable proportion of the cess or land-tax, and other public burdens imposed or to be imposed on the shire of Lanark, for and in respect of the ground, which cess shall be paid by the Magistrates and Town-Council of the said city, from the funds of the community." By the 11th section it was enacted "that the said grounds hereby annexed to and comprehended within the royalty of the city of Glasgow shall be, and the same are hereby for ever separated from the Barony parish, and are hereby annexed to the parishes within the said city to which they lie most contiguous, or to which the Magistrates and Town-Council shall, by any act or acts of council, hereafter direct and appoint." The tithes payable out of the lands so annexed were by the 12th section "saved and reserved to the true owners thereof, in the same manner as if this Act had never passed." The 14th section was as follows:—"Saving always and reserving to his Majesty, and all other person or persons concerned, all rights and interest, other than the present extension of the said royalty, which they had, have, or may have, in the lands hereby annexed."

Previous to the passing of this Act, and when an extension of the royalty was in contemplation, various communings took place between the heritors of the Barony parish and the Magistrates of Glasgow with reference to the introduction of a clause into the bill providing against the lands proposed to be annexed to the royalty being freed from the burden of supporting the Barony parish poor. In the beginning of 1800, the Trades' House, who held part of these lands, passed the following resolution:—"That the said Provost, Magistrates and Council, should not only free and relieve the inhabitants of the Barony parish, whose property is to be annexed to the royalty, of the statute-labour, but also of the poors' rates in the said parish."

From the passing of the Act down to the year 1810, the heritors and Kirk-session of the Barony parish raised the sums required, over and above voluntary contributions, for the maintenance of the poor by assessing the heritors of the annexed lands according to the valued rent, the Magistrates of Glasgow paying such assessment. In 1811 it was found necessary to raise the amount of assessment and apply the mode of collecting by the real rent instead of the valued rent, whereby the householders were made liable as well as the heritors. The question as to the liability of the city to bear this increased assessment was remitted by the Magistrates and Council to a select committee, who gave in a report expressing their conviction, that, looking to the state of Parliament, the increased demand could not be resisted; which report was adopted and acted upon thereafter. The Magistrates accordingly, in relief of the individuals within the extended royalty liable to assessment, continued, down to 1831, to pay their share of the rate, the greatest sum levied in any one year, in respect of the property within the 381. royalty, being £1795. During the whole period from 1800 downwards, the annexed lands were likewise assessed for and made to bear an equal proportion of the poor's rate imposed within the city for the maintenance of the city poor.

In December, 1831, the sum collected fell considerably short of the sum demanded from the city by the Barony parish, and of that date the Magistrates intimated their intention to resist farther payments until the validity of the claim made by the Barony parish should be judicially ascertained. Arrears of the assessment affecting to the properties of the defenders, James Ewing and William Dunn, proprietors within the extended royalty, became due for years 1830, 1831, and 1832, amounting to a sum of about £26 or £27 on each.

Thereafter the Rev. Dr Burns, and the Rev. William Black, his assistant and successor, ministers of the Barony parish, for themselves and the other members of the kirk-session, and William Robertson, collector appointed by the heritors and session, raised action against Ewing and Dunn, and against the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of Glasgow, founding on the provisions of the Act 39 and 40 Geo. III., and particularly on the 8d section thereof, and setting forth that the legal import and effect of these enactments "was to leave the properties of the defenders and the other heritors in a similar situation within the said extended royalty with those of all the other heritors of the said Barony parish, and subject to a rateable share of the annual burden of supporting and maintaining the poor, in all time coming, reserving the right of heritors to relief of the sums from the Magistrates of Glasgow, as the burdens might arise or be imposed; or otherwise, to render the Magistrates and Council of Glasgow, as representing the community, directly liable to the pursuers, and their successors, for such assessments as might be imposed on the properties of the said heritors, in the part foresaid, of the said extended royalty;" and accordingly that ever since the passing of the Act the assessments had been imposed upon the properties of the defenders, and others within the extended royalty, in the same manner as it was upon the tenements within the other parts of the Barony parish, and that the requisite sums had been advanced and paid each year by the Magistrates on behalf of the proprietors of those subjects down to the year 1831, when they announced their intention to discontinue such payments in relief; that the properties of the defenders, Ewing and Dunn, had been comprehended within the Barony parish and were liable to the assessments, and that they were in arrear a certain sum on account thereof for the years 1830, 1831, and 1832; and concluding for payment by these parties respectively of their arrears, or otherwise in case it should be found that the Magistrates and Council were now directly liable to the pursuers in the said sum, then that they should be ordered to make payment of the sums of arrears above-mentioned.

ance against this action, Messrs Ewing and Dunn pleaded— No. 231.
 they are not liable, in respect of their properties, for the sup- May 17, 188 e poor of the Barony parish, as that parish now exists, and are Burns v. Ewing.
 , directly or indirectly, to be assessed therefor by the heritors session of that parish.

, on the contrary, they are, along with the other inhabitants rgh, liable for the support of the poor of the city of Glasgow

t, having accordingly been assessed for the support of the burgh having regularly paid their assessments, the present action is roundless, as regards them, and they ought to be assoilzied r from its conclusions, with expenses.

Magistrates, referring to these defences, pleaded generally that not liable in the sums pursued for or in any part thereof.

ord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the note: *—“ Finds, that according to the just and true construc-

Lord Ordinary cannot persuade himself that there is any difficulty in and thinks that it is impossible to read attentively through the fourteen ns of the Act, as they stand in their order, and entertain any doubt as to meaning and effect.

defenders, at the debate, did not find it convenient to proceed in this urse. They went at once to the 11th section, which provides, in gene-for the disjunction of the annexed lands from the Barony parish, and ration to the parishes of the old royalty; and then, contending that this
 , not being in any way qualified or limited in its term, imported a total
 , and consequent liberation from all future parochial burdens in the m which they are disjoined, they went to the 2d section (as illusthe 8th), to show that they were accordingly subjected to a new, and, untained, substituted set of burdens, in their new connexion, and argued double liability was in no case to be presumed without express words, conclusive confirmation of their views as to the effect of the absolute
 . They then proceeded to point out the very different terms in which payments of cess and statute-labour money to the county, from which d lands were disjoined, are provided for in the Act, and the provisions osed to be made for future poor assessments; and concluded by sugat these last provisions, which they represented as being merely for contingent and imaginary claims, must have been inserted to satisfy less anxiety or apprehensions of the owners of the annexed property, never be held to import that the claims themselves were just or main-

Lord Ordinary takes a very different view of the object and effect of the
 It was enacted on the petition of the Magistrates, and for the purpose ing a great benefit on the city, by putting under its municipal jurisdicsubjecting to its burghal assessments, a very wealthy and flourishing the actual town; at the same time, it was obvious that if this rich as-strict was to be entirely withdrawn from the parish, and the county to formerly belonged, and exempted from all future contributions to their ions, a great loss would be sustained by these communities, and a pro-heavier burden laid on what remained of them. It was necessary, to provide for this by special enactments, and it is impossible to read the have any doubt as to the principle on which these are framed. That tion of the Act of the 39th and 40th of Geo. III. c. 68, the lands thereby annexed to the royalty of the city of Glasgow, and disjoined from the principle is, beyond all question, that the annexed lands shall be liable to a double assessment, but that the owners or occupiers shall only pay those chargeable for the city, and be relieved of such as continued due to the county or parish, from the public funds, or some particular branch of the public funds of the city. That this is the case as to the cess and all the other proper county burdens, and the statute-labour, cannot possibly be disputed; and as there were obviously as strong, if not still stronger, reasons for applying the same principle to the assessments for the poor, the Lord Ordinary would not have hesitated to construe any doubtful or ambiguous words in the provision as to these assessments upon that assumption, and according to the analogy of the kindred provisions, as to which there was no doubt. But, in fact, it does not appear to him that the words, even if they stood by themselves, are in the least degree doubtful or ambiguous. The provision as to the cess &c. (sect. 10), is, that besides the cess to be levied from the annexed lands for the town, they should also remain liable to their rateable proportion of the county cess and all other county burdens; 'which cess,' &c., it is added, 'shall be paid by the Magistrates and Town-Council of the said city, from the funds of the community.' Then, as to the statute-labour, it is specially provided (and obviously in terms of a previous agreement), that an annual sum of £5 shall be paid by the Magistrates and Town-Council to the heritors of the Barony parish, 'as a conversion for the statute-labour of the said annexed lands;' and then immediately after, and as the sequel of the same section, follows the provision as to the poors' rates, in these words:—'And they (the Magistrates and Council) shall also, from the funds of the said city, relieve the owners and occupiers of lands and houses in the said extended royalty, of the poors' rates payable by them to the said Barony parish, as having been a part thereof, before passing this Act.' If this does not mean that the annexed lands were still to pay poors' rates (as well as cess and statute-labour money) to the Barony parish, and that the Magistrates were to protect the owners and occupiers, by paying these rates for them out of the public funds, it is not easy to conceive what it does mean.

"Accordingly, the defenders are driven to great straits to give it a meaning; and actually maintained, at the debate, first, that the whole of this provision about the poors' rates really had no meaning, and must have been inserted by mistake, or per incuriam; and, next, that it could only have been inserted to satisfy the groundless apprehensions of the owners and occupiers, as to possible, but evidently incompetent claims on the part of the Barony parish; or, finally, that it might possibly relate to the arrears of former assessments. It is not thought necessary to make any remarks on these extraordinary suppositions.

"The variance in the phraseology, and indeed in the substance of the arrangements, as to the cess and other county burdens, the statute-labour and the poors' rates, on which the defenders dwelt largely, is very easily explained. The principle, it has been seen, is the same as to all; but the arrangements for carrying it into effect are naturally different, and the expression accordingly varies. The cess being a fixed and invariable sum, the provision is merely that it shall be annually paid over by the city, and there was in that case no need for any other arrangement. The statute-labour assessment, again, was liable to fluctuation, though not to any great extent; and it was quite practicable, therefore, and seems to have been thought more convenient, to fix an average amount in the statute, which should be paid in all time coming, as its conversion. But the poor assessments were liable to great and incalculable variations; and (as the result has shown) a fixed average could have been taken with any tolerable safety, as the rule of contribution in all time coming. They were, therefore, left to be settled by the annual assessments, and as these assessments must necessarily be by the individual owners and occupiers of the annexed property, the burden parish of Barony, and the owners and occupiers of the said lands, or of the houses and buildings thereon, are not relieved from their previous

No. 231.

May 17, 1887.
Burns v.
Ewing.

the Magistrates is correctly expressed as an obligation to relieve those individuals, against whom personally a charge must have been first constituted, before the amount to be paid for them by the Magistrates could in any one year be ascertained. The whole provisions, therefore, as to each and all of these county and parish burdens are not only perfectly congruous and identical in substance, but the particular arrangements and expressions as to each, are judiciously adapted for carrying the principle into effect.

After this plain exposition of the words of the Act, it can scarcely be necessary to say any thing as to the defenders' main argument, that the general terms of the express disjunction of the district in question, from the Barony parish, must necessarily import a disjunction quoad omnia. The conclusive answer is, that the statute has not left the nature or effect of that disjunction to inference; but has expressly provided and enacted in what respects, and to what effect, the disjoined property shall still be tributary to the parish from which it is divided; and has, in a special manner, enacted, inter alia, that it shall still be liable to poors' rates in that parish. In fact, there is no civil burden, for which it does not continue liable as before, both to the parish and the county; and while the annexation, with all its consequent liabilities, is complete and total, it may be truly said that the disjunction can extend to ecclesiastical relations only;—for there is nothing else left, of which it can possibly operate.

One simple and obvious question brings out the palpable fallacy of the defenders' whole argument. If it was really intended by the Act to exempt the owners of the annexed territory from future poor assessments in the Barony parish, why was it not so provided? And above all, why was a clause inserted looking so very like a special provision the other way? It could not be that the framers of the Act trusted to the effect of the general words of the annexation and disjunction, for they leave nothing whatever to the operation of those words. Every thing is separately and anxiously provided for. They do not rely on the express annexation and consolidation with the old royalty, even for the extension of the Magistrates' jurisdiction over the new territory; but this, with every thing else, is specially enacted. But, unluckily for this trusting hypothesis, there is a special clause about those poors' rates, and the defenders' theory is, that it was introduced to quiet the idle fears of the annexed owners, as to the possible insufficiency of the general words to secure their exemption. Whoever else trusted to the virtue of these words, therefore, it is certain that these owners did not trust to them; and the legislature knew this, and in order to remove their distrust, is supposed to have put in this clause, bidding the Magistrates to relieve them from their imaginary perils. The Lord Ordinary must say that this appears to him to be nothing more of a mere absurdity. If the object was not only to secure these owners from the Barony assessments, but to quiet their foolish apprehensions of danger from them, was not the plain way to do this, just to enact that they should be exempted? For is it not conceivable that, with this object in view, the legislature, having full power to settle the whole matter by a word, should take this indirect, and really unintelligible course to effect it? It is needless to add, that the whole phraseology of the clause excludes this strange hypothesis. The Magistrates are there bound to give relief, not against possible claims, but against 'rates payable in the Barony parish;' and this relief is to be given, not by refuting the annexation, but by paying them—not by a successful argument on the effect of the clause of disjunction, but 'from the funds of the community of the city.'

When the case is so clear upon the construction of the Act itself, there is no need to refer to the powerful corroboration which this construction receives from the fact, that it has been so long and so generally followed in practice. It is quite certain that, when the Act was passed, the territory of the Barony parish required that satisfaction, both 1831. liability, for the assessments made, or to be made, for the support of the poor of the said parish, along with the other lands, and the owners and occupiers thereof, within the said parish; and that the Magistrates and Town-Council of the said city are bound to relieve the owners and occupiers of the said annexed lands, and houses and buildings thereof, of the whole of the said assessments, made or to be made for the support of the poor of the said Barony parish, by paying over, from the funds of the community of the said city, the whole amount of the said assessments as they have or shall become due, to the proper officer of the said parish, or person entitled to collect and receive such assessments, and therefore repels the defences set forth and maintained by both sets of defendants, decerns, in terms of the conclusions of the libel, against the defendants James Ewing and William Dunn, severally, for the sums of money concluded for against each of the said defenders, with interest upon the said several sums as libelled: And in the event of payment not being made of the said several sums by the said defenders, within twenty-one days

as to the statute labour and the poor's rates, which the Lord Ordinary thinks they have obtained by the clauses in question; and it is admitted that, after they submitted their amendments, they allowed the Act to pass without opposition. He is aware, however, that the admissibility of such evidence, however powerfully it may influence the mind, is very questionable, and therefore he in no degree rests his judgment upon it. With regard to the subsequent practice, however, he inclines to think, that, when it has been uniform—of many years' standing—and against the interest of those by whose consent it has been established—it may fairly be looked to for elucidating the true meaning of any doubtful or obscure enactments. Against a plain and precise statute (at least since the Union) no practice can be of any avail; and the Lord Ordinary thinks the statute clear enough here. But the defenders can scarcely deny, that in their view of its meaning, its enactments are full of obscurity, and that it is competent, therefore, to refer to early and long-continued practice for their elucidation. Now, the practice in this case amounts to no less than this, that ever since the passing of the Act in 1800, down to 1831, the Magistrates, upon whose petition it proceeded, have all along recognised their liability under the clause in dispute, and have, every year, paid over large sums, ranging from £300 to £1795, as their share of the Barony poor assessments. In 1814, when the first great increase of these assessments took place, the matter was referred to a select committee, who gave in a full and well-considered report, expressing their clear conviction that the increased demand could not be resisted, and that was deliberately adopted by the Council, and acted upon ever after. In 1821, some objections having been taken, not to the general legality of the charge, but to the way of ascertaining its amount, another committee of the Town-Council was appointed to adjust this matter with the Barony Heritors, which they accordingly effected, and gave in a long and elaborate report to the Council, with a scheme for checking the assessor's charges in a particular way, which was also adopted and acted upon down till 1831. In that year a new light broke in upon the Magistrates, and it was discovered, that they who framed and carried through the Act of 1800, were altogether mistaken as to its meaning; and that their practice, and that of their successors for thirty years, was against its true construction, as well as their own interest and duty to the city.

"The Lord Ordinary thinks, that a more extravagant allegation never was brought forward in a court of law; and sees nothing but the greatest absurdity at stake, which can explain the conduct of the Magistrates in continuing an unpromising a litigation."

advocate shall be final, decerns also against the other defenders, No. 231.
 rates and Town-Council of the said city of Glasgow, and May 17, 1837 sots in office, for such of the said sums as may then be unpaid: Barnes v.
 whole of the defenders, conjointly and severally, liable to the Ewing.
 expenses."

and the Magistrates reclaimed:

and having been put out for advising, the Court (May 26, 1836) es.

for the Pursuers—

annexation of the Barony parish lands effected by the statute was disjunction, but one of a limited and qualified character, and regards liability to assessment for the poor of their original the lands in the same situation in which they stood prior to of the Act, but with a right of relief to the owners and thereof from the city funds. The third clause of the statute is an enactment upon which the present case hinges. The declaration is express that the Magistrates of Glasgow shall, from the
 the community, relieve the owners and occupiers of the annexed the poors' rates payable by them to the Barony parish, which necessarily implies that the owners and occupiers of these lands continue directly liable, as before, in payment of a rateable of the poors' rates, of which they were to be relieved from the the city. The provision in question, according to this its obvious nature, is in accordance with the principle upon which the analogous provisions in regard to other public and civil burdens affecting the lands proceed, and generally with the scope and tenor of the of the Act, the several provisions in which were framed with a fair and equitable adjustment of the different interests affected measure. The fact of the usage having been, since the date of the Act, in accordance with the view now taken is admitted, and such usage may competently be founded on in order to elucidate the true meaning of the clauses of an Act alleged to be ambiguous. This is common in the case of a public statute in the provisions of which there is obscurity,<sup>1</sup> and much more may usage be taken as the interpretation of a private Act, such as the present, of which the construction is a point of public law, but which merely professes and was intended to regulate private or local rights, and can be regarded only in the light of an interposition of the authority of the legislature to annullify of such rights and interests previously adjusted and agreed upon by the parties themselves.

1831. Pleaded for the Defendants—

7/1837. In a direct question of taxation such as the present, the pursuers, representing the Barony parish, have no right to insist except against the parties directly liable to themselves in the assessment; and with reference to the conclusion against the Magistrates, there is room for doubt whether there be a relevant case at the pursuers' instance against the Magistrates and the community. If there be termini habiles for decree against the defenders, Ewing and Dunn, there appears to be no longer any thing either under the statute or the present summons which can reach the other defenders. As to the question of the liability of the former, there was from the date of the statute, according to its true construction, and especially looking to the 11th clause, a complete disjunction quoad omnia between the annexed lands and the remainder of the Barony parish. But if these lands no longer form part of the parish, and if the proprietors thereof are no longer heritors or parishioners of the parish, whence do the pursuers derive their jurisdiction and power to assess? If the lands are "for ever separated," the whole machinery is gone by which a parochial rate could be either imposed or enforced against them. Moreover, these lands are declared to be assessable in an equal proportion of the poors' rates payable within the royalty to which they are annexed with the other inhabitants thereof. But the law will never presume for and will not countenance a double assessment.<sup>1</sup> It is merely by implication that the clause of relief founded on by the pursuers can avail them, and such being the case, it is insufficient to get the better of an express and positive enactment that the annexed grounds "shall be, and the same are hereby for ever separated from the Barony parish," more especially when the result would be to introduce a state of matters altogether anomalous and contrary to the general principles of law. Had it been intended that the right of assessment contended for was to be reserved to the Barony parish, an express clause of reservation would have been resorted to, such as was inserted to save the claim of the county for rates and other burdens, and the rights of the tithe-owners.

In regard to the liability of the Magistrates, except in so far as they happened themselves to be heritors of the lands afterwards separated from the Barony parish and annexed to the royalty, there was, prior to the statute, no colour for holding the parish to have any claim over these parties. Then, even assuming that the statute did impose upon them a certain liability, that was a liability created, not in favour of the Barony parish, but in favour of the individual "holders and occupiers of houses or lands within the extended royalty." Besides, even as regards these latter parties, it was in no sense an absolute or primary liability, but a

<sup>1</sup> Hill, June 25, 1835 (F.C.)

liary or secondary obligation of relief, in case a direct liability No. 231. reared up against these parties themselves. In any case of May 17, 183 a statute the authority of usage is doubtful, but in the circum- Burns v.
 he present case, it is not to be taken into account, and cannot Ewing.
 defenders from falling back upon the statute itself.
 e was this day finally advised.

JUSTICE-CLERK.—Your Lordships will remember, that when this re-was presented, we thought the case deserving of consideration, and ordered cases; and I wished also to have the same advantage

Ordinary had, by having before me the whole of the Act of Par-
 I am not very fond of looking merely at clauses culled out here
 The Lord Ordinary observed in his note, that he thought it imposbody could read the first fourteen sections of the act without arriving conclusion with himself; and now that I have read them, I have come conclusion as the Lord Ordinary. It appears to me that it is a fair construction of this Act of Parliament, while the obligation of eived in language so perfectly plain and intelligible, to give effect proviso, without holding it equally certain that, while the Magis-isgow are entitled to levy poors' rates on the holders of the lands in question in the same way as on those within the old' royalty, e same time liable to the Barony parish as the proprietors of the on those lands were formerly liable to that parish. It is perfectly en you look at the preamble of the act, and the very anxious provi-ed in it in regard to the conversion of statute-labour, and proporaid to the Barony parish, while the right to the tithes is to remain id when you look also to the way in which provision is made for the ess, and paying the proportions of it effeiring to those lands, it is it had been considered that, upon the ground of expediency alone, it at that the lands specified in the act should be annexed to, and brought yalty of Glasgow. That was, in reality, the only object of this act; at the different sections, it will be seen that, while they make all provisions, the chief object is, that these lands should be compren, and make part of the royalty of the city.

se that, when this object was accomplished, the interests of the h were farther meant to be affected—that those lands, with the valuable ed upon them, forming squares and streets, and at the time liable to oors' rates along with the other parts of that parish, were for ever to from that liability, and the power of assessment cut off without any seems altogether inconceivable, the more especially when it is seen anxiously provides for the sum of £5 being secured to the Barony ount of the statute-labour conversion. Accordingly, the defenders as they argue in their case, to the conclusion, that this obligation no meaning at all, but has just somehow or other crept into the w, my Lords, keeping in view the words of this enactment, that the and Town-Council “shall also, from the funds of the community of , relieve the holders and occupiers of houses or lands in the said ex-ty of the poors' rates payable by them to the Barony parish, as having 1831. been a part thereof before passing this act," does it not expressly declare, that they shall be bound, out of the funds of the community of Glasgow, to relieve the whole of the proprietors of houses or lands of the poor's rates payable to that parish, as having been part of it before the passing of this act? To suppose that this express provision has no meaning at all, is a proposition to which I can pay no regard. It was a most just and equitable provision, in reference both to the interests of the parish, from the limits of which the lands had been separated, and to those of the city of Glasgow itself, that was acquiring the benefit of the extension of its royalty, with the power at the same time of levying from the annexed lands not only cess and statute-labour conversion-money, but likewise poor's rates, in the same way as was competent over the ancient royalty of the city. But, in addition to the fair construction of all those clauses, while the meaning of the legislature is sufficiently manifest, you have this important circumstance, that those very persons who got the act of Parliament to make Glasgow one great and magnificent city, as it now is, by including all those streets and squares within its territory, acting on their clear understanding of the act of Parliament, proceeded immediately to levy the city's poor's rates over those newly annexed lands, and then proceed, in the fair fulfilment of this obligation, to relieve the parties from all claims at the instance of the Barony heritors, by paying over to the treasurer of the Barony parish the sums that had been assessed by those heritors. This having been continued for a period of thirty years, is a clear proof of the understanding of all parties concerned, and affords a sound ground for interpreting the act, if there were any doubt as to its true meaning.

I may, however, observe, that there appears some little difficulty, in point of form, from the way the interlocutor is worded. The Lord Ordinary "decerns in terms of the conclusions of the libel against the defenders, James Ewing and William Dunn, severally, for the sums of money concluded for against each of the said defenders, with interest upon the said several sums as libelled; and in the event of payment not being made of the said several sums, by the said defenders, within twenty-one days after this interlocutor shall be final, decerns also against the other defenders, the Magistrates and Town-Council of the said city of Glasgow, and their successors in office, for such of the said sums as may be then unpaid," &c. Now, I must own I was a little startled by the way in which that part of the interlocutor is worded. It seems rather odd to decern against the Magistrates for that part of the sums that shall not be paid; and it seemed doubtful to me whether that was the way in which the judgment ought to be expressed; but as to the substantial part of the case I have no doubt, and that the Magistrates and Council and community are liable, however the finding may be expressed.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I have studied the case as your Lordship has done, and I have no doubt of its substantial justice. I think it quite legitimate where there is doubt of the true import of the terms used in an Act of Parliament, or any public instrument, to arrive at their just interpretation through the practice, under and with reference to such instrument. Accordingly, I consider that the practice in this case which is established beyond all doubt makes the true meaning of the private and local statute quite unquestionable.

LORD GLENLEE.—Perhaps something may be said with regard to that provision of relief, that on the whole it goes too far; but, on the whole matter, it appeared to me that this is a declaration of the Magistrates' obligation at once to relieve the heritors of the added part, of all claims at the instance of the Barony parish. I No. think it puts an end to the possibility of founding on the clause of annexation to the town churches. There is an annexation but qualified by this necessity of May 17. relieving the inhabitants of the part added to the royalty. I would go so far as to Burns, Ewing. say that there is an absolute declaration on the part of the legislature that they shall remain liable. But on the question, whether they remain liable, you are not to go to the clause annexing the lands to the town churches as if it stood unqualified. And then it appears to me that the town being obliged to relieve those heritors of all claims at the instance of the Barony parish—if there is no unreasonable charge made—it must be sustained and the town must pay it. It is impossible for me, in the question before us, to say that it is a just claim of relief, merely because it has been paid all along. I just throw the thing open, and I think on the fair construction of the statute there is a clear case, that the town are bound to relieve them, and likewise an express admission by the town for a vast number of years that such a claim existed; and in fact they did relieve them. With regard to that difficulty your Lordship alluded to, I don't think there is so much in it. If the statute had all along been libelled on, there would have been a difficulty in arranging in any other way than in decerning against the heritors, leaving them to take their relief, but the summons subsumes the constant practice of the Magistrates paying without any demand on the heritors at all. Whether that was a good way or not does not signify, but it makes the judgment conformable with the libel. The summons libels on the practice that the Magistrates were accustomed to pay at once when called on; and I observe no special objection is made against the present charge, as being an improper quantum that has been laid on. Therefore, I think that they are now bound to pay as they have been in the habit of paying for a length of time.

LORD MEDWYN.—If this case had occurred immediately after the Act of Parliament had passed, when there was no practice under it, I should have had no doubt whatever as to the interpretation of it. Notwithstanding the opinions expressed by your Lordships, and notwithstanding the manner in which the Lord Ordinary treats the argument of the defenders, I should have had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that those who were formerly heritors of the Barony parish, should have been entirely relieved from the payment of the poors' rates for that parish. These lands were not merely annexed to Glasgow. The object was not merely to extend the royalty, but it was to disjoin those pieces of ground from the Barony parish. I have read the Act of Parliament as the Lord Ordinary has desired me to do, and I cannot say that it occurs to me as of the slightest importance, to consider in what position of an Act of Parliament that clause of disjunction is to be found. In fact, if the position of a distinct substantive clause in an Act of Parliament be of any consequence, I understand it is a rule of interpretation well-known in the law of England, that if a clause deviates from a preceding one, it is the subsequent clause that decides. But I don't go on that at all. I have examined the Act of Parliament, as I have been required to do, and when I see that it disjoins those lands from the Barony parish and annexes them to Glasgow, I cannot see that I can hold them to be liable for any rate to that Barony parish, unless they are specially declared so to be. Now the annexation is made under conditions; and attend to what these conditions are. I in vain look for any condition by which those who were Barony parish heritors are to be still liable for poors' rates there. I think it has not been sufficiently attended to, in the discussion before the Lord,

11. Ordinary, or in the papers, that there is but one burden, properly speaking, under which these lands lie, and that is the cess; and as these lands are distinctly disjoined from the Barony parish, had it not been the tenth clause, I should have considered them not liable for the cess to the county but to the town. But the condition of the disjunction was expressly under this provision, "that the several lands hereby annexed to the royalty of the city of Glasgow, besides the cess to be levied by the collectors of the town for and in respect of the houses and buildings erected thereon, shall remain liable and be subjected to the payment of a rateable proportion of the cess or land tax, and other public burdens imposed, or to be imposed on the shire of Lanark for and in respect of the ground, which cess shall be paid by the Magistrates and Town Council of the said city from the funds of the community, and shall be levied in the usual manner, any thing in this act notwithstanding." Now that was a very proper condition for the county to make, that no part of their cess should be taken away. But then it is not held to be implied that they are, though disjoined, still liable for county cess; but it is distinctly said that they shall be still liable, and as this would make them liable for cess both in the city and county, it is most properly provided that the Magistrates are to pay it out of the funds of the community; and why? because the cess is one of those burdens going to the common funds of the city, out of which the cess for the county naturally should be paid. There are also the burdens of statute-labour and poors' rates. The statute-labour is provided for in this way, "that the said Magistrates and Town-Council shall hereafter pay, from the money raised for the conversion of the statute-labour within the said city, to the heritors legally appointed to repair and maintain the public roads in the western district of the Barony parish of Glasgow, £5 sterling yearly as a conversion for the statute-labour of the said annexed lands." Now this is properly a personal tax, and does it say the money due for these lands under the conversion is still to be paid? No; it says distinctly there shall be paid £5 as a conversion for the whole lands so disjoined, and this sum is to be paid most properly out of the funds raised for the conversion of the statute-labour, not from the general funds of the city. These lands now paid the statute-labour within the city, and from that fund this payment was most properly made. The stipulation is, not that the whole money should be paid to the county, which might have amounted to £50, but only this sum of £5, which should be given as an equivalent for withdrawing part of these lands from the Barony parish of which they afterwards were to form no part. What is the reason why the legislature did not make the same stipulation with regard to the poors' rates, viz. that the Magistrates should pay the same over to the parish, and relieve the heritors of the annexed and disjoined lands, as they were now to pay poors' rates within the town? I cannot understand how, since the parties specially provided for cess and statute-labour, they did not specially provide also that this burden of poors' rates was to continue on the heritors of the disjoined lands, the Magistrates relieving them of the payment, if this was really intended. It is not difficult to see how this should have been done. Suppose there had been no clause of relief, and those lands totally disjoined, it is certain the liability to the parish would have ceased. Now what difference can the clause of relief make? It is quite new to me that a clause of relief can operate to constitute a principal obligation. That is a rule of interpretation not yet admitted into our law. The reading of the clause, however, is of importance—"And shall also, from the funds of the community of the said city, relieve the holders and occupiers of houses or lands in the said extended royalty poors' rates payable by them to the said Barony parish as having been a reof before passing this act." That does not make "payable" equivalent paid." If they can make it out that it was still payable, unquestionably n, from their funds, was bound to relieve them, and Mr Ewing cannot be responsible for it. But I say decidedly, that if this question had arisen ately after the passing of this act, I should have had no hesitation in giving nion that there was no obligation here to pay poors' rates, because it was to make this provision, if it had been so intended, when provision was or other burdens, and when they were actually legislating with the poors' their view. In truth I cannot understand how, when the lands were d, the property was to remain liable for the poors' rates of the country parish, some special clause was introduced to that effect. It is quite true that if nders should be found liable, this clause will make the Magistrates relieve At the same time I think it unsound law that this clause of relief should hose parties liable. Such, I think, would have been my opinion looking to the object and words of the act; but, looking to the interpretation put by the parties, I have great difficulty in getting over the fact that this act ssed in 1800 or 1801, and if the Magistrates continued to pay for only a rs I would not have held it of so much consequence, as the chamberlain ave been mistaken. But what I lay the great stress upon is that this special is distinctly brought before the Magistrates in 1811, and most certainly they eld that they were bound to pay those sums. But it came to be a sum they thought it well to consider, although not certainly so large as it is id what is done? Why, holding that the heritors of these lands continued o pay poors' rates in the Barony parish, they gave an order to pay it out funds of the poor, for which they had no authority whatever from the as the statute distinctly says the relief is to come from the funds of the nity, and I think the payers of poors' rates in Glasgow are quite entitled to to it. It must make a great difference whether £1000 is raised the poors' rates or out of the funds of that great city. But although this how very negligently and inattentively parties have entered into these lings, yet after what has been done, I think I must give in to the belief that it erwise intended by the parties at the time; and, since your Lordships think tly from me, I am bound to hold that there is here an ambiguity in the of the statute, and therefore, as the practice has been uniform for these years, that the parties are the best interpreters of their meaning and of the itself.

D MEADOWBANK.—In consequence of what has been stated by Lord n I deem it proper to add, that if I had thought, as his Lordship does, that ds of the statute are clear, I should not have felt myself at liberty to look practice at all. I have taken the practice into view exclusively on the that in the terms employed in the statute there is great ambiguity. For if it clear that the statute imported one thing and the practice another, I had t to have gone beyond the instrument itself.

THE COURT accordingly adhered, finding expenses due.

Geo. DUNLOP, W.S.—CAMPBELL and MACDOWALL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 231

May 17, 183

Burns v.

Ewing.

No. 232.

May 18, 1837.
 Forsyth v. His Creditors.

— FORSYTH, Pursuer.—Logan.
 HIS CREDITORS, Defenders.—Paterson.

Cessio.—In an opposed cessio, under 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56, the Court, at the same time that they made a remit to the sheriff for the liberation of the pursuer, granted his petition for interim liberation caution to the amount of £50, that he would attend all diets of Court, the sum of £50 exceeding the incarcerator's debt, and the incarcerator making no objection.

No. 233.

J. S. HALLAM, Pursuer.—Robertson—Anderson.
 GYE and COMPANY, Defenders.—D. F. Hope—Maitland.

Process—New Trial—Expenses.—In an application for a new trial on grounds of the verdict being contrary to law and to evidence, and of excessive damages—Circumstances in which the Court refused the application, and allowed the pursuer his expenses, but subject to modification, though he had conducted his pleading properly throughout.

May 18, 1837.
 2d Division.
 Jury Cause.

SEQUEL of the case reported ante, XIV. 199, which see.

The jury having found for the pursuer Hallam on both issues, assessed damages at £2000, the defenders, Gye and Company, obtained a rule to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside, on the ground 1st, that it was against law, 2d, that it was against evidence, and 3d, that the damages were excessive.

Robertson, for the Pursuer, showed cause.

The first ground stated for a new trial is novel, no exception has been taken to the law laid down in the Judge's charge, which is admitted to be good law; the jury take their law from the Court, which is fixed by the charge, and the verdict therefore cannot be impugned as contrary to law. The evidence is sufficient to support the verdict, the justice of which is borne out by the authorities referred to by the pursuer at the trial.<sup>1</sup> Assuming the verdict to be a good verdict on both issues, and not being a case for merely nominal damages, it is not the part of the Court to interfere with what it is the peculiar province of the jury to fix the amount of damages.<sup>2</sup>

Dean of Faculty, for the Defenders, in support of the rule.

Admitting the Judge's charge to have been unobjectionable, the verdict was wrong, looking at it with respect to the application of the law N. the facts of this particular case. With reference to the privilege May attaching to judicial slander, the verdict on the first issue was in the circum- Hall stances of the case unwarranted ; and if so, assuming the verdict to have been right on the second issue, the jury were not entitled to slump the damages, and find a sum upon both issues. Moreover the sum so found to them was excessive and extravagant.

<sup>1</sup> See cases cited ante, XIV. 202.

<sup>2</sup> Christian v. Lord Kennedy, 2 Murray, 51.

 The case was this day put out for advising.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—After having deliberately considered this case, at the trial of which I presided, and the three grounds upon which the verdict is sought to be set aside, viz. that it is against law—that it is against evidence, and that the damages are excessive—and having referred to the proceedings at the trial, I am of opinion that the verdict ought to stand. Had I conceived myself to have erred on the law which I stated to the jury, I should have allowed it; but in the very pleading in favour of the new trial, no fault is found with the Judge's direction in law. (His Lordship then referred to the law as laid down in the charge.)
 As regards the verdict being contrary to evidence, the whole evidence was laid before the jury, and this was matter for their consideration. As to the question of excess of damages, perhaps it might have been consistent with the justice of the case had the damages been less ; but can I say that the jury having found as they did is a reason for granting a new trial? Before the Court are entitled to grant a new trial, there must be a flagrant excess of damages ; and the rule is so laid down by the Lord Chief Commissioner in his valuable work.<sup>1</sup> I am of opinion then that the verdict ought not to be set aside. We should give the pursuer expenses, but subject to modification.

LORD GLENLEE.—I cannot help thinking that the verdict of the jury on the first issue was erroneous, and contrary to the rule by which statements in judicial proceedings, if pertinent to the cause, are held to be privileged. I should be inclined to allow a new trial.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I concur with the chair.

LORD MEDWYN.—I have come to be of opinion that the verdict ought not to be disturbed.

THE COURT accordingly discharged the rule, and found the defenders liable in expenses, but subject to modification.

J. and T. DARLING, W.S.—CAMPBELL and MACK, W.S.—Agents.

---

<sup>1</sup> Adam on Jury Trial, p. 197, et seq.

WILLIAM RICHARDSON, Advocate and Defender.—D. F. Hope—Maitland.

ROSCOE and RIGG, Respondents and Pursuers.—M'Neill—J. Anderson.

Sale—Principal and Agent.—A party in Liverpool received an order from a merchant in Glasgow to purchase for him a certain quantity of oil of a particular description; the party made a purchase of oil accordingly, and advised his correspondent that he had secured for him the quantity required, but thereafter in executing the order, limited this quantity to a half, as appearing in the invoice transmitted to Glasgow; the merchant having declined the purchase altogether. Circumstances which held insufficient to bind him to take the reduced quantity.

1837. On the 4th September, 1832, the advocate, Richardson, a merchant in Glasgow, addressed a letter to the respondents, Roscoe and Rigg, commission agents in Liverpool, ordering them to purchase for him 20 tons pale seal oil, at £30 per ton, or as near that limit as the market would permit, and stating that as the purchase was made for the chance of a rise, they might store it in the mean time till his acceptance was paid. About the 10th September, Roscoe and Rigg purchased all the pale seal oil on board a vessel called the Gem, and they had delivered to them 20 tons and 43 gallons. On the 15th September, they wrote to Richardson as follows:—"We have the pleasure to inform you that we have secured your twenty tons seal oil at £30, 10s. per ton. This will be landed and stored in a few days, when we shall hand you invoice. Sales have been made to-day in quantity at £31, at which importers now hold very firm." On the 20th September, they wrote in these terms:—"Annexed you have invoice of the pale seal oil for your order. The remainder of the parcel turning out coloured, we rejected it. Please to accept the inclosed draft, and return it to us in due course." The invoice which accompanied this letter showed a quantity of only 9 tons and 2 quarters, which it stated Richardson to have "bought of Roscoe and Rigg."

Of the same date, Roscoe and Rigg invoiced a quantity of upwards of 10 tons pale seal oil to Messrs Hutcheson and Milne of Glasgow, with whom they had previously corresponded, the invoice stating Hutcheson and Milne to have bought the oil of one Buchanan, per Roscoe and Rigg.

On the 24th, Richardson wrote to these parties acknowledging receipt of the invoice, and requiring delivery of the full quantity of pale oil ordered, or offering to take the straw-coloured oil mentioned in their letter at the market price. Some correspondence ensued, in the course of which Richardson offered to go into a reference, which Roscoe and Rigg refused; the result being that Richardson declined the purchase altogether, the quantity which he had been advised was secured for him not having been delivered.

after Roscoe and Rigg raised action before the Magistrates of No. 234 against Richardson, concluding for a balance due on the account between the parties, including the price of the 9½ tons of oil in Richardson. He pleaded in defence that he was entitled to full implement of the contract which had been completed between the parties, and was not bound to take partial delivery of the goods

May 18, 1837
Richardson v.
Roscoe.

In condescendence, Roscoe and Rigg alleged, inter alia, that they had received a prior order for pale seal oil from Hutcheson and Milne, and that it was wanted for immediate use; that when they advised Richardson of having secured 20 tons for him, the cargo had not been loaded, and the quantity of pale oil was less than they anticipated; these circumstances they had satisfied the order of Hutcheson and Milne, and had reserved the remainder for Richardson, which was the case in the invoice; that it was in conformity with the practice of Liverpool to purchase pale seal oil, according to the foreign invoice, to be examined or discharged from the vessel, and if part of it turns out to be dark or straw-coloured, the seller is not required to deliver, and the buyer has no right to demand delivery of more pale oil than may be delivered; but the buyer is bound to accept of the pale oil on board, although the quantity should turn out deficient; that it was also a common practice for a merchant or broker having several orders to execute from a cargo, for him to execute those first, where the purchaser required immediate delivery.

The Magistrates allowed a proof of their averments, which was accordingly given by two of the principal witnesses being a clerk and salesman of Roscoe and Rigg. Thereafter they decreed in favour of Richardson.

Richardson then brought an advocacy, in which he pleaded, inter alia, that the respondents never having disclosed the parties from whom they had purchased the oil on account of the advocator, became thereby principals in the transaction, and are consequently not entitled to maintain this action on a separate and more favoured character of brokers.

The respondents having been employed, and having undertaken as agents to purchase the specific quantity of twenty tons of pale seal oil on account of the advocator, they were not entitled, under their employment, to deliver any smaller quantity of the commodity in question, to the effect of releasing him by the transaction.

The respondents having reported to the advocator in their letter of September, 1832, that they had effected a purchase of twenty tons of pale seal oil on his account, he was entitled to rely on this as an usual and concluded transaction, while they are barred from now setting up in a question with him as their employer, that the purchase was for a smaller amount.

respondents should make up the deficiency; nor, on the other hand, should he reject the quantity actually obtained and invoiced for him.

2. The respondents were justified in executing the order for oil from Milne from the cargo in question before that of the respondents in respect that it was a prior order, and for immediate delivery, and the extent of the cargo had not been ascertained.

The Lord Ordinary advocated the cause, recalled the intervention of the Magistrates, and assailed Richardson, issuing, at the same time, the following note: *—

---

* " NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary must think it very unfortunate that the respondents refused to go into the reference offered, and an amicable settlement. He should have thought that, if they were as confident as they state of the rectness of their proceedings, according to Liverpool practice, the dispute should have been easily settled with very little expense or trouble. They now stand uprightly according to their own views; and it does not appear in this case that they either got or aimed at any profit to themselves in withholding the fulfilment of their pledge to the advocator; and it may also be that they were influenced by the change of the market, and may not have done handsomely in refusing to accept the bill. But the Lord Ordinary must say that a mercantile transaction, according to the view of it given by the respondents, he has seldom seen. Neither did they deal candidly with the advocator in the correspondence, the case at last coming to depend on a fact which was not all disclosed to him till the parties were in Court.

" The Lord Ordinary conceives that the case is a case of law, and of plain and admitted facts. The advocator employed the respondents, brokers, to purchase twenty tons of pale seal oil on the terms given. He told him that they had secured that quantity. As their letter indicated that the oil was not then landed, the alleged practice in Liverpool, though but feebly supported, of doubtful efficacy, where so unqualified a notice was sent to a mercantile

Roscoe and Rigg reclaimed.

No. 234.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary impreg-

May 18, 1837.
Richardson v.
Roscoe.

ies, or sold it to two parties, very probably expecting that there would be sufficient for both in the ship, and that they preferred delivering to the others, and leaving the deficiency on the advocator? They have not proved even that case. 1st, The order of Hutcheson and Milne on the 23d August appears (for any good shown to the contrary) to have been answered by the ten tons invoiced to him on the 30th August; and 2d, There is no evidence whatever that the respondents had made any intimation to Hutcheson and Milne that they had purchased or secured for them ten tons, or any other quantity of the oil imported by the Gem. The evidence stands, therefore, the delivery to them was a gratuitous preference to them, to the prejudice of the advocator's completed purchase, as expressly announced to him: It was selling what was his oil to another favoured customer. It would be a singular usage, very different from what the Lord Ordinary has always understood of the Liverpool trade, which would sanction such a proceeding, and there is no evidence whatever to sanction it.

But taking the matter even in the best view for the respondents, that they had been under an express or implied obligation to deliver to Hutcheson, &c. as for immediate use, and that they held themselves bound to satisfy them from the first deliveries from the ship, were they not bound to tell this to the advocator when informing him that they had secured the twenty tons for him? The case is not as the respondents put it, that they had simply had two orders, one for speculation, one for immediate use. They would even in that case have been bound to tell him fairly, though no legal obligation might have arisen. But the essence of the matter here lies in the fact, that they had announced the purchase as actually made to him, without the slightest allusion to any contingency arising from another order, and that they got the quantity, and might have delivered it to him. If an obligation to a third party prevented them, could that affect the advocator, or oblige him to accept of half implement, not of his order merely, but of the purchase standing by the respondent to have been actually made on his account?

The question, whether the advocator was bound to accept of the nine tons in the circumstances, appears to the Lord Ordinary to be purely a question of law. The alleged usage about fulfilling orders for immediate use first is very lamely proved. But he must confess that it appears to him to be of little importance in the case like this. He has no idea that any such practice can entitle a party, whether as merchant or broker, so to trifle with his correspondent, as first to tell him that he has purchased according to his order, then to say that the vender had not the quantity of the quality required, and, at last, when forced to speak judicially, to avow that he got the full quantity in the purchase, but gave more than half of it to another customer. This the Lord Ordinary looks upon as a very serious question in mercantile law. He thinks that, in point of law, the advocator was not bound to accept of the half implement offered; and that it is nothing to the purpose in the legal question, whether, in taking the resolution to reject it, the advocator was influenced by the change of market or not.

Much discussion has taken place on the question, whether the respondents, though acting as brokers at first, rendered themselves principals as merchants at last.

The Lord Ordinary is inclined to think that they did so, both by the form of the invoice to the advocator, and especially by not disclosing the name of the vessel, when expressly required. The evasion of that demand has too much the appearance of an unwillingness to let the fact transpire that they did receive twenty tons from the vessel. But the legal effect of it seems to be that they took to themselves the character of venders; and some of the witnesses seem to be of that opinion. But in the Lord Ordinary's view of the case, this does not appear to be of much importance attached to it.

The Lord Ordinary is sorry to alter the judgment of the Court below in such a case. But he cannot help it; and he is of opinion that, in the way the cause has been treated, it is not without considerable importance."

234. nable. Looking to the letters which passed between the parties, the practice alleged by the respondents seems to have very little to do with the case, and were the case to turn upon it, I am not satisfied that such usage has been satisfactorily proved.

LORD GLENLEE.—I am of the same opinion. On the 10th September, Roscoe and Rigg had purchased and were proprietors of the whole pale seal oil on board the Gem. Now before the 10th they had received Richardson's letter directing them to purchase twenty tons of oil. On the 15th they write to say that they had twenty tons secured. When they do send the nine tons, it is with an invoice stating forth that the oil was "bought of Roscoe and Rigg;" and not as if they were brokers or factors. I think Richardson was not bound to accept of the oil, if the other parties had made an alteration on the paction.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I doubt if the practice adduced would make out the practice under which the respondents attempt to shelter themselves. Besides, the custom spoken to by the witnesses does not apply to the case, or bear out the allegations of these parties. This is just an ordinary case of a party having committed a breach of contract; and they must see the consequences.

LORD MEDWYN concurred.

THE COURT accordingly adhered, finding additional expenses due.

FRASER and DUNCAN, S.S.C.—J. COLLIER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 235.

ALEXANDER MACALLAN, Advocate.—M<sup>r</sup>Neill.

WILLIAM COCKBURN, Respondent.—Deas.

Process—Accounting—Spuilzie—Master and Servant.—Circumstances which, where a summary application was presented to the sheriff, by the proprietor of a newspaper, against a clerk recently in his employment, concluding in immediate restitution of the amount of certain accounts, as uplifted by the clerk without authority;—Held that it was an incompetent proceeding, in respect that the matters in dispute between the parties formed a proper subject for an ordinary action of count and reckoning.

May 10, 1837. ALEXANDER MACALLAN, proprietor of the Edinburgh Evening Post newspaper, presented a petition to the sheriff of Edinburgh, stating that William Cockburn was employed by him, in August, 1832, as clerk in the office of the newspaper, with power to uplift and discharge accounts; that, soon after, other individuals were employed to assist Cockburn, and in March, 1833, Patrick Milne was employed as sole collector of the accounts, and Cockburn was retained for other duties; that in April, 1834, he, Macallan, heard that Cockburn had collected some accounts and appropriated them to his own use, and therefore he called on Cockburn to specify the sums, which Cockburn did by a writing showing that they amounted to £24, 7s. 11d.; that Macallan agreed to continue Cockburn in his employment, in order to wipe off this balance by earning for 1st Division.

Ld. Corehouse.
D.

ry; that Cockburn continued in his employment, drawing a small No. 235. for his weekly maintenance, until March, 1835, when he took his e, and, in May following, Macallan learnt that Cockburn had collect- May 19, 1837.
 and appropriated other sums, and he called on Cockburn to specify Macallan v.
 r amount, in writing, and to deliver up that amount and the former Cockburn.
 nce; that Cockburn gave a note of sums so uplifted amounting to , 6s. 1d.; that Cockburn “drew and appropriated the money in stion without the knowledge or authority of Macallan, on the pree that Macallan was indebted to him for his services, and that he was tled to pay himself;” that Macallan was not indebted to Cockburn, at all events, as Cockburn “had no right, on any pretence, to make olent seizure of Macallan’s funds,” Macallan had a right to obtain a mary order for restitution; he therefore prayed the sheriff to ordain kburn “to deliver up to him the foresaid sums of £24, 7s. 11d. and , 6s. 1d., reserving Macallan’s other claims on him, and to both par-their defences.” Cockburn, besides pleading to the merits, objected e competency of the application, as it truly resolved into an ordinary ess of count and reckoning between Macallan and himself. By the s of their agreement, as he was ready to prove them, Macallan was bted to him in a larger sum than was claimed in this summary peti-
 ; he, Cockburn, had uplifted the funds regularly, and, separately, as e sums uplifted in 1834, they could not now form more than a com-debt, even if not compensated; and there was no principle on which istinguish the other sums from these. An action of count and oning was therefore the proper action to raise.

appeared ex facie of the writings produced that Cockburn might at bona fide have supposed that he had the power of uplifting the accounts uestion. And there were confessedly counter claims, to a certain rt, at the instance of Cockburn against Macallan. It also appeared Macallan had not afforded to Cockburn such access to the books of oncern as he was entitled to.

he sheriff “sustained the preliminary objection stated to the form of process, dismissed the petition, and found the petitioner liable in nses.”

Macallan brought an advocacy, in which the Lord Ordinary “repelle reasons of advocacy, and remitted simpliciter to the sheriff, and ped, and found the complainer liable in expenses.” *

---

NOTE.—If the advocator had distinctly averred that the respondent, after his service, continued to collect accounts without authority, it would have been an illegal and fraudulent act on the part of the respondent. But there is no averment on the record. It is only alleged that, by the second agreement of the parties, the respondent had no power to collect accounts. But this is denied; and ex facie of the writings produced, the respondent had the power of collection, or at least might have bona fide supposed that he had that power. In these circumstances, it does not appear to the Lord Ordinary that the

No. 235. Macallan reclaimed.

May 19, 1837.
King v.
Mackenzie.

THE COURT unanimously adhered and awarded additional expenses.

Buchanan v.
Lumsden.

Ainslie, Macallan, and Graham, W.S.—P. Campbell, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 236.

JAMES LAING, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Russell.
HONOURABLE MRS HAY MACKENZIE, Defender.—D. F. Hope—Walker.

May 19, 1837. A case of circumstances, in which the Court pronounced a interlocutor.
2d Division.
Ed. Jeffrey.

F.

Gair and Morton, W.S.—Walker, Richardson, and Melville, W.S.—Agents.

No. 237.

JOHN BUCHANAN, Pursuer.—J. Anderson.
ROBERT LUMSDEN, Defender.—M'Neill.

Process—Reduction—Decree.—Opinion by a majority of the whole Court in a reduction at the instance of the pursuer of an action before Justices of Peace, of a final but unextracted judgment, to a certain extent, in his favour of all the previous proceedings in the action, with a conclusion for the full sum which he claimed, was incompetent, and that the plea was not excluded by production having been satisfied (which was done by the pursuer himself). Judgment on a closed record pronounced by the Lord Ordinary without the objection having been stated.

May 20, 1837. THE pursuer, Buchanan, a coal-hewer at West-thorn, raised an action against the defender, Lumsden, coal-master there, before the Justices of Peace for Lanarkshire, concluding for payment of an alleged balance of wages due to him to the amount of £30. Defences were given, and a proof led, upon which the Justices at Petty Sessions pronounced the following decree:—

advocator was entitled to resort to a summary proceeding, such as would be competent in the case of an admitted spuilzie, or a fraud of the nature of a spuilzie, to have the money collected paid over to himself, according to the maxim Spoliatus ante omnia restitutus. An ordinary process of count and reckon agreeably to the judgment of the sheriff, is the regular and proper form of proceeding. It is not denied that there are counter-claims, at least to a certain extent, at the instance of the respondent against the advocator. There is evidence that the respondent always offered to count and reckon, and it is proved that the advocator withheld the books of the concern, to which, in terms of their agreement, the respondent was entitled to have access. It will be observed, that count and reckoning could not have taken place in a summary process.

Glasgow, 3d February, 1834.—The Justices having resumed con- No. 237.
 eration of this process, and whole steps thereof, with proofs of parties May 20, 1837.
 Of consent declare the proofs concluded, and on the merits (for the Buchanan v. sons stated in the note subjoined), decern against the defender for the Lumsden.
 n of £3, 0s. 6d. sterling, in name of wages unpaid during the last three nths; further, find the defender liable in expenses, modify the same, der the circumstances, to £5 sterling, and decern.”

Both parties having appealed to the Quarter Sessions, this judgment s, on 1st April, affirmed simpliciter, Lumsden being found liable in , 11s. 6d. of additional costs; and the Justices “decern accord-ly.”

Thereafter Buchanan brought a reduction of these interlocutors, while l unextracted, and of the whole proceedings before the Justices. The mmons of reduction called upon the defender “to bring, exhibit, and duce before our said Lords a petition presented at the pursuer’s tance to the Justices of the Peace for Lanarkshire against the defender bert Lumsden, and likewise the interlocutors, sentences, or judgments the following dates and tenor, &c., for the purpose that the whole eedings in the said action, of whatever dates, tenor, or contents the e may be, should be seen and considered by our said Lords, and the l interlocutors, sentences, or judgments should be reduced, annulled, l declared to be null and void, and of no effect in judgment, or out-l the same in time coming, and that the pursuer ought and should be oned and restored thereagainst in integrum, and that the defender uld and ought to be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to ke payment to the pursuer of the sum of £30 sterling, being the sum eluded for as aforesaid.”

No objection was stated against satisfying the production, the pursuer self borrowing up the proceedings from the inferior court and elucing them in process; and the Lord Ordinary, “in respect the lies hold the production as satisfied,” appointed the defender to lodge nces.

A record was thereafter made up on the merits and closed; in the use of which, and of the subsequent discussion before the Lord Ord-y, no objection was made by Lumsden to the competency of the action. His Lordship reduced and decerned in terms of the libel, ing the defender liable in expenses.

Preclaiming note being presented against this judgment, the Court, advising (March 11, 1836), took up the point of the competency of process of reduction, the interlocutors in question never having been uted.

Mr MEDWYN.—The error arises from not recollecting what it is we are

237. asked to reduce. The technical decree of a court is the extracted decree; it is only the grounds and warrants of the decree which the pursuer calls for. Until it is extracted, there is no proper decree to be reduced. (His Lordship referred to Stair, IV. 46, 4.) This practice of proceeding by reduction is recently adopted, in order to avoid the provision in the Judicature Act, 1825, regard to advocations, as to finding caution for expenses.<sup>1</sup> You may as well regard interlocutory judgments as decrees before extract. This would be turning them from their proper use. The parties have no right to call for the records and proceedings which are here sought to be reduced. These are records of court, got at by borrowing the proceedings from the Justice of the Peace clerk, the pursuer himself satisfying the production. Prior to extract, this is the proper form of review. When a charge is given or threatened, the extracted decree, suspension is the form. When these modes of review are available, reduction is competent. (His Lordship referred to the case of C. Watson, Feb. 24, 1804 (F.C.); and also to the case of Boyd v. Swinton, 19, 1825,<sup>2</sup> and Holmes v. Tassie, Jan. 19, 1828,<sup>3</sup> which last differed in the circumstances from the present case.)

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—What makes against the competency of this is the fact, that the only way of satisfying the production must have been by borrowing the proceedings from the inferior court, which seems to be an incorrect method of satisfying the production.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—We are bound to protect our forms; and if an incompetent proceeding acquiesced in, it is our part to take notice of it.

LORD GLENELG was understood to concur.

The Court, "before further answer, appointed the parties to give minutes of debate on the competency of the proceedings in this case."

Argued for the Pursuer—

There can be no doubt that the judgment of the Justices under question exhausted the cause, the pursuer's claim being held to be well founded in principle, though sustainable only to a certain extent. No reduction is a competent form of process for reviewing the judgment decrees of inferior judicatories finally disposing of the cause; the fact of an unjust or illegal decree having been pronounced being what entitles the pursuer to complain. The inferior judge, in pronouncing the decree, has done his part, and the extract is the act of the clerk, being given forth as the warrant for execution, and tantamount to a certified copy of the decree. In the present case, more especially, extract was not necessary before raising a reduction of the decree, it being impossible for the pursuer to have complained by suspension, as the decree was not one upon which the defender had any interest to extract, or upon which he could have used execution.<sup>4</sup> It cannot be said that the process of reduction

<sup>1</sup> 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 41.

<sup>2</sup> Ante, VI. 394.

<sup>3</sup> Ante, III. 444 (new ed. 311).

<sup>4</sup> Erskine, IV. 3, 8.

an evasion of the statutory enactment requiring caution to be found No. 287.
 here inferior court proceedings are brought under review by advoca-on ; for the competency of that mode of redress was established long May 20, 1837 prior to any such enactment, and could not be affected unless by a posi- Buchanan v.
 ve provision ; and the objection would, besides, apply with equal, if not Lumaden.
 greater force to an extracted as to an unextracted decree. The objection now started has been overruled in the cases of Boyd v. Swinton, and Holmes v. Tassie ;<sup>1</sup> and the present case is still stronger against its being sustained, considering the period of the cause at which it has been stated, and that the defender failed to bring it forward in limine.

Argued for the Defender—

The established mode of bringing the judgment of an inferior court under review before extract is by advocacy ; as it is by suspension after extract, when a charge has been given or threatened. In those situations where the extraordinary remedy of reduction is allowed, in order to set aside the decree of an inferior court, there must be a decree—that is to say, an extract or extracted decree. The judgments and proceedings which were here called for and sought to be reduced did not belong to either party, but formed part of the record of another court. The reduction, therefore, could not be satisfied by the defender, and it had not been satisfied by the pursuer by borrowing up the proceedings from an inferior court, and irregularly producing them in this court, which circumstance was itself sufficient to show the incompetency of the action.
 This Court could not proceed in the reduction on the merits, unless the reduction was regularly satisfied ; and if the production called for was such as could not be regularly satisfied, the Court could not competently determine the case.

At the next advising (June 24, 1836), the Court ordered the minutes of debate to be laid before the other Judges, for their Lordships' opinion on the competency of this process of reduction. The following cases were at the same time referred to from the bench as bearing upon the question, viz. Learmont v. Lord Arniston, Dec. 23, 1698 ;<sup>2</sup> Auchin-chachie v. Hope, Dec. 17, 1713 ;<sup>3</sup> Campbell v. Baird, Dec. 3, 1825.<sup>4</sup>

Thereafter the consulted Judges returned Opinions as follows :—

LORDS PRESIDENT, BALGRAY, GILLIES, MACKENZIE, COREHOUSE, MON-TROFF, JEFFREY, and COCKBURN.

In this process the following interlocutor was pronounced :—‘ The Lords having heard counsel for the parties, and advised the case ; ordain the minutes of <sup>1</sup> Supra.

<sup>2</sup> M. 13517.

<sup>3</sup> M. 13514.

<sup>4</sup> Ante, IV. 264 (new ed. 269).

237. debate to be laid before the Judges of the First Division of the Court as 1837. nent Lords Ordinary, for their Lordships' opinion as to the competency
 v. process of reduction.
 Jan.

" In consequence of this interlocutor we have considered the minutes given in by the parties, and have particularly adverted to the terms of mona of redaction brought by the pursuer, whereby the defender is called ' to bring, exhibit, and produce before our said Lords a petition presented by the pursuer's instance to the Justices of the Peace for Lanarkshire against the defender Robert Lumeden, and likewise the interlocutors, sentences, or judgments of the following dates and tenor,' &c., for the purpose that ' the whole proceedings in the said action, of whatever dates, tenor, or contents the said sentences, or judgments should be reduced, annulled, and declared to be void, and of no effect in judgment, or outwith the same in time coming, the pursuer ought and should be reponed and restored thereagainst in full, and that the defender should and ought to be decerned and ordained, before our said Lords, to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £30 sterling, and the sum concluded for as aforesaid.

" Under these circumstances, we are of opinion that this process of reduction, the effect of which must be to remove the process from the inferior court, preventing the opposite party from further insisting or obtaining extract, is a fact necessarily causing a risk without caution, is an incompetent mode of proceeding, and we are of opinion that if the pursuer meant to complain of the interlocutors of the inferior court, and to bring them under review, he should have done so by a proper advocacy, and not by a reduction accompanied by tory and petitory conclusions, which in substance is nothing but an action turned into the form of a reduction, evidently for the purpose of evading statutory regulation of finding caution.

" In giving this opinion, we do not wish to lay down an invariable rule applicable to all cases without exception, but merely that we think that the process of bringing the case under review in this case is incompetent, and ought not to be sanctioned in the ordinary course of cases which occur before the courts."

LORD FULLERTON.—" The reduction here is brought, and the question of competency raised, under circumstances which appear to me sufficient to justify the objection.

" The decree in the inferior court is a final judgment, and it is in the power of the pursuer, both on the merits and the expenses. It is a decree therefore for the purposes of execution, admits of being beneficially extracted and paid to the pursuer.

" But the pursuer declines to extract it, because he is dissatisfied with the amount of the sum decerned for, and he has accordingly brought this action, concluding, first, for the reduction of the ' interlocutors, sentences, and judgments pronounced in the inferior court; and secondly, for the payment of the sum to which he lays claim.

" The defender stated no objection to this course, at the proper stage of the proceedings. The production was held to be satisfied of the competency of the record was made up on the merits, and the Lord Ordinary pronounced the the pursuer. It was not till the cause came before the Second Division Court, on a reclaiming note, that the objection of incompetency was

No. 237.

May 20, 1837.

Buchanan v.

Lumsden.

first place, then, without giving any sanction to the general competence of unextracted decrees or interlocutory judgments, I think that rather the only ground, on which, in the general case, such a course is questioned, does not apply to the present.

When an interlocutory judgment is pronounced, which a party has an interest in the disposal of the farther merits of the cause; or when a final judgment is pronounced, which he has an interest to extract, the bringing up the present process in an action of reduction, might operate as a stay of all farther proceedings and thus give the pursuer all the benefit of an advocacy, without the necessity of finding caution. There might be good grounds there, for holding this to be an evasion of the rule regarding caution, which is the condition known and competent process of review.

There is no room for such an objection, because, in the first place, the judgment is final; and secondly, the pursuer of the reduction is the only party who obtains the extract of the decree, as affording the means of execution, and effect.

There is no rule of law, requiring the finding of caution, as an indispensable condition for obtaining the review of a judgment of an inferior court. It is not as I understand, that, if the decree had been extracted, the pursuer could competently raise a process of reduction; and in the ordinary case of one who obeys the judgment, there is no doubt that he may bring his action of reduction and repetition, without finding caution.

It is an intelligible ground, then, for requiring caution in the case of advocacy, not merely that it is a process for reviewing a judgment already pronounced against the advocator, but that it is a process, which stays the execution of a judgment so pronounced. And as this principle cannot possibly apply to the present case, I see no reason for sustaining the objection, which is here purely technical and thus obliging the pursuer to take an extract of a decree, for the purpose of cutting it down.

Finally, I think that the objection comes too late. It ought to have been made before the production was satisfied, or rather as a defence against being allowed to satisfy the production. That was not done. Of course the production is held to be satisfied, and the record made up on the merits. And it would be equally contrary to form and to substantial justice, that at this late stage of the case, and after judgment pronounced in the pursuer's favour by the ordinary process, the whole of the proceedings should be rendered of no avail, which the defender had the means of stating if he chose, and was to be before those proceedings were allowed to go on.

I may observe that the decisions referred to appear to have sustained the competency of such a procedure, under circumstances much more unfavourable than those of the present case."

Having been this day put out for advising, to be finally determined by the opinion of the majority of the consulted Judges, it being at, in the interim, the pursuer had died; whereupon 237.

THE COURT superseded consideration of the cause.

20, 1837.

FISHER and DUNCAN, S.S.C.—THOS. LEBURN, S.S.C.—Agents.

In v.

238.

JEAN HARVIE, Pursuer.—D. F. Hope—Sandford.
 JAMES INGLIS, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Sh

Marriage—Proof—Judicial Examination—Process.—1. In a marriage, certain facts and circumstances being set forth as implying courtship with a view to marriage, and as equivalent to a promise, and subsequent copula being averred; a proof pro ut de jure allowed to before answer as to the relevancy of the pursuer's averments. 2. In the Lord Ordinary, in pronouncing an interlocutor on the relevancy, he allowed the defender to be judicially examined; this interlocutor being in general terms—Held that it was still open to allow the judicial exami-

20, 1837.

Division.

Jeffrey.

F.

JEAN HARVIE, daughter of a farmer in Linlithgow, raised against James Inglis, a farmer in the same county, concluding it found and declared that they were married persons, or altered damages for seduction. As the grounds of action, she set forth in the condescendence the following facts and circumstances:—†

That the parties were of equal condition, were about the same age, and attended the same school; that their families resided about four miles of each other, and were on intimate terms; that several years preceding the date of the action, the defender had addressed to the pursuer in an honourable way, and during that time frequently spoke of marriage to her, and requested her consent to marry; that his wife, whenever he should be in a situation to marry; that in the years 1831, 1832, and 1833, he was in the habit of visiting the pursuer's father's house, and was received as her lover and accepted by her parents and others, and that the defender's father used to call her a "gude daughter;" that the defender made her presents, and in particular a silver thimble, having the initials of both their names upon it, and that he communicated to various persons his intention of marrying her, and heard him acknowledge that he had promised marriage to her, and intended to fulfil his promise, and in fact that he had stated that she would be Mrs Inglis, and that she

* It is understood that no final judgment will be pronounced in this case, the pursuer's representatives declining to assist themselves.

† The statement in the condescendence did not materially vary from the averment in the summons, except that it was shaped more with a view to prove ther person, should ever sit at the head of his table ; that upon the faith No. 23 of the courtship and of the promises of marriage aforesaid, the pursuer, May 20, 18 in September, 1833, allowed the defender access to her bed, and they Harvie v.

 had carnal connexion together ; that thereafter, the pursuer having Inglis. become pregnant, the defender on several occasions admitted that he had promised marriage, and particularly on one occasion, when he was overheard, in April, 1834, or in March preceding, or May following, within premises belonging to her father.

With reference to these averments the pursuer pleaded—

Long courtship or promise of marriage, followed by copula, constitute marriage, and the pursuer having been courted by the defender, and having admitted him to her bed under such promise of marriage, is the wife of the defender, and is entitled to the rights and maintenance of his wife.

It was pleaded in defence against the action—

There are no relevant facts and circumstances averred by the pursuer to constitute marriage, and her allegations are vague both in time, place, and circumstances.

The defender at the same time denied the pursuer's principal averments, and alleged various facts in opposition to them.

Thereafter the Lord Ordinary (the pursuer having previously moved that the defender should be judicially examined), pronounced the following interlocutor with the subjoined note : *—“ Repels the objection stated by the defender to the relevancy of the pursuer's several averments on the record, and finds that there is in the said record a relevant and sufficient allegation of the constitution of marriage, by a substantive promise or agreement and engagement to marry, and by copula following on the faith

* “ The case of Grierson, 26th November, 1755 (Mor. 12,393), has always been understood to have settled that proof of mutual purpose, agreement, or engagement to marry, de futuro, is at least equivalent to a proof of a promise to marry, and need implies the existence of such a promise, and a good deal more ; and from it necessarily follows that facts and circumstances clearly importing such a purpose and agreement may be proved pro ut de jure, though a mere promise in words could only be established scripto vel juramento. Both points are determined in the leading case, and have been taken for granted in a variety of subsequent cases, but in none more fully and deliberately than in that remarkable one of Honeyman, affirmed in the House of Lords. (See 5, Wilson and Shaw, Appeal Cases, 1.)

“ The objection to the latitude taken as to time and place is pretty well answered by reference to the length of time during which the open courtship for marriage, by the occasional admissions of a matrimonial engagement, continued to be exhibited in a narrow circle of society. If the case were to be decided by a jury at a solemn, the defender might no doubt be seriously prejudiced by so great a latitude. But the diets of probation before the commissaries are not peremptory, and a reasonable time is always allowed to the defender after the pursuer's proof is concluded.

“ It seems quite reasonable that, in such a case, the defender should be subjected to a judicial examination, the record being now closed.”

238. of such promise or engagement; and before farther answer, finds the pursuer entitled to have the judicial examination of the defender."

1837. The defender reclaimed.

The cause came on for advising, November 25, 1835, when the Court ordered cases.

Pleaded for the Pursuer.

A promise of marriage may be inferred from facts and circumstances which may be proved verbally. Any thing in act or word, which is equivalent in signification, or may, by fair interpretation, be construed into a promise of marriage, will be held equivalent to an express promise as to its effect in constituting marriage. And a protracted courtship, with a view to marriage, is of itself sufficient to establish that a promise has been made, and when followed by concubitus constitutes marriage.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Smith v. Grierson, Jan. 27, 1755, (M. 12391); Low v. Allardice, Feb. 26, 1794, not rep.; * Ferguson v. M'Lymont, Nov. 26, 1818, Lord Justice-Clerk.

* (Low v. Allardice, Feb. 26, 1794.)—In this case, which was a declaration of marriage, the statement in the summons, upon which the media conclusions were founded, was, "that the defender, having for three months past conceived an attachment to the pursuer, became a visitor at her father's house, saw her, and addressed her, and courted her for marriage; on many occasions did declare his unalterable intention, and did promise to marry her, and vowed perpetual fidelity to her, both by words and in writing; that on one occasion the said William Allardice, defender, read over the marriage-service in the Book of Common Prayer, and made the pursuer do the same, thus mutually pledging and rendering themselves to be married persons; that by these means the defender gained the pursuer's affections, and under the strongest assurances and declarations, and the most solemn vows and promises of marriage, and by actually declaring himself her husband, prevailed upon her to submit to his embraces, and on more occasions than one, they treated and behaved to each other as man and wife, particularly they slept together as man and wife two several nights in the house of the pursuer's father in Brechin." The commissaries pronounced the following interlocutor, "Facts clearly proven, that a copula took place between the parties in the course of an honourable courtship, and in consequence of a solemn promise of marriage by the defender to the pursuer; find these facts relevant to infer marriage between the parties; and therefore find and declare, in terms of the conclusions of the pursuer's libel, in so far as relates to the conclusion for marriage and adherence, and decree accordingly. The defender advocated the cause, and it was reported by Lord Abercromby upon informations. The majority of the Judges were for adhering to the interlocutor. The following note of their Lordships' opinions was taken by the late Lord Macdowbank, who was counsel for the pursuer, and is written upon his papers:—

"Abercromby.—Admits slept on 9th and 10th March, and previous to these nights promised marriage, but before these promises, enjoyed her person. Argument for defender, founding on 30th March, irrelevant; and also on defender's account of first copula; and farther not true, not supported, and contradicted by Brown, and by the circumstances; also that it was a new idea newly taken up.

"And in point of law, irrelevant. Would have asked defender from No. 1.

"Eskgrove.—Moved with situation of the parties here, equal in rank. Man in a better line of life ought to be circumspect in their proceedings with such persons; admitted any other woman would have thought honourable; without proof could for the Defender—

No. 238

r to found a relevant claim for a conclusion that parties are husband and wife, there must be a clear, distinct, and unequivocal averment
 May 20, 1841
 Harvie v.
 Inglis.

action for seduction, but libelling on facts considered by the Court relevant to constitute a marriage); Campbell v. Honeyman, July 9, 1830 (VIII. Stewart v. Lindsay, 1817, noticed in Honeyman's case; Cameron v. Cameron, 1814, not reported.

alleged third night; but here thinks it incredible and calumnious, and void. Then what does the case come to? Just the ordinary case of promissory courtship, followed with the consequence the law holds sufficient.

—As the law now stands, and from the facts stated by the Lord Ordinary affirming.

Honeyman.—Same.

Lord.—Has great doubts; 1, celebration; 2, cohabitation.

must be clearly proved, and witnesses competent. 3d, Promise with or without oath requisite in all cases; attempted in the case of Smith to infer from honourable views indicated to witnesses; principle of copula (Britton v. Britton copula purifies the condition; not on the ground of seduction. Now, 3d, and the declaration, conception of honourable intention not sufficient. Prison, master of the horse to the Duke of Montrose. Now, as to the letter, letter does not say they were prior to the copula, but still would be to hear than to speak.

Clerk.—Sorry we have questions of this nature, and sorry that we have no law, and thinks virtue better guarded. Clear promise, cum subsequent copula.

say in these cases to settle facts. Lady's allegation, promise and courtship copula subsequens. He again avers a prior copula, but late made, would have been made 30th March. Even if driven to decide the point, would be for the lady under all circumstances, but doubt very much the relevancy. A woman acts once unguardedly, and resolves not to repeat, only in case of a promise, that would be a marriage.

Jury.—Clear upon the letter, allegation in the summons as to the prayer for a conclusion that a promise cum copula can be avoided by a previous copula. Smith was a nice case; here the defender had plenty leisure. But clear on the plea of law, and the fact on which it is founded, disproved.

Jury.—Of the same opinion.

altering the law, for women wd. &c.

Jury reads evidence of promise before the two nights.

Lord.—Numberless cases where promise cum copula is good, notwithstanding commerce. Case of Duffie.

Jury.—Pleased with the opinion of the Court declaring marriage, but dissentient well stated in page 16th of the defender's information. Differs thought it for the interest of female virtue to make marriage loosely; it must be clearly made out; cannot admit the competency of raising a promise on a declaration. Said gentleman must not say any thing ambiguous; but I say believe nothing ambiguous; promises ambiguous in the declaration, letter, but very well pleased with judgment" (two or three concluding words).

action there was an alternative conclusion for marriage or for damages. The conclusion for marriage was departed from, and the case was deration whether the condescendence, to which alone we can look as offered to be proved, is relevant and ought to be allowed to be proved evidence, which only I understand to be offered. I should incline to the opinion of all the Judges on this case, before adhering to the interlocutor, a little farther than Smith and Grierson.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I am glad of the proposal now made as I have consented to alter the interlocutor at present.

LORD GLENLEE.—I agree with the suggestion from the chair ; but I think the question is at all doubtful that a marriage may be established by facts and circumstances, as in the case of Smith, though a promise can be established by oath or writing. In Smith's case, the question was, whether what was offered to prove was relevant ; in this case we have no such specification and the judgment of the Lord Ordinary goes much beyond Smith and all cases I know of.

LORD MEDWYN.—I entirely concur, thinking this a case of the utmost

---

<sup>1</sup> Barclay, July 5, 1611, 1 Stair, 416; Cockburn v. Logan, July 1717 (M. 12386); Castlelaw v. Agnew, 1717, noticed in Mr Hodgson Cay in Appendix to Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, 2 Haggart's Reports; Harvey v. Ford, Dec. 13, 1732 (M. 12388 and MS. collection of Lord Hermand); v. Hamilton, Dec. 14, 1748 (M. 13909); Forbes v. Countess of Strathmore, 27, 1750, Ferguson's Consistorial Law, p. 115; Kennedy v. Campbell, 1751, 5 Brown's Sup. 789; Pennicook v. Grinton, Dec. 15, 1752, 111; White v. Hepburn, Nov. 18, 1785 (M. 12686); Inglis v. Robertson, 3, 1786, not reported; Miller v. Tremamondo, Jan. 29, 1771 (M. 12391); v. More, Feb. 1786, not reported; Kennedy v. McDowall, Ferguson v. Meikle v. McGee, 1820, Commissary Records; Evidence of Hon. Henry Baron Hume, and Mr Hodgson Cay in Appendix to Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, supra.

at the proposed proof of marriage goes beyond what I consider to be No. 238.
Scotland.

May 20, 189
Harvie v.
Ingles.

ordships then ordered additional cases, and directed the opi-whole Court to be taken upon them.

er the consulted Judges, with the exception of Lord Cockburn, opinion "that a proof ought to be allowed in this case, before o the relevancy of the pursuer's averments in the record."

CKBURN'S opinion was as follows:—I am of opinion, 1st, That the tements, particularly in her revised condescendence, are not relevant; ently that the defender ought to be assoilzied; 2dly, That though they t, the engagement on which the action rests, can only be proved scripto o of the defender; and consequently that that part of the Lord Ord-ocutor, which subjects him to judicial examination, or tends to recog-er mode of proof, ought to be altered.

is not easy to imagine a less satisfactory summons. As originally et forth copula, preceded by the facts that the defender "paid his the pursuer, professing the most sincere esteem, love, and regard for desire to marry her, which he often repeated, promising with the most tions, that he would marry her, and that she yielded in consequence of promises." This was the common case of a direct verbal engagement marriage. But the simplicity of the original summons was destroyed nendment, the exact import of which it is very difficult to ascertain.
r rather implies, that there had been a promise, in the usual sense of out it also rests, or seems to rest, the case on the facts, that the defender ions" of marriage; that it was "generally known in the country, and of ordinary report, that the defender was courting the pursuer, and was d to her;" and that "by his constant attention and undisguised court-his declarations of affection, and open avowal of his promises, and his fulfil them, and by repeated requests that she would be his wife, he pursuer's affections;" a second amendment states, that she yielded aith of the promises and courtship aforesaid." And then a third one the marriage was constituted by "avowed and public courtship, as romises of marriage, followed by sexual intercourse." There is thus a inction kept up between what she calls the courtship and the promise, difficult to detect her in any preference of the one to the other, as the f her demand; and when the exact import of all this comes to be ex-er revised condescendence and plea, the same difficulty continues. It to discover whether she means to rely on the direct ordinary promise, plied one, which is said to be involved in what is termed the courtship, Her plea is expressed as if it had been purposely meant to restrict her alar ground of action.

as her case is rested, not on any immediate and specific agreement, but of constructive promise said to be implied in the defender's general ave the utmost difficulty in recognising any such promise as the basis
e. I am aware that there are a few cases in which it has apparently with as sufficient; but the point cannot be considered as having been issue on oaths by what he is said to have done, but even with the

of time which her statements include, there is no sufficient and preci any formed and mutual engagement to marry.

Second, I scarcely know any point on which the authorities in the land are more clear, than that all promises, but especially those four basis of marriage, are only proveable by the writing or the oath of th have made them. Nor is this rule confined to mere verbal promises, as are said to flow from circumstances to be established like ordin expressly laid down as extending to all of what are commonly unc promises, or pledges de futuro, as distinguished from present and con ments.

There have, no doubt, been expressions used by Judges, to the i whose opinions the very highest respect is due, of an opposite tenden were only obiter dicta, and not necessary for the determination of the which they occurred. There are several cases on the other hand, necessity of restricting the proof to the writing or the oath of the expressly decided; and this even when the promise was not verbal, b inferred from circumstances. Stewart against Lindsay is a strong and re For the promise on which the defender was there claimed as a husb deduced from his conduct; yet it was expressly found that the facts duct could only be ascertained scripto vel juramento of him, and accor only by his examination on oath that they were reached. The whole decisions is adverse to the competency of any other proof. Even the c son, which has sometimes been supposed to have fixed the admissib evidence, when the promise arose from facts, turns out, when examin not to establish this, but rather to imply the reverse.

The Scotch law of marriage is loose enough already. But the obvi of the pursuer's doctrine is to make it still looser. The necessity of (which it generally may) to assume this shape, all ordinary evidence it is plain that the sphere of relevant claims, and the chances of occa-s, are enlarged, and one of the barriers of female virtue weakened.

No. 238.

May 20, 1881
Viscountess of Strathallan v.
Duke of North
umberland.

conformity with the opinion of the majority of the Judges—

COURT “recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary submitted to review, and remitted to his Lordship to allow a proof to the parties, before answer, as to the relevancy of the pursuer’s statements in the record.” *

A. M. ANDERSON, S.S.C.—J. LIVINGSTON, W.S.—Agents.

ESS of STRATHALLAN, and OTHERS, Pursuers.—D. F. Hope— No. 239.
Robertson.

NORTHUMBERLAND, and OTHERS (Lord Glenlyon’s Trustees), Defenders.—H. J. Robertson.

ATHOLL and CURATOR AD LITEM, Compearers.—M’Neill—
Patton.

Pursue—Curator Bonis—Fatuus—Executor.—An heir of entail and three daughters; his eldest son was fatuous; he had executed a division in favour of his youngest son; the daughters, alleging that the ultra vires of their father, and that it had the effect of altering the of their fatuous brother, diminishing his executry to their prejudice, as presumptive-executors, raised an action to reduce the bond, or at least to have that if the bond was paid out of the rents of their fatuous brother’s right to be assigned to him, and kept up as a debt against the next heir; concluded also for the appointment of a curator to the fatuous brother and his heirs, and for an order on him to concur in the action; a curator was who adopted the declaratory, but refused to adopt the reductive conclusion; the youngest son objected that the pursuers had no title to insist, their presumptive-executors being merely contingent on surviving their father, and they being wholly superseded by the appearance of that person as curator: Held, that, though the interest of the pursuers was continued a good title to pursue those conclusions which were not adopted by the person and his curator.

John Duke of Atholl left two sons, John Marquis of Tullie- May 23, 1881 who became Duke of Atholl, and James Lord Glenlyon; and

1st Division
Ld. Moncreaf
S.

the case returned before the Lord Ordinary, the pursuer moved to have the matter judicially examined, the latter objecting to the competency of the in respect of his Lordship’s interlocutor, which allowed such examination, having been altered by the Court, as above, and no notice taken of it. The Lord Ordinary reported the matter to the Court (May 30), who opinion that by their interlocutor, his Lordship was left at liberty to follow as he pleased as to the judicial examination, and directed him to repel the objection to the competency of the application.

free rent at £8000 per annum, and bound the granter and heir to pay £24,000, or such sum as three years' free rents should be; "and the amount of the said three years' free rents of the said estates as aforesaid, shall be payable to the said trustees as at three instalments, at and against the first, second, and third Martinmas or Whitsunday that shall happen in the first, second years immediately succeeding my decease, and that by three in that is, the first instalment of one-third part thereof, or one year's free rents, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the expiration of one full year after my decease; the second instalment, of one year's free rents, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the expiration of two full years after my decease; the remaining third instalment, of one-third part thereof, or one year's free rents, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the expiration of three full years after my decease, with a fifth part more of the said respective instalments of liquidate penalty of failure, and the legal and ordinary interest or annual rent of the respective sums aforesaid, from and after the before-mentioned day of payment respectively, until actual payment be made." It was added, directing £1500 per annum to be paid out of the said three years' rents, to the party having the care of the Marquis's support and maintenance of his lordship, and that, in lieu of the same so paid, the trustees of Lord Glenlyon should receive, out of the said fourth year, the sum of £4500, and corresponding interest, for the said fourth year, of Lord Glenlyon, being the amount deducted during the first three years, by way of annuity to the Marquis.

The summons set forth the Duke of Northumberland and others, No. 23 of Lord Glenlyon and John, now Duke of Atholl, and his tutors May 21, 1 ny has, and James, Lord Glenlyon, as the parties who should Viscountess at their instance. It stated the tenor of the bond, which was Strathellan “ reduced, &c., by decret of our said Lords, to be pronoun- Duke of Northumberland. the instance of the pursuers, and of the said John, now Duke oll, and of his tutor, or other legal guardian, if he any has, ight and should be decerned and ordained to concur with the s, as pursuers in the action to follow hereon, on account of the of the said Duke in the subject-matter thereof, in manner after d; and if the said John Duke of Atholl has no tutor, or other legal n, a curator ad litem ought and should be assigned to him by our rds, to prosecute and follow forth the action to follow hereupon l form, the said bond of provision, &c. to be reduced, &c. by decret l, &c.”

ing the reasons of reduction it was stated, that, by the death of Duke in September, 1830, his right to the rents of the entailed ad ceased; that it was ultra vires of him, and injurious to his sucto direct in what manner the rents of any one year, during his or's period of possession, should be appropriated; and, in partihat a deed appropriating rents in payment of the capital sum of vision in the bond was not consistent with the permissive powers entail, under which it was only the annual interest of such bond of on which was exigible out of the rents of a single year. But far-the present Duke was fatuous, and incapable of making a settle-his whole succession, heritable and moveable, must be left to the disposition of the law, and every deed by another party which ed the natural course of his Grace's succession was illegal. The n question was executed for the purpose, and with the effect, of rring to Lord Glenlyon a large sum which must otherwise have ed in the present Duke's executry, and fallen to the pursuers as rs in mobilibus. The deed was therefore injurious to the pursuers, was an unwarrantable encroachment on that right which belonged Duke's unfortunate situation, of having his estate left in so far urbed, that it would descend, at his death, in the event of his not alescing, according to the rules of intestate succession, the entire le estate which accrued during his life, descending to his execu-nd his entire heritage to his heir. The pursuers farther pleaded the late Duke had been the legal guardian of the present Duke, ed which he executed, encroaching on the rights of the present was on that account the more liable to reduction. It was stated parate reason of reduction that the sum of £24,000 exceeded three free rents.

the action concluded that the bond should be reduced, or, “ at all
, whether the said bond of provision shall be reduced or not,” it 1837. John v. Duke of Atholl.

 should be found and declared that John, now Duke of Atholl, had the sole right to the rents of the estates, free of all claim except for the interest of the sum of £24,000, or such other sum as should be found to be the legal amount of the provision; that the rents accruing after the present Duke's accession, should not be applied in payment of the capital sum in the bond of provision; "or otherwise and in case the said rents shall be applied in payment of the said sum of £24,000 of capital, or any part thereof, it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the said defenders are bound to grant, and the said John Duke of Atholl, and the guardians named, or to be named, for him, shall be entitled to take assignations to the said provision, to the extent to which the same shall be paid, in favour of the said Duke, his heirs, executors, or assignees, and that to the effect that the said capital sum of provision, so far as paid, may be kept up as a burden affecting the entailed estates."

A curator ad litem was appointed to the Duke, and defences were lodged by him, stating, that the only point in which it appeared that the Duke's interests might be considered at all compromised by the bond of provision, regarded his Grace's right to demand an assignation from Lord Glenlyon's trustees, so as to keep up the debt against the succeeding heir of entail: that Lord Glenlyon's trustees had agreed, on receiving the money, to grant an acknowledgment, keeping open, hinc inde, the Duke's right to demand, and their right to refuse, such assignation: and that, in these circumstances, it did not appear necessary for the Duke to make any farther appearance, if the arrangement was acknowledged by a judicial minute on the part of Lord Glenlyon's trustees.

Lord Glenlyon's trustees lodged a minute in these terms, and no farther appearance was at that time made on the part of the Duke. Lord Glenlyon's trustees, in their defences, objected to the title of the pursuers to insist, and also to the form of the action. The Lord Ordinary ordered cases on these questions, which he reported to the Court.* Before they * "NOTE.—This is a very peculiar case, and it is proper for the judgment of the Court. The Lord Ordinary will only observe, that he does not think it as settled, by any opinion which the curator ad litem may have formed on the merits of the reduction, or even on the view which the Court may take of the correctness of his resolution, in regard to the interest of the Duke of Atholl. His Grace being in the unfortunate situation of a lunatic, is under the care of the Court; and it will be for them to judge of these matters. But independent of any such question, as to the course to be taken by the curator ad litem, the question remains whether the existing nearest of kin have not a good title to insist in the action. The merits cannot be considered where there is no argument on one side. The Lord Ordinary will only say, that, in the state of the case, he is strongly inclined to think, that the pursuers have a title derived from the evident interest, though but a contingent interest. He holds the rule to be, that nothing shall be done in regard to the rights in property of a lunatic, by which the natural course of succession, on his death, is or may be altered, and that those contingently interested advised, John Atholl Bannatyne Murray Macgregor was appointed No. 239. or bonis to the Duke, and he was called on by the parties to consider May 23, 1837 action, and either state his concurrence in it, or his resolution not to Viscountess of

 ar. He lodged a minute, stating that he declined to support the Strathallan v.
 ctive conclusions of the action, but that it appeared proper to insist Duke of North ose conclusions which had for their object to restrict the amount of umberland.
 ond, if it exceeded three years' rents, and to declare Lord Glenlyon's es to be bound to grant an assignation to the bond of provision, in r as it might be paid up out of the rents of the estate.

ord Glenlyon's trustees contended that the objection to the title of pursuers was strengthened by this partial appearance for the Duke.
 n if his Grace had adopted none of the conclusions at all, the pursuers d have had no title, because their interest, as presumptive execu-s of his Grace, was merely contingent and uncertain, and would ely vanish if they predeceased the Duke and Lord Glenlyon. And egard to any interest which the Duke might himself have, to appear insist, that was within the province of the Duke's curator bonis to rmine upon, and he had accordingly adopted part of the action ; but decision, declaring the rest to be a matter in which the Duke should nsist, was conclusive on that subject.

he pursuers answered that they had an interest, and therefore a title, nsist in all the conclusions of the action as originally raised. And gh their interest was contingent, that did not affect their title to pur-as the Court was daily called upon to protect contingent interests.
 o far, however, as the Duke and his curator had adopted the action, interest and title of the pursuers was superseded. But in so far as Duke and his curator had not done so, the pursuers' interest and title ained the same as at first. And farther, the decision of the curator not conclusive on the point whether it was for the Duke's interest he should insist in the reductive conclusions of the libel or not. The e was under the protection of the Court, and if the pursuers could fy the Court that it was proper for his Grace's interests that the ctive conclusions should also be insisted in by him, they were entitled nsist that the curator should be ordained to do so.

ORD COREHOUSE.—I do not think this question is attended with any difficulty.
 s is a very clear title to pursue. The pursuers' interest is contingent to be but a contingent interest may be defended against injury just as well as a t interest. There are instances of this occurring in Court every day, as, for nce, in the use of arrestments in security of contingent debts, or upon the ndence of an action. The summons sets forth that the late Duke of Atholl

---

the succession have a right to interfere to prevent any such acts, unless they be shown to be necessary for the lunatic's personal interest."

illegal act of the late Duke, and refuses to reduce it, I see no preventing the party whose interests are lesed by that illegal act from a reduction of it. Whether it is truly illegal and reducible is not but I offer no opinion upon the subject. It may perhaps be shown that it is truly for the personal benefit and advantage of the Duke, though his executors, and that it could not be reduced without injury to him. There may be other defences on the merits, into which I do not enter. But on the point of title, which is alone before the Court, I am clearly of opinion that the pursuers ought to be sustained.

LORD GILLIES concurred.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am entirely of the same opinion. If the pursuers had not insisted in any of the conclusions of the action, the pursuers would have title to insist in them all ; and as the curator has only insisted in part the title of the pursuers to insist in the rest remains unimpaired.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am satisfied that the title must be sustained. A contingent interest is every day sustained in Court as a title to pursue. A remotest substitute heir of entail may raise a declarator of irritancy. An individual interest is merely contingent. And although the pursuers cease their brother the Duke, and so turn out not to be his executors, the mean-time, his executors presumptive, and entitled to challenge a reduction of the executry.

THE COURT sustained the title of Lady Strathallan and Lady Murray Macgregor, and remitted to Lord Cuninghame, as Lord President, to proceed with the cause.

A. MONYPENNY, W.S.—H. GRAHAM, W.S.—MACKENZIE and SHARPE, W.S.

WILLIAM BROOM, Pursuer.—Whigham.

No. 240

ADAM ANDERSON and JAMES HAIR, Defenders.—Maitland.

May 23, 183

Broom v.

Anderson.

Process—Reduction—Decree.—Reduction an incompetent mode of reviewing interlocutors of an inferior court disposing of the cause and allowing expenses, expenses not having been modified and decerned for, and the decree not having extracted.

THE defenders Anderson and Hair presented a petition to the Dean of May 23, 1831, of the burgh of Sanquhar, complaining of some operations of the pursuer Broom, whereby a certain water-course was diverted into their property, and praying for an inspection of the same by a court of burgesses. Appearance having been entered for Broom, the Dean of Guild summoned a court or jury of burgesses who, after hearing evidence ex parte, and viewing the premises, returned a verdict finding Broom not entitled so to divert the water-course. To this verdict the Dean interposed his authority and thereafter pronounced an interlocutor ordaining Broom, within a certain time, to direct the water in dispute into its former course, finding him liable in the expenses of process, and allowing an account thereof to be lodged. This order being disregarded, the Dean pronounced another interlocutor granting warrant to and authorizing Anderson and Hair to do the necessary steps for turning the water-course, finding Broom liable to these parties in the expense to be necessarily incurred by them in doing, and allowing a particular account thereof to be lodged. Before the expenses referred to in these interlocutors had been modified and decerned for, and while the judgment was still unextracted, Broom brought the present action against Anderson and Hair concluding to have the interlocutors and whole proceedings above-mentioned reduced upon legal grounds of law.

2<sup>D</sup> DIVISION

Ld. Cockburn

F.

The production having been satisfied without objection, it was pleaded, in defence, that the action was incompetent, in respect the interlocutors in question were not final; the expenses awarded against Broom having been modified and decerned for, and the decree not having extracted.

The Lord Ordinary “sustained the defence of incompetency,” and dismissed the action, finding the pursuer liable in expenses.*

NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary proceeds entirely on the principle of the case Keith against Keith, as reported in the Faculty Collection. The objection as to the defences, is, that the case is not final in the inferior court. But on this, the decree, if extractable, has not been extracted, a fact which, in the present case, the Court noticed and decided on, though not brought forward by the pursuer.—The Lord Ordinary thinks it right to state that the doctrine in Coutts has been found to operate very extensively, and that being strongly objected to at the bar, a case on the point is now in the First Division.”

No. 241.

JAMES M'FARLANE, Pursuer.—D. F. Hope—A. M'.
JOHN FISHER, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—&

Trust—Stat. 1696, c. 25—Proof.—1. In a declarator of trust to 1696, c. 25, is applicable, it is competent to prove trust by writing in the hand of the party importing an acknowledgment or admission of trust, without a formal back-bond of trust.—2. Evidence which held sufficient to prove title to property, the titles to which were taken wholly in name of one person, is held to the extent of a half in trust.—3. Opinion intimated, that in a declarator of trust it is not necessary to prove the constitution of a trust at the time of the proof of an emerging trust will support a conclusion for declarator of trust.

May 23, 1837. In the year 1800, certain subjects in the neighbourhood of Glasgow were disposed absolutely by one King to the defender Fisher. The name of the subjects was made up. Thereafter Fisher granted to the pursuer M'Farlane, and a lease of the same subjects was entered into between them on the footing of their being joint-proprietors. In 1835 Fisher raised action against Fisher, setting forth that the subjects were in 1800 by himself and Fisher jointly, and the purchase money then paid, advanced by them equally; that the same were granted to Fisher, and the rights and titles taken in his name for behoof of both parties, as joint and equal proprietors; and the court have it found and declared that the disposition, &c., was a trust for the use and behoof of himself and M'Farlane, as joint and assignees, or at least was held in trust to the extent of one-half.

2d Division.
Ld. Moncreiff.
T.

w to the partnership in 1803, and that the subsequent administration of up to the date of the action had been as of a joint-property, and offered to and produced, in proof of the property having been joint, a variety of writings under the hand of Fisher. Of this description were bills in part payment of the price of the subjects dated in 1801, and signed by the parties jointly, but which on the back bore the marking "as by John Fisher;" the contract of copartnery between M'Farlane and Fisher in 1803, being a probative writ under the hands of both, describing them as "proprietors of the field and ground," &c., in question in which character they bound themselves and their heirs to grant a lease of it; a "statement" of sums paid by the parties "with regard to the field" down to December, 1807, which was made up by Fisher, and countersigned by M'Farlane's docquet upon it; certain vouchers and receipts under the hand of Fisher connected with the administration of the property, and a declaration of it to have been joint; a joint engagement in 1809 for repairs on the property; and, lastly, certain letters in 1824 and of other dates, signed by Fisher, expressly recognising the right of M'Farlane as a joint-proprietor.

Fisher, in defence, denying generally the pursuer's averments, alleged, that the subjects were purchased, and the bills for the price retired by himself; that he had exercised a right of property in them throughout, and had been recognised as the proprietor in the charges for public works and otherwise; that it had been proposed in 1802 that M'Farlane should purchase a half of it, but he had never done so, which explained the clause in the contract of copartnery; and he pleaded,—as the summons set forth, that the subjects in question were acquired by Fisher, and that the lease to the same taken in his name "in trust and for behoof of himself and the pursuer as joint and equal proprietors," and concluded for declaration of trust, and as this statement of trust was contradicted by the titles, and denied by Fisher, it was not competent, in terms of the statute, c. 25, to prove the same, except by a declaration or back-bond of the pursuer, "lawfully subscribed" by the person alleged to be the trustee, or by reference to his oath.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the concluding note: *—"Finds that it is sufficiently established scripto of the

---

* Unless it is to be held to be the effect of the decision in the case of Duguid v. Wight, March 2, 1797, that nothing but an express and formal back-bond declaration of trust can be admitted to prove a case of trust or joint property, the Lord Ordinary must be of opinion, that the pursuer's averment of trust, to the effect of the property being held for the joint benefit, and at the joint risk of the parties, is fully proved in this case. But he understands the doctrine of that case, as expressed in the judgments, to go no farther than this, that under the statute, c. 25, to qualify the effect of a written title, can only be proved scripto vel jura- mento of the party, and that no parole evidence is admissible; and so it appears to

of the field and ground,' &c., and in that character they bind themselves heirs to grant a lease of it. 2. The bills granted for the price, which bills of the parties, are the writs of the defender. The markings on them, at least in the material part of them, have plainly been made at a very late period, and if so, they militate against the defender. 3. That of the sums paid by the parties, 'with regard to the field,' down to 20 1807, which is not denied to have been made up by the defender with docquet upon it, may be taken as the mutual writ of the parties; and if it is correct in the particulars or not, it necessarily assumes that the joint. 4. Such of the docquets upon the vouchers enumerated in No. I. to the Record, as are expressed in the terms quoted in Cond. Art. 8th one half of the within from James M'Farlane. JOHN FISHER—or in other terms, are good evidence by the defender's writ that he dealt with I a joint proprietor. The others may afford real evidence, but cannot be taken as the defender's writ to the same effect. 5. The joint receipts for rents, &c. Art. 10 of Condescendence, are clearly good evidence, and direct to the effect. The holograph statement of rents, &c. to 1815, shows that all the parties were charged as on a joint property. 6. The joint engagement, May 2 1808, is a direct mutual writ to the same effect. 7. The defender's letter of 16th May, 1808, bears again—'You (M'Farlane) have agreed to sell part of the field, if I would sell mine.' How can this be explained other than as a distinct recognition of the right of the pursuer as actually a joint proprietor. 8. The defender's letter to Gibbie (Art. 21 of Cond.) who had nothing to do with the contract of copartnership, expressly assumes the same thing. 9. This is also very material. 10. The joint receipt for rents, &c. is still stronger. 11. It may be a question, whether the books of C. Co. are to be taken as the defender's writ, seeing that he was not on the books, but, by the contract, was appointed to keep the books. But at any rate the fact proved by them is admitted in the Answer to Cond. Art. 1 in those books the parties were uniformly treated as joint proprietors. 12. The defender's letter (Cond. Art. 25), though somewhat equivocal, is clearly admissible, and, in connexion with the other documents, is conclusive.

"There is a good deal more referred to in the Condescendence, which evidence, may be very important. The Lord Ordinary has only attended to the writs of the defender; and they appear to him der and pursuer : Therefore, finds, decerns and declares in terms No. 241 st or declaratory conclusion of the libel ; but before further May 23, 18 ppoints the cause to be enrolled : Finds the defender liable in M'Farlane and remits the account, when lodged, to the auditor to be taxed." Fisher.

reclaimed, contending in support of his note, that this was a of trust, to which the Act 1696, c. 25, was applicable, and yet to the statement in the summons, there was no trust originally d in Fisher's person, nor was there any evidence thereof; that had been assigned, as in other cases of declarator of trust, for on of a trust, and the evidence adduced was insufficient to prove ce; <sup>1</sup> that this evidence, furnishing merely matter of inference, f that character and description which the Act required; that the ought to be such as to fall under the category of "a declaration ond of trust," and at all events should distinctly import a trust; <sup>2</sup> thing more than the writ of party had been intended by the sta-expression "writ or oath of party" would have been used, as ase in those statutes where this mode of proof was pointed out tent.

it was answered, that the action was relevantly laid as a decla-rust, and the subsistence of a trust, from the very commence-the transaction, was proved by the evidence; that, admitting lence of facts and circumstances to be insufficient, the writ of der importing an acknowledgment or admission of trust, was t to a declaration of trust, and all which the statute required, ; evident from the case of Duggan, and the other cases referred the form of the document was of no importance, if granted with to the transaction in question, and the pieces of evidence n in the present case formed an express acknowledgment, and d evidence of a trust.

USTICE-CLERK.—I can see no ground for objecting to the principle of Ordinary's interlocutor. Keeping in view the preamble of the statute the entrusting of persons without any declaration or back-bond of trust from the person entrusted, is the occasion of fraud, &c., we must give traction to the enacting clauses. I am of opinion that the words, "deere. There is no need in this case for parole evidence. The writs of or instruct a joint property as actually existing, and nothing else; and effect of such evidence cannot be done away by a mere gratuitous of which there is not the least trace in any of the writings or acts of the m v. Wight, March 2, 1797 (M. 12761); Mackay v. Ambrose, June 4, , VII. 699); Lyon v. Reid, May 25, 1830 (ante, VIII. 789); Taylor

---

 t, Nov. 14, 1833 (ante, XII. 39).

supra.

this construction then to the Act, I have to look to the proof of what has been adduced in this case. Laying out of view the evidence of fact and circumstances, I think there are writings under the hand of the defender which show what was actum et tractatum between the parties, and the subject in question was made over to the pursuer.

LORD MEDWYN.—Although I differ from the chair in the result which has been arrived at, yet I entirely agree as to the law and the construction of the Act of 1696, and shall add nothing more on that point. We must attend to the facts and its conclusions. This is a declarator of trust, the original title taken to the defender, and also the charter of confirmation. I have no case where the titles were made out so differently from the allegations of the parties, and no motive attempted to be assigned for such a proceeding. In Duggan v. Wight, the motive was, that the pursuer, being a Roman Catholic, was incapable of holding the property in his own person, and it was the object to have the titles made up in the name of the defender. So in Mackay v. Ambrose, Lyon v. Reid, and Taylor v. Cranford, and in Macdonald v. Beaton.<sup>1</sup> Again, in all the cases I have seen, is it property or a debt the usual question; but here, the question is between the fact of a trust and the defence of Fisher. I think none of the documents founded on inconsistent. They admit of an interpretation confirming the statement of the pursuer (His Lordship here referred to the documents alluded to in the Lord Ordinary's note). I cannot, therefore, concur with the Lord Ordinary in treating this as a common declarator of trust, no motive being assigned, and all the documents explainable on the statement of the defender; and I think this action should have been dismissed, reserving to the pursuer to bring another action.

LORD GLENLEE.—I cannot see any solid ground for differing from the Lord Ordinary. If it were necessary in every declarator of trust to prove the ascertained, that the Act 1696 had only in view the case of deeds intended to be in trust, and that proof of facts and circumstances might be adduced to establish a trust, arising as in the case of Spreul, noticed by Kilkerran.<sup>1</sup> May 23, 1824, Ker v. Hotchkiss. The doctrine has been held to be going too far, and is now rejected. In the late case of Taylor v. Crauford, you have it found that, if there is proof by writing in the defender's own hand, you may have a trust emerging declared. Here the defender only says, that there was no trust ab origine; but was there none afterwards? In 1803, when a contract of copartnership was entered into, and a list of the subjects granted by the pursuer and defender, was there not a trust? See the defender's own letter in 1824, in which he declares his readiness to settle when matters are settled; and this must be connected with the contract of copartnership in 1803, which contains an acknowledgment under the defender's hand and of the pursuer being a joint-proprietor. Upon the whole, it is impossible not to be satisfied that, whether there was originally a trust or not, there is established an incidental trust to the extent of one-half of the property. If the wording of the libel had only said it is, instead of it was, a trust, all would have been right. I think, however, there is sufficient evidence for holding that it both was a trust. I am not sure that the Lord Ordinary is right as to some of the other pieces of evidence, particularly as to the bills; but I concur in the judgment, and think it would be too much to hold that, because there may not have been a trust ab initio, we ought to dismiss the action, reserving to the pursuer a new one to have the subsequent contract or trust declared.

D. MEADOWBANK.—We are agreed as to the law of the case, and in holding that there must be some writing under the hand of the defender indicative of a trust. The only question, therefore, is, whether there be sufficient written evidence indicating this party's understanding that the subject was held, to the extent of one-half, in trust? I think there is sufficient evidence of such an understanding, and that, even from the first, the subject was acquired with the intention of being held in trust.

THE COURT accordingly adhered, finding additional expenses.

JAMES STUART, S.S.C.—ALEX. NAIRNE, S.S.C.—Agents.

MISS ESSEX KER, Pursuer.—Robertson.

MES HOTCHKISS, W.S. and OTHERS, Defenders.—D. F. Hope—Thomson—Urquhart. No. 24

cess—Issue—Reduction—Writ.—1. In a reduction of a bond, on the ground, inter alia, of the bond having been impetrated from one of the grantees who was in a state of blindness, and without it having been read over to him, the court held as to the alleged impetration which held not such as to infer reduction.

<sup>1</sup> July 16, 1741, Kilkerran v. Trust.

docquet being in 1820, when the sum at the debit of General Ker was upwards of £10,000. In 1821, the firm of Hotchkis and Co. dissolved, it being arranged that the General's debt, which was then owing, should remain with Hotchkis.

Thereafter General Ker and his son Walter Ker granted their bill, payable at 12 months, for the amount due at the time of the dissolution upwards of £14,000. This acceptance was renewed five times during the succeeding years, Hotchkis continuing to retain General Ker's law-agency till his death in 1824, when it devolved on the firm of Hotchkis and Meiklejohn, of which firm the defender Hotchkis, who was his father, was a partner.

In April, 1832, the sum due to Hotchkis by General Ker was £14,720. Some time prior to that date, his son, Thomas Ker, an attorney in Newcastle, had entered upon a negotiation with Hotchkis, being held out in letters from the General as authorised for him, with the view of endeavouring, on the part of his father, a settlement of the debt. He proposed, as the only way of settling it, that Hotchkis should take a bond signed by his father, his brother, or himself, stipulating to pay such a sum as might be agreed to by General Ker, or any of his family, should succeed to the dukedom of Roxburgh, they being the next heirs after the present Duke of Roxburgh, then a minor. This proposal having been agreed to, a bill was granted in April, 1832, by General Ker and his sons, Walter and Thomas Ker, whereby, on the narrative that the accounts between General Ker and Hotchkis having been balanced and docqueted, the debt above-mentioned was due, and that the said Hotchkis was entitled to receive the same, a bond was granted by General Ker and his sons, Walter and Thomas Ker, in favour of Hotchkis, for the sum of £14,720, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, from the date of the docqueting of the accounts, till payment.

, to which place General Ker, being then advanced in years, No. 242.
 he express purpose of signing it from his residence at East May 23, 1837 Northumberland. The deed was also subscribed by the other Ker v.
 and was duly delivered at Edinburgh. Hotchkis.

g after the date of granting the bond, General Ker raised inst James Hotchkis, as representing his father, and Tytler, to have the whole accounts between himself and the late firm s and Tytler opened up and examined, and the balance ascercount and reckoning.

Ker died in December, 1833, and his daughter, Miss Essex sted in his stead as pursuer of the process of count and reckon-after Hotchkis assigned the bond for an onerous consideration 1 Hotchkis of South Wales.

sex Ker then brought an action, as General Ker's daughter for confirmed, against the same defenders, to have the bond 0, the docquets or settlements of accounts, and the bill above-reduced on various grounds,—1mo, As irregular and infor-That the bond was not the deed of the granters—that it was over or explained to General Ker—that at the alleged date was advanced in years, and laboured under a defect in his eye-h prevented him from being able to read writing—that he was ignorant of its nature, and that the import of the deed was never o him in any manner of way; 3tio, That the bond was vitiated ing clause, and that as it stands it was not the original bond to have been signed by the ex facie granters; 4to, That the cancelled, the signatures of the witnesses having been torn , That it was not delivered; 6to, That it proceeded on a tive, inasmuch as it declared that the accounts between the l the vouchers thereof, had been fully examined, while in point y had not, and also that states of intromissions with the funds Ker had never been exhibited.

tated as a preliminary defence against the action that John the true holder of the bond in question, had not been called;
 efence having been sustained, a supplementary action was inst him accordingly, which was conjoined with the former.
 ence to the 1st, 3d, and 4th reasons of reduction, the pursuer's ence contained certain general averments in regard to the exand form of the bond. With reference to the 2d reason the were as follows:—That General Ker was in a state of blind-e date of signing the bond—that it was not read over to him signed it—that he was incapable of reading writing—that he ware of its object and effect—that it was unfairly impetrated but how, when, or by whom, was not averred. With reference reason of reduction, it was stated that General Ker's agents lered accounts of their intromissions nor exhibited accounts of done in regard to the granting of the bond as done with the of General Ker, and also from insisting in the other conclusions settlements of accounts which took place between the defender and General Ker.

The pursuer on the other hand contended, that she was entitled to the process of count and reckoning above-mentioned conjoined present process, and the statements in the one made part of and that as in a question of relevancy and with reference to the of reduction, as well as to the others, she was entitled to have remitted to the jury roll, with a view to framing a general conclusion on his averments.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor (12, 1836), adding the subjoined note: *—" Having con-

---

* "It is evidently the duty of the Lord Ordinary to consider the reduction on its own proper merits. There might be matters con-stated in the count and reckoning which would not be barred by a But the question, whether the bond, the bill, and the docquets called be reduced, must depend on the practical relevancy of the grounds insisted on; and the material point is, whether the bond is challenged legal grounds.

"The summons in the first, third, and fourth reasons, and the conclusion in the 12th article, contain certain vague general averments in imperbond, in respect of its form and external state. But these were not before the Lord Ordinary, nor has any warrant been applied for, for the original deed from the record, without which no judgment could given on any such points.

"The Lord Ordinary, therefore, must understand the case to stand

d in these conjoined processes of reduction, and having heard No. 242.
curators thereon, and made avizandum, and particularly con-

May 23, 1831
Ker v.
Hotchkiss.

the respondent's statement, to which the pursuer makes no answers denials (to which the Lord Ordinary specially called her attention before the case was closed): But she admits the authenticity of the letters, the contents of which in a great measure compose those statements.

In the state of the case, the pursuer's counsel demands a general issue, Whether the deed is not the deed of General Ker, or some issue on his averments. As the case is really special, the Lord Ordinary thinks that this demand raises a question of very serious importance.

The documents produced, and admitted to be genuine, establish beyond all doubt that the negotiations for a settlement by such a transaction was conducted by a part of General Ker by his son, Mr Thomas Collingwood Ker, then solicitor in Newcastle; while a letter of General Ker himself (said to be a copy of the handwriting of Mrs Ker), on the 29th January, 1832, renders it scarcely possible to have a serious doubt that he had fully authorized his son to act for him, and was fully informed of the arrangement which had been proposed; and the pursuer further demonstrate, that every thing connected with the signing of the deed of General Ker was left in the hands of Mr Thomas Collingwood Ker, both as agent and his agent being at the time in Edinburgh.

The deed bears to have been signed by General Ker at Newcastle, not at East Edinburgh. The 8th article of the condescendence would lead one to infer. At Newcastle, in the house or office of Mr Thomas C. Ker, it is signed by General Ker, in the presence of Masterton, a clerk of Thomas Ker, and another agent of General Ker; and both Thomas Ker and his next brother, Walter Foster, are parties-obligants in it. The subsequent delivery of it at Edinburgh is made under the hand of Thomas Collingwood Ker.

It is not a question about a testamentary deed. It relates to a bond containing a most onerous contract. It was no doubt of a very peculiar kind. An obligation for a large sum of money, contingent on an event of rather a very doubtful occurrence: But, in consideration of it, the defender condescends to discharge absolutely and unconditionally a debt exceeding £14,000, and is bound to be just in the body of the bond; and on the faith of it, such a deed was executed, and most deliberately delivered and accepted, and is still to be observed then, 1st, That the pursuer, who is bound to make an averment for reduction, does not aver in her condescendence that Mr Thomas Ker was not authorized to act as his father's agent. She has indeed put a positive denial against the pointed and precise statement of the defenders supported by documents, of which it would be trifling, and has been impossible, to deny the effect. But surely this will not do. She has put the negative, that this is not the deed of General Ker; and, if it be the question to show, that a person who acted as if he were authorized, was not the pursuer bound to make a positive averment on that point. Observe, 2d, That it is admitted that General Ker himself did sign the deed, 3d, That it is not averred that the subscribing witnesses did not see him sign, 4th, That it is not averred that the defenders knew that General Ker signed, or that the deed had not been read to him.

The case, therefore, is reduced to a very simple issue of law. The terms of the contract having been settled between the authorized agents of two parties, the counter deeds to be granted fully revised by them, a bond to be given by the pursuer, and sent to his authorized agent, living at a distance of 120 miles from the place where it was to be duly executed. Under his exclusive management it is duly executed, and, in the presence of the party himself, professedly subscribing it. It is delivered, and the counter deed, also duly executed, is delivered and accepted. Is it releasing such a bond, by the granter or his representative, to say that, without the possession of his faculties, he had become blind, and that the deed was not read over to him? Unfair dealing is out of the case. For unfair dealing, it could only be by his own son and agent, deceiving at the same time. It is not said, that Mr Thomas Collingwood Ker, of Mr Hotchkiss, or was influenced by him to deceive General Ker.

Miss Essex Ker reclaimed against both these interlocutors

“ Now, the law of such a case seems to the Lord Ordinary to Blindness is no statutory objection. The judgment of the House of Fife case, July 17, 1823, Shaw, l. p. 495, decided that, by itself at objection at all. It was a question, then, whether, without proof of being read, it could be sustained, though the only ground on which it was reduced, was its being found upon the verdict, that the witnesses had not seen the granter subscribe, or heard him acknowledge his subscription. But in the case of a settlement. The party challenging was not the granter, or his general representative, having the same interest, but a particular heir excluded by the deed. The case of a bond, conducted solely under the superintendence of the granter's own agent, must stand on very different principles. Being confessedly of sound mind, if being blind, he relies on his agent's accuracy, is he to be allowed to break his obligation, deceiving the other party, that agent did not read the deed to him, or he did not require it to be read? It seems to the Lord Ordinary that blindness can have no such privilege. It appears to be in assuming that blindness of itself makes a nullity. It is not so. All that has ever been held is, that in the case of a private deed, a blind man may execute or not as he pleases, blindness and evidence of the deed not being read, may raise a presumption of his not knowing its contents. But in the Lord Ordinary's apprehension, avail against a third party contract, to whom a deed, confessedly signed by the obligant, under the hand of his own agent, has been delivered for the stipulated value received in consideration. In the case of a settlement, the House of Lords held that reading over was dispensable, and that there might be other means by which the granter was made fully aware of the contents of the deed; and, in a case like this, the Lord Ordinary conceives that the presumption of knowledge is as

RD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I can see no reason for altering these interlocutors. No. 242. joining the two processes is out of the question. As to the main point of as Ker having authority from General Ker to act as he did in the negotiation Mr Hotchkis in regard to the bond, I can have no doubt whatever, looking neral Ker's letters and the whole conduct of the parties. I hold it to be im-le, under the pursuer's statement as to the impetration of the bond, that any could be framed to go to the jury. On the other points I agree with the Ordinary.

RD GLENLEE.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and taking the whole to-
 ; I am not sure that I have ever seen the equal of this reduction.

EDS MEADOWBANK and MEDWYN having concurred,

THE COURT unanimously adhered, finding additional expenses.

J. J. FRASER, W.S.—HOTCHKIS and MEIKLEJOHN, W.S.—Agents.

RUSSEL and AITKEN, Advocators.—Patton.

No. 243.

ALEXANDER M'FARLANE, Respondent.—Whigham.

Principal and Agent.—Held, in conformity with the case of King v. Shirra, ry 23, 1827, that an action against a bank-agent, in his character as such, on nt of a bank transaction, in which the agent was alleged to have acted wrong-was incompetently laid.

THE advocates, Russel and Aitken, writers in Falkirk, presented a on to the Sheriff of Stirlingshire, against the respondent, M'Far-agent for the Bank of Scotland there, setting forth that the late rt Scott, for whose trustees they were agents, had prior to his death anted various bills with the different banks in Falkirk, some ick were current at the time of his death; that his trustees instruct-e petitioners to pay these bills as they became due, on condition ceiving indorsations without recourse on the indorser; that they dingly paid several of the bills, receiving indorsations to the fol-g effect:—"Pay Messrs Russel and Aitken, writers, Falkirk, ehoo of the trustees of Mr Robert Scott, without recourse;" an acceptance by one Smith, due 26th February, 1835, had been anted by Scott with M'Farlane, as agent for the Bank of Scot-and on 2d March thereafter, the petitioners sent one of their ap-ices (Kincaid) to the office of the bank with money for this bill, and press request that it should be indorsed as above; that Kincaid paid money accordingly to M'Farlane, who, however, instead of indg the bill as required, put on it the following receipt:—"Received nt from Messrs Russel and Aitken, Falkirk, (Signed) A. M'FAR-Agent;" and that on Kincaid returning the bill to them, the peti-A wrote to M'Farlane, stating the money to have been sent to him as gent, and complaining of his not having indorsed the bill as re-
 The petition then prayed to have M'Farlane ordained forthwith

May 23, 1837

2D DIVISION.
 Ld. Moncreiff

an illegal and improper act done by the respondent individuals, and the conclusions were properly directed against him, and there was no necessity for calling as parties to the proceeding, others who had no share in the illegal act, and neither were, or could be presumed to be, participants in the transaction.

2. M'Farlane was not entitled to relieve himself of the obligation to indorse the bill, or to return the money, or to shift the responsibility for his breach of that obligation on the Bank of Scotland, upon the pretence that he acted not in his private character, but as the agent of the bank, because the money never was truly paid to the bank, but was taken possession of by M'Farlane contrary to the terms of his engagement as bank-agent; and besides, the bank had no interest to object to the indorsation of the bill without recourse.

3. The true facts upon which the case of King v. Shirra was decided, and upon the strength of which decision the Sheriff rests his judgment in this case, having been different in their nature and character from those occurring in the present case, that decision ought not to be followed in judgment in this case.<sup>1</sup>

M'Farlane in answer repeated his plea already stated, that the action of the petition, the action was incompetently laid.

The Lord Ordinary, in respect of the decision in the case of King v. Shirra, repelled the reasons of advocacy, and remitted simpliciter, and in the interlocutor the subjoined note.*

---

<sup>1</sup> Ante, V. 231 (new ed. 215).

Russel and Aitken reclaimed.

No. 243.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I cannot find any thing like a principle for distinguishing this from the case of King and Shirra, and would not disturb that decision. It is of infinite importance, when a point of this kind is once decided, that it should not depart from it. May 24, 1837 Brewster v.
Marquis of Abercorn.

LORD MEDWYN.—There is no rule in jurisprudence better founded than this; therefore I am for adhering to the interlocutor, though I should not have concurred in the principle of the decision referred to.

LORD GLENLEE.—The petition might possibly have been so laid as to infer a conclusion against the party, not merely as bank-agent, but otherwise. As it is laid, however, against him in his character of bank-agent, the advocates' letter to Farlane expressly setting forth that the money had been sent to him as such, I consider it altogether safer to adhere.

LORD MEADOWBANK concurred.

THE COURT accordingly adhered, finding additional expenses.

JAMES BURN, W.S.—DAVIDSON and SYME, W.S.—Agents.

REV. PATRICK BREWSTER, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—J. M. Bell.

No. 244.

MARQUIS of ABERCORN and OTHERS (Heritors of the Abbey Parish of Paisley), Defenders.—Whigham—Forman.

Church—Stipend—Augmentation.—Circumstances in which the Court refused to award any augmentation to the second minister of a collegiate charge.

THE Abbey parish of Paisley is in length about nine miles, and in breadth about three miles. There are above 100 heritors in the parish, May 24, 1837
1st Division
Teind Court

Respondent, he individually should be the proper party. He is unable however to distinguish the case from that of King v. Shirra, and he is of opinion that uniformity of decision in such a question is of chief importance. It is true that the payment of the money in King's case, was a long time before the action was brought. The act complained of was in the mode of its application; and if it could be legally held in that case that the money was paid to the bank, it is not easy to deny that it was so in the present case. It is not in the record that Kincaid, the young man intrusted by the advocates, refused to pay the money, or to leave it on getting the receipt given, or that he did at the time demand it back, when he saw that the receipt was not in the terms required; and though this may have arisen from a moral oversight, in reliance that the indorsation would be in conformity to the law laid before the respondent, yet, rightly or wrongly, the money was paid or delivered to the bank in the person of their agent. In fact, the only evidence the advocates have of the payment, is that very receipt, and the respondent's admission qualified as it is. The Lord Ordinary is, therefore, unable to find any difference in principle between this case and that of King, though he has considered it carefully, thinking the plea rather of a captious nature; and if the Court thought it necessary to go into it in King's case, even where it had not been stated in the House of Lords, he does not see how he can reject it in a case in which it was stated as a very first.

neither manse nor glebe, one-half payable in meal, the other in barley, with the sum of £15, for communion elements. In 1834 the minister, in a process of augmentation, was allowed a stipend of 10 chalders, and £20 for communion elements.

In 1836, the second minister raised a process of augmentation, in which it appeared that the two glebes of the first minister yielded respectively, the annual sums of £47, 10s. 5d., and £19, 1s. It appeared that, pursuant to the act of Assembly, 25th May, 1836, considerable portions of the Abbey parish had been allotted to several churches, and declared parts of the new parishes, erected by the act, spiritualia, around these respective churches. One of these was situated at the town of Johnston, and included that town; the population of this new parish was 6500. The church within this parish had been erected as a chapel of ease in 1794, and an ordained minister had constantly officiated there since that time. The other two were newly built. One, called Lavern Church, had a stipend assigned to it, containing 2300 souls. This parish included parts of three old parishes, and that which belonged to the Abbey parish contained a population of about 1800. The other new church was within the Abbey parish, but in St George's parish, in the town of Paisley. In allocating a district round this church, a suburb called Charleston, which was part of the Abbey parish, was thrown into the newly erected parish. That suburb contained a population of about 1700. The distance between the extremities of the old parish was diminished by the erection of these spiritual parishes.

In support of his claim for augmentation, the pursuer insisted ion to the stipend of 22 chalders ; and on the precedents afforded by No. 244.

previous judgments of the Court of Teinds in dealing with former cases of augmentation in this same parish.

May 25, 1837.

Irving v. Irving.

the defenders, who were the principal heritors of the parish, answered that, since the last augmentation, the erection of three spiritual parishes had been made, which relieved the ministers of the Abbey church, of a population amounting to 12,300 ; and that, as the Court could not award a manse or glebe to a second minister, they could not take the manse and glebe of the first minister at all into view in making a suitable provision for the second minister, because if they did so, that would be tantamount to making an allowance to the second minister in lieu of manse and glebe, which the Court had no right to do, directly or indirectly.

The Court were of opinion that no augmentation ought to be awarded.
Their Lordships did not deliver opinions at length, but were understood to be influenced, partly by the circumstance that an ample stipend was already provided to the second minister, and partly by the erection of many spiritual parishes, which diminished the duties of the cure.
On this last subject, the view of the Court was understood to be, that, so long as the churches, built in any parish, were mere chapels of ease, having a spiritual parish erected around them (as they were prior to the act of Parliament, 25th May, 1833), their Lordships had not been in the habit of taking these chapels of ease into account, in awarding an augmentation ; but, since the erection of spiritual parishes under that act, the duties of the minister of the old parish were in so far circumscribed and diminished ; and this formed a circumstance to which the Court ought to give regard.

Their Lordships, therefore, refused to award any augmentation.

MACLEAN and HAMILTON, W.S.—J. NAIRNE, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN IRVING and MANDATARY, Pursuers.—Brodie.

No. 245.

vs CHARLOTTE HYSLOP, or IRVING, Defenders.—D. F. Hope—T. Grahame.

De to Pursue—Approbate and Reprobate—Service.—The pursuer and defender, a process of reduction, ultimately derived right to a heritable subject from a common author ; the defender was in possession ; assuming the common author to be in the right of the subject, and duly infeft therein, the pursuer had no right to insist ; but such assumption would have been contrary to the fact :— The pursuer was competent for the defender, though deriving right from the common author, to maintain possession, by founding on the defects in the common author's right, the effect of cutting off the pursuer's title to insist ; and judgment pronounced in favour of the defender.

his second son, deceased. This disposition contained an infest, and a procuratory of resignation. John Irving, junior, his father, and entered into possession of the subjects, but title. He died in 1825 without issue. Robert Irving, his next substitute in the disposition of John Irving, senior, did service before the bailies of Annan as "propinquior et legi of his deceased brother, John. He afterwards produced to the service, and the disposition of his father, John Irving, senior, and obtained an infestment from them, in July, 1825, which proceeded upon the procuratory of resignation contained in that of 1807. He afterwards entered into a postnuptial contract, he disposed these subjects to his wife, Mrs Hyslop or Irving, and failing issue of their marriage, he disposed the fee of one to John Irving, residing in Stanwix. The fee of the other was disposed to other nephews.

Robert Irving died in 1834, after having been in possession years, and his widow entered into possession of the subjects in her own right. In 1835, John Irving in Stanwix expedited a service before the bailies of Annan, as nearest and lawful heir of provision John Irving, junior, under the disposition and settlement of his father, senior, in 1807. He then raised an action against Mrs Hyslop for reducing her liferent right, removing her from the subjects, calling on her to account for the rents drawn by her during the session.

He pleaded that, under the disposition of John Irving, senior, the infestments were made in favour of his son, John Irving, junior, and his wife, Mrs Hyslop, and that the subjects were conveyed to them in full payment of the debt due to him by them.

es to him ; and, therefore, his disposition was altogether ineffectual, No. 245.
 it was open to the pursuer to take up the subjects in the disposition, May 26, 1887 is service as heir of provision under that deed. He also pleaded, Irving v. as all these results flowed from the assumption that the title of John Irving.
 ng, senior, was a good feudal title to the subjects, and as both parties red their right from him, as their common author, the pursuer must ail in any question with the defender, because it was not competent er to state any objection to the title of her own author, John Irving, or. He denied that the liferent disposition of this subject was ous, and alleged that the defender was otherwise sufficiently prod for by her husband.

lrs Hyslop pleaded in defence, that the pursuer neither had a better
 , nor could make up a better title, than her own. It was true, that, er right flowed from the disposition of John Irving, senior, she could repudiate it ; but, while founding upon it, she was entitled to point that, from its nature, it was such that the pursuer could not extract it the means of making up a preferable title to her own. But as Irving, senior, was never infest, it followed that the pursuer, even by ig up the procuratory in his disposition, could not make an effectual nation ; and as John Irving, senior, was a natural son, having no al right of succession in him, and as no means had been specified by h a valid procuratory of resignation of these subjects could be taken y the pursuer, he was unable to make up an effectual feudal title.
 therefore, could not insist in a reduction of the defender's title.
 , separately, as the defender's deceased husband, Robert Irving, had in possession for above three years, and the pursuer's pleas, if ssful, would show he had possessed on apparency, then the pursuer, assing him by, and serving to a remoter ancestor, would become
 , under 1695, c. 24, for the onerous deeds of Robert Irving, ding the liferent provision of these subjects for the support of his w, the defender. So that he had no interest to cut down her life-upon one ground, when he was bound to give full effect to it on er.

ie Lord Ordinary (Cockburn) “ repelled the objection to the title rsue ; repelled the defences against the reductive conclusions of the ions, and reduced in terms of this conclusion, and decerned ; found he pursuer, having served himself heir to a remoter ancestor, passing obert Irving, the deceased husband of the defender, who was more three years in possession on apparency, is liable for the onerous debts eeds of the said Robert Irving ; found that this liability may affect ther two conclusions for removing and for payment,—therefore, answer as to these conclusions, remitted to inquire and as to the circumstances from which the onerosity or non-onerosity deed by Robert Irving, in favour of the defender, is to be inferred, into the interlocutor of 27th June, 1830, assented and decerned, and found her entitled to expenses." *

* " NOTE —As the Lord Ordinary has taken a somewhat different case from that argued by either party, he would have directed additional facts to be lodged, had not this been a miserable subject between poor people ill able to bear the expense of the protracted proceedings which have taken place. As they will, of course, reclaim to the Court at any rate, the resources of the parties should be reserved for the Inner-House. The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor will be corrected, if he is wrong. The title is at once understood from the following explanation of the title.

" The subjects in dispute are situated within the burgh of Annaburgh.

" For many years prior to 1807, they had been possessed by John Irving, senior, as proprietor. That person's right appears to have been possession was infeft; and, indeed, there does not appear to have been any premises in favour of any body for nearly a century prior to that afterwards adverted to. Nothing, however, turns on this, as neither party object to the title of John Irving, senior, through whom both parties question derive right.

" John Irving, senior, in 1807, executed a disposition and deed whereby he conveyed the subjects to his fourth son, John Irving, heirs of his body; whom failing, to Robert Irving, his third son, heirs of his body; whom failing, to his second son William (father of the present pursuer) heirs of his body.

" John Irving, senior, died soon after 1807. He was succeeded by his son, John Irving, junior, who possessed for a considerable period alone. He died uninfest, and without issue.

" He was succeeded by the defender's husband, Robert Irving, the maker of the settlement, and it is on the supposed ineptness of this action is founded.

" It will be observed that Robert was the heir of conquest of

The pursuer reclaimed.

No. 245

LORD MACKENZIE.—I think the action should be dismissed, as the pursuer has no title nor merits to found on. I do not exactly follow the view of the Lord Ordinary.
May 25, 1883
Irving v. Irving.

the bailies, in virtue of the procuratory in the settlement of 1807, and got new infestment, more burgi, on 22d July, 1825. Thereafter Robert executed the settlement on his wife in liferent, now under reduction.

“Now the whole case, on the part of the pursuer, is founded on the supposed aptness of this title. It is said that Robert’s service was inept, as ‘legitimus et propinquior hæres’;—that he should have been served heir of provision: and never having been so, it is argued that the present case is identical with the noted precedent of Lord Cassilis and Sir Andrew Cathcart, when it was found that a general service as heir of line does not take up and transmit subjects which fell to be taken up by the party as heir of provision (Mor. p. 14,447).

“But there is a very material distinction between the cases. In the Cassilis case there was no title by infestment; the subjects, indeed, were held feu; and one of the arguments used by Sir Andrew Cathcart was, that there was no proper diligence of Earl David having any animus adeundi as to the subjects, which were ultimately found to belong to Sir Andrew.

“In the present case, however, Robert Irving did not stop with the service. He took that service, along with his father’s settlement, to the bailies of the shire—the proper judges of cognition—and got them to enter him on the exhibition of a special recital of the service and settlement. It appears at present to the Lord Ordinary that this was a valid infestment. It proceeded on competent diligence, detailed and set forth on the face of the instrument, that the substitution opened to the party to whom infestment was given by the bailie. For if John Irving, junior, died without issue, as was proved by Robert’s general service to him as nearest and lawful heir, then necessarily the succession opened to Robert, next substitute in his father’s settlement.<sup>1</sup> This is all the Court laid down as indispensable in the noted case of Glen and Peacock in 1826, which has been frequently referred to in questions of title.

“No doubt the service of Robert Irving would have been more correct if it had described him as heir of provision of John Irving, senior, seeing that John Irving, senior, never was infest. But Robert’s service as heir in general of John Irving, senior, was the proper evidence to show that that person had died without any issue, and so to give Robert a right to demand infestment from the bailies in these burgage subjects under the substitution in his father’s settlement.

This being the case, it deserves notice in this question, that the bailies of a shire have more extensive powers in giving infestment than notaries in feudal districts. The bailies are Judges of Cognition; and, if they do not proceed in a regular way, or on very insufficient or incompetent evidence, they are entitled to receive resignations and to give new infestments in burgage subjects. The Lord Ordinary thinks it would be a great stretch to reject the sasine in favour of Robert Irving in the present instance, as given improperly or erroneously by the bailies.

“Neither is this giving any undue effect to Robert’s service, such as it was. If Robert expedie a proper service as heir of provision, it would have carried the title to the procuratory and precept in his father’s deed, without sasine. But when a general service to his brother was followed by sasine under the substitution in his own favour in the old man’s settlement, that title is supposed to be now unchallengeable by any party.

In order to illustrate this question, the parties may refer to the case of Houston, inherent disposition to his wife, the defender; and, after his death, pretending to come after him in the order of succession to the tenement to cut down his title. But he has not a better right, of any sort, than the right of Robert Irving, the defender's husband. Even if he were to reduce the defender's title, he would just be obliged to go and beg the bailies of the burgh, without instructing any lawful right to him more than the deceased Robert Irving possessed. The pursuer does not think the true right to the tenement was in Robert Irving while he lived; the ultimate right was in him, considering the length of undisturbed possession his predecessors had enjoyed; the formal right also, so far as there was any right at all, was in him. How then can the pursuer, who does not connect himself with any ancestor who was infeft, raise a reduction? He has no title, and not even the shadow of a title, to do so.

<sup>1</sup> 4 Shaw, p. 742.

LORD GILLIES.—I do not adopt all the views of the Lord Ordinary. I think the liferent right of the defender cannot be set aside at the instance of this pursuer. It is true that her title is not unimpeachable, but it is no better. They are both in pari casu. If it be clear that the defender had no title to grant her the liferent right, it is equally clear that she has no title to set it aside.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I concur in the view taken by Lord McKim. I adopt the findings in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, which should be recalled. The onus does not lie on the defender to prove that the title was onerous; it is to be presumed onerous until the pursuer proves otherwise.

LORD PRESIDENT concurred in thinking that the pursuer's title was weaker than the defender's.

---

4th February, 1784 (Mor. p. 14,420), where there were two burgages, one of which was found inent and the other contained. It appears to the

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, repelled the reasons of reduction, so far as regarded the provision in favour of the wife, and found expenses due to her.

No. 245.
—
May 25, 1837
Browning v.
Hamilton.

W. BELL, S.S.C.—W. MARTIN, S.S.C.—Agents.

IN BROWNING and MATTHEW BROWNING, Pursuers.—D. F. Hope— No. 246.
J. Anderson.

JAMES HAMILTON and OTHERS (Browning's Trustees), Defenders—
Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Russell.

JAMES WATT, Defender.—Neaves.

Marriage Contract—Provision to Children—Jus Crediti—Trust.—1. A father, infest in certain lands, became a party to the marriage contract of his son, J. B. junior, and disposed these lands to him under various real burdens; the son also undertook several personal obligations; the contract contained this clause:—"If there be a son or sons, or son and daughter, or sons and daughters of this marriage, alive at the dissolution thereof, in that event the said J. B. junior, obliges and his aforesaid to give and dispose to that son, or these sons, the just and equal part of the said lands of Benthall, to take effect immediately after his own decease, so to do no deed in hurt or prejudice of this obligation, only he is to have liberty to divide the same amongst the children of this marriage, if more than one son, as they shall think fit, or his children deserve:" this obligation was not recited in the contract of J. B. junior; he contracted debts to a greater amount apparently than the value of the estate, and granted real securities over it, after which he conveyed it to the trustees, with powers of sale, for the purpose of satisfying his debts, "so far as the value of the property will go:" the trustees sold the lands, and afterwards J. B. junior, predeceased his wife, leaving two sons, who raised a reduction of the heritable securities, and of the sale of the estate, contending that their right to one part of the lands, under the contract of marriage, could not be defeated by any act of their father, his creditors, or his trustees, and insisting in ulterior conclusions of total liability against the trustees:—Held that the pursuers were entitled to enforce any bonds or other deeds executed gratuitously or fraudulently by their father in prejudice of the obligation in the marriage contract, but not to compete with the onerous creditors of their father, or to challenge his onerous deeds. 2. Question whether, in special circumstances, a private sale by trustees to one of their number, was not reducible.

JAMES BROWNING, son of John Browning, senior, of Benthall, was married May 25, 1837. 1837, to Margaret Hamilton, daughter of Robert Hamilton, tenant in 1st Division. Cockburn. Benthall. John Browning, senior, who was infest in the lands of Benthall, became a party to the contract of marriage, which bore that he, John Browning, and under the reservations and burdens after-mentioned, gives, sells, and disposes to and in favour of the said John Browning, younger, his heirs and assignees whatsoever, absolutely, heritably, and irredeemably, all and hail the lands of Benthall, &c." "In which lands of Benthall the said John Browning, elder, binds himself to infest and sease his son, and his aforesaid, heritably and irredeemably, and the said Margaret Hamilton in a liferent of £5 sterling yearly, &c." "But this contract is granted and accepted with and under the burden of paying to the said John Browning, elder, as after-said, and the said John Brown-as good, as the said John Browning younger, as him and his foresaids" to pay to his wife Margaret Hamilton vived him, the sum of £5 annually, during her lifetime; he ged him and his foresaids" to give her a dwelling-house, & remained a widow. A provision followed as to the distri moveables in the event of no child surviving the dissolution of The next clause was in these terms:—"Item, if there sons, or son and daughter, or sons and daughters of this alive at the dissolution thereof, in that event the said John younger, obliges him and his aforesaid to give and dispon or these sons, the just and equal half of the said lands of take effect immediately after his own decease, and to do no or prejudice of this obligation, only he is to have liberty same amongst the children of this marriage, if more than o shall think fit, or his children deserve."

The two next clauses obliged John Browning, younger, (s saids, if there were no son of the marriage, to pay certain su to the daughter or daughters "procreate of this marriage an decease," with liberty to him, if there were more than one divide the sum among them as he thought fit; "and the term of these respective sums, to be at the first term of Whitsun tinmas happening after his decease."

These provisions were declared to be in full of all the le the wife and children, and Margaret Hamilton bound herself sterling, in name of tocher good.

A precept of sasine was inserted, "to the effect the said.

mother and survivor of them; "item of the sum of 90 pounds Scots ly to Mrs Ann Fleming, during her life, and reserving to the said Browning, elder," during his life, the portion of lands already specified in the disposition as so reserved.

No. 246
May 25, 1811
Browning v
Hamilton.

Under the precept in this contract, John Browning, younger, was in- in 1778. Prior to this, the 4000 merks had been paid. The sasine recited the burdens of the annuity of £90 Scots, the liferent of £5 to John Browning, senior, and his wife or the survivor, and the liferent of £5, the house, &c. to Margaret Hamilton, who was Mrs John Browning, or; and also the portions of land reserved by John Browning, senior, himself. It did not recite any of the provisions in favour of the children. Two sons were born of the marriage, John (tertius) and Matthew, who survived the dissolution of it. It was not dissolved till 1832, at which John Browning died and left his widow surviving.

From 1777 till 1827, Browning, above designed as John Browning, younger, continued to exercise all the rights of an ordinary fee-simple proprietor of Benthall. He contracted a considerable amount of debts, in 1818 he granted a heritable bond and disposition for £800; in 1819, another security for £1000; in 1820, a third security to James Watt of Flakefield, for £1000; in 1823, a fourth security for £800; and a fifth security, which, like the third, was to the said James Watt, for £1200; and subsequently, a sixth security for £3600. These were respectively made real securities by infestment, and their total amount was £6020. In 1827, Browning executed a conveyance, with powers of sale, of his whole estate, heritable and moveable, including the lands of Benthall and also the separate lands of Lairdfad, to James Hamilton and others, "in trust, for the purpose of settling the granter's affairs, and paying the debts due by him, so far as the price thereby disposed would go." James Watt, already mentioned, who was a connexion of Browning, was one of these trustees. Under this disposition the trustees were infest. After repeated advertisements, the lands were finally sold in 1828, conform to minute of sale, by James Watt, by private bargain, at a price of £3650 for Benthall, and £200 for Lairdfad. John Browning, tertius, signed this minute of sale, in which he was designed as acting "for himself and the family." He was, at the time, held a mandate from his father to act for him. His father afterwards, in 1829, expressly ratified the sale, upon obtaining certain stipulations from Watt, as to the liferent of part of the houses, &c. The price of Lairdfad was higher, to the extent of £200, than the highest price of a previous sale by public roup which had proved abortive. The price of Benthall was less, to the extent of £350, than the upset price at the roup, but no offer had been made at that upset price. The minute of sale contained a power of redemption of the lands of Lairdfad, by John Browning, tertius, at any time within five years. Before concluding the sale, a meeting of the creditors of Browning was called by advertisement in the Gazette, and in two local newspapers,

...and also for determining that the pursuers' father was bound to dispose of one half of the lands of Benthall to them; that the defenders and successors in the subjects, were personally liable to the obligation, and should be ordained to dispose one half of the lands to the pursuers accordingly; but, in the event of the subsisting obligation being irreducible, it should be declared that the pursuers were liable under the marriage contract for the price of half the lands of the defenders, as his trustees, or jointly and severally as individuals, to be ordained to pay over the full value of half of the lands of the defenders at the time of their father's death, or otherwise to pay its amount in damages for their father's breach of contract in putting away the whole of the lands of Benthall.

Several pleas of a special nature were raised, involving whether the pursuers had homologated the sale to Watt, and from challenging it; and whether Browning's ratification of 1829 had been fairly obtained. Independently of special pleas, the pursuers contended (1), that under the provision in their favour in the contract 1777, their father was onerously bound to dispose of one half of the lands of Benthall to them. This obligation formed a condition of the title under which he himself acquired and held the lands, rendering him a mere fiduciary as to one half of the fee; and that neither he nor his creditors could defeat the pursuers' right to that half. The pursuers were therefore entitled to set aside the deeds under which the lands had been conveyed to Watt, and to obtain a conveyance from the defenders of one half of the lands of Benthall. (2) At least, the obligation in the contract was such as to bind the pursuers' father, immediately on the dissolution of his marriage, to dispose of one half of the lands to his son.

led to call on their father's trustees (who were aware of his obligation No. 246.
 or the marriage-contract, and had nevertheless disposed away the May 25, 183
 s), to make good to them the value of one half of the lands which Browning v.
 , as representing the pursuers' father, and acting for him, had thus Hamilton.
 away from the pursuers.

The defenders concurred in pleading, 1. That the provision relative to half of the lands of Benthall, did not enter the infestment of owning, the pursuers' father, or in any way qualify his right of fee, could not affect onerous third parties contracting on the faith of the deeds, in which no such provision appeared. But Browning had covered lands with real burdens, to an amount greatly exceeding their value ; unless the pursuers could reduce these securities, they had no interest

And as the infestment of the trustees in 1827 was for behoof of creditors exceeding the value of the estate, the pursuers had no right in a deed to cut down such infestment, unless they possessed not merely a jus crediti, but a right of preference which they had failed to instruct. 2. Browning's obligation only was to dispose one half of the lands "to take effect immediately after his own decease." This could not raise up a jus crediti, but merely gave a spes successionis, to children nascituri. And, according to the true construction of this clause, there was no obligation to execute such a deed, immediately on the dissolution of the marriage, or if the mother had predeceased ; but, in the case which actually happened, the father predeceased, so that no species of obligation could, according to any construction, have been purified against the father in his lifetime. And it was the more evident that nothing could vest in the pursuers during their father's life, as he had reserved right to divide the half of the lands, in any proportions which he chose ; and he might have exercised that right at any period of his life. 3. As the pursuers had no jus crediti, they could not challenge the sale to Watt, which had been ratified by their father. But even if the pursuers had a jus crediti, and could therefore call their father's trustees to account, in a count and reckoning, that was not the nature of this action. In regard to the personal conclusion against the trustees, to pay half the value of Benthall, the pursuers' interest in Benthall was less than nothing before the trust was granted ; and, at any rate, the trustees were liable in nothing in a just count and reckoning for their intromissions, and no such action had yet been brought against them.

In regard to the sale to Watt, the defenders pleaded that it could not be reduced as it had been ratified by Browning, the truster, and by the creditors ; and that the pursuers had no title or interest to challenge the sale, as they were postponed to the onerous creditors of Browning, who had ratified the sale, and whose debts far exceeded the value of the lands. Special pleas were also urged as to alleged homologation of the sale by the pursuers, especially John Browning.

No. 246.

May 25, 1837.
Browning v.
Hamilton.

The Lord Ordinary "sustained the defence and decerned; and found the pursuers liable

The pursuers reclaimed.

LORD GALLIES.—I think the pursuers have a marriage, to the effect of not being liable to be disponees of their father. But their right must be proved.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I take a view similar to satisfied that the pursuers are either preferable, compete with the onerous creditors of their father, event of their mother's predeceasing their father (the pursuers could have compelled their father to in their favour; in any terms whatever. And fide among his sons at pleasure, which power he might alone would imply that he could not have been so in favour of his sons, so as to vest their respective chose. And farther, the same inference might, provision in favour of daughters.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I think the pursuers do compete with onerous creditors of their father. I the pursuers, that their father was under any obligation to vest any right in the pursuers. Certainly competition with the gratuitous disponees of the interlocutor under review should be modified; but than that. The pursuers are creditors among her creditors, of their father.

LORD PRESIDENT was understood to concur.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor

* "NOTE.—The conclusion for reduction of conclusion for the half of the lands of Benthall, the pursuers have a jus crediti under their father's conclusion for reduction of the trust-deed proceeds they are not only creditors, but preferable creditors. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that they are neither the question with the bona fide onerous creditors of circumstances, he dealt with as having any jus that, without being creditors, and merely under that, be entitled to challenge the bonds as gratuitous. The challenge actually brought, solely on the ground—and if it be true that this character does not merit—as maintained at least before the Lord Ordinary are groundless.

"The only other claim is for reduction of the ground that he, being a trustee, could not purchase. The Lord Ordinary considers the application of the facts of the case. The sale was consented to and by the pursuers." entitled to challenge any bonds or other deeds executed gratuitously, or fraudulently, by the late John Browning, their father, in prejudice of the obligation in favour of the children of the marriage, expressed in the contract of marriage between him and Margaret Hamilton their mother; but that they are not in the right under the said contract, to compete with the onerous creditors of their father, or to challenge his onerous deeds; therefore remit to the Lord Ordinary, to inquire and proceed farther in the cause, as to him shall seem proper, and reserve all questions of expenses.”

No. 241
May 25, 18
Maxwell v.
Wylie.

WOTHERSPOON and MACK, W.S.—M'LEAN and HAMILTON, W.S.—CAMPBELL and M'DOWALL, W.S.—Agents.

DAVID MAXWELL and OTHERS (Thomson Mure's Trustees), Raisers. No. 247
RS ADAM WYLIE, and DAVID PARK (Executor-creditor of Adam Wylie), Claimants,—Ivory.

DAVID WYLIE, and HIS TRUSTEES, Claimants.—D. F. Hope—Ivory.
HENRY M'CULLOCH, Claimant.—Maitland.

DAVID MAXWELL and OTHERS (Trustees of David M'Culloch), Claimants.—Maitland.

MOWAT or CAMERON and HUSBAND, Claimants.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Moir.

MRS WYLIE or CROSBIE and HUSBAND, Claimants.—M'Neill.

MRS WATSON, and MRS JOHN M'CULLOCH, Claimants.—Penney.

Life and Liferent—Legacy—Succession—Vesting.—1. A testator conveyed his estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, who were directed to pay over the annual proceeds of it to his three unmarried sisters, and the survivor of them; and “after the death of the said three sisters, and the survivor of them, and, in case, of the termination of their respective liferents, I hereby direct my said trustees to make payment to my six nephews and nieces after named, or to the survivor of such of them as may have deceased before that time, of the several sums of money hereinafter specified; viz. to A. W. the sum of £1500 sterling, &c.; and the said six legacies shall bear interest from the first term, after the termination of the liferent hereby provided to my three sisters, and the survivor of them;” A. W. was the testator, and two of the sisters, but predeceased the third sister, and left issue:—Held that the legacy of £1500 had vested in him on the death of the testator, and was effectually assignable by him, during his life, or attachable by the executor-creditor, after his death.—Observed by the Lord Ordinary, that, when a legacy is left to one person in liferent, and another in fee, the subsistence of the liferent does not prevent the fee from vesting at the death of the testator; the rule appears to be the same when a fund is conveyed by the testator to trustees, with directions to pay the interest to one person during his life, and the principal to another, at the liferenter's decease. At least, this is the rule when there is no destination of the fee to an individual simply, and no ulterior substitutions are required to keep the trust up for the benefit of those substitutes.”

A testator had three unmarried sisters who survived him, and three married sisters who predeceased him leaving issue; he directed his trustees (under a settlement of his whole estate containing powers of sale), to pay the annual proceeds to the three unmarried sisters, and the survivor of them; “after the death of my said sisters, and the survivor of them,” the trustees were directed to pay certain legacies, and, “after the payment of the said several legacies” they were directed “to pay

14. Corehouses. Marion, were unmarried, the other three, Mrs M'Culloch, M Mrs Wylie, were married, and each had issue. In 1810 A Mure executed a disposition and settlement conveying to trust estate heritable and moveable, then belonging to him, or belong to him at his death. The primary purposes of the to certain provisions to his wife, and to his children if he shou
The settlement then proceeded:—"5to, In the event o no lawful children procreated of my body in my present marriage, the whole of the remainder of my estate and e conveyed shall be liferented by my three unmarried si Margaret, and Marion Thomson, or by such of them as existence at the time, in equal proportions; and I hereby rize, and empower my trustees to pay over to my said thr the survivors or survivor of them, during their respective l proceeds of the remainder of my said estate and effects." 6 was left to each of the trustees. "7mo, And lastly, after my said three sisters before named, and the survivor of course, of the termination of their respective liferents, I l and authorize my said trustees to make payment to my six nieces hereinafter named, or to the child or children of such may have deceased before that time, of the several sums of inafter specified, viz.: to John M'Culloch, manufacturer and Janet M'Culloch, his sister, wife of Robert Watson banker in Glasgow, the sum of £1500 sterling each; 1 Mowat, daughter of John Mowat, Esquire, of Shetland, n William Cameron, lieutenant of the 78th regiment of foot, e my said trustees to pay over the whole residue and remainder No. 247.

aid estate and effects hereby conveyed, if any be, to the said t, David, and Adam Wylie, by equal portions," &c.

May 25, 188

Maxwell v.

Wylie.

use here succeeded, the terms of which raised a question of con-of a special nature; the clause declared, that if one or more of the should succeed "as heirs" to a part of the lands of Ingliston, ere at that time vested in trustees for behoof of the testator's bromuel Thomson, who was fatuous, then such legatee was to forfeit, eat, his legacy. The terms of this provision are not quoted, as it wards held by the Court not to apply to the case which happened uel Thomson predeceasing Adam Mure Thomson, so that the Ingliston were not taken up by any party "as heirs" of Samuel n, but fell under the disposition of Adam Thomson Mure's own ent.

May 1st, 1822, Adam Thomson Mure executed this addition or to his settlement:—"I do hereby, in virtue of the reserved nd faculty contained in the foregoing trust-disposition and settle-recall the same in so far as it directs and authorizes my trustees named to pay over the whole residue and remainder of my estate cts thereby conveyed, if any be, to the therein designed Margaret, and William Wylie, by equal portions, to the same effect as if ad been no such clause as to the destination of the residue inserted aid trust-disposition and settlement; and in lieu and place of the stination of the said residue and remainder hereby recalled, I he said residue and remainder of my estate and effects to be paid my said trustees to the heirs who by law would have been entit-ucceed to my heritable property, had no settlement thereof been d by me; declaring that nothing herein contained shall hurt or he liferent right created by the said trust-right disposition and ent in favour of my three sisters therein named, and the survivor n Thomson Mure died soon afterwards. He was survived by his nmarried sisters, Mary, Margaret, and Marion. The representa-his deceased married sisters were, respectively, David M'Culloch houskie, son of Mrs M'Culloch; Mrs Mowat or Cameron, wife ain Cameron, and only child of Mrs Mowat; and David Wylie, -Clerk of Justiciary, eldest son of Mrs Wylie.
."

823, Adam Wylie, the testator's nephew, married, and, by ante-
-contract, he assigned to trustees for behoof of his wife and himself, ent allenarly, and the children of the marriage in fee, the above-ed legacy of £1500, under burden of the liferent of the testator's Adam Wylie died without issue in 1832, having been predeceased of the testator's sisters, but survived by the third. He was inand after his death, David Park confirmed to him as executor-legacy, as having vested in Adam Wylie. They pleaded the legacy of £1500 was burdened with a liferent to the testator, the fee was directly and unconditionally bequeathed, and it vested on the testator's death. The other parties, interested in the trust-estate, answered, that the trustees were only to hold the legacy "of the survivor of the three sisters of the testator" of £1500, to each nephew or niece specified, "or to any of such of them as may have deceased before that time;" and that it was to bear interest only from the first term after the death of the last surviving sister. Thus the legacy was made payable only to such niece as survived the whole sisters, or to the issue of such niece surviving. And as Adam Wylie died without issue, before anything had vested in him.

2. The second question related to the period when the residue of the estate had vested; and to the number of shares it was to be divided.

One of the unmarried sisters, Mary, had executed a settlement of David M'Culloch, in June 1822, conveying to him her whole interest under the settlement of Adam Thomson Mure, except a reserved right. This was, after her death, conveyed by David M'Culloch to trustees, along with his right and interest as the representative of M'Culloch a deceased sister of the testator. The other two sisters, Margaret and Marion, in Oct. 1823, had similarly conveyed their whole right and interest under the settlement to Henry M'Culloch of David M'Culloch. In these circumstances it was pleaded by Adam Wylie, and Mrs Cameron, who each represented a married

They were expressly restricted to a liferent by the original settlement, and the intention of the codicil was not to enlarge their right in any, or to superinduce, incongruously, a partial right of fee, upon their right of liferent; but merely to direct a different distribution of the among the heirs, ab intestato, who should be existing when the period of distribution arrived. Each of these three parties should therefore have an equal share of the residue.

Henry M'Culloch, and the trustees of David M'Culloch, answered, though a liferent was provided to the unmarried sisters, the fee was suspended any where during their life, but vested immediately after the testator's death, in the parties to whom it was conveyed. In the settlement these had been Margaret, David, and Adam Wylie; but for the codicil, the fee would have vested in them so soon as they died. But the codicil revoked that provision, and, in lieu of it, left the residue to be paid to the testator's heirs, in heritage, ab intestato. Had there been no settlement, these heirs were his three unmarried daughters and the representatives of the three married sisters, each taking an eighth-share. Henry M'Culloch was therefore entitled to two sixths in right of Mary, and Margaret Thomson Mure, under their settlement in his favour; and the trust-dispones of David M'Culloch were in right of two sixth-shares, one, in virtue of the conveyance from Thomson Mure, one of the unmarried sisters, and the other in right of the deceased Mrs M'Culloch, one of the married sisters, whose representative David M'Culloch was.

Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—" Finds that the legacy to Adam Wylie, who survived the truster, did not lapse in consequence of his predeceasing one of the truster's three sisters, to whom a liferent of the residue of the trust-estate was provided: Finds that the heirs, who by law would have been entitled to succeed to the heritable property, had no settlement thereof been executed, are his sisters Mary, Margaret, and Marion, who survived him, and the representatives of Nicholas, Jean, and Janet, who predeceased him. Finds that the fee of the residue of the truster's estate, in terms of the settlement of 1st May, 1822, is divisible into six shares accordingly; that it is due to those persons at the death of the truster, as it would have been to them in the character of heirs-portioners if he had made no settlement, and that it is now payable to them, or to their heirs and assigns: Finds that the clause in the trust-deed (by which it is provided, that any of the legatees should succeed as heirs to the lands and estate of John, Knockbrex, and others, the property of the truster's brother, Thomson, the person so succeeding, should have no right to the residue of the trust-estate provided to them by the truster) did not take effect, in respect that Samuel Thomson was survived by the truster, who succeeded to the said lands as heir, and who has disposed of them by the settlement, which has given rise to this process: Therefore, prefers the vid Wylie and his trustees reclaimed.

No. 247.

THE PRESIDENT.—I think the interlocutor is right. I see no difficulty in May 25, 1831 Maxwell v. Wylie.
ing it to have been the testator's intention to give his unmarried sisters a liferent, and at the same time, a partial fee, of his estate. It appears to have his primary object to secure their comfort, which he did by providing the t of his whole estate to them. And he finally directed the fee of the residue estate to be shared among his heirs, ab intestato, which had the effect of one-sixth share to each of his unmarried sisters, along with each of the rs or nieces representing his married sisters who were all deceased.

THE GILLIES.—I do not think that any construction of this settlement can be d, which shall be free of doubts; but I concur in the view of it which has aken by the Lord Ordinary. The testator first of all bestowed the liferent of he intended to dispose of his property in a manner so unusual and capricious.

stance, it is alleged, can be found, in which a person making a settlement d his trustee to give a liferent of his estate to certain individuals, and a share fee likewise to each, both existing at the period of his death. On this point, rd Ordinary has felt considerable doubt. It is by no means improbable, e truster intended that his sisters should have no interest in his estate beyond a t, or rather, it is certain that this was his intention in 1810, when he executed st-deed. By that deed, he conferred upon them the liferent alone, and gave to his niece, Margaret Wylie, and his nephews, David and Adam Wylie. clause had remained unrevoked, it is thought that the fee of the residue have vested in his niece and nephews from the date of the truster's death, bly to the decision in the case of Wallace just referred to, which ruled the Marjoribanks, 18th February, 1836, and several intermediate cases. These ns have not been shaken by Mowbray v. Scougall, and others, 9th July, for in that case there was a series of substitutions to various persons in lifend others in fee, after the extinction of the first liferents, which raised the ce, that the truster meant the trust to subsist after the first liferents had l, and consequently, that the fee was to remain in the trustees for the benefit substitutes after that event had taken place. That presumption appears to rd Ordinary to have run through all the cases which seem at first sight to be d to the judgment in the case of Wallace.

at in the present case, by the original deed 1810, the liferent was provided truster's sisters, and the fee to the three persons named, with no substitution ot even to the heirs of those fiars.

here seems no reason, therefore, to doubt, that if this settlement 1810 had ed unaltered, the three Wylies would have been vested with the fee from the f the testator. But the codicil of 1st May, 1822, simply recalls the bequest fee to these three individuals, and provides it to the heirs-at-law, who would en entitled to succeed if he had made no settlement, that is, to his six heirs-ers at the period of his death, who come exactly into the place of those tim fiars in the original settlement, and in whom the fee must vest in the anner, and to the same effect, as it would have vested in those nominatim fiars.
may be conjectured, indeed, that when the truster provided the fee to his ortioners by the codicil 1822, he meant to except the three heirs-portioners n he had previously bestowed the liferent. But there is no declaration ed or clearly implied to that effect. There is no inconsistency in a liferenter also a fiar of part of the subject liferented; and the Lord Ordinary is inclined h, that in the construction, not of a privileged instrument like a testament, a disposition of heritage, executed in regular form, and in liege poustie, it he, it is reasonable to interpret that exception on the strength of conjecture

LORD MACKENZIE.—I cannot say that I am of a different opinion to the Lord Ordinary. The words of the codicil which direct the sum to be paid over by my said trustees "to the heirs, ab intestato, create an obligation, as the period of payment is expressly postponed until after the death of the last unmarried sister. But still the substance of the settlement is to be paid among his heirs at law; his heirs ab intestato. Now his own survivors are not only among that class, equally with the representative of the deceased, but there can be no doubt that the testator was fully aware of this, and that he meant to bestow a share of the residue on each of his survivors equally with the representatives of his deceased sisters; at least if it is conjectured that he had any other meaning, he has used words which are plain and too express to allow the Court to act on that conjecture.

LORD COREHOUSE intimated that he retained the opinion which was expressed in the interlocutor under review.

THE COURT adhered.

J. GORDON, W.S.—D. WELSH, W.S.—J. MCCLELLAN, S.S.C.—A.

No. 248.     EATON, HAMMOND, and Sons, Pursuers.—D. F. HOPKINS, — MACGREGOR'S EXECUTORS, Defenders.—Sol.—Gen. RUTHERFORD, — son—Graham—Bell—Penney.

Bill of Exchange—Executors.—1. Parties with whom a bill (when renewed) was discounted, allowed it to lie over for some months unpaid, without any communication had with the acceptors; at the expiration of the term, the drawer, who truly had no claim of debt against the acceptors, they gave powers to Mr Archibald Campbell of London for managing the affairs. In October, 1827, Campbell, who was at the same time an executor of the late Sir Alexander Campbell, represented to these parties, without foundation, that a debt of £3,300 was due by the trust-estate of Sir Alexander's executors, and he accordingly drew a bill upon them for this sum, which was accepted by them. The bill was in the following tenor:—

No. 248

May 25, 1828
Eaton v. Macgregor's Executors.

“ London, 16th October, 1827.

,300.

Six months after date, pay to me or my order, the sum of three and three hundred pounds sterling, on account of the estate of the Major-General Alexander Murray Macgregor.

(Signed)

“ ARCHD. CAMPBELL,

“ One of the Executors of the late

“ Sir Alex. Campbell.”

the Right Honble. Lady C. Murray Macgregor, the Earl of Caithness, and Sir Evan John Murray Macgregor, Bart., the executors of the said Major-General Alexander Murray Macgregor.”

(Accepted, payable at No. 6, Regent Street, London.)

(Signed) CHARLOTTE MURRAY MACGREGOR.
CAITHNESS.

E. J. MURRAY MACGREGOR.”

This bill was discounted by Campbell with the pursuers, Eaton, Hammond, and Sons, bankers in Newmarket. When it became due the pursuers agreed to take a renewal, payable at four months, which on coming due was again retired by a new bill for the same sum accepted before. This last bill became due on 20th February, 1829, but was not paid, being allowed to lie over on promises of payment by Campbell, and no communication on the subject was made to the acceptors. In May, 1830, Campbell wrote as follows to Eaton, Hammond, and Sons:—“ I do most fully excuse you for what you write to me, and in consequence thereof, I will write most pressing to Edinburgh, to demand of me forthwith part of the £12,000 now due to me by the executors of General Macgregor and Sir Evan Macgregor, the whole of which I ought to have received when I went down there in October 1829, and if you will send me the bill you hold, accepted by these executors, and discharged (I mean without your indorsement or discharge), I will hand it down to my agent there, who, I think, will be able to of obtaining delivery of the bill from Sir Alexander Cam which was appointed by decret of that court to be m this was accordingly done.

Thereafter Eaton, Hammond, and Sons, having thus sion of the bill, raised action against General Macgreg acceptors, for payment of the contents.

In defence against this action it was pleaded—

1. The pursuers have, as in a question with the d legal possession and right to sue on the bill in question.
document from Campbell by simple delivery, no com subject having ever taken place between the pursuer and the possession of the bill thus acquired through sole ground of the pursuers' title to sue, it seems to would lose the lawful possession of the bill, as well as thereon, also by and through the act of Campbell, and by redelivery of the bill to that individual, and the tra debt operated thereby.

2. The pursuers never had any legal claim agains beyond what would have been competent to Campbell have, by their own laches and general conduct, now lost the defenders upon the bill in question.

3. The defenders having accepted the bill merely as the late General Macgregor, and not being in possessio try funds, no claim for the debt can be maintained again
To this it was answered—

1 The circumstances under which the pursuers parted

, or are alleged to have done, can relieve the defenders from No. 24 liability as acceptors.<sup>1</sup> acceptance by the defenders is in their individual characters ; May 25, 18 either as individuals, or as General Macgregor's executors, they Eaton v.

Macgregor's
Executors.
either case liable.<sup>2</sup>

Lord Ordinary decerned in terms of the libel, finding expenses added to his interlocutor the subjoined note : *—

Bar v. Southey, 1826, 1 Moody and Malkin, 14.

v. Morins, 2 Broderip and Bingham, 406 ; Thomson v. M'Lauchlan, 829, ante, VII. 787.

case might have been attended with difficulty, at least as to the personal the defenders, if the parties to the bill had really stood in no other rela-h other than appears on the face of that instrument ;—that is, if the ing merely one of Sir Alexander Campbell's executors, had truly in that equired and obtained the acceptance of General Murray Macgregor's satisfaction (or security) of a debt due by one of these estates to the t the drawer was not merely an executor of Sir Alexander Campbell—o the factor, commissioner, and confidential manager for Macgregor's nd it is manifest, from the letter of 22d October, 1827, and all the subrespondence, that it was truly in this last character, and not in the other, l was drawn by him, and accepted by his constituents. That letter is ct or degree an application for payment or security on the part of Sir Campbell's executors. It is solely and emphatically a confidential letter actor and manager of Macgregor's trustees to his constituents, on the ie trust, and their acceptance is required, not, in the first instance at least, or liquidate the debt due to Sir Alexander Campbell, but, in the most l distinct terms, to enable him, their factor, to raise money to carry on s of the trust. If money was raised upon it, therefore, by discounting k, and the proceeds actually paid over into the hands of the factor and er of these trustees, it is thought that there could be no more doubt of personal responsibility to the bank, than if the discount had been required oney paid over to themselves personally, and without the intervention it or representative whatever. Payment made to their agent, in short, ence of a mandate to him to raise money on their acceptance, is to all purposes payment to them, and if the drawer had had no connexion exander Campbell, but had drawn the bill in his individual character ees, in consequence of the arrangement proposed in the letter referred t supposed that, after the money was so raised, the defenders would een advised to dispute their personal liability, although they might have heir subscriptions (which they have not done here), the designation of General Murray Macgregor. The mandate to raise money on their though in that official character, was the most complete pledge that they had trust-funds wherewith to repay it ; and the fact that the actually taken by them, through their factor and agent, made them as r liable, personally, for such repayment, as they would have been for price of any article for which they had bargained with third parties, an account of the trust.

Does it make any difference that the drawer was actually one of Sir Campbell's executors, and drew the bill under that designation ?
the terms and plain object of the letter of 22d October, the Lord humbly of opinion that it does not. It is still manifest that the leading object in granting the bill was, not to pay the drawer a debt due as Sir Alexander's executor, but to enable him by discounting it, to

No. 248. Macgregor's executors reclaimed.

May 25, 1837.
 Eaton v.
 Macgregor's
 Executors.

The Court were clear that the Lord Ordinary raise money for the immediate use of the trustee in view the secondary object of vouching, or ultimately supposed to be due to the executors, but, at a time taken in payment of that debt. It was first of all raised upon it to be applied, it might be, in extinction also, of any others that might prove to be more accepted and sent to the drawer, that money in place, is quite enough for the pursuers, since, if discounting it with them, it seems quite impossible that he did any thing but what they expected, and that, because he did not apply it in paying off in other way, they should be excused from repaying the value on their mandate and credit. The Lord Ordinary that the main reason for drawing the bill as for Campbell's estate, was not to secure that debt the discount of the bill by connecting it with a re-appearing to give the additional security of the over and above that of the acceptors. There were executors by this way of proceeding, but in a quality those who had actually advanced the money, the acceptance in order that money might be raised conclusive against them.

" They maintain, indeed, in their case, that the bill was to be so raised, or that their bill was to be actually believed all along that it remained in the hands of Sir Alexander Campbell, and was retained by him supposed to be owing to those parties. The first question is, that, if the bill was actually discounted, and accepted, it is irrelevant in a question with the discounters, to account for such an avowment on the part of the drawer, and veracity are above all questions. But the executors misunderstood their instructions when they made themselves have forgotten the origin of the transaction, and the confidence in their commissioner, when they drew it. For it is palpably inconsistent with the explicit terms of the first bill for their acceptance, and not less so with the terms of its renewals. If the bill had been truly drawn for their debt to Sir Alexander's executors, there could be no reason for renewing it all along, so long as it was in their hands, they were undeniably acting in concert with the drawer, and it is inconceivable that it should not have been renewed when it came in for its payment. Instead of this, however, the first bill was near falling due, he applied to the drawer for renewal, in order to retire it, and is so anxious to get it off to Lord Cathness, before getting it into the hands of the acceptors, who was in his own neighbourhood, and in the hands before the 8th of April, in order to retire it before the 16th. The Lord Ordinary must say, that to suppose that any of the parties to this correspondence had the first bill was still in the hands of the drawer, and had been discounted with a third party. If the facts had been set forth in detail, it could not, in the more completely of that fact.

But then it is said that Campbell afterwards the merits, though without concurring in all the views contained in No. 248.

note; being of opinion that, had the question been between Campbell,

May 25, 1831
Eaton v.
Macgregor's
Executors.

ders as still the holder of those bills, and at last actually raised action at them in name of his brother executors in that character. Now, there is to be no doubt that he did in many respects deceive and impose upon his constituents. But in so far as concerns the statement in his subsequent letters, he was at those dates the holder of the bill in question, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that it imports any contradiction to what he conceives to have been the clear meaning of his former communications, or ought to have led the defenders to believe, even at those dates, that those bills had never been discounted. The and indeed the only consistent meaning of the latter statement was, not that he had not been originally discounted on their credit, but that he had since been obliged to advance his own funds to retire them; and this, accordingly, is what the defenders have themselves stated, and apparently proved, was precisely his position. He soon after gives in to them an account, in which he states, that he had advanced between £10,000 and £12,000 in advance for the trust-estate; and one of the items of that advance, alleged to have been made as their factor, and of which the bills on them to relieve him, is the amount of those bills.

If he had merely kept the bills in his hands as one of Sir Alexander Campbell's trustees, he might, indeed, have been a creditor of the trust in that capacity. He could never have stated this debt due to him in that character as an item of actual advances as factor, unless he had first paid to the executors the money raised by the discount, and afterwards retired the bills with his own. But it is quite certain that he never did any such thing,—the bills being to this day undischarged in the hands of the pursuers; and the defenders now maintain that they never supposed he had done so. It is very remarkable, indeed, not only that he never reported or exhibited any discharge from Sir Alexander's executors, or in any way pretended that their claim had been satisfied, but that from the very beginning, he never states them to be anxious for payment, or holds out their acquiescence as a ground for granting or renewing the bills. He first asks them as a condition of raising money for carrying on the business of the trust, and ultimately asks for payment in liquidation merely of the great balance which he alleges to be owing to himself individually, in consequence of his advances as factor. What probably meant the defenders to believe, and what (if they trusted to him) they must have believed, from his whole communications to have believed, was, that he had employed the proceeds of the discount in the other affairs of the trust, and afterwards retired the bills with his own money.

In a question between the acceptors and those who discounted on their credit, it is of no consequence that this was false; nor, in fact, would it have been of any consequence that he had made the defenders believe that this particular debt due to the executors had been paid off with the proceeds of the discount. The bankers who gave their money on the faith of the defenders' acceptance, must still be obliged to receive payment, however their agent may have misemployed that money, or whatever false account he may have given of its application.

His view of the true nature of the transaction disposes not only of the defenders' objection to a personal liability, but of almost all their other defences. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that there is no ground whatever for the plea of ratio debiti, and that nothing can be more extravagant than the attempt to apply to a case like the present, the rigorous, and by no means universal rule of law, that even an onerous acquirer of a bill may be liable to the exceptions coming against the drawer if he does not acquire it till after it is past due. The ground for maintaining such a doctrine here seems to be, that the pursuers had to take two renewals of the original bill, and are now suing on the last renewal, which bears date, of course, a considerable time after the first bill was due, and this, the defenders appear to think, is equivalent to their having taken the bill itself after it had remained so long dishonoured. It seems to be pursuers and Sir Alexander Campbell's executors, whereby they to allow the suit against the defenders to proceed in the name actually covenanted that the defenders should receive no notice or preferable claim upon their part to the contents of the bills as was founded. This, at first sight, has no doubt an unfavourable is plausibly represented as tending to persuade the defenders to no unsatisfied discounters in existence, and consequently of preventing such measures for their relief as might still have been as duly apprised of the fact.

" Upon farther consideration, however, the Lord Ordinary is was nothing in this arrangement which should deprive the pursuers to insist against the proper debtors for this just and onerous debt that the defenders may have suffered prejudice by the course although there is no evidence that they have actually so suffered. of the duty of the onerous holders of a bill to be watchful for the acceptors; and there are many ways in which they may incidentally interest, either by acting or abstaining from acting, without forfeiting right to recover from such acceptors. Provided they do not fraudulently, or knowingly adopt or abet the frauds of others, it is the course which a regard to their own interest may suggest; however in the result that a different course would have been more advantageous to the debtors. Now, there is not the slightest appearance either of negligence on the part of the pursuers in this case, any more than on that of Sir Alexander Campbell's executors, the only other parties to the agreement, and when duly attended to, seems fully to justify the course they pursued in presenting back the bill to the drawer, at his request, they probably should sue on it in their names; and it seems undeniable that they dealt with it for their interest, and quoad hoc, as their agent. But for other indorsement on it but that blank one, under which it had been presented to the pursuers, it was unfortunately in his power to fill up above the name of the executors of Sir Alexander Campbell, or indeed to present it to any other person. This power he seems accordingly to have exercised without the pursuers, and to have delivered over the bill (or rather, as it appears from the original bills which had been given up on receiving their release the pursuers, the parties in right of the bill, of their legal claim No. 248.

the defenders, acceptors thereof. In regard to the question of

May 25, 1835
Eaton v.
Macgregor's
Executors.

at all events, by mixing up their own competing claims to the sum in with the main question of the acceptors' obligation to pay, and therefore ly occurred, as a prudent and proper arrangement, to allow the suit n progress at the executors' instance to proceed, and to stipulate only question as to who should have the ultimate benefit of the expected ould be afterwards settled in a separate discussion. In all this, it appears ord Ordinary there was nothing culpable or savouring of fraud, neither e seem to have been any purpose of actual or positive concealment, but resolution not to compear as parties in the existing suit, nor to mix up ion of the executors' accountability to them for what they might recover bill, with that of the defenders' responsibility to its legal holders. By sement of the drawer, and the actual possession of the document, the had undoubtedly a legal title to demand payment and to discharge the ough they might ultimately be bound to account to the pursuers for the nd so far from seeking to dissemble or conceal the existence of such a is remarkable that it was openly brought forward in the Court of y by the pursuers at a very early stage of the executors' action against the , and in a suit to which Campbell, from whom their whole right was was regularly called as a party. If there were any good objections to the in the person of the executors, it is plain enough that this was unknown rsuers; and it is not alleged that they ever did any thing to embarrass ders in maintaining these objections. The Lord Ordinary must, however, hat the defenders take much too high a tone in now assuming, as a matter ty, the validity of these objections. They have advantage enough, no the present state of the case for taking this tone. For the pursuers, to e whole question is irrelevant, have no interest to complain of it; and the , whom alone it affects, are no parties to the present action. It is inaccurate, however, to ascribe the ultimate abandonment of the suit by ators, to their conviction of the justice of these objections, it being matter istration, from mere inspection of the dates, that this step was the result, necessary result, of the previous decision in the Chancery suit, by which e interest in the bill had been finally adjudicated to belong, not to those s, but to the pursuers. The date of that decision is 21st July, 1834, and ators' action is proposed to be abandoned for the first time, soon after the own of the Court of Session in November thereafter. The defenders' s to the executors' claim of debt may or may not be invincible. But, r, there has been as yet no judicial determination on the subject. The as not decided on its merits, but was withdrawn and abandoned because ers have been found to have no right to the bill on which alone it proceeded; not only quite open to them still to bring forward their claim in another t the defenders themselves seem to intimate, that steps have already been t that purpose.

this, however, is irrelevant to the merits of the present case. The e fact is that the defenders deliberately granted their acceptance for the of the drawer's raising money on it, and that the pursuers did give their n the credit of that acceptance. In these circumstances, it is thought have no valid defence against payment, except by clear proof, either of a agreement to release them from their obligation, or of some actual fraud onesty operating to their loss; and as the Lord Ordinary is of opinion e is no such proof, he cannot but repel the defences. Expenses seem to f course, more especially as the defenders have rested their case almost ly on an allegation which it is impossible to reconcile with the written of process."

Manse.—When a manse though “capable of being repaired” requires repairs to render it at all habitable, it is not incompetent to do what may be necessary to be done, whether by repairs or alterations, to render the manse sufficient and suitable to the circumstances and a competent residence for the Minister of the parish.”

May 25, 1837.

2d Division.
Ld. Moncreiff.
T.

THE parish of Symington, in the Presbytery of Biggar, Lanark, is of the yearly rental of £2,400. The whole of the manse is valued at £75, and the stipend of the minister is made up to £150 under the Small Livings Act. The population, according to the census of 1831 was 364, but was said now to have increased to 511. A new manse was built in 1790, at an expense of £222, 14s. 4d. The old materials of the former manse, estimated by the surveyors, have been worth £50, and it was accepted by the Presbytery on the terms of law.” In the year 1824 a washing-house was built, and repairs executed, costing in all about £50, but with the exception of these repairs appeared to have been made on the manse since 1834, the present incumbent, the charger, Mr M’Lean, was of the parish, on which occasion the heritors, with a view to put the manse in a proper condition for his residence, employed Mr James Buchanan, a burgh architect, to inspect it. Mr Angus accordingly inspected it and returned a report to the heritors specifying the repairs which he considered necessary to render it a fit residence for the minister. The heritors, however, resolved not to adopt his report, but to give an addition of a kitchen and a room above, and employed a tradesman (Mr Robertson) to give them a specification of the cost of such addition, being of an inferior description to those tery to inspect the manse and report, he presented a copy of the report No. 2 prepared for the heritors, to which he adhered. This report stated the May 25, manse to consist of,—on the ground-floor, of which the ceiling was 8 feet Carmich 7 inches in height—two rooms of 15 feet 9 by 13 feet 4, and 13 feet 2 by M'Lean.

 10 feet 3, respectively, a kitchen and back kitchen, and two closets with borrowed lights about 6 feet square ;—on the bedroom floor, to which the access was by a wheeling timber stair—four rooms and a closet, the largest room being 13 feet 3 by 12 feet, and the height of the ceiling 8 feet 3 inches ; and in the garret—a sleeping room and an open loft or lumber room. There was not a wall press in the whole house. The report then proceeded as follows :—“ The masonry of the walls is standing quite straight, and appears to be substantial ; the whole of the pavement is much out of repair, and it, along with the hearths in the ground-floor, appears to be exceedingly damp ; the windows in front are 5 feet high by 2 feet 9 inches wide. The flooring and joisting of the bedroom floor, and the timber work of the roof, are good ; the flooring of the garrets and ground-floor, not so good ; the sleepers of the latter are decayed in several places ; every other portion of the joiner work throughout the manse is of the most slim description ; the partitions are of wood, and four inches thick, including standards, lath, and plaster ; the room-doors are from 1½ inches to 1½ inches thick, 6 feet high, by 2 feet 10 inches wide ; the most of the locks are out of order ; none of the scuntions of windows are lathed or lined with deal ; the inside of the exterior walls is only partly lathed ; the ingoings and breasts of windows in general have neither bound nor plain deal linings ; no chimney-piece in any of the rooms, and only a few have jamb mouldings ; the plaster throughout the whole of the manse is in very bad order ; none of the floors are deafened ; the stair to bedrooms is of wood, and of a very superficial description ; none of the window sashes have been hung excepting three, and these single hung ; the most of the windows are out of repair ; the slater work of the manse appears to be insufficient, in so far as fillets are nailed on the joints of the sarking.
 “ Having thus given an outline of the present state of the manse, and the extent of the accommodation which it contains, I am decidedly of opinion, that notwithstanding the alterations and repairs which may be made within its present area ; yet the accommodation thereby acquired would, in my opinion, be too limited for the proper accommodation of the minister ; and although a new kitchen, &c. were to be built, and possibly a bedroom over it, yet, from the height of the present ceilings, I do not see how a comfortable diningroom, without regard to a drawingroom, could be obtained within the present building, under all the circumstances of the case. I am further of opinion, that the kitchen and back kitchen should continue in their present situation, subject to the general repairs ; and that two new rooms and a staircase should be added to the present manse, each room to be 18 feet by 16 feet or thereby, having 10 feet 6 feet ceiling. These rooms and staircase will cost about £280.

any such absolute rule; but that, looking to all the cases, of Strathblane,<sup>2</sup> the true inference was, that, when a manse extensive repairs to render it at all habitable, which in the case here, it was not incompetent to discern for additions were necessary to make it a suitable and comfortable residence for the minister.

The Lord Ordinary reported the bill and answers to the effect of the subjoined note.*

---

<sup>1</sup> Greenlaw (Creich), July 31, 1788, 5 Sup. 513; Robertson v. Heritors of Dalmeny, July 28, 1789 (M. 8515); Shields v. Heritors of Dalmeny, June 18, 1818 (ante, XIII. 1018, Note); McKensie (Lochcarron) v. Heritors, 1835 (ante, XIII. 1018).

<sup>2</sup> Heritors of Strathblane v. Hamilton, July 10, 1827 (ante, V. 1018).
* "The Lord Ordinary takes the course of reporting the case as the most beneficial to the parties. The case seems to be sufficient in the facts of it, to enable the Court at once, either by confirming the decision of the Presbytery, or by any remit, with instructions, if they are not satisfied, to settle the whole matter.

"The Lord Ordinary cannot bring himself to the opinion, that a fixed general rule laid down, such as the complainers insist upon, would be incompetent for the Presbytery, in such a case as the present, to give directions as to the manse and offices. He thinks that the case is exactly the same as that of Strathblane, 10th July, 1827, in which certainly the Court was not bound to be tied up by any such unbinding rule; and in the case of Strathblane, while Lord Jeffrey, in his note, expressly recognised that the case of Strathblane as establishing a principle for such a case, though in contrast with the case of Lochcarron, the Court expressly waived the decision of any ground involved in the latter. The present is a case in which, on the clear facts, it must be assumed that the manse requires very considerable repairs to render it habitable at all; in which it has not been the heritors now renewed their offer to execute the repairs and additions specified in Mr Robertson's report, with this declaration, that, if sanctioned by the minister, they restricted it to whatever "by law" he should be found entitled to. The minister rejected this offer, and the Court (June 1, 1836) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Before us, remit to Mr Thomas Brown, architect in Edinburgh, to inspect and examine the manse in question, and to report, whether, besides repairing the manse of Symington, the additions offered by the heritors in their said minute are sufficient to make the said manse not unsuitable and benefice, and a competent residence for the minister; or, whether further additions decerned for by the decree of the Presbytery are required, and what part thereof, for the above purpose—moderation in dimension, and simplicity in ornament, being always rigidly observed."

Mr Brown returned the following report:—

1. I have inspected and examined the manse in question, and find that it requires very extensive repairs to render it at all habitable. Its present condition is well and correctly detailed in the 'Report to the heritors of Symington,' by Mr George Angus, to which I beg leave to refer your Lordships. I am therefore of opinion, that repairs upon the old manse, of a description similar to those pointed out by Mr Angus, are essential to render it comfortable.

2. In regard to the additions to the manse offered by the heritors, I am of opinion that they are not of such a description as to render it a sufficient and competent residence for the minister of Symington or any other parish. The additions which they propose are insufficient, not so much in extent as in arrangement, inasmuch as they propose to form the principal rooms within the old house by increasing the sizes of the apartments on the ground-floor. This I think very objectionable, as the ceilings are little more than 8½ feet high, with windows and doors of equally diminutive proportions. The additions are appropriated to the kitchen and nursery. On the other hand, the additions decerned for by the decree of the Presbytery, although not so suitable, yet, keeping in view the limited rental of the parish, and the circumstances, I am of opinion might be gone into in a more

---

The Lord Ordinary must say, that the heritors bring the case before the Court in a very unsatisfactory form. To state, in answer to the specific demands made by the Presbytery and the minister, that they will do what the law may require of them, and neither to put in the records of the Presbytery, or even in their own minutes, any precise proposal of the repairs which they will execute, nor to produce any report, specification, or estimate of work to be performed, is, it was clearly their duty to obtain when they objected to those approved by the Presbytery, seems to be a very unreasonable way of asking the interposition of this Court, which, even though the Court should think that the decree of the Presbytery should not be wholly approved of, may leave them in great difficulty as to what order should be made, without sowing the seeds of further litigation.

pointed out by the minister's sketch, the expense of which is £80 to £90, making a total of about £270 for additions and repairs on the manse.

"3. As to the offices and garden-wall, I consider that the repairs pointed out and detailed in the specification by Robertson, are very judicious, and such as to render them good and suitable to the manse.

"4. There appears to be no notice taken by either party of the state of the ground to the north of the manse, which is both a public road, and no fence whatever; it ought certainly to be enclosed in some manner, either by a low wall, or paling and hedge."

The heritors, on this report being returned, offered to acquiesce in the bill provided it was also acquiesced in by the minister. This the minister refused, and the Court instructed the Lord Ordinary to take record on the bill by mutual minutes and answers. In these minutes the heritors still insisted on their plea that no additions were competent, while the minister contended for the repairs and additions recommended in Angus's report, and decreed for by the Presbytery.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor, adding the following note: *—"Finds that, in the circumstances of this case, it

---

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary has a strong apprehension, that in this case, here mainly struggling to cast the expense of the litigation on one side or the other, otherwise, he cannot but think that the case might have been easily decided in favour of Mr Brown's report was received. It is his duty, however, to decide on the merits of the pleas maintained.

ascertained that the manse in question 'requires very extensive repairs No. 249 to render it at all habitable,' it is not incompetent to consider generally

May 25, 1851
Carmichael M'Lean.

from original insufficiency, or by the lapse of time, come to be in such a state that requires extensive repairs to render it even habitable, it is then competent for the Presbytery, and for this Court in reviewing their sentence, to consider, not merely what is absolutely essential to render the old building habitable, but what might reasonably be done, by alterations and additions, to render the manse a suitable residence for the minister in the circumstances of the parish.

"The first of these points seems to be the amount of the law laid down in the cases of Dalmeny, Channelkirk, and Lochcarron. In the first, the manse had been built only ten years before, in the incumbency of the minister who made the claim, and the demand was purely for additions, on the ground of want of accommodation. The second was perhaps not essentially different, though some repairs were required; but it was greatly affected by the consideration, that the offers of repairs and additions made by the heritors were held, and expressly found, to have been reasonable; and even as it stood, two Judges, and one of them Lord Robertson, thought it not within the rule adopted in Dalmeny. The third case is nearly identical with Dalmeny. The old case of Creich was, in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, certainly too strong, at least in one point, to be now taken as precedent. No one, it is thought, would now maintain, that where a manse requires a new roof, it would be sufficient to thatch it, merely because it had been formerly thatched.

"But the second point above stated appears to be equally well settled. In the case of Strathblane, the Presbytery had expressly found that the manse 'is repairable.' But as it appeared clearly from the report of the architect, to whom the Court remitted, that it required very extensive repairs to render it habitable, the judgment of the Presbytery, which ordered both repairs and additions, was affirmed by the Court. There may possibly be a difference in degree between that case and the present. But the same fundamental facts are established, viz. that though the manse is repairable, it requires extensive repairs to render it habitable.

"But there are other cases in which the principle was recognised. In the case of Kirkliston in 1808, though the main question was, whether a new manse or additions should be given, the old house was found to be clearly repairable; and Lord Ordinary will here transcribe the interlocutor of the late Lord Meadowcroft, giving instructions to Mr Reid, the architect, to whom he remitted, which embodies principles which appear to be sufficient for the solution of the present case. 'Remit to Robert Reid, &c. to examine the manse of Kirkliston, and report, 1mo, How far it is defective in safety, comfort, and accommodation, for the use of a minister of that parish. 2do, Whether, by any, and if any, by what alterations, additions and additions, it may be rendered a sufficient manse, and at what expense. 3tio, At what expense a sufficient new manse, affording proper accommodation to the minister, could be finished; and in making this inspection and report, the architect will have in view, that no minister is entitled to have a new manse, or his present one altered, merely from the size, form, and arrangements of the apartments being ill suited to the fashion of the times; but that he has a right to have a substantial dwelling, not unsuitable to the revenue of the benefice, neatly and comfortably furnished without and within; and if an old manse has become ruinous in whole or in part, so that renovation, rather than reparation, is become necessary, such renovation may with propriety be adapted to the taste of the times, moderation in dimensions, and simplicity in ornaments, being always to be observed.' On the principles thus laid down by very high authority, and which appear indeed to be recognised by the interlocutor of the Court in the present case, Lord Ordinary is of opinion that he is fully warranted in sanctioning such reasonable additions and alterations in the circumstances which this case presents. It may be added, that it is only on a similar distinction, which was plainly indicated in the case of Lerwick, that the decisions in that of Lauark, Carnwath, Carluke, Dunning, in regard to churches, & Rosskeen, February 9th, 1830, can be reconciled with those of Methven, and Neilston.

" But the Lord Ordinary also thinks, that in such a case as this matter cannot just be considered on the same footing as if an endowment were required; and farther, that the rental, and the general circumstances of the parish, do legitimately enter into consideration in determining the amount to be paid, as is suitable and reasonable. This principle is distinctly recognised in the case of Lord Meadowbank, and also in the interlocutor of the Court, in which the Lord Ordinary thinks that the manse will be comfortable and respectable in conformity to Mr Brown's report, and that, in the circumstances, the burden should be laid on with all reasonable moderation and therefore thinks that the respondent should have been satisfied with acquiescence in it.

" The Lord Ordinary has been in doubt whether to remit to Mr Brown's specifications here, or to remit to the Presbytery. But he has taken the shortest and least expensive course, when the interlocutor shall remit to the specifications for the repairs seem to be in Mr Angus's report, as to the offices and garden-wall in Mr Robertson's. Those for the additional alterations are chiefly what are wanted. The report is perhaps a little deficient in regard to the latter. But Mr Brown can make it all clear.

" As to expenses, the Lord Ordinary thinks, that after the court of heritors, in inducing the minister and Presbytery to delay proceeding until Mr Angus should report, there could be nothing very erroneous or unreasonable in the Presbytery taking Mr Angus's report for their guide. He is not satisfied that the heritors did make a distinct offer to execute even the repairs specified in Mr Robertson's. But, at any rate, that has been found to be insufficient. It therefore appears to the Lord Ordinary, that as no objection has been made which the minister and Presbytery were bound to make, and as no specific objections had been stated against the plan by Mr Angus, the respondent was in person originally selected by the heritors, the respondent was in

Mr Brown, shall be duly executed, the heritors will thereby have satisfied their legal obligation to render the manse sufficient, suitable and competent: Therefore, approves of the report, so far as it goes; but, in respect that it contains no specification of the work to be done upon the manse, for the execution thereof, or on which an accurate estimate can be made, remits to the presbytery, with instructions to recall the decree of suspension, and thereafter to remit to the said Thomas Brown to report to them accurate specifications of the whole work recommended to him in regard to the manse, offices and garden-wall, with estimates of expense required for executing the same; and thereafter to proceed there according to law; and decerns accordingly: Finds the respondent entitled to the expense incurred by him previous to the interlocutor of the Court of 1st June, 1836, and remits the account, when lodged, to the heritor, to be taxed; but in respect that the suspenders made offer to the respondent to acquiesce in the report of Mr Brown, provided the respondent were also willing to acquiesce in it, leaving the question of expenses to be determined by the Court or the Lord Ordinary, and that the suspenders have since maintained that he is not in law entitled to any expenses whatever, Finds no other expenses due to either party.”

Both parties reclaimed, but

No. 245
May 26, 1836
Ogilvy v.
Erskine.

THE COURT adhered, except as to expenses, finding none due to either party.

M'KENZIE and SHARPE, W.S.—M'LEAN and HAMILTON, W.S.—Agents.

GEORGE OGILVY, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Ivory.

No. 250.

MRS ANN ERSKINE or WATT, Defender.—D. F. Hope.

Description—Succession—Faculty—Trust—Provision to Heirs.—Under a nuptial contract in 1754, the husband “bound himself to convey and settle to the use of the lands of Kirkbuddo to and in favours of the heir-male to be procreated by him and his present spouse; whom failing, to the heir-male to be procreated by his body, in any subsequent marriage; whom failing to the heir-female to be procreated by this or any other marriage, the eldest always succeeding without division.” The contract contained no disposition of the lands, and no procuratory or assignment; the husband was previously infeft in the lands, in fee-simple; he died in 1784, leaving one son and two daughters; the son immediately executed a trust-deed of the lands, with powers of sale, chiefly for the purpose of paying his father’s debts, and under an obligation to re-convey “to him, his heirs or assigns” the lands, if unsold (or the balance of price if the lands were sold), after the purposes were fulfilled; the trustees, as empowered by the trust-deed, served the son as nearest and lawful heir to his father: they then infeft themselves in the lands, under the precept in the trust-disposition, and possessed the lands for 10 years, after which, their whole advances being paid to them, they re-disposed the lands to the son, with a procuratory of resignation ad remanentiam, for consolidation of his right of property, with the right of superiority remaining in the son, and annulling the trust, which was done accordingly; the son died, without a settlement, in 1834:—Held, that, as the right of the son, under the obligation in the nuptial contract, was equally unlimited with his right as nearest and lawful heir

...succeeding without division, from his dying, to the said Erskine's nearest heirs or assignees whatsoever." The contract dispositive clause in reference to this obligation, nor any resignation, or precept of sasine. Francis Erskine never position of Kirkbuddo in terms of the destination in the co son, Colonel Francis Erskine, and two daughters, Mrs Ogi and Mrs Watt of Meathie, were born of the marriage. Fr the father, died in 1776, having executed, shortly before trust-conveyance of his whole estate, heritable and moveab of Colonel Erskine, declaring that he was to enjoy the whol burden of his father's debts and obligations, but that, as he service, the trust-management would be expedient during and was to fall on his returning to Scotland and taking the on himself. In January, 1777, Colonel Erskine, on the na trust-deed, and that, he had returned to Scotland for a short father's death, and that from various causes, the validity and the trust-deed were doubtful, executed a trust-conveyance heritable and moveable estate which had belonged to his fat ticularly of the lands and barony of Kirkbuddo, together w and title which he himself had therein. The deed stated, th to the more full execution of the said trust, and payment of and performance of the obligations prestable by my said fa enable the trustees to borrow for his behoof, power was trustees to burden or sell the lands "in case they shall find it sary for their own security, or judge it most for my advantag is left absolutely to their own determination." In the even continue irrevocable in security, and until full and complete payment of what all, or any of the said trustees shall advance in execution of this trust;" "and upon the termination of the said trust, and the trustees being paid and relieved as aforesaid, the said trustees shall then, and no sooner, be obliged to re-dispose to me, my heirs and assignees whomsoever, the said lands and barony of Kirkbuddo, whole other subjects before disposed, in so far as shall remain undisposed of by them in execution of this trust, and to make payment to me and my aforesaid of any balance that shall be in their hands," &c. The deed farther empowered the trustees to expedite a service of the Colonel as "heir in special to his father," and to infest him in Kirkbuddo, or to make up his titles "in any other competent form." The deed contained procuratory of resignation and precept of sasine in favour of the trustees. The deed contained an assignation of "all writs, rights, &c., old and new, of and concerning the lands and others, &c., in favour of me, my predecessors or authors," &c.

In March, 1777, the trustees expedite a special service of Colonel Erskine as nearest and lawful heir of his father, on the retour of which a precept was obtained from Chancery, and he was infest on 7th April following. On the same day the trustees also took infestment under the precept contained in the Colonel's trust-disposition.

In 1787, the trustees executed a re-disposition of the lands of Kirkbuddo to Colonel Erskine, in which, after reciting the trust, the deed proceeded, "and now seeing the said Colonel Erskine has made payment and satisfaction to us of all the money we advanced, &c., and we being paid and relieved of all the advances, &c.," incurred "in the management of the trust-right;" "therefore, witt ye us to have re-disposed and conveyed, as we by these presents re-dispose and convey, to and in favours of the said Colonel Erskine, his heirs and assignees whatsoever, all and whole the foresaid lands and barony of Kirkbuddo," &c. "And we hereby grant and confess ourselves to be fully denuded of the foresaid trust-right over the said lands and barony of Kirkbuddo, and declare the said lands, and others, to be absolutely freed, relieved, and disburdened of the foresaid trust-right, in all time coming." The deed then granted a procuratory of resignation ad remanentiam in the hands of Colonel Erskine "to the said the right of property thereof in our person may be consolidated with the right of superiority thereof in the person of the said Francis Erskine, and that the whole may remain his absolute property, as if the said trust-disposition had never been granted, nor the infestment following upon the precept of sasine therein contained, past and expedite."

This procuratory of resignation was duly executed in 1787.

Colonel Erskine died in 1834, without issue, and without executing any settlement. It appeared that at different times, particularly in 1811 and 1818, he had made inquiries at his law-agent regarding the manner in which his succession would descend, if he made no settlement. The agent informed him that he had full power to destine his whole succession as he

No.
—
May 26.
Ogilvy
Erskine

then raised an action against Mrs Watt, libelling on the marriage, 1754, and the obligation there undertaken by Francis of Kirkbuddo, to settle that estate on the heir-male of his failing on the heir-female of that marriage, "the eldest always without division." The pursuer contended that this obligation was in force, and that the defender was bound to concur with him in settling it, and should be ordained to do so.

Defences were lodged and cases were ordered.

Pleaded by the Defender—

1. The defender admitted it to be settled by a train of deeds where a party had, in his own person, separate titles to an estate, the titles being unlimited, his possession upon one of the titles, adverse possession in reference to the other dormant title, and the dormant title did not suffer prescription. But that doctrine was often regretted by the Court, and would not now be extended beyond its present limits.

In all the precedents, the dormant title had rested on an act in pursuance of the estate, in apt words, de presenti. Even in the case where though the deed contained no procuratory or precept, yet de presenti conveyance were employed, in such terms as were apt, and habile by the conveyancers, of that period. In all these cases the dormant title rested on a conveyance with procuratory act. But in the present case, the dormant title, instead of being an estate, was a conveyance of any kind, was a mere obligation to convey. It was not reached by former cases; and there was nothing to prevent from holding that the personal obligation in the marriage under the marriage-contract, and adopted solely that of the feudal investiture. No.

2. Colonel Erskine could gratuitously have discharged the obligation in the marriage-contract, at any time ; and, therefore, it was extinguished in his person, confusione,<sup>1</sup> as he was both debtor and creditor in it. May 26
Ogilvy
Erskine

3. There was a separate specialty in the present case. Colonel Erskine, in 1777, executed a trust-conveyance of it with powers of sale. If a sale had been effected, the trustees were taken bound to make over the reversion to the truster, "his heirs and assignees;" and if no sale was effected, they were taken bound to re-convey the lands to him "his heirs and assignees." The conveyance embraced "all right, title, interest," &c., in, or to, the estate, and all writs relating to it; it, therefore, carried to the trustees the whole right under the marriage-contract. The trustees possessed, under their conveyance for ten years, and then re-conveyed to the grantor "his heirs and assignees." This was a destination different from that in the marriage-contract; and it was under this re-conveyance that Colonel Erskine had subsequently held the estate, so that the destination in the marriage-contract was thereby evacuated. If the trustees had sold the estate and merely re-conveyed a reversion of the price to Colonel Erskine, such reversion would not have been affected by the destination in the marriage-contract; and the estate itself, when re-conveyed, was equally free from it.

Pleaded by the Pursuer—

1. It was fixed, by a series of judgments,<sup>2</sup> that where a party can make up his right upon either the one or the other of two titles, both of which are unlimited, his possession upon one title does not expose the other to prescription, because there is no adversity between the active and the dormant title. In some of the former cases, especially that of Zuille, the dormant title did not consist of a disposition with procuratory and precept, but merely a destination under a marriage-contract, by which the estate was to be "provided and secured" to that order of heirs; which imported nothing more than a personal obligation. So that the dormant title, in that case, was at least as remote as in the present instance from being an actual disposition of the estate by apt words, de presenti, with procuratory and precept. And without overturning the principles on which all these cases proceeded, it could not be held in this case that prescription had run on the dormant title.

The single indication given by Colonel Erskine in 1811, which was 22 years before his death, that he did not wish his nephew to succeed

<sup>1</sup> Ersk. 4, 23.

<sup>2</sup> Edgar, July 6, 1736 (3090); Edgar, July 21, 1738 (Elchies, voce Service and manation, No. 6; Smith and Bogle, June 30, 1752 (10803); Durham, Nov. 22 (11220); Zuille, March 4, 1813, (F.C.)

both in heritage and moveables, could have no effect whatever on the present case. And as little could it be available that in 1811 and 1818, his law-agent erroneously advised him that the obligation under the marriage contract was prescribed.

2. Colonel Erskine was not the sole creditor in the obligation contained in the marriage-contract; all the heirs of that destination were creditors; and though their right might have been defeated had the Colonel chosen to do so, yet, as he did not, their right remained, so long as the obligation was unprescribed. The principle of confusio had been contended for, and repelled, in previous cases, especially that of Zuille.

3. The temporary existence of the trust-right did not affect the question. It was granted primarily for the purpose of paying the debts of the father of Colonel Erskine, and was neither intended, nor calculated, to affect the succession of the estate of Kirkbuddo. It was a mere temporary burden on the radical right of Colonel Erskine, and, by the reconveyance from the trustees, every thing was left in statu quo; as would indeed have been the case, if the trustees had merely executed a renunciation. The peculiar form of the procedure made this result more evident; as the trustees never made up a title to the dominum directum of the land, which continued always in Colonel Erskine, under his crown-infeudment. And by the express words, as well as according to the true intent, of the procuratory of resignation ad remanentiam executed by the trustees, the dominum utile was resigned into the hands of the Colonel, "that the whole may remain his absolute property in the same manner as if the said trust-disposition had never been granted." It was conveyed to "his heirs and assignees," in order that it might be equally at his disposal with the dominum directum. And thus, the temporary existence of the trust-burden had no effect in evacuating the destination in the marriage-contract.

The Lord Ordinary reported the Cases.*

* M-Millan, March 4, 1831 (ante, IX. 551).

* "NOTE.—As this cause has been argued in Cases, which are already printed, and as the declared object of the parties is to obtain a judgment of the Court on the points in dispute, the Lord Ordinary thinks it most convenient to report it at once; but, in doing so, he may be permitted to express the opinion he has formed on the questions raised in these papers.

"On both of these he is disposed to adopt the conclusions maintained by the pursuer.

"The first question is, Whether or not the destination in the marriage-contract, founded on by the pursuer, has been extinguished or effaced by the lapse of time, or by the concurrence of the rights and obligations created by it, in the said individual, from the death of Francis Erskine, the contracting party in 1776, until the death of his son in 1834.

"Now, whatever difficulty there may at one time have been in regard to this point involved in this question, the Lord Ordinary is bound to consider it definitively settled by a long train of decisions, the last of which, that of Morrison, 4th March, 1813, it is impossible to distinguish from the p did not call on counsel for the pursuer to address them. No. 250.

IES.—I may regret that the decisions, founded on by the pursuer, <sup>May 26, 1837</sup> Ogilvy v. Erskine. ounced. But there they are, and we cannot get over them. I can particular. In that case, the lands were provided and secured to of heirs in a marriage-contract, containing neither procuratory nor a clause could import nothing more than an obligation, and so ars, from the report of the opinions, to have been considered by the Court. But still it was held to afford a title of possession, cap- ing the case within the operation of the rule established in the , such as those of Elshieshiells—Smith and Bogle v. Gray, 30th and Durham v. Durham, 24th November, 1802.

nd question, viz. Whether the trust-deed executed by the late Francis he reconveyance to him by the trustees, altered or evacuated the ntained in the marriage-contract, is perhaps attended with more it in regard to it, too, it appears to the Lord Ordinary, that a een fixed in various cases, turning on the effect and operation of hich necessarily leads to the determination of it against the no doubt that the late Francis Erskine, who held the right under in the marriage-contract, as well as that of heir of line of his o made up titles in the last mentioned character, had the power of or altering the destination in the marriage-contract. If, for instance, ly conveyed the lands to another series of heirs, or if he had created ure, by resigning for new infeftment in favour of himself and his nees, that effect would have been produced; and agreeably to the e case of Molle v. Riddel, and some others, it would have been held inquire how far the new investiture was specially intended as an the destination or not. But the difficulty, on the part of the , arises from the nature of the deeds on which she founds as an the trust-deed and reconveyance. In the first place, it cannot be at those deeds were specially intended to produce that effect. The ely a trust executed by Francis Erskine for the administration of his accomplishing certain purposes; and containing, indeed, a power of ver was exercised; and, finally, binding the trustees to reconvey, in on the termination of the trust, to the granter, his heirs and assig- eed was followed by a base infeftment, and ultimately by a recon- a resignation, ad remanentiam, in the hands of the truster as the

, If it could be shown that a deed of this kind divested the granter, r the reconveyance by the trustees the origin of a new investiture, of resignation, the arguments of the defender would be entitled to

But it has been fixed by a long train of decisions, that a trust-deed effect—that it leaves the radical right still in the person of the t only to the burden of the trust-deed, and the purposes therein d it seems to follow from this principle, that the reconveyance by ch a case, does not operate positively by creating a new title, but vely, by extinguishing the trust, and thus disencumbering the original n the person of the truster. According to this view, the trust-deed case neither divested Mr Francis Erskine of his feudal title to the of line, nor of his personal right under the marriage-contract. It of only burdening both as still remaining in his person. And the and resignation ad remanentiam, operated merely in extinguishing n those titles respectively,—and left them precisely as they formerly nter's person; each affording a title of possession according to the ned to on the first branch of the cause; and the latter, that is, the

...the pursuer is, therefore, entitled to decree in terms of ...
LORD COREHOUSE.—I concur with Lord Gillies and Lord Mackenzie whether we have regard to strict legal principle, or to expediency, in the decisions which have been pronounced by our predecessors, and which to in the pleadings, rest on very doubtful grounds indeed. But it is no longer an open question; a series of judgments has been pronounced, and we are bound to give effect to them, if they are really precedents in the present case. I have been unable to draw any sound distinction between those cases which have been cited. At one time, I thought that there might perhaps have been some arising out of the trust-conveyance of the estate of Kirkbuddo, which was made by Colonel Erskine in 1777, with very ample powers to the trustees, and in the subsequent reconveyance by the trustees in 1787, I am unable to see any ground for that conclusion. The trust-disposition by Colonel Erskine was no more than a mere burden on his right. The radical right was always in him, as ever, and the burden of the trust-right, from its nature, was temporary, and became extinguished. I see nothing to warrant me in holding that the subsistence of the trust had the effect of evacuating the destination of the marriage-contract; and I perceive literally nothing else in the case which would take it out of the series of precedents relied on by the pursuer. I must therefore give effect to the effect which these decisions have produced on the law of Scotland, and leave alive latent and antiquated rights; but it is the legislature alone which can give a remedy.

LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT found that the obligation in the contract of marriage was still in force, and that the pursuer was, therefore, entitled to decree in terms of the libel.

THOMAS SCOTT, Advocate.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—J. M. Bell.
 CURLE and JAMES ERSKINE, Respondents.—Robertson—
G. G. Bell.

No. 251.

May 26, 1837.
 Scott v. Curle.

ion—Bill-Chamber—Process.—1. A bill of advocation of the final of a sheriff was passed on 13th August; a certificate, that the letters expedite, was obtained on 3d September:—Held that the letters of advocation subsequently expedite, were irregular, being without a warrant, as the bill was not expedited; and advocation therefore dismissed. 2. Terms of a certificate of non-expedite, which were held sufficiently to identify the individual bill of advocation, notwithstanding an allegation that it described the parties differently. 3. Question, whether the mere lapse of 10 days, after the passing of a bill of advocation, without expediting the letters, caused the bill to be null and void; whether the 10 days are reckoned from the date when the bill is “issued, or when it is to be issued, by the clerk to the bills to the complainer’s agent;” or whether the bill does not fall till a certificate be obtained from the signet office that the letters have not been expedited.

THOMAS SCOTT of Abbotsmeadow presented a petition to the Sheriff May 26, 1837. through, which resulted in a final judgment against him. He then presented a bill of advocation, describing his petition as having been presented against “Curle and Erskine, writers in Melrose, and James Erskine, one of the partners, and Mrs Barbara Erskine or Pott, widow deceased Charles Erskine, writer in Melrose, and also against James Erskine, now one of the partners of the said firm of Curle and Erskine.”

1ST DIVISION.
 Ld. Corehouse.
 S.

This was a correct description of the parties. The bill of advocation was passed de plano, on 13th August, 1836. Intimation of the passing of the bill was given to the respondents on 24th August, by the sheriff-clerk on 3d September. On the same day, the respondents obtained a certificate from the signet office, in these terms: “I have searched the signet books, from the 22d day of August last, to the 10th day of September current, both days inclusive, and found no bill of advocation there entered as having passed the signet, during the above period, at the instance of Thomas Scott of Abbotsmeadow, Messrs Curle and Erskine, writers in Melrose, and Mrs Erskine here.”

On 10th September, Scott expedite letters of advocation under the bill. These were called on December 15th, and no appearance being made, they were enrolled for obtaining decree in absence. The respondents then appeared, and pleaded, that, if ten days elapsed after the passing of the bill, without expediting the letters, or at least so soon as a certificate of the non-expedite letters was obtained, at the signet-office, the bill was null and void, in terms of A. S. June 14, 1799, § 5, and A. S. July 11, 1799, §§ 7 and 18. There was thus no warrant in existence for expediting the letters, on 26th September, and they ought to be dismissed as irre-expedite. The respondents farther pleaded, that the description of the parties, as given in the certificate from the signet-office, was substantially the same with that set forth in the bill of advocation.

in Melrose, and also against James Erskine, now one of the said firm of Curle and Erskine." But the certificate was in favour of parties as "Curle and Erskine, writers in Melrose, residing there," which was an essential variation, as not only against a company, but also against the interdict, was not the same with a process directed against a company, and a lady "residing in Melrose."

The Lord Ordinary "found that the advocacy had been brought into Court; dismissed the same, and decreed the respondents entitled to the expense of the present application, and awarded the same to two guineas."

Scott reclaimed.

LORD GILLIES.—I think the certificate is sufficiently explicit, and as the bill fell after that certificate was issued, the interdict was not expedient, and the Lord Ordinary did right in dismissing the bill.

LORD MACKENZIE.—It is clear that the words of the Act, § 5, declare the bill to fall so soon as ten days elapse after the interlocutor passing the bill. On the other hand, it seems from A. S. July 11, 1828, § 18, that some effect is ascribed to the certificate; and it is said that, in practice, the bill does not fall by the ten days, unless the certificate be also issued. It is not necessary in this case, whether the bill would have fallen without the issue of a certificate as actually obtained, which I think was expedient to strike at the bill, and that was only done after the ten days elapsed. I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should have been more explicit.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the certificate sufficiently i

SIR JAMES GRANT SUTTIE, Pursuer.—Maitland—Whigham.
 GEORGE GORDON, Jun. and GEORGE GORDON, Sen., Defenders.—
D. F. Hope—Forsyth.

No. 252.

May 26, 1837
 Suttie v.
 Gordon.

Property—Possession—Sea-Shore.—1. Circumstances in which the rule was ed, that a party, holding a bounding-title, cannot, by possession, acquire the erty of adjoining land in the face of his title. 2. Observed, that, if one of the idaries, in a bounding-title, were the “unappropriated sea-shore, a party might, ere was no interjected property, have extended his boundary towards the sea, out violating the right of any one.”

SIR JAMES GRANT SUTTIE, Bart., was proprietor of the lands and May 26, 1837 ny of Prestongrange and others. The barony was bounded on the 1st Division h by the sea, and in 1649 a predecessor of Sir James had granted a Ld. Corehouse charter of two small subjects, forming part of the barony, the bounds of which were thus described in the subsequent conveyances:— ll and Haill that tenement of land, back and fore, under and above, a houses, biggings, brewhouses, and yard of the same, with the perti-ts lying overagainst the harbour of Millhaven, now called Morrison’s ven, betwixt the said harbour on north and west, the common high-r on the south, and the Links of Prestongrange on the east parts, taining 40 ells in length and 20 ells in breadth; as also that salt-el, with the lofts above the same, and close thereof, having 2 ells of te ground betwixt the said salt-girnel and common highway, in all s, on the south, the Sea Craig on the north, and the Links of stongrange, upon the east and west parts, containing in length, rixt the east and west, 50 ells, and in breadth, betwixt the north and h, towards the east end thereof, 13 ells, and in breadth, betwixt the h and south, towards the west end thereof, 18 ells, as the same is aded betwixt the march-stones thereof, all lying within the barony Prestongrange, constabulary of Haddington, and sheriffdom of Edingh.” In 1808, Robert Gordon, potter, purchased these subjects, and ined a disposition describing their boundaries in these terms.
 The highway, which was stated to be the south boundary of the feus, been removed in 1753, and carried along a line considerably nearer to sea. After the highway was thus removed, there still remained a stripe asture-ground, of considerable breadth, lying between the highway the sea, and terminating on the sea-ward side, in a rock or craig. On south of the highway there remained as large a superficial area of and as was contained in the feu-charter, according to the measure-t therein expressed. Upon this area, which was undoubtedly the erty of Robert Gordon under his feu-right, a pottery, or glass-work, a salt-work, had been in operation for a long series of years.

tack. In support of this plea, Sir James founded on the precise measurement of the extent of the subjects, as consisting of in length and breadth, which, being set forth on the face of rendered it impossible for Robert Gordon, by any possession a right of property beyond the boundaries, and as the whole ground, so described remained, entire to Robert Gordon, without the stripe of ground which lay between the highway and necessarily resulted that no right of property in that stripe acquired by Robert Gordon.

Sir James did not deny that possession of the stripe of been enjoyed by the Gordons for above seven years; but he this arose, not from their feu-right, but from the lease of failed, however, to produce the lease, though called on by him to do so.

Gordons denied that the possession of this stripe of was ascribable to any other title than Robert Gordon's feu. They that the northern boundary, as expressed in the feu, being that was tantamount to the sea-shore, and that Robert Gordon notwithstanding the limitation in the feu-right, to gain from him to extend the boundary in that direction. They alleged that the public works erected on the feu, had formed an accumulation increasing during a long series of years, and had gradually a superficial extent of Robert Gordon's property towards the therefore contended that they were not liable to interdict, Gordon was proprietor of the stripe of ground in dispute. pleaded that as they had enjoyed seven years' possession ice of any other title to which it could be ascribed, except the feu- No. 252.

; the circumstances that, so far as appeared, the sea-craig, which May 26, 1837 tated as the northern boundary, was just a part of "the unappro- Suttie v.
d shore," and that "as there was no interjected property, the advo- Gordon:
might have extended his boundary towards the sea without violating ght of any one:" which it rather appeared he had done by the ant accumulation of debris from extensive public works. His Lord-therefore conceived that, hoc statu, the interdict ought to be recalled.
James reclaimed, and also raised a declarator of his right of property e ground in question. The advising of the reclaiming note in the ss of advocacy was delayed until the declarator should be ready for ment. In the declarator George Gordon, senior, was called as well obert Gordon. In this last process, the lease was at length recovered roduced by Sir James, showing the existence and terms of the title ich he alleged that Gordon's possession of the stripe of ground was referred. An old plan of the ground prior to 1753 was also produced, h showed the existence of a considerable stripe of ground, as at that between the space now covered by the highway and the sea, thereby ng that there was no such addition made, as had been alleged, to the nds towards the sea, by the accumulation of any debris from public
s. This also appeared, from the nature of the sea-coast, as the of ground terminated, on the seaward side, in a perpendicular cliff.
this altered state of the proof, Sir James maintained that all the nds were removed upon which the Lord Ordinary had previously dered it possible for Robert Gordon to acquire property beyond the s of his bounding feu.

re Lord Ordinary (Corehouse) "having considered the closed record, , productions, and whole process, found that the authors of the ider, George Gordon, junior, obtained right to the feus in question rants in which the boundaries are specified, and the measurement of feu in the length and breadth is minutely stated; that the piece of nd in dispute is not included within the specified boundaries of either ese feus; that the sea-shore is not the northern boundary of either but that the sea-craig, the name given to the northern boundary of eus, appears to have been applied to the ground in dispute, because a perpendicular face of rock towards the sea, while it admits of being red upon on the side next the land; that in these circumstances the iders could not acquire the ground in dispute by possession in the
of their bounding title, and that it was not gained by occupancy as of the shore: Therefore decerned and declared in terms of the libel, found the defender, George Gordon, junior, liable in expenses of ss since the action was brought, and the defender, George Gordon, r, liable in expenses, subject to modification." *

---

* NOTE.—In consequence of the investigation since the declarator was raised; and awarded additional expenses against the defenders.

In the advocacy, Sir James insisted that the interlocutor Ordinary should now be altered both on the merits and expenses.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I decided both the advocacy and the declarator in the Outer-House. It does not appear to me that a reversal of the interlocutor Ordinary follows as a necessary consequence from our decision in the declarator in terms of the libel. It rather appears to me that the decision in the advocacy, which merely involved a possessory question, was not a reversal of the declarator, which could have been pronounced, and that it satisfied the merits of the case. The case is entirely altered since then. Various most important documents have been produced. In particular, the lease was produced only in the declarator, and it shows that the possession of the stripe of ground was ascribable to the declarator right altogether from the feu-right. I asked parties, in the advocacy, if they could produce any more documentary evidence than they had already produced, and they informed that they could not. I was obliged, therefore, to decide the case on the evidence laid before me. Besides the lease, there has also been produced by the declarator the old plan of the subjects, dated in 1753, showing the position of the stripe of ground towards the sea, stood then just as it does now, and in the same condition, and has not grown up out of accumulated debris, as was

---

and the productions which have been made in the course of it, much light has been thrown on the questions at issue. It appears from the evidence that a stripe of ground of considerable breadth, has, since an early period, existed between the feus and the sea, and that the stripe is covered with soil and is used as pasture for cattle. It could not possibly have been included in a lease of the subjects in length betwixt the east and the west fifty ells, and in breadth betwixt

lon. But in truth the only question of any importance which can now remain No. 252.
 gard to the advocacy is the question of expenses.

ORD MACKENZIE.—I think the finding of expenses should be recalled. There May 30, 1837 Kerr v.
 Barbour.

have been a considerable omission on the part of Sir James to produce the , so soon as he should have done, but the tenants always knew of the existence e lease, and they acted in bad faith in their statements respecting it. I think nses should be found due to neither party.

ORDS PRESIDENT and GILLIES concurred with Lord Mackenzie.

THE COURT, in the advocacy, adhered on the merits, but recalled the finding of expenses, and found neither party entitled to them.

J. and A. SMITH, W.S.—W. ALLAN, S.S.C.—Agents.

CHARLES KERR, Suspender.—G. G. Bell.

No. 253.

JAMES BARBOUR, Respondent.—Thomson.

inding—Bill of Exchange—Process.—1. A charge of horning was given in ch, 1833—Held competent to poind thereon in April, 1836, without giving ew charge. 2. Held that the indorser of a bill of exchange, who does not payment thereof to the holder of the bill, has no right to control the holder e use of diligence against other parties to the bill.

JAMES BARBOUR, writer and private banker at Castle-Douglas, May 30, 1837 ounted a bill for £50, which was indorsed to him by Charles Kerr in 1st Division.
 kerbie. The bill was not retired when due, and, in March, 1833, Ld. Fallerton our raised letters of horning on it, and gave a charge to Kerr. Kerr B. d that his connexion with the bill was merely by way of giving an mmodation to one Graham the proper debtor. Barbour then allowed r to obtain possession of the letters of horning, which he put into the ls of one Bell, a messenger, directing him to poind the effects of ham. Bell executed a poinding of Graham's effects to the value of , 13s. 6d.; but, on 10th April, 1833, Barbour wrote to Bell, eting him "to delay prosecuting any diligence against Graham at my pnce." This prevented farther procedure in the poinding. Barbour this step because Graham owed him nearly £200 on other bills, and did not wish that the proceeds to be realized by a poinding at his pnce should be imputed solely to the bill for £50, in which he had Kerr d along with Graham. Kerr notified to Graham that he held himself ted in consequence of the prejudice which he had suffered by the ruption of the poinding; and Barbour answered, that, as the sole to the debt and diligence was his own, he was entitled to use the way or not, entirely at his own discretion, and that Kerr had no to complain though he should refrain from doing diligence. Parties at issue whether Barbour had ever authorized Kerr to cause the Harbour answered, (1.) That Kerr had no right to insist on with the poiding, unless he chose to pay the debt assignation to it and the diligence; and as it would have been to the charger to go on with it, he was entitled to stop it as That the poiding was regular and conform to practice, 1 years had elapsed from the date of the charge.

The Lord Ordinary "repelled the first and third pleas in by the suspender, and the reasons of suspension founded and decerned; and in respect of the second plea in law for the appointed him to give in a note of objections to the state at division, given in by the respondent." *

Kerr reclaimed.

THE COURT, without calling on counsel to support the unanimously adhered.

W. STEWART, W. S.—W. KISSACK.—Agents.

---

* "NOTE.—It is doubtful whether or not the charger authorized of the effects of Graham. But even if it should be held that be undeniable that that measure was one adopted for his own behoof, and subject to his own discretion. So long as the suspender did not te of the bill, he had no right to control the measures which the cre adopt for the recovery of it from the other co-obligant. Now the assign reasonable grounds for his declining to proceed with that poin Graham was owing him nearly £200 on other bills, on all of which I poided, and that the only effect of going on singly with the poidin would have been to give the suspender the benefit of the whole arising, a benefit which he was under no obligation to afford to the s is clear that the suspender had always the means of getting con diligence by paying the bill, and not having done so, it appears to the I that he cannot found any claim to be relieved, on the mere circum charger having stayed the proceedings, a step which was within his d with which the suspender had no right to interfere."

ICK MACLEOD, Raiser.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Craufurd. No. 254.

WILSON and OTHERS, Claimants.—D. F. Hope—J. Anderson. May 30, 1837.
M'Lend v.
Wilson.

—In a competition among the creditors of a party deceased,—held executor nominate, who was himself a creditor, not having been cited, and interpellated by legal diligence on the part of any of the creditors, within six months from the party's death, and not until he had himself expedited as executor, was entitled to a preference over the executry funds for debts as he could instruct to have been justly owing to himself by him, and to impute or retain in payment thereof any part of the funds in his hands prior to diligence being used, or a judicial claim made at the instance of the other creditors, in so far as he could not be shown to have renounced such preference by acts or omissions of his own.

On the 30th of May 1837, Charles Murray Macleod, advocate, died at Southampton in the 2nd Division. Lord Jeffrey.
leaving certain personal property, including a collection of books, and nominating Roderick Macleod, younger of Cadboll, his executor and universal legatee. Mr Macleod was at the time of his death indebted to various sums to different individuals. Mr Roderick Macleod was not cited or interpellated by diligence on the part of any of the creditors of the deceased, within six months from his death. Some time after he expedited confirmation as executor. He took no steps for settling the estate of the defunct, and exhibited no articulate accounts. He caused the greater part of the books to be conveyed to his residence at Invergordon, to be kept in his custody. Thereafter a dispute took place between certain tradesmen in Edinburgh, creditors of the deceased, and Macleod, in the course of which it appeared that the latter had a claim against the estate, and that neither himself nor the executor was aware of the exact value of the estate, nor of the amount of debts owing to it.

In the circumstances Macleod raised a process of multiplepoinding and citation, in which he gave up, for the first time, in his re-revised petition, a state of the effects in question, and sums recovered by him, and alleged a sum of £861 to be due to himself from the estate, for charges incurred in recovering the same, and partly for debts owing to himself by Charles Macleod, prior to his death. For this he claimed a preferable right over the funds, and particularly over the funds sent to Invergordon; in support of which he pleaded,—that the other creditors having cited him or urged their claims for six months after the common debtor's death, he being executor, he was entitled to a preferable right, in virtue of which he was entitled to retain, in satisfaction of his own claims, any fund which might be realized.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> M'Dowal, Dec. 22, 1744 (M. 10007.)

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interdicts: 1mo, That the raiser being the executor-nominate of C. M. Macleod, the common debtor, and not having been compelled by legal diligence, on the part of any of the said C. M. Macleod, within six months from his death to had himself expedite confirmation as such executor, was to have a preference over the executry funds, for such debts as he had to have been justly owing to himself by the defunct, and to retain in payment of such debts any part of the said funds which were actually in his hands prior to any diligence or judgment of the other creditors, in so far as he cannot be said to have renounced such legal preference, by any acts or omissions: Finds, 2do, That the correspondence between the said raiser and the agents of the other claimants referred to in the interdict import any renunciation of the said legal preference, and that part of the funds which consisted of the personal bond of F. A. M. Fraser, out of the free proceeds of which, if the raiser has undertaken, and is bound to pay the debts of the said claimants in this process: Finds, 3tio, That the tenor of the correspondence, taken along with the other written documents admitted in the record, does not instruct such misconduct or neglect on the part of the raiser, as to subject him to any obligation to satisfy the claims of the said other claimants, though they be founded on by them in any proof which they may use: Finds, 4to, That the said correspondence does not instruct the verity and amount of the debt alleged to be Wilson reclaimed.

No. 25.

LORD GLENLEE.—There is nothing in the interlocutor which precludes Mr Wilson from being heard on the whole matter. The Lord Ordinary merely finds that there are no termini habiles to cut Macleod out of his right of retention as executor. The last finding leaves every thing open; and it still remains to be settled whether the effects taken to Invergordon were taken by Macleod to be retained in payment of his debt, or in what way.

LORD MEDWYN.—Something very distinct would require to appear, if the executor is to be deprived of a privilege he is entitled to. I cannot see grounds in any part of the correspondence to justify me in going farther than the Lord Ordinary has done.

LOKDS JUSTICE-CLERK and MEADOWBANK concurred.

THE COURT accordingly adhered, finding additional expenses.

GORDON and STUART, W.S.—GORDON and MACKAY, W.S.—Agents.

ROBERT ADIE, Pursuer.—D. F. Hope—Thomson.

No. 255

DUNCAN M'MARTIN and DONALD M'MARTIN and OTHERS, Defenders.

Sol.—Gen. Rutherford—Whigham.

Prescription Quinquennial—Mora—Personal Exception—Arrestment.—The sheep belonging to an outgoing tenant, were acquired by the incoming tenant at a price which was applied partly in paying the rent due to the landlord, who had used sequestration, and partly in paying a debt due to the outgoing tenant's pouding creditor; the proceedings under which this transaction was completed, were partly judicial, and partly extrajudicial; for seventeen years the outgoing tenant acquiesced in the transaction; thereafter, a creditor of his resorted in the hands of the incoming tenant, and attempted to set aside the proceedings, and make the incoming tenant pay the price of the sheep over again to him: Held that the quinquennial prescription applied, and that the arrester, being in no better situation than the common debtor, was barred from challenging the proceedings, in respect of the mora which had occurred.

THIS was a case of a special nature. In 1833, Robert Adie, writer at Perth, used arrestments in the hands of Duncan M'Martin and Donald M'Martin, farmers in Liangartan, as indebted to John M'Dougall, residing in Croftentyan, and formerly tenant of the farm of Liangartan. He stated that M'Dougall had left that farm at Whitsunday, 1816, and the stock of sheep upon it, which belonged to M'Dougall, had then been made over by him to M'Martins at a valuation, fixed by two appraisers, and that the price had never been accounted for to M'Dougall. He brought a process of forthcoming against M'Martins, before the Sheriff of Perth, and they pleaded that they were not indebted at all to M'Dougall. They stated that they had not bought the sheep from M'Dougall; that they had bought one part of them in June, 1816, from

May 31, 185

1st Division
L. 1, Cockburn
S.

from Stewart that they (M<sup>r</sup> Martins) had bought the sheep

Adie pleaded that the diligence of Achallader was not the length of a sale under the sequestration ; that the act of selling any part of the stock, for payment of rent, to him was unwarranted ; and moreover did not take place, according to his own statement, till June, 1816, whereas the whole stock was delivered by M<sup>r</sup> Dougal to them as early as Whitsunday, under which contract alone they had acquired the stock. He alleged the sale under the poinding to have been collusive and liable to the objection of having taken place as late as September. M<sup>r</sup> Martins denied these allegations, except as to the date. He acquired the stock from the respective factors of Achallader and Breadalbane. Adie raised an action of reduction-improvement, for the purpose of setting aside the whole steps of diligence, as being null and void, and an action against the trustees of the Marquis of Breadalbane, the heir of Campbell of Achallader, now deceased, and his son Stewart, who bought part of the sheep at the sale under the poinding and resold them to M<sup>r</sup> Martins ; and John M<sup>r</sup> Dougal, the co-defender, and the M<sup>r</sup> Martins themselves. M<sup>r</sup> Dougal made no appearance, other than to dispute the existence of the poinding, and stating various other defences, contended that Adie, as a creditor, could not be in a better situation than M<sup>r</sup> Dougal, the co-defender, and that by M<sup>r</sup> Dougal's long acquiescence in the proceeding, his stock was applied in payment of his rent, and of the debt of the poinding creditor, he would now be barred personally from attempting to bring a challenge, and Adie was equally barred.

In the reduction his Lordship assented, with expenses, and explained the leading facts of the case in the subjoined note.*

Adie reclaimed.

May 31, 1847
Currie v.
Jardine.

THE COURT adhered, and awarded additional expenses against him.

J. COURT, S.S.C.—W. SPALDING, S.S.C.—DAVIDSONS and SYME, W.S.—J. A. CAMPBELL, W.S.—Agents.

DR CLAUD CURRIE, Objector.—More.

No. 251

PETER JARDINE, and Miss M. B. CURRIE, Respondents.—Forsyth.

Husband and Wife—Goods in Communion—Expenses.—A surviving husband and not entitled to state as a debt against the goods in communion the expenses incurred by him in resisting certain actions of reduction of deeds by his deceased wife, raised after her death, although he was partially successful in the litigation; not found entitled so to state the expenses incurred in opposing a process for having her cognosced as insane.

THE objector, Dr Currie, was the son of Margaret Baldwin, by her first husband, on whose death she was married to the respondent, Jardine. Mrs Jardine, who was liable to fits of insanity, executed a deed in favour

May 31, 1847
2d Division
Ld. Moncrie
T.

NOTE.—The case is bristled with defences, which the pursuer has not been successful in putting down. It is impossible to detail them here; but a simple and conclusive general view arises against the pursuer from his own mora.

He is a creditor of John M'Dougal, who was debtor for rent to Achallader, in bills to Lord Breadalbane. He was sequestrated under the Bankrupt Act, and these two creditors attached his effects. The pursuer says that the diligence which they did so, was irregular; but the fact that the one sequestrated, and the other pointed, is not denied, but, on the contrary, is complained of. In this action the matter was settled between them and M'Dougal, and two persons, M'Martin, the incoming tenants; the import of the arrangement being, that the M-Martins bought M'Dougal's stock at a sale sanctioned by the Sheriff, paid the price to his two creditors, and the Sheriff approved of the whole proceedings. All this took place on or before 1817. M'Dougal was sequestrated 1815; the transference of the stock was in 1816; the Sheriff's approval was 1817.

Now, the debts due to the pursuer by M'Dougal, were prior to all this; so he was in a situation to have vindicated his rights before any thing had taken

Nevertheless, he did nothing, either by action, or by diligence, or protest, or any thing, till the year 1833; when he asked, and got a decret from the Sheriff, constituting one of his debts, and arrested; and his case is, that he, as creditor of M'Dougal, is entitled, after a pause of seventeen years, to break up a transaction concerning moveables, which has been acted and relied upon, and which no one of the parties is attempting, or has ever attempted, to disturb. His statement that the transaction was collusive, and that the price was not paid by the M-Martins to Achallader and Achallader without objection by M'Dougal, are contradicted by the whole admitted or undoubted facts.

If such a transaction can be disturbed by a third party, at such a distance of time, landlords and tenants had better take care.

There are many insuperable obstacles in the way of the reduction, independently of this general view."

of reduction to have the verdict in the cognition, so far lucid interval in 1818, reduced, and another process, to be above-mentioned set aside. The jury sustained the v lucid interval, and the deed of 1818, but reduced the de

In a question subsequently arising between Dr Ca hand, and Jardine and Miss Currie on the other, as to h incurred by Jardine in these litigations should be stated between these parties respectively, the Lord Ordinary interlocutor:—"Finds Peter Jardine entitled to state the e by him in the process of cognition, against the goods Finds him also entitled to state the expenses incurred l ing the process of reduction of the verdict of the jury, and incurred by him in the submission before Mrs Jardine's d goods in communion: But finds him not entitled to st incurred by him in resisting the process of reduction of nor the expenses incurred in the submission after Mrs Ja the £30 found due by Mr Reddie, or any part or proportion against Dr Currie's share of the goods in communion: .
account of the expenses, as thus found competent, to accounting against the goods in communion, to be given Both parties reclaimed.

THE COURT pronounced as follows:—" Find that not entitled to state the expenses incurred by hi of reduction raised after the death of the wife agai communion, in so far altering the interlocutor of

WILLIAM RANNIE, Suspender.—Wood.
IN FALCONER TAYLOR, Respondent.—M'Neill—Dunbar.

No. 257.

May 31, 1837.

—Suspension—Bill of Exchange—Forgery.—In a bill of suspension of Rannie v. Taylor. an acceptance, in which it was denied that the bill was signed by the was averred that it was either a forgery, or, if genuine, that the signature Campbell v.
been obtained by gross fraud, but produced no genuine subscription for Aiken.
—Bill (which the Lord Ordinary had refused) passed on caution.

E, a farmer near Turriff, presented a bill of suspension of a May 31, 1837.
the instance of Taylor, messenger there, upon a bill for £195, 2<sup>D</sup> DIVISION. to be accepted by Rannie to Taylor. In the bill Rannie denied Bill-Chamber.
signed any such bill, and stated forgery as the principal ground of Lord Jeffrey.
n, “averred most deliberately and solemnly that the bill is either T.

, or if it shall be produced and found to contain the complainer's on, that it has been procured by the grossest fraud and circum-

No genuine subscriptions by the suspender were produced bill, for the purpose of comparison.

, in his answers, denied the allegation of forgery.

Lord Ordinary, “in respect that forgery is not positively nor any genuine subscriptions produced for the purpose of com-efused the bill,” with expenses.

reclaimed.

THE COURT remitted to pass the bill on caution.

J. BENNETT, W.S.—W. MARSHALL, W.S.—Agents.

ROBERT CAMPBELL, Pursuer.—Robertson.
AIKEN, and JOHN HAMILTON, Defenders.—Forsyth—Wood—
Cowan.

No. 258.

licata.—In a reduction of certain decrees for expenses, which were alleged en for random sums, this ground of reduction held to be barred by the nounced in a suspension of a charge for payment of such expenses, in letters were found orderly proceeded.

was a reduction, in which certain decrees for expenses were called May 31, 1837.
reduced, on the ground principally that the sums decerned for 2<sup>D</sup> DIVISION.
dom sums, the expenses in question never having been modified. Ld. Moncreiff.
th article of the summons, there was also called for a decree of F.
1818, pronounced in a process of suspension, at the instance of cessor of the pursuer, of a charge by the author of the defenders, ent of the sums contained in the above decrees, in which the d been found to be orderly proceeded.

which can be otherwise involved in the demand to resume consistent rectness of such decrees. The parties who are defenders in the red Campbell, and Cathcart, state themselves to be onerous assignees to the extent of all that is comprehended in the decree of 1818. Mr. author, had charged Dugald Campbell for that amount, founding on decrees, and his bond of corroboration, thus giving him the opportunity every objection which he could state against the debt as constituted himself of the legal process for doing so, by raising a suspension of the parties came to issue in foro before Lord Alloway. If the decree to objection on the ground that the random sums of expenses were that objection appeared ex facie of the decrees themselves. It is now here, whether it was actually taken and maintained. The Lord Ordinary to think that it must have been taken, or at least palpably presented. For the suspender claimed against Mr Hamilton to have the benefit which he received in acquiring the debts; and it does not appear that any ease except in this very thing, that he was only required to pay expenses to the creditor. But at any rate, if it was competent to state the same thing. Now, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that it was state such an objection, both because the fact appeared ex facie of the decree because he thinks that the Court has always power, without any reduction a decree taken for a random penalty, or expenses to the actual expense (Bell, Com. 1, 657, and the case of Pardon Gray against Buchanan, though it does not follow that in all circumstances they must do so frequently much expense incurred which cannot enter an ordinary decree. Lord Ordinary forms no opinion on this in the present case; but if competent to state the objection, it is plainly competent and omitted, sufficient to bar any trial of the question afterwards.

"The pursuer says that Dugald Campbell had granted a bond of entail—that random expenses beyond the actual expenses were not entailed that Dugald could not make them so, to affect a subsequent heir of the decrees determined the amount of the debts expressly as entailing the expenses awarded; and if the pursuer means to say that the was res inter alios, merely because Dugald was an heir of entail, the pursuer fears that it would be a very dangerous doctrine. He represents in these conjoined processes, and heard parties' procurators on the No. 258 the decree of this Court, of dates the 27th November and 15th May 31, 1835 ber, 1818, called for in the eleventh article of the summons of Clyne v. ... on, and having made avizandum—Finds, that no relevant grounds Clyne's Trust en stated for demanding reduction of that decree: Finds, that that tees.

standing unreduced, and not challenged on any sufficient grounds and having been a decree in foro, pronounced between the author principal defenders, himself also called as a defender in the reduc-d the predecessor of the pursuer then standing in the full rights eir of entail, in possession of the estate of Skerrington, constitutes bar against any challenge of the other decrees called for, in so far formed the grounds of the decree then pronounced, for the sum of
s. 6d. of principal debt; either on the ground, that in such decrees of expenses decerned for ought to have been modified to the amount l expenses incurred; or on the allegation, that the decree, of date July, 1792, was not a decree in foro: Sustains the defences stated eduction on this ground, and appoints the cause to be enrolled, in at it may be further proceeded in; and in the mean-time reserves tions of expenses."

Lord Ordinary in a subsequent interlocutor as to certain other n the cause, found no expenses due to either party.

pursuer reclaimed on the merits, and the defender Hamilton on it of expenses.

THE COURT adhered on the merits, but remitted to the Lordordiary as to Hamilton's note.

ROBERTSON, W.S.—HUNTER, CAMPBELL, and Co., W.S.—JAMES HAMILTON, W.S.—
Agents.

DAVID CLYNE, Pursuer.—R. Robertson.
CLYNE'S TRUSTEES, Defenders.—Moncreiff.

No. 259.

and Client—Attorney's Certificate—Expenses.—Objection repelled to an report on an account of expenses of process, that during part of the cur-the account the pursuer's agent had no attorney's certificate.

as objected by the defenders to the auditor's report on the pursuer's May 31, 1835 of expenses in this case, that during the first portion of the pur- 2d Division account running from January to November 1835, charges were T.

and the Court, throughout the process 1818, as having been a decree in

THOMAS ROBERTSON (Trustee of Lord Fife and his Creditors) and Claimant.

JAMES SOUTER (Trustee of Personal Creditors of Lord Fife) Claimant.

June 1, 1837. Trust—Clause.—This was a case of a special nature, depending on the construction of a trust-deed executed by Lord Fife for his personal creditors. There was a surplus of funds in the hands of the trustee, after paying the current heritable annuities, and the question was whether the same should be applied in redeeming these annuities, or in keeping up the interest on the personal debts of the Earl. The Lord Ordinary found for the former purpose to be enjoined by the trust-deed, but the interest was not altered, and found that the interest on the personal debts was not paid.

1st Division.
Ld. Cockburn.
B.

H. INGLIS and DONALD, W.S.—J. SOUTER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 261. ABERDEEN BANKING COMPANY, Suspenders.—Sol.-Gen. H. Inglis and Donald.

MABERLY, CANE, and COMPANY, Chargers.—D. F. Hope.

Foreign—Bill of Exchange—Process.—1. In a suspension by the Aberdeen Banking Company of a charge for payment of a bill drawn by them on a Bank in favour of an English party,—circumstances in which, in conformity with the law of England, as obtained on remit to English counsel, the Scots Court found liable for the contents of the bill to the onerous holders.—2. On appeal being made, parties not allowed to submit argument, either oral or written.

Glynn and Co. of London, in favour of John Maberly, and afterwards indorsed over to Maberly, Cane, and Co. of London. No. 20

After various procedure, it appeared that the parties were agreed as to the facts; the point in dispute being the liability of the drawers under the circumstances of the case, which was considered by the Court to depend upon the law of England. June 1, 1832 Aberdeen
v. Maberly

In obedience to a remit from the Court to the Lord Ordinary, the following special case, stating the circumstances under which the question rose, was prepared by the parties for the opinion of English counsel:—

“ John Maberly carried on business at Aberdeen and London as a banker, under the firm of John Maberly and Company, for some time previous to January 1832; and it is admitted that Maberly being indebted to the Aberdeen Bank, he did, by his agent at Aberdeen, on the 20th December, 1831, draw a bill upon his house in London, in favour of the Aberdeen Bank, for £450. This bill became due on 2d January, 1832; but Maberly having stopped payment in London on the morning of that day, payment of the bill was refused. It is also admitted that, on the 7th December, 1831, another bill for £900 was, in like manner, by his agent at Aberdeen, drawn on John Maberly of London, in favour of the Aberdeen Bank, of which payment was also refused on 9th January, 1832.

“ Maberly's Bank and the Aberdeen Bank had weekly settlements of notes of their respective banks, which had been taken in the course of the week, and for the balance respectively due a bill was given on London. On the 3d January, 1832, the Aberdeen Bank, on such weekly settlement rendered on that day, became indebted to John Maberly in the sum of £780, and the bill now in question was drawn for this sum upon Sir Richard Carr Glynn and Company of London, payable on the 6th January, 1832, in favour of the said John Maberly. This bill was transmitted to Maberly, and received in London on 6th January, indorsed by his agent at Aberdeen, and afterwards by John Stevens (who is a clerk in the banking-house of Maberly in London), ‘ per procuration of John Maberly and Company,’ and was by Maberly handed over with other cash to E. Y. Bartley, who was also a clerk in Maberly's banking-house, and manager of the Horse Bazaar in London for Maberly. This bill was afterwards indorsed over by Bartley on the 13th January, 1832, on the part of the Horse Bazaar, to Maberly, Cane, and Company, in the manner which will be found stated in the special verdict to be afterwards mentioned.

“ It is admitted that the bill for £780 was not presented for acceptance previous to its becoming payable; and it is also admitted that John Maberly and Company stopped payment in London upon the 2d January, 1832, and that upon the bill for £780, granted by the Aberdeen Bank, being presented to Sir Richard Carr Glynn and Company, they refused to accept it, in consequence of instructions from Aberdeen to that effect,

£267. the Aberdeen Bank having been advised that their bills for £450 and £900 had been previously dishonoured by John Maberly and Company, 1. 1837. Proceedings thereupon took place in the Scotch Courts at the instance of Maberly, Cane, and Company, for the purpose of enforcing payment from the Aberdeen Bank, of the bill or draft drawn by them upon Richard Carr Glynne and Company.

" In this action various proceedings took place, when the following issue was directed to be sent to a jury for the purpose of ascertaining the facts attending the indorsation of the draft for £780 to Maberly, Cane, and Company, who are styled defenders in the issue:—'Whether the last-mentioned bill or draft for £780 was, on or about the 13th January, 1832, indorsed and delivered by the said John Maberly and Company, or by others acting for them, to the defenders: And whether, when the defenders received the said draft or bill, the stoppage of payments by the said John Maberly and Company was known to the defenders.'

" The issue having gone to trial, the following verdict was returned:—'Agreed, that John Maberly was the sole partner in the banking-house of John Maberly and Company: That the said John Maberly was the sole proprietor of the Horse Bazaar: That the said banking company and the said Horse Bazaar were separate concerns: That the said Horse Bazaar was not carried on under the name or firm of John Maberly, or John Maberly and Company: That E. Y. Bartley, who was a clerk in the said banking-house, was also the sole manager of the bazaar, but became personally liable for the debts of the Horse Bazaar: That the said John Maberly and Company stopped payment upon the 2d day of January, 1832, but were not made bankrupt until 28th of January, 1832, when a commission of bankruptcy was issued against the said John Maberly, banker, trading under the firm of John Maberly and Company: That the said Horse Bazaar was a solvent concern, and continued business until the bankruptcy of the said John Maberly on the said 28th of January, 1832: That the said bill for £780 was received in London on the 6th January, 1832, and was handed over, along with other bills, by John Stephens, who was in the employment of the said John Maberly and Company, to the said John Maberly, indorsed by him, per procuration of the said John Maberly and Company; and that the said bill, along with a considerable sum in cash, was handed over by the said John Maberly to the said E. Y. Bartley, for the purpose of the business of the said bazaar, but without any special directions as to the appropriation of the said bill: That the said E. Y. Bartley carried the said bill to Maberly, Cane, and Company, the same not being then accepted, who were then in the knowledge that the said John Maberly and Company had stopped payment, and requested the said Maberly, Cane, and Company to receive the said bill in payment of an account due by the said Horse Bazaar to the said Maberly, Cane, and Company, and to pay over to him the balance, which was done accordingly by a cheque upon the bankers of the said Maberly, Cane, and Company, and discount for prompt payment was allowed, as it was before the usual term of credit had elapsed: That on no other occasion did the said E. Y. Bartley settle with the said Maberly, Cane, and Company in cash, but by a bill at three months: That the said John Maberly did not at the time know or direct that the said bill should be so delivered over to the said Maberly, Cane, and Company: That the said E. Y. Bartley employed the remainder of the funds which he so received from the said John Maberly in discharge of other debts of the said bazaar: That the debts of the said bazaar were paid in full, and the balance of the proceeds handed over to the assignees of John Maberly."

With reference to these facts, counsel was at the same time requested to state how the law of England would apply, in answer to the following queries:—

"I. Can an onerous indorsee or holder recover payment from the drawer of a bill which has been indorsed in the circumstances above explained, although, prior to indorsation, the payee has, to the knowledge of the indorsee or holder, stopped payment, but has not committed an act of bankruptcy, and the bill has not been accepted?

"II. Will the answer to the above question be altered on the supposition that the party receiving the bill, although he knew of the stoppage of payments by the original payee, did not know that he was insolvent?

"III. Under the circumstances of this case, does the law of England hold that Mr Bartley, the manager of the Horse Bazaar, for the debts of which he held himself personally liable, and which continued solvent notwithstanding the bankruptcy of Maberly and Company, must be viewed as a third party, independent of Mr Maberly?

"IV. May a set-off be pleaded by the Aberdeen Bank against Maberly, Cane, and Company, in respect of Maberly's two dishonoured acceptances?

"V. Did Mr Maberly, by voluntarily delivering over the said bill of exchange for £780, and cash to his clerk, Bartley, for the purposes of the Bazaar, make a fraudulent delivery of his goods and chattels; and was the delivery of the said bill to Maberly, Cane, and Company, and in part discharge of debt, the term of credit of which had not elapsed, and without any application for payment, such a fraudulent and illegal act as will bar them from recovering payment of the said bill?

"Lastly, Having in view the whole circumstances of the case, the court and special verdict, counsel is requested to say whether, if the present action had been brought by Maberly, Cane, and Company, in the Court of Westminster, against the Aberdeen Bank, the drawers of the bill, then sued, according to the principles of the law of England, have been held entitled to recover payment?"

but as this question proceeds upon the assumption that, as the bill was indorsed, the payees had not committed an act of fraud, I am of opinion that a holder for value might, under the circumstances stated, maintain an action against the drawer of the bill.

" 2. I think the state of facts here suggested would answer to the first question.

" 3. The law of England would consider Mr Bartley personally liable for the debts he had contracted in his capacity as the agent of Mr Maberly, for carrying on the business of the firm, but personally liable for the debts he had contracted in his private capacity. As regards this transaction of the bill, he could not be treated as a partner altogether distinct from Mr Maberly; but I do not think the question of the liability of the drawer of the bill is materially affected by Mr Bartley's position.

" 4. Upon the state of facts before me, I think this set-off cannot be pleaded. Maberly, Cane, and Company are stated to have received the value of the bill indorsed previous to any act of bankruptcy on the part of the drawers, therefore, cannot, as against them, set off a debt as indorsers.

" 5. These are questions of fact for the determination of the jury, not of law; but upon the statements in the special case, I find no evidence to establish a case of fraudulent transaction, or such a fraudulent and illegal act as would prevent the recovery.

" 6. If this action had been brought in England, and the facts at the trial had been those stated in the special verdict, the Aberdeen Banking Company reclaimed, and contended, that the No. 261.

 t were not bound by the 5th Answer in Sir W. Follett's Opi- June 1, 1837.
 which, according to his own statement, related to matter of fact, Aberdeen Bank could not, therefore, in a question of law, be received as autho- v. Maberley.
 ve.

RD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary. Here there has a statement of facts agreed upon, and, in order to find what is the law of and as applied to these facts, certain queries are put to Sir William Follett. ng to the careful way in which the questions have been prepared, and the r-like manner in which they have been answered, I can find no fault. As a fifth answer, in particular, was it irregular in counsel to say, allowing the t of it to be a question of fact, I, as an English lawyer, hold the facts not to at to fraud? If a judge had so directed the jury, and the jury notwith-ng had returned a verdict contrary to this direction, would we not have been d to set aside the verdict? I do not think it was out of Sir William t's province to make this answer. Then, as to the sixth query, does it not ce every thing in the case? He answers to this emphatically, that if the had been brought in England, and the facts proved at the trial had been stated in the special verdict, he thinks the party would have been entitled over. Under the circumstances in which the case comes before us, we no other alternative but to come to the same conclusion as the Lord Ord-

RD MEDWYN.—I agree with the interlocutor on the merits, but with refer-to the pleadings of the parties, and the way in which the transaction in on was managed, I cannot concur on the point of expenses.

RD GLENLEE.—I have no doubt, as the case stands, that the interlocutor is on the merits, and that according to the law of England, whatever our law have held, this was a good transaction. The expenses are a different matter.
 ule, "actor sequitur forum rei," does not bar the chargers recovering from awers under the law of land; but the question of expenses may be judged ding to the law and practice of our own Courts. I do not think, looking to statements on the record, that the suspenders are entitled to the whole ses of process, which depend in a great measure on the way in which a cause en conducted.

---

f England, can give no other judgment than the above. It was observed at r, that the questions put in the 5th query are said, in the corresponding is, to be questions not of law, but of fact, and that the answer consequently not establish the law of England, but merely shows the opinion of a learned al, as to whether a matter of fact is or is not proved. But the answer to 5, that whether strictly matter of law or of fact, it is necessarily left as law case, by the act of the parties themselves, who have embodied all the facts they hold to be proved in the agreed verdict, and now require merely judg-on their legal effect. The point to be determined, too, if not properly and matter of law, is obviously very near akin to it, being, in truth, whether overt acts afford legal evidence of fraud and dishonesty, which are things by law; and accordingly, the concluding part of the answer to this query is a judgment on the legal effect of those overt acts."

No. 262.

ROBERT ALLAN (Thomas Allan's Executor), Ra ROBERT CHRISTIE (Robert Allan's Trustee), Claimant MRS HOSKINS and OTHERS (Thomas Allan's Creditors), D. F. Hope—Penney.

Partnership.—Special case involving a question whether certain to the estate of a company, or to the private estate of an individual company.

June 2, 1837. SEQUEL of the process mentioned ante, XIII. 998. TH for Division. of a multiplepinding in name of Robert Allan being the Ld. Fullerton. several questions arose respecting various subjects, whether
2. to the individual estate of the late Thomas Allan, who was Robert Allan and Son, or to the company estate of Rol Son. Three of the disputed subjects, were, respectively of the Bank of Scotland, a share in the Encyclopædia Brit entire property of the Caledonian Mercury newspaper. C chiefly upon entries in the books of the company: which w part of the other claimants, with the fact, that similar entr the company books, respecting various funds which we part of the individual estate of Thomas Allan: and that th circumstances proving the subjects in dispute, to be part estate.

The Court, after considering cases which were reported Ordinary, found that all the three subjects belonged to the of Thomas Allan. The question raised was entirely of a DONALD STEWART (Judicial Factor on Harris) and OTHERS, Pursuers. No. 263.

—D. F. Hope.

EARL of DUNMORE'S TRUSTEE, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Tait.

June 2, 1837.
Stewart v.
Earl of Dunmore's
Trustee.

Lease—Ranking and Sale—Ameliorations.—An estate was sold, in a ranking and sale, on 5th March, 1834; the purchaser's entry was at Whitsunday, 1834; the purchaser became bound, as to the current leases, to pay the ameliorations due to tenants at the expiry of their leases; the last term in several of the leases was Whitsunday, 1834, when the lease of the incoming tenant commenced: Held that the purchaser was liable for the ameliorations due under those leases, because they were current at the date of the sale, when the purchaser undertook the obligation, and because the outgoing tenant does not give full entry to the incoming tenant at Whitsunday, but retains possession of the arable part of the farm till the crop is reaped, so that his right under his lease was still current, to many important effects, at Whitsunday.

UNDER a process of ranking and sale of the estate of Harris, belonging to Alexander Norman Macleod, the estate was sold on 5th March, 1834, at a price of £60,200, to the late Earl of Dunmore. The term of entry was Whitsunday, 1834. It was stipulated by one of the articles of roup, that "as the lands and other subjects under sale are to be sold under the burden of the current tacks or missives of tack thereof, or of such parts thereof as are under lease, the purchaser must implement all the conditions and obligations therein that were binding upon the said Alexander Norman Macleod, Esq. of Harris, the common debtor, and the purchaser shall have no recourse upon the said Alexander Norman Macleod, or upon his creditors, or any parties in their right, for or on account of any ameliorations or improvements which may have been made by the tenants or others, it being expressly stipulated, that all such meliorations shall be a burden upon the purchaser alone, and that he shall free all concerned of such claim." In another and relative article it was farther provided, that "the purchasers shall be bound to implement the whole conditions and obligations in these leases, that are or may be binding upon the creditors of the said Alexander Norman Macleod, and to free and relieve him of all such conditions and obligations, reserving to the purchaser all actions whatever against such obligations as shall not infer liability against the said creditors." Various leases had been granted by Alexander Norman Macleod, under which he bound himself to pay to the tenants an equivalent for ameliorations, at the end of each lease. The last term in several of the leases was Whitsunday, 1834, when the lease to the incoming tenant commenced. In these leases, the tenants retained the amount of the meliorations out of their rents, which they refused to pay to the judicial factor; and the judicial factor, after attempting unsuccessfully to obtain payment of the rents from them, raised an action against the Earl of Dunmore, as having become liable for the amount, in consequence of the above quoted articles of roup.

In the process, Lord Dunmore died, and his trustee was sisted. It was in defence that the estate was sold only under the burden of the defender's crop, was rendered so, and right of the common leases had not then expired. They had a crop still on the ground, they did not reap until the harvest after the defender's end of the lease. On that account also, the terms of the articles of roup rendered these meliorations.

The Lord Ordinary "repelled the defences, and decreed against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the libel, and found him entitled to expenses."

The defender reclaimed. The Court did not call on counsel for the interlocutor.

LORD GILLIES.—I think the interlocutor is right. At the close of one lease, and the commencement of another, there is an interval during which there are two occupants of the ground, qua tenants, and the outgoing, tenant. The incoming tenant takes possession of the ground at Whitsunday; the outgoing tenant, whose crop is already reaped, retains possession of the arable part of the farm, until he reaps it. The right of the old tenant therefore has not come to an end, but is subject to various important effects, after the right of the new tenant has begun. That the defender, in terms of the articles of roup, became liable for the expenses due to the tenants in those leases, which have given rise to the present litigation.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I think the interlocutor right. The lease was not existing at the date of the roup, when the defender's obligation arose.

LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

LORD COREHOUSE.—The grounds on which I pronounced the interlocutor under review have been anticipated in the opinions which have now been delivered. Though the term of the lease ends at Whitsunday, the incoming ten

L CHARLES SOMERVILLE MACALISTER and OTHERS (Caledonian No. 264
y Company Directors), Pursuers.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—

Ivory—A. M'Neill.

June 2, 1831

Macalister v

Alexander.

D ALEXANDER and OTHERS, Defenders.—D. F. Hope—M'Neill

—Anderson—Graham Bell—Cook.

Partnership—Joint Stock Company—Contract—Homologation.—1. In an action by the directors of a joint stock company against the other partners for advances made and engagements contracted for behoof of the company—on the following defences were repelled:—(1st), That the directors were only liable, inter se, to the amount of the shares severally subscribed; (2d), That the directors had no right to begin business or power to bind the other partners till the whole capital had been subscribed for and secured; (3d), That the power to borrow money was expressly limited by a certain clause of the contract of copartnership, the provision in which they had violated.

In the year 1824, a prospectus was circulated for the establishment of a joint stock company for supplying the inhabitants of Edinburgh with other dairy produce. A committee of management was there- June 2, 1831
 2D DIVISION
 Lord Jeffrey
 T.
 ned of those who were favourable to the undertaking, and the Wheatfield, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, were purchased for a price of £12,000. On 2d February, 1825, a “meeting of subscribers” took place, at which directors were named and certain resolutions passed with a view to constitute the company, the capital fixed at £50,000, divided into 2000 shares of £25 each. The directors were authorized to complete the purchase of the land required for the undertaking and to erect suitable accommodations, and a contract of copartnership was appointed to be prepared. The committee read a statement setting forth that the whole capital had at that time been subscribed and had the thanks of the meeting voted to them for making the purchase of Wheatfield. The lands of Meadowbank and an adjoining ground were soon afterwards bought at a price of £9700.

After a contract of copartnership was prepared, and was approved by the directors. By the 1st article it was declared that the partnership should be held to have commenced from and after the 28th of January 1825, and it was farther declared that the subscribers “shall be entitled to the profits, and be liable for the losses, arising from or upon the business, and shall be bound to relieve each other of all the debts and engagements of the company, but that only to the extent of and in proportion to their respective shares therein.” By the 2d article it was declared that the subscribers “shall have right to the profits, and be bound to relieve each other of the losses of said business, and shall be bound to relieve each other of all the debts and engagements of the company in proportion of their respective interests or shares in the capital stock.” The 3d and 4th articles provided for an annual general meeting on the last Monday and other writings relative to the business of the company, and all times be open to the directors, and superintending members thereof respectively, but to no other members of the company, unless ordered by the annual general meeting," and also that the directors "shall have full power to make the purchase of land, or premises which they shall deem necessary for the concern, and be authorized to complete and carry into effect the purchase of lands of Wheatfield and Meadowbank, and to take all required steps for the erection of suitable accommodations for the dairy, and to enter into all contracts or deeds necessary in the business of the company, and otherwise to carry into effect and execution the business of the company, and to take all such steps as to them may seem and beneficial in forwarding the prosperity of the estate, according to their sound discretion, to dispose of the lands or feu them, and also to feu such parts of Meadowbank as they think proper." It was farther declared "that the directors, in the above-mentioned and all other parts of the business, subject to such limitation, extension, or alteration, as a general meeting shall think fit—all which acts of administration shall be effectual and obligatory upon the company, and whole individual parts thereof, and that it shall be in the power of the directors to borrow money on the credit and security of the company to the extent of £10,000, which they are hereby empowered to do by way of cash, or by some bank or banking company, provided there is stock or securities subscribed for and unpaid to that amount." It was provided date fixed for payment, and until payment thereof is made; and in no event shall it be in the power of the directors to call upon the partners for a sum beyond that subscribed for by them respectively." By the 18th article the directors were not to be "liable for omissions, nor for the sufficiency or responsibility of securities or property on which they may lend out or otherwise invest the funds of the company; nor for the actions or intromissions of the manager, banker, clerks, or accountant, or any other officers or agents of the company, or any other persons trusted with the business of the company; nor shall they be liable in solidum nor pro rata for one another, but each only for his own actual omissions." The 21st article provided that "each of the partners shall assign, as he hereby assigns and conveys to the company, and the directors thereof for the time being, his own particular share and profits in the concern, in security of the debts and engagements of the company." The 23d article it was provided that "previous to the last Monday of May, 1826, on which day the general annual meeting of the stockholders is to be held, and in every year thereafter, the books of the company shall be balanced, and a statement or abstract of the company affairs shall, under the inspection of the directors and auditors, be made up and signed by the accountant of the company and secretary: And the directors, or the accountant or secretary, shall be obliged to lay upon the table, at the said general meeting to be held upon the said last Monday of May, the said statement or abstract, for the inspection of the partners present, the substance whereof shall be stated at the said court by the chairman or preses; and the said statement or abstract shall lie at the disposal of the secretary, open for the inspection of any of the partners, during the space of one calendar month subsequent to the said last Monday of May."

Thereafter the contract was subscribed by shareholders to the extent £20,000. The directors, while it was in the course of subscription, took measures for the erection of the necessary buildings, the contract being about £5400, though they ultimately cost about £9000.

There having been a previous call of five per cent, a call of ten per cent was made upon the shareholders in June, 1825, and another to the same extent in July following, but these calls were only partially paid. The sum thereby realized was inadequate to meet the engagements of the directors, and they borrowed money for payment of the price of the lands above-mentioned and for current expenses, partly on their personal credit and partly on an heritable bond granted over Meadowbank by some of their number as trustees for the company.

On 29th May, 1826, the first annual general meeting took place, as required for by the contract of copartnery, at which there were present sixteen shareholders, five of whom were directors. The meeting received a report by the directors of their proceedings, in which the various difficulties they had to contend with were detailed, and by an accountant it appeared that in January, 1828, the calls on the partners had been £8600, while the debt was £3600. Annual meetings were held, and reports by the partners thereat, in 1827, 1828, and 1829. The meetings were barely sufficient in number to form a quorum. In 1830, a general meeting was held at which it was resolved to call up the subscribed capital, and wind up the company. Steps were taken accordingly.

Thereafter Colonel Charles Macalister and others, individual partners of the company, raised action against Alexander and others, being the whole solvent partners and pursuers, libelling on the terms of the contract, and setting aside the formation of the company and its subsequent unsuccessful operations. The amount of subscribed capital recovered and the value of the property was about £30,000, which sum was inadequate to payment of the debts and losses of the company, there being a deficiency of upward of £10,000. And that large advances had been made by the pursuers from private funds for the purpose of liquidating the debts and losses of the company, and concluding, first, to have it found and decreed that the pursuers were only liable rateably, according to the shares held by them of the company stock, for its losses and debts, and entitled to be relieved from all farther proportions of such losses and debts by the remaining solvent partners rateably according to the shares such partners had in the concern, and then to have the defendants ordered to make payment to the pursuers, conformably to the amount of their shares.

the contract libelled on, and with reference particularly to No. 264 ion at the end of the first clause, and also to the ninth clause, June 2, 1837 rs are not entitled to recover from the defenders, as in a Macalister v.
 ter socios, beyond the amount of the sums for which they Alexander.
 subscribed.

ursuers had no right under the contract to begin business, and to bind the partners for any debts or obligations on behalf of y, till the whole capital of £50,000 had been subscribed for l.

owers of the directors in regard to the borrowing of money ed by the contract, and particularly by the 8th clause, and as part of the debt concluded for was contracted by means of bligations entered into in violation of the contract, and on the sponsibility of individual directors, the pursuers have no claim he company to be relieved of such advances.

d Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the note:—"The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for —The first of the above-mentioned defences appeared to be that on. It was rested mainly on the provision in the close of the first contract, 'that the partners should be bound to relieve each other of d engagements of the company, only to the extent of, and in proportion ective shares therein,' and partly upon passages in the 8th, 9th, and , which were said to confirm the construction put by the defenders on vision. According to that construction, this provision was specially protect the body of partners from the consequences of over-trading, or rudent dealings on the part of the directors, and was equivalent to an hat they should at no time put more than the subscribed capital at er pain of being personally answerable, and without relief, for the con-any more extensive speculations. Now, if any thing be clear in this rd Ordinary takes it to be, that this limitation of the provision to the directors having occasion for relief, is totally inadmissible. It is in is a provision limiting the right of relief of all the partners, as against

The case of directors is not once named or alluded to in any part of and it is not less (but more) extravagant to say, that it applies exclu- m, than it would be to say that they alone were exempted from its

If it had really been intended to impose such a restriction upon the he directors to bind the company, it is inconceivable that the parties introduced it into this first article, which merely sets forth the uniommon law rights and liabilities of the partners, instead of bringing it ation of the great general powers given to those directors by article 8 contain a special limitation as to borrowing), or as a qualification of munities conferred on them by article 21.

ue meaning and effect of the restraining words now cited, be, there-defenders contend, it necessarily follows that no one partner of the ho has been obliged by a creditor to pay any of its debts or engage-ho is distressed by such a creditor, will be entitled to any relief from rtners, beyond the amount which may remain unpaid upon the sub-ital of each; and if all have paid up their whole subscriptions, he will to no relief at all. Now, the first question is, Whether it is conceivable istrous and unjust a provision could be intended, or could by possibility l to effect? The Lord Ordinary has never been able to get over this, gers—assume (contrary to the fact) that the directors would go beyond the capital, and suppose that a private partner, having management, is obliged to pay a debt so contracted, is there any sense in saying that he shall not be relieved by the other partners liable to such distress? or, under the words relied on, would claim relief from the directors who over-traded? Those directors for each other. The individuals who subjected the concern to insolvency, and the whole subscribed capital may have been. Then the directors are all necessarily partners;—and it is not they should not have the benefit of the provision in question as. There is confessedly no provision, nor any thing like a provision that the individual directors, who over-trade, shall be bound to who may be consequently distressed by the company creditors. The defenders seem to go on, in this attempt to escape from the construction, is really something more than some vague notion assumed common-law liability of the directors, to an award of ration as the penalty of their so over-trading. In any ordinary case would plainly be no such liability; and, in the cases most like would be no shadow even of equity in seeking to subject them. There is, in point of fact, it must always be remembered, no contract that no engagement shall ever be entered into beyond capital. Now, suppose the whole of that capital paid up, and it fits, under an admirable system of management, and that the directors increase those profits, contract for 100 more cows, and a correct new cow-houses, could it ever be said that this was a malversa the event of any ultimate miscarriage, they would be made liable in their own persons, and without relief from their partners? And plainly be no such liability at common-law, how is it possible to it out of a provision in the contract which makes no distinction and other partners; and, instead of imposing any extraordinary members, consists wholly in a declaration (as the defenders, at they shall all be freed from the common and natural liability of

“But the radical fallacy of the defenders’ attempt to palliate sequences of their doctrine is, that it is not true, in point of fact, of copartnership alleged by the defenders to import an absolute No. 264: n of the liabilities of the partners inter se, to the amount of the

June 2, 1837.
 Macalister v.
 Alexander.

orth of new buildings; these undoubtedly would be engagements within ers, and the line of their duty, even according to the rigid and imaginary of the defenders. But suppose the bank to fail—the cows to die of —the houses to be destroyed by fire, and the whole concern to be broken the prices of these articles were paid, and then suppose that the sellers actors should sue an individual partner for those company debts, and creet against him, could it be seriously maintained that he should have whatever against his partners, but be obliged to pay £7000 of company of his own pocket, from the mere accident of his having been selected pany creditor in preference to all or any of those who were equally their diligence? Yet, if the defenders' reading of the provision in quese right one, this would be the inevitable consequence. The partners are elieve each other, to the extent of their subscribed capital, still unpaid; the supposed case, it is all paid, and the debts having been contracted re was abundant capital in the hands of the directors to answer them, shallow pretext of handing him over to them for indemnity would be

It is needless, indeed, to go to such an extreme case as has now been , for the purpose of testing the doctrine of the defenders, since, unless it that no company is to contract any debts or engagements after its subapital is paid up, however ample the stock in which that capital has been may be to answer them at the time, it is obvious that unavoidable mis-may reduce the creditors to the necessity of coming on individual partners action, and that the most unheard of injustice must be done, if they were eluded from all claim of relief on their associates.

Lord Ordinary is satisfied, therefore, that this cannot be the meaning t of the provision relied on by the defenders; and the next question, , is, what then is its meaning, and how are the words of it to be satisfied?
 ords no doubt are awkward and ill-assorted, but to him he will confess y seem of very little importance; the whole passage from the word
 'g,' in the first line of the page to the end of the article, being, in his little more than an idle amplification of the elementary principle of all rships, and which would be implied, though not once mentioned in the viz. that the partners should share profit and loss according to their in the concern, the words, 'but only to the extent of, and in proportion' shares therein,' being merely a clumsy and tautological way of expressing tional liability, and which, with a slight variance, might have been more rded, as follow, 'but each only to an extent proportional to his share in c of the said company.'

though the Lord Ordinary inclines strongly to think this, and no more, meaning of the words in question, he conceives that the peculiar form of on may be explained by one or two suppositions equally inconsistent with s of the defenders, and either of them far preferable to their interpreta-The clause, it will be observed, sets out with declaring generally, and with-ification, that the partners 'shall have right to the profits, and be liable to es arising upon the said business,' and it is only after having made this and absolute provision that it proceeds to say, 'and shall be bound to each other of the debts and engagements of the company, but only to nt of, and in proportion to their shares. Now, the Lord Ordinary would that the debts and engagements of the company thus contradistinguish-its losses, may have been meant of such debts and engagements only t be satisfied without loss to the company, as being within the amount unpaid up shares of the several partners, and that the limitation meant no n this, that when any individual partner was distressed for debts of this ion, he was to be entitled to proportional and total relief from the rest, he extent only of those unpaid shares, by means of which the matter might,

the defenders being either truly and literally losses, or debts as which remain after all the subscribed stock has been applied to satisfaction.

"The second supposition (which is not inconsistent with the which a just and reasonable meaning may be given to the words that they were intended not to cut off the inherent right of a debtor to equal relief from the others, but only to oblige him to seek it and proportionally from them all; to deprive him, in short, of the right to an extraneous creditor of the company, of selecting one to bear the common burden, and to make it necessary at once to convene all to come against each only to the extent of the proportion indicated of his share in the concern. This, it is conceived, was a proper object, and will fully explain and satisfy the words of the provision.

"Understood in this sense, too, it has been carefully attended to by the court in framing their summons, the conclusions being directed against the solvent partners of the company, and only for their rateable shares of the sums demanded.

"If the case had admitted of no other solution, the Lord Ordinary adopted either of these constructions in preference to that of the defender, indeed he is strongly inclined to the views on which the last of them is based. But he has already stated, that he considers both as unnecessary, on the whole, that the words so much relied on are mere surplusage, nothing more than what was already expressed, and would be implied, if the whole clause had been omitted. One main reason for this is derived from the tenor of that part of the second head or article in which the whole of the passage, already referred to in the first article, is fully repeated, with one or two slight verbal changes, and the remainder of the words, 'but only to the extent of,' on which the whole case depends. From the words, 'bind and oblige,' in the fourth line of the article, to 'shares of the capital stock,' in the ninth line, the whole is repeated of the passage in the first article, including the obligation of so much has been said, and the material thing is, that this obligation is expressed in the second edition, without any limitation, except the proportion to the interest in the stock. It now runs thus:—'and the s or directors of the said company had no right to begin business, No. 264 power to bind the partners for any debts or obligations, on behalf

June 2, 183
Macallister v
Alexander.

clause, the partners are bound to relieve each other only to the extent of, proportion to their subscribed capital unpaid, and by the other, they are to relieve each other in proportion to their interests in that subscribed capital. The meaning of the last, there can be no doubt, and that meaning is entirely conformable to justice and common law. The former is in some measure ambiguous and admits, as has been seen, of various interpretations; and, according to different constructions, it is utterly repugnant to justice, and without example. If it admitted of no other construction but this, one of the contradictions must give way, and the Lord Ordinary conceives that it cannot be which stands last in the deed, and is alone conformable to equity and general principle. If it does admit of construction, however, there can be no better guide to the meaning than the immediate subsequent clause, in which the whole matter is settled, with direct reference to the specific capital which had not been previously his leading defence is not maintainable on the first article of the contract itself, it is plainly in vain to hope that it may be aided by any of the rest. A special restriction upon borrowing in the close of the 8th article, will be noticed in due time to the last defence. But as to any bearing it may be supposed to have, first, it is enough to observe,—1st, that it relates expressly to the directors, and not to partners generally; and, 2d, that it would obviously have been unnecessary if the first article had imported what the defenders now allege.

The ninth article again plainly relates exclusively to calls on the partners for payments of their subscribed capital, and to nothing else. It regulates in great detail the forms of such calls, and the subsequent proviso that the directors shall have power thus to call for any sum beyond that subscribed, manifestly relates to calls only, and not to actions of relief by partners distressed for company money in seeking to equalize the burden of its losses, after its business is at an end. The proviso was probably unnecessary; but it was apparently suggested by the wording of an earlier part of the same article, in which the directors are directed to make their calls ‘at such times, and to such amount as they shall think proper.’ In fact, it is precisely equivalent to a parenthesis like this after the word ‘amount’ ‘(but never exceeding the sum subscribed by each such partner),’ which would have been a better way of expressing, what might very well have been implied, and would obviously have afforded no room for the strained construction of the defenders.

The only other article referred to in relation to this first defence was the 13th, which, when fully considered, it appears to make strongly against the views of the defenders. It relates to the right of a partner allowed to retire, or to sell his shares, and to be relieved of all antecedent debts, &c., of the company. It first provides, that he shall be entitled to relief of the whole of such debts, and then the other partners are obliged to oblige themselves severally to relieve him in proportion to their shares, to the extent of their liability herein before expressed. Now, at the very most, this clause only falls back on the original definition or measure of liability, and tends in no way to limit or define it. But looking to the clear and unqualified right of the retiring partner to be at all events relieved of the whole debts and obligations, and finding that on the defender's view of this original liability, he could have no relief at all, in the very probable case of the whole subscribed capital being paid up, and the creditors came to him for payment, it seems obvious that this liability cannot be so limited as they allege, without imputing to this provision the most glaring inconsistency, as well as the grossest injustice.

With regard to the defence rested on the allegation that the directors had no power to begin business, or undertake engagements for the company, till the whole of £50,000 was subscribed, it is not necessary to consider, whether there be any cases where such a ground of pleading might be admitted. It is

As the Lord Ordinary it appears, that no party signing this contract to pretend ignorance of what had been done or sanctioned at these meetings. But the matter is not left to implication, for, in the 8th article, deliberately subscribed by the defenders, the directors are, in empowered 'to complete and carry into effect the purchases made 'Wheatfield and Meadowbank, and to take measures for the erection and accommodation for the establishment, and to enter into all contracts necessary, &c. Now, the lands of Wheatfield had been already bought for £12,000, and the lands of Meadowbank for £9,750; and yet the directors, on their responsibility, to carry into effect those purchases, grant all necessary deeds for that purpose. It is quite in vain to say, who thus expressly recognised and adopted, as acts of the company, four months before, and when there was not one farthing of actual capital must be held (upon mere implication) to have meant that nothing be done till £50,000 had been actually collected: And that when buildings to be erected on the lands so purchased, they had no notion of any contract being entered into for that purpose, till this was secured. If they declared it right and laudable to lay out £20,000 of capital at all, it is extravagant to say, that they would have reproached themselves with contracting for necessary buildings to the extent of £9000, with subscribed capital of only £20,150. The directors accordingly entered into such a contract, and the buildings were actually in progress before the defenders subscribed. The Lord Ordinary cannot think it doubtful, but fully warranted in so doing, by the express terms of the contract as recited. But in this way the company was bound, by the express acts of the defenders and the other subscribers, and before a single subscription to the extent of more than £30,000, which was the true origin of the loss, and in fact, with the other unavoidable expenses of the company, authorized, the source of the whole losses which have been sustained.

"This alone might dispose of the defence, that the directors have exposed the partners to hazard, or to bind them in any obligation, before capital was subscribed. But there is another provision in the contract separately conclusive upon this head: This is the latter part of the provision of the contract by which the defenders allege that the powers of the directors to borrow money, on the responsibility of the company

No.
June 2,
Macalis
Alexand

of substance and effect, they were so retained, and as completely at the disposal of the company and its managers, as if a minute to this effect had been formally engrossed in the books. That it was not so engrossed may be an impeachment of their book-keeping or accuracy in entering their transactions, but can never deprive them of the substantial power, under which they have really acted, or subject them to forfeitures as for breach of an imaginary interdict against entering on business till all the shares are actually taken by individual partners, in the very face of this express license and permission to the contrary.

"The last defence disposed of by the preceding interlocutor, is that founded on the concluding part of the 8th article of the contract, by which the directors are empowered to borrow 'on the credit and security of the company,' to the extent of £3000, provided there is subscribed capital unpaid up to that amount at the time. This, though properly an empowering clause, is contended to import a prohibition to borrow, except on those conditions, and this prohibition, the defenders say, the directors have violated, by borrowing to a much larger extent, and when there was no such unpaid capital, and they maintain they cannot be called on to relieve them of the consequence of such borrowings.

"Now, the short answer to this is, that there have been no borrowings 'on the credit and security of the company' to a greater extent than is permitted by the contract;—that the greater part of the transactions complained of under that name consisted merely in granting new securities for debts previously existing, and recognised in the contract itself, and the remainder in raising money on the personal credit of individual partners or directors, and afterwards advancing it to pay off the most pressing of the existing debts of the company. According to the Lord Ordinary's impression, there is no one case in which money has been raised, directly or indirectly, on the company's account, in order to extend its business (the case evidently contemplated in the provision referred to), or for any other purpose than to satisfy the claims to which the company was liable from the very beginning, or which ought to have been defrayed by the withheld instalments on the subscribed capital. It is needless to go here into the details of those proceedings; but with the exception of the sums actually advanced for those purposes out of the private funds of individual directors, the Lord Ordinary is not of opinion that any farther investigation is necessary. With regard to these, a question may no doubt be raised, whether the condition of the company was not such as to have made it the duty of the directors rather to have allowed the creditors, whom they thus pacified with their own money, to have proceeded with diligence against its property, than to have delayed an inevitable catastrophe by such interference. If the defenders can make out any case of gross and pernicious imprudence of this kind, it will be open to them to do so under the preceding interlocutor, which merely finds that these were not acts of borrowing on the credit and security of the company in contravention of the contract. To him it certainly occurs that it would be next to impossible to make out such a case. By paying the most urgent debts of the company with their own money, they may have done no real service to the concern. But they would seem entitled, at all events, to come in the place of the stranger creditors, whose proceedings they thus arrested, and against whose claims it is admitted that the defenders would have had no protection.

"In these circumstances, it is needless to inquire into the justness of the legal presumption, that the grant of a limited power in a contract of this description implies a penal prohibition against exceeding the limit, as in every case to infer the forfeiture of equitable rights, otherwise competent at common law, to persons in the situation of the pursuers; and it is equally unnecessary to consider the effect of the declaration, which immediately precedes this implied prohibition, viz. 'that powers of the directors shall, in all particulars, be subject to such limitations, is not provided for by the general law of partnership. If any departure from common law is intended it must be clearly expressed and without ambiguity. It is not, however, a correct rule of interpretation in case of ambiguity to introduce something for which provision is already made by the common law. It must necessarily be contrary to the common law. Looking at the contract as to the first point of the liability of the parties inter se, the limitation as the defenders contend for had been meant to be introduced. I expect this to have been done in the most specific terms, and in a clause not objected to by any other. I should not have looked for it in the first or second clause of the contract. The first describes the company generally, and is where the details are given that such a limitation is to be looked for. The second declaration is only in majorem cautelam, and its words apply to profits as well as to the losses and engagements of the partners. In the first clause the words "to the extent of" are left out. The true interpretation of the expression in question in the first clause is that it refers only to the shares, and there is no other clause leading to a different interpretation. The parties do not seem to have contemplated loss, but if they meant that entering into engagements beyond the amount of their subscribed capital was not to have relief, there should have been a distinct provision limiting the Acts of the directors as sanctioned at meetings of partners to an extent not exceeding the sums ever paid up. I see nothing in the 8th clause which has been contended for. It gives power to borrow £3000 without calling a meeting. The 9th clause alludes solely to calls upon the partners for shares, although that matter was provided for at common law. The context shows the meaning of the words used, and both the first and last parts of the clause show such calls. The 13th clause follows up the 11th, which gave a power to call, and contains a provision beyond the common law. I entirely concur with the Lord Ordinary in regard to the first defence. As to the second defence and nothing but the power to recover by calls; I do not say that the directors No. 264 d have borrowed more than £3000, but in a question of indemnification for ls and advances, the limitation contended for does not apply. The Lord June 2, 1837 inary reserves all special objections, and only repels these general Anderson v. nces. Buchanan.

ORD GLENLEE.—I cannot hesitate in being of the same opinion as to the two findings; and as to the third finding, the Lord Ordinary only repels the nce on the clause as to the power of borrowing; in so far as a defence is mained that the debt in question was not one for which the pursuers were entitled claim against the partners, that is not disposed of but is still reserved. The only t omitted in the discussion is whether the directors might not have left the itors to attach the property.

ORDS JUSTICE-CLERK and MEADOWBANK concurred.

THE COURT accordingly adhered, reserving all questions of expenses.

is HUNTER, JUN., W.S.—ALEXANDER DOUGLAS, W.S.—TOD and HILL, W.S.—THOMAS INNES, W.S.—Agents.

MRS TORRY ANDERSON and SPOUSE, Pursuers.—Penney. No. 265 WILLIAM BUCHANAN and OTHERS, Defenders.—A. Wood—Ivory—
W. Bell.

Husband and Wife—Trust—Revocation.—A trust having been constituted by oman before her marriage, in gremio of a marriage-contract, whereby the jus iti was excluded, in regard to her own heritable property, and for her behoof usively, no rights or interests being created by the trust in favour of third ies, and it being declared to be irrevocable,—Held that such trust was not cable during the marriage, at the pleasure of the granter, with consent of her and; but observed, that it might be revoked on the death of the husband, the s of granting being then removed.

HE pursuers, Mr and Mrs Torry Anderson, were married in 1828, June 2, 183 latter being possessed of entailed property to a considerable amount. 2D DIVISION:
 In a view to the marriage, they executed an antenuptial contract, in Lord Jeffrey ie of which a trust was constituted for behoof of Mrs Anderson. T. contract set forth that she had made certain settlements on her ded husband, to take effect on her death; but that it had been wanted and conditioned, “and expressly agreed to by the said as Gordon Torry, that during her life he should have no title to, interest or concern in, the rents, issues, and annual profits of the s and estates of Tushilaw,” &c., and that the said subjects should not ble to his debts or deeds, &c. Upon this narrative, the deed pro-as follows:—“And in order to give full effect to the foresaid on and agreement, the said Thomas Gordon Torry renounces, upgives, and overgives to and in favour of the said Mrs Ann integrity and ability of the persons after-mentioned, for it has given, granted, and disposed, and does hereby, with advice and assent of the said Thomas Gordon Torry, alienate, and dispose to, and in favour of William Buchan &c.

The purposes of the trust were thus set forth :—"Provided as it is hereby specially provided and declared, that these [granted to the said William Buchanan, James Buchanan, and Gardner, and to the survivors or survivor of them, as aforesaid always, for the sole and separate behoof of the said Mrs A Simmons Gaskin Anderson, and for the purpose of preserving alone, and in her own person, the whole right, title, and interest in the subjects before disposed, and thereby giving complete effect to the stipulations before written, and rent the said Thomas Gordon Torry, of the rights and privileges [otherwise belong to him, in consequence of the said intention for effectuating which ends and purposes, it is hereby declared said William Buchanan, James Buchanan, and William C the survivors or survivor of them, shall be bound and obliged in acceptance hereof, they expressly bind and oblige the hold just count, reckoning, and payment to the said Mrs A Simmons Gaskin Anderson, for their whole intromissions with subjects before conveyed, rents, issues, and annual profits [particularly, that they shall be bound and obliged yearly, and during all the days of her life, to pay over to her the free the said rents, malls, duties, and annualrents after deduct sents shall not be revocable by me on any ground or in any form No. 265

 .” The trustees received no power, either expressly or by June 2, 183 on, to resign the trust or to assume new trustees. The trust Anderson v. a to the survivors or survivor of them. Buchanan.

16, Mrs Anderson, “with consent and concurrence of Anderson, and, and he for his interest,” raised action against the defenders, William Buchanan and James Buchanan, trustees under her contract, and against the late Mr Gardner, W.S., the agent for proceeding on the narrative, that “the pursuer having become for various reasons, to put an end to the said trust; and being on that her property would be better and more expediently
 , and equally well secured for her behoof, without the interventhe said trust, did accordingly, with her husband’s consent, to the said trustees, that she revoked and recalled the said trust-n, and declared the trust, at least as constituted in their favour,
 , and called on them to denude of the same, simply in favour of r at least in favour of such other trustees as she shall name and but the said trustees have in reply maintained that they were and bound to maintain and keep up the said trust, and to the possession and management of the property in terms

Thereupon, after a recital of the trust, the summons concluded, it should be found and declared that the trust-disposition, anted exclusively for behoof of Mrs Anderson, was and is by her at pleasure, and has been duly and validly revoked by consent of her husband, and that the trust was extinguished and d, and farther, that the trustees should be decerned to reconvey erty to her; or, 2dly, And alternatively, that she had full power, sent of her husband, to invest such new trustees as they may and appoint, instead of the defenders, with the whole trust-

There was likewise a conclusion for count and reckoning, as departed from on the subsequent decease of Mr Gardner.
 ence against the declaratory conclusions it was pleaded generally trust was not revocable, but that if the contrary should be held, ees were entitled to a decree of the Court declaring their n with the trust-estate to have been brought legally to an end, ering them of their actings under the trust.

Lord Ordinary reported the question on cases, adding to his tor the subjoined note.*

---

e Lord Ordinary is inclined to hold that the trust may be revoked by in this case, especially considering the consent or non-repugnantia of ee. He takes it to be a principle of universal application in the law and of Scotland, that no party can judicially resist, or enforce, any demand, ing able to qualify an interest, as well as a formal title, so to enforce or resist. Now a trustee has, as such, no legal interest but that whose benefit the trust has been created. But in this case, truster herself, and she only resumes her own property, when trustees or commissioners to denude. That the deed bears, irrevocable, would seem to be of little consequence, where the interest concerned but that of the party by whose free will inserted, and who may afterwards will to recall them. In the entirely sui juris at both periods, such words truly amount to expression of present purpose, which may of course be supersede of altered purpose, whenever that may occur. If it be said that is in one sense a different person, and one requiring more protect individual, who, for the very purpose of being so protected, ma trust, while she was yet unmarried, it may be answered, 1st, T only person for whose benefit the trust subsists; 2d, That the is it considers sufficient protection to such persons, by making all husband and wife revocable; and, 3d, That a wife, with the co husband, is by law, as entire a person, and in all respects as cap a single woman can ever be. In fact, a man (or an unmarried disposition, has much less protection against the influence of than a married woman, and if a trust created by such perso exclusive interest, may be recalled at pleasure, though in tern irrevocable, it is not easy to see why the same rule should not b a case as the present.

"The case of voluntary interdiction may offer some analogy revocable at the mere will of the party, it may be recalled with interdictors, and the trustees here are quite willing to denude.

"But though this be the leaning of the Lord Ordinary's c disposed to decide a new question of this magnitude on his o and thinks it desirable, on every account, that it should at on deliberate judgment of the whole Court. In England, it is a trust of this kind would be clearly irrevocable; and even with interdiction some judicial enquiry is generally requisite to show er separate property, is competent to act in all respects as if she were femme seule.”<sup>1</sup> No. 26

Supposing the trust to be sua natura revocable, the clause declaring it revocable—the clausula derogatoria of the Roman law—must be operative on two views, first, That where the law affixes a certain intrinsic character to a deed, such as revocability, no mere declaration by the party can effectually control the declaration of law on the subject; and, second, That where the matter is one in which the granter of the deed is exclusively interested, and no other person is concerned, there is no act involved, by means of which the declaration is capable of being resisted, and a contrary declaration resisted at the instance of any party ever.

June 2, 1836
Anderson v
Buchanan.

argued for the Trustees—

The object of the trust was to protect the wife against the influence of her husband by the absolute surrender of her own power over her property, in order to prevent that power being exercised upon his suggestions or under his influence. But if it be nevertheless competent for her to resume her power, then the consequence is that that very influence of the husband is let in which it was the primary purpose of the trust to exclude, and the deed is rendered useless by those very means, the operation of which it was intended to annihilate, the presumption being that, when the woman comes to wish to recall the deed, she does so through the suggestions or influence of her husband. Even if he has obtained his jus mariti and right of administration, she might by his suggestions be persuaded to surrender any benefit that might thence have accrued to her—she might consent to the renunciation being revoked, and her estate to be applied by her husband to his own purposes, at which event the trust was meant to provide.

The cause was put out for advising December 22, 1836, when the Lord Ordinary, “in respect of the novelty of the case, and the opinion expressed by the Lord Ordinary in his note, directed the question to be laid before the whole Judges for their opinion.”

lancy's Law of Husband and Wife, p. 292; Roper's Law of Husband and Wife, c. 16.

Voet,* ii. 14, 20, and xvii. i. 17; Dig. 32; iii. 22; Bacon's Maxims of the Law of England; Wood's Institutes of the Law of England, p. 288; Black's Law Dict. voce Revocation; Bankton, i. 23, 4, and iv. 45, 62; Erskine, Questiones Juris, lib. 3, cap. 6.

The rule of the Roman law is thus laid down by Voet:—“Jurtilia sunt, quibus dominus sibi de re sua arbitrium ac moderamen adimit, quoties inde alterum utilitas pervenit.” there would be no room for a question. It is upon the reason of a woman, in such circumstances, thus effectually to protect her from the influence or solicitations of her husband, that the judges, who were the defences, are understood to have rested their opinions. Now, in deference to these opinions, I find it impossible to concur in them. In this place, I have great difficulty in understanding how the mere reasonableness of an object can justify us in dispensing with settled rules in the way of its attainment. If it be unquestionable that, in all cases for the sole behoof of the grantor may be recalled by the grantee, with no precedent or authority for holding that the case of a married woman, would the mere expediency of such an exception be a good reason, could a court of law be warranted in introducing it? Such a decision would be a novelty; and I cannot find that it would have any analogy of any of the provisions which the law has actually made. Our law, in this respect, has been peculiarly provident and wise in empowering women, entering on matrimony, effectually to exclude their husbands; and to revoke, at any time, any act or deed, in the largest sense, be held to import a donation, appears to have done all that of its framers thought requisite for their protection. The doctrine and dicta on these subjects, form a large chapter in our jurisprudence. I am not aware that, in any part of it, there is to be found a trace of anything intended for by the defenders.

There seems to be no ground, therefore, for referring the privilege to any peculiarity in the relation of husband and wife; and therefore on its assumed reasonableness or equity in general. On its true foundation, it ought plainly to be extended to many other trusts constituted by a woman about to marry. A single woman's estate may frequently need all the protection which the law can set forward by the defenders really is. The trust is declared in the contract absolutely "irrevocable, on any ground whatever;" and it is expressly constituted "for all the days of her life." Yet, it is not pretended by the defenders, it could be maintained against the granter, in these terms, or to this extent. It is held, upon some tacit and undefined canon of construction, to be really operative only against the husband; at least, it is only justified upon the alleged danger of solicitations. Is it to become revocable therefore, in spite of its express terms, the moment he dies? and, if not actually recalled till she marries a second husband, is it then to become irrevocable again? and though occurring only in her nuptial contract with Mr Gordon Torry, is it to be all-powerful to restrain her natural weaknesses towards Mr Somebody else? Then, is it a trust only that is to be thus irrevocable while the granter is under coverture? or why should not the same privilege be extended to all deeds of faculty or commission granted on a similar narrative, and in parallel terms: that is, irrevocably and for all the days of life? The ground of the defenders' case is, that if they now denude of the trust, the husband will gain some undue advantage: and that, in asking them to maintain it, the wife must be held to intend some lavish favour to him. This may or may not be, quod plerumque fit, even after ten years marriage; but is the probability so overwhelming, even if the mischief were intolerable, as to warrant, on its supposition, the introduction of a disability as yet unheard of in our law? Suppose it were notorious that there is a deadly quarrel between the spouses, and that the wife seeks to get back the management of her estate, chiefly, in order that she may give it over to her son of a former marriage, the bitter foe of her husband; or suppose there has been a judicial separation; and that the husband is restricted, by terms of it, to a fixed share of the common property. Is the wife, in this case, to be disabled from revoking a trust-conveyance of her separate estate, executed before marriage for her own mere use and convenience? I confess I am not prepared to answer these questions; and that I do not see the urgency which calls upon us to admit the principle, upon which alone we can be required to answer them.

As to the suggestion that the wife, who now seeks to revoke the trust, is, in law, a new persona from the single woman who created it, it seems a sufficient answer that she is still the only person by whom, and for whose sake, it was created; and that, by our law, however it may be in other places, she is still recognised as the same identical person. Marriage, with us, reduces the woman to the condition, not of a pupil, but of a minor only: she is thereafter under the curatory, but not under the tutory of her husband; and though his concurrence is necessary to the validity of her acts, still she is the only proper and primary agent in all that relates to her property; and deals with it precisely as she might have done before marriage, except for the necessary authentication of her acts by his formal concurrence. I do not presume to know how the law of England would deal with a case like the present; as that law has not been put in evidence to us, in any way of which we can take cognizance. But from all I can conjecture or gather from the authorities, I conclude, that, if it would hold a trust like this to be irrevocable, it would be only because it holds a married woman to be utterly incapable of affecting or changing her investments of her heritage, even with the concurrence of her husband; a principle which most certainly is not recognised in our law.

As to the notion that the revocation of this trust should not be sanctioned, because it could only be effected with the concurrence of the husband, and that in

No. 26.

June 2, 1841

Anderson v

Buchanan.

intended, not to benefit, but to vex and annoy the husband, cannot be a worse predicament. If the wife, therefore, is entitled, with the legal curator, to make a direct disposition in his favour, I am unable to see how a mere surmise that the curator may derive a contingent benefit from it, while another person is prejudiced, can possibly affect such a revocation.

The fundamental question, therefore, continually recurs :—On what for whose interest do the defenders say they are bound and entitled to preserve the pursuer's property? They must answer that they hold it for the wife, and, unless it can be shown that her marriage has entirely extinguished her power of acting, so as to disable her even from granting receipts, it is not easy to see how it should prevent her from receiving exclusively her own, and over which no living creature has any sort of actual or contingent interest. The trustees, indisputably, have no right to do so personally; and being accountable only to those who have the benefit, they must necessarily be safe when the only person, having that benefit, must necessarily exonerate and discharge them. To allow them to hold against the interest of that person, I think would be a solecism in law; and that effect would, at the same time, afford the only instance, I believe, in which it has been found possible for a person, effectually to limit his property without constituting any right in it, present or future.

LORD COCKBURN.—I concur in the foregoing opinion.

LORD MONCHEIFF.—After giving all the attention in my power to the arguments of the parties in this cause, and to the views expressed by the learned counsel in consultation, I am of opinion, with Lord Jeffrey, that this trust is a gratuitous act of will, by Mrs Anderson, for the management of an only say, that I have found no authority and no precedent in the law of and, for holding that, in any case, a voluntary trust, the sole interest in either was from the first vested, or has come to be vested, in one individual, it be put an end to by the consent, or at the desire, of that individual; and I I have a strong apprehension of much inconvenience, and great hardship, in cases, arising from the introduction of a principle, which appears to me to tirely new in the law of trust in Scotland.

No. 265

June 2, 1837

Anderson v.
Buchanan.

re case is argued on the footing simply of this being the case of a married an, and of the marriage subsisting. But I apprehend, that it cannot be cory decided without necessarily involving a broader principle. It must be held the pursuer could not recal the trust, and that the trustees could not denude, though the husband were dead; for, if it could be extinguished in that case, ow of no principle on which it can be held that the same may not take place, gh the woman is in the married state. I am of opinion, that a married an, though under the curatory of her husband, in a certain qualified sense, is, gard to her separate heritable estate, as fully enabled and entitled by law to l legal acts with his consent, as any unmarried person. Such acts may, no t, be to her detriment, and in some cases may be liable to revocation by her, hey may also be to her great benefit, and very often of the most essential rtance to herself and the members of her family. And if a trust constituted rself for her own interest alone, is not in its own nature irrevocable, I appre-
 , that it is not the province of this Court, upon any views of expediency or nsions of the undue influence of husbands, to put a restraint upon the exercise of rights of property, which the law does not impose in any other

ARD FULLERTON.—I agree with Lords Jeffrey and Moncreiff, in the opinion this trust may be revoked by the pursuer, Mrs Anderson.

ere may be cases in which a trust, though existing for the sole benefit of a ular individual, is yet beyond the reach of her recal; as, for instance, when rust flows from another party, or when the creation of the trust, and the tion of power thence arising, truly form conditions of the grant. And again, a party by her own deed, creates, through the means of a trust, separate ndependent interests, the trust will subsist for the protection of those interests.
 he present case falls under neither of those descriptions.

ie trust here was the act of Mrs Anderson herself, for, in so far as I can see, sed no separate interests, either immediate or eventual, but was purely and ntely for her own benefit.

these circumstances, I think it must be within her control. For though it is red to be irrevocable, there is neither any separate person, nor any separate est, in regard to which the obligation not to revoke can be said to be acted.

the trustees held the subjects and the deed itself only for her behoof, it to me, that the clause is, in relation to her, of no greater force than if it contained in a conditional deed.

owed merely as a trust-deed, then, I think the deed was necessarily subject vocation; and the defence seems to me to involve the attempt to enforce, the form of a trust, a species of interdiction, for which I can see no autho-our practice.

THE PRESIDENT, GILLIES, and CUNINGHAME.—In order to form a correct substance of the marriage, and that the said subjects should not debts or deeds, nor subjected to the legal diligence of his creditor that may thereafter be contracted by him.

Upon that narrative, the contract and trust-conveyance proceed order to give full effect to the foresaid stipulation and agreement, the said Gordon Torry renounces, surrenders, upgives, and overgives to and the said Mrs Ann Vernona Simmons Gaskin Anderson, and the named, his jus mariti, right of courtesy, and all other right, title, privileges in, and to the means and estate of his said promise heritable and moveable, to which he might otherwise be legally entitled of the said contemplated marriage. In pursuance of which renunciation, the said Mrs Ann Vernona Simmons Gaskin Anderson, desirous, for various weighty and sufficient reasons, to vest the same in certain persons in trust, for her sole and separate use as after-mentioned of any jus mariti or other right on the part of her said intended husband, having full confidence in the integrity and ability of the persons appointed for that purpose, has given, granted, and disposed, and does hereby, with the special advice and assent of the said Thomas Gordon Torry, give, grant, and dispose to and in favour of William Buchanan, Esq., and James Buchanan, Esq. residing in Forth Street, Edinburgh; and William Buchanan, Esq. and the survivors or survivor of them, a majority to be a quorum, and the powers, and for the uses, ends, and purposes after specified, all the lands of Tushilaw," &c. (Here the trust-subjects are described).

The purposes of the trust are set forth in the following terms:—always, as it is hereby specially provided and declared, that the same be granted to the said William Buchanan, James Buchanan, and William Buchanan, and to the survivors or survivor of them, as aforesaid, in trust always and separate behoof of the said Mrs Ann Vernona Simmons Gaskin conveyed, rents, issues, and annual profits thereof, and particularly that they be bound and obliged yearly, and each year during all the days of her life, to pay over to her the free proceeds of the said rents, mails, duties, and annual- after deducting the expenses of collecting the same, including a reasonable allowance for trouble to factors or agents whom they may employ, and the whole expenses incident to the execution of this trust, and of the powers hereby committed to them, and that the simple discharge of the said Mrs Ann Vernona Simmons in Anderson, by herself alone, without the addition or consent of the said Thomas Gordon Torry, her intended husband, shall be a complete and full exoneration to them in the premises, at all hands, and against all persons.

No. 265
June 2, 1837
Anderson v.
Buchanan.

There was a subsequent clause to the following effect:—"And I declare that these presents shall not be revocable by me on any ground, or in any form, whatever."

The contract did not give the trustees any power, either expressly or by implication, to resign the trust. There was not even any power given to the trustees, or any of them, to assume any new trustees. But as shown above, the power was given to the survivors or survivor of the trustees.

Upon the faith of this contract the marriage was solemnized in 1828.

No deed of revocation has been produced, but the present action was brought in April, 1836;—and the summons runs in the name of the said Mrs Anderson, with the consent and concurrence of the said Thomas Gordon Torry Anderson, her intended husband, and him for his interest." This summons, it is material to observe, contains the following narrative:—"That the pursuer having become desirous, for various reasons, to put an end to the said trust, and being of opinion that her property would be better and more expediently managed, and equally well secured for her behoof, without the intervention of the said trust, did accordingly, with her intended husband's consent, intimate to the said trustees, that she revoked and recalled the said trust disposition, and declared the trust, at least as constituted in their favour, to be at an end, and called on them to denude of the same, simply in favour of herself, or at least in favour of such other trustees as she shall name and appoint; but the trustees have in reply maintained that they were entitled and bound to maintain and keep up the said trust, and to continue the possession and management of the property in terms thereof."

Upon that narrative, and upon a recital of the trust, the summons concludes, That it should be found and declared that the trust is extinguished and at an end, and that the trustees should be decerned to reconvey the property to her; and, And alternatively, that she has full power, with consent of her husband, to vest such new trustees as they may nominate and appoint, instead of the said trustees, with the whole trust property.

It is in this case that our opinion is asked on the right of the pursuers to revoke the trust. And we are humbly of opinion that she has no such right.

The trust having been created by the truster in contemplation of her marriage, and expressed in the contract, and manifestly to provide against the interference and influence of her husband, we should have held it to be very questionable, if it could have been recalled during the subsistence of the marriage, even if there had been no special clause barring revocation. But the present case is placed beyond doubt by the express declaration in the contract, "that these presents shall not be revocable by me on any ground or in any form whatever." of effecting this is, by a well arranged trust. Accordingly, such trusts, their terms and objects, according to the situation, rank, age, and the contracting parties, now form a numerous and important class of business of the world.

But the security of these trusts would be essentially impaired, and substantially abrogated, were they held to be revocable under an act by the granters, during the subsistence of the marriage. In the cases it would be invidious to state specifically the circumstances either of husband or wife, which render a trust of the whole or of a part of either expedient in a marriage contract. It has been hitherto thought that to create the trust in an antenuptial contract of marriage, the mode known in the law of Scotland, to render the security permanent, and irrevocable, during the marriage. But if it were found relevant for both spouses, to recall the trust, on new views emerging, or possibly on a change of purpose in the truster, then no trust of the kind could exist for one day, that it was the temporary interest of the spouses. The security would be extinguished at the very time, when it was to preserve it.

There is another important consideration which ought to be taken beyond the reach of the trusters. It is manifest, without reasoning, in favour of third parties, created by a wife in contemplation of marriage, to be presumed as intended to protect her from the anticipated husband, and to preserve her property more securely for her own use, after the marriage subsists. This security, however, can only be available so long as it is irremediably beyond the power of the wife herself, after the marriage. If its subsistence depends on her pleasure, it will of course be cancelled if the husband finds it convenient to ask it; or if in a few rare cases be a similar trust. It appears to us, however, that it is incumbent on the No. 265 requiring the aid of the Court, to sanction the recall of this trust, to show June 2, 1837 authority for their demand. No precedent to this effect has been cited. On Anderson v. trary, it has been stated, without contradiction, that, in the practice of Buchanan, where trusts have been longer known, and far more generally adopted than us, it is settled that such a trust, as the present, could not be recalled.

 We apprehend that there are well recognised principles in our law to preserve the entire in the present case.

In the first place, we hold it to be a rule of law, quite incontestable, that any trust is constituted for a legitimate and useful purpose, it must subsist till the purpose is fulfilled. Such a trust cannot be arbitrarily renounced or altered by the trusters re infecta. Hence, a trust for children must subsist till they are in a condition to take or dispose of the trust-fund. The trusters cannot alter; and if they fail, this Court will name a judicial factor for holding and managing the fund.

In the next place, we conceive that the purpose of the trust, in the present case, is as yet unfulfilled, and must be so during the subsistence of the marriage.

A trust constituted before marriage, in special and express terms, to the wife of all management of particular estates, and to vest the same in her trustees, and thus render more effectual an exclusion of the future husband jus mariti. It must be presumed, that that was made advisedly and for good and sufficient reasons. Hence, the parties must be held to have meant that the trust should subsist, and be in operation during the subsistence of the mar-

Till the marriage is dissolved, therefore, the circumstances or considerations which were held to continue in full force, which gave rise to and induced the trustor to create the trust.

Although it is possible that many cases may have arisen in which parties who have executed a trust rashly, and declared it irrevocable, will be entitled to recall it, the present case falls, in no respect, within that class. Not only was the purpose of the trust legitimate and proper, in the present case, but there cannot be any recall so long as the marriage subsists, any consent to recall it, of the same nature, and adhibited under the same circumstances under which the original trust was constituted. The trust here was created by a party, sui juris, when she was free and unfettered. It is now proposed to be recalled by an alleged consent given by her, when she is not in that condition, but when, on the contrary, she is under curatory, and sub potestate mariti.

There cannot, therefore, be the same consent at present to the dissolution of the trust as there was to its original constitution.

Finally, there is another consideration founded in the principles of the law of Scotland, which, we think, not only renders it very difficult for the pursuer to obtain a valid revocation of such a trust as that now in question, constituted by deed before marriage; but would make it most hazardous for the trustees or others to assent to it. Any deed revoking the trust must, according to our law and practice, be executed also by the husband as the curator of the wife. The revocation must be null without such consent. But as the trust manifestly was created in consequence of a distrust of the husband, and in bar of his right of administration or of his quoad the properties conveyed in trust, his consent given to the revocation would be a consent for his own benefit, and as he would thus be auctor in rem suam, we doubt if it would be valid to any extent.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I concur in the above with this exception, I doubt that a wife may recall a trust constituted by her for the management of her estate, but not declared irrevocable. I have only further to observe, that the trust, in this case may, by fair and reasonable interpretation, be limited to the duration of the existence of the marriage. And that it appears to me that such a trust, constituted in a marriage contract, may be as different in kind from an ordinary trust constituted by one person for his own purposes. A marriage contract has effects that extend even beyond the death of both husband and wife, of which the exclusion of the legitim by a husband affords a striking example. But even looking to these two parties to the trust as this, which vests in the trustees a right as against the husband for the protection of the wife from the acts of both, or either, of these parties to the marriage, seems to be of a different kind from ordinary trusts constituted by A and B.

LORD CORNHILL.—I concur in the above opinion.

The case was this day put out for advising.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I had formed an opinion in accordance with the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, and still retain that opinion. The circumstance of a trust occurring in the marriage contract ought to have no weight. The trust is regulated by the contract independent of the trust-settlement. The trust is established solely for behoof of Mrs Anderson, who is alone benefited by it. I am at a loss to know on what principle she should not have it in her power to recall it as in any other case of a trust.

LORD MEADOWBANK concurred with the opinions of the consulted voke it. I am also moved by hearing that in England the same course would be allowed in regard to such a trust. I think the trust, therefore, not able. No. 265.

June 3, 1837.
Maben v. Perkins.

LORD GLENLEE.—On looking to the Lord Ordinary's note, he states the authorities which have prevailed with me to think this trust irrevocable. If a husband had no other cause of granting than the mere pleasure of the granter, it would be held to hold it not revocable ad arbitrium of the granter, notwithstanding of a husband declaring that it should be irrevocable. But it is different if there have been a just and proper cause originally, and that cause still subsists, and this meets the observation of some of the Judges. I do not think it is the worse of being a species of interdiction. The Court will not allow a deed of interdiction to be recalled unless the cause of it is removed, as in cases where they have sent one of their own number to visit the parties, and see if they are rei suæ providi. On the whole, I am for finding that the deed is not revocable, and I agree in the opinion drawn by Lord Cuninghame. Supposing the husband dies the cause has ended, and the deed may be revoked.

THE COURT, in respect of the opinions of the majority of Judges, found that the deed in question was not revocable, and assoilzied the defenders from the conclusion of the libel thereanent.

F. J. SMITH, S.S.C.—J. and J. M. BALFOUR, W.S.—J. F. SMITH, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN MABEN (Arnott's Trustee), Pursuer.—M'Neill—G. G. Bell. No. 266.
JOHN PERKINS and ALEXANDER MILLER, Defenders.—Anderson.

Bankruptcy—Process—Res Judicata—Interest.—1. The clerk or shopman of a bankrupt was employed by the trustee after sequestration; he made a claim which included arrears of salary incurred prior to sequestration, as well as an advance for his services since that period; the trustee, with the sanction of the commissioners, paid him a sum of money and obtained a settlement of the claim: it was held that such payment could not be sustained, in so far as it was made on account of wages or services prior to sequestration, and that the sanction of the commissioners did not warrant the trustee in giving a preference, out of the funds of the estate, to an ordinary debt of the bankrupt. 2. A bankrupt, with concurrence of his trustee, petitioned for discharge; some of the creditors successfully opposed the petition, and the Court found the bankrupt liable in expenses, and the trustee also liable "qua trustee:" the trustee afterwards resigned, and a new trustee raised an action against him for these expenses, alleging that he had acted secretly and in collusion with the bankrupt, in getting up the petition for discharge: Held that the former judgment had not the effect of barring the trustee from seeking relief against the ex-trustee, personally, if sufficient grounds were shown for subjecting him. 3. Where a record was closed, and it appeared necessary for the due administration of justice between the parties, that a farther inquiry and investigation should be made on one branch of the cause involving allegations of fraud and collusion—Remit made to the Lord Ordinary to open up the record in regard thereto, and to receive a more special and articulate condescendence on the facts in proof of the fraud and collusion alleged. 4. Where a trustee had paid sums which were not due, and besides debiting him with these sums the penal interest of 20 per cent, upon them, was claimed from him—Held, that if he made the payments in mala fide, he was not liable in such interest.

the bankrupt prior thereto. The payment was sanctioned by the commissioners. Maben objected, that, in so far as the payment was for services to the bankrupt, they just formed a common charge against the bankrupt, upon which no more than a composition along with the other debts, and the commissioners had no power, by their sanction, to authorize payment of more than a composition upon any ordinary debt. The defenders attend that the arrangement made with Cameron was of the nature of a composition, under which a claim, including arrears of salary, amount, had been adjusted for a smaller sum in virtue of the sanction of the trustee and commissioners to transact doubtful claims. The claimant pleaded separately that as the commissioners had sanctioned the arrangement, the trustee was entitled to credit for it in account with the creditors.

2. One of the commissioners was a professional accountant who had paid to him an account of £38, 6s. for professional business of the trust-estate. Maben objected to credit being allowed for the payment, alleging that the business fell properly within the province of the commissioner, and also that a commissioner ought not to be employed, if any professional assistance was required. The defender alleged that the business was not within the province of a commissioner, that it was necessary to employ a professional accountant, that the trustee was entitled to employ a commissioner, at the usual rate, if he performed the business; and that the account incurred to him was due, and payment of it had been sanctioned by the other commissioners.

A petition to that effect was presented by the bankrupt with No. 266. force of Perkins. Some of the creditors opposed it, alleging that and the bankrupt were acting in collusion; that the offer of June 3, 1837. tion was inadequate, and that the affairs of the estate were not Maben v. Perkins. closed, &c. The petition was refused, and the opposing creditors and entitled to their expenses. Perkins was found liable for the of expenses "qua trustee." In the subsequent action of ng, Maben, the new trustee, contended that for these expenses ing to £96, 17s. 11½d.) Perkins was personally liable. Al- in the bankrupt's petition for discharge, the Court had merely d the trust-estate, that did not foreclose the creditors, in the action, from seeking relief to the trust-estate, against Perkins lly, if they would instruct, as they offered to do, that he had acted ion with the bankrupt, and by his misrepresentations and conceal- gave rise to the judicial proceedings out of which this amount of s arose. Perkins answered, that, under the original petition, if rt had seen cause, they might have subjected him personally in s. But as he was merely subjected "qua trustee," this was in judgment that he was not personally liable in any question with litors, and that the trust-estate alone was so. He also pleaded re were no grounds for subjecting him in personal liability. here were various periods during which Perkins had a sum ng £50 in his hands, and on which therefore the penal interest er cent was due. But Maben farther contended, that, every sum ad been improperly paid away, such as the account paid to n, the account paid to the commissioner as accountant, &c. should ed as if still remaining in the hands of Perkins, and should be ed as bearing the penal interest of 20 per cent, if it raised the in Perkins's hands above £50. The defenders answered that the of the statute was only meant to apply to money actually kept in tee's own pocket while it should have been in the bank: and, in ar, that it never was meant to subject him in that penal liability ey which he had bona fide paid away, with the sanction of the ioners, on account of claims against the estate.

Lord Ordinary, on 7th March, 1837, found, "Primo, That in with the pursuer, the defender is entitled to have credit for the sums paid to Andrew Cameron, in so far as it can be shown that ere either due to him for wages on account of his services subse- to the sequestration, or in so far as the payment was sanctioned by missioners. Secundo, That the defender is not entitled to credit sum of £38, 6s., said to have been paid to Mr William Galloway, the commissioners. Tertio, That the pursuer is only entitled to e defender once with the sum of £29, 16s. 3½d. sterling, or with it thereof, on account of goods belonging to the bankrupt, but et appropriated by Perkins, the late trustee. Quarto, That the

266. pursuer is not entitled to debit the defender with the sum of 1837. 11½d. sterling, or any part of it, being the expenses incurred in the application for the bankrupt's composition and discharge, &c. of fraud on the part of the late trustee, on which this claim being set forth in the condescendence with sufficient relevancy tion to entitle the pursuer to a proof upon this point."

In regard to the second finding, it was understood to rest on ground that the business for which the account was charged, was within the province of a commissioner, and ought to have been tously performed. It was not reclaimed against.

His Lordship afterwards, on 9th March, 1837, after hearing as to the claim for penal interest, "repelled the defender's objection, claim, and found that Perkins, the late trustee, was liable in payment for sums above £50 kept by him in his hands above ten days, as defender, Alexander Miller, as his cautioner, is bound to satisfy to the extent of his bond; but found, that in computing the sums sums which have been found to have been improperly paid by Mr Galloway, or others, are not to be held as having been in his hand." *

Maben reclaimed against the first, third, and fourth findings interlocutor of 7th March, 1837, and against the finding, in the interlocutor, which exempted Perkins from liability for penal interest the sums which he had erroneously paid away. In regard to the finding above-mentioned, it depended on the terms of the record, the Court held to establish the true value of the goods bought to be £29, 16s. 3½d., and that he was only liable to account for once and no more.

LORD GILFILL.—This is a rather complicated case, but I do not the findings of the Lord Ordinary. In regard to the sum paid to the clerk, the first finding allows credit to the defenders on account of it it was on account of services subsequent to the sequestration; and right. But it farther sustains the payment, separately, "in so far as was sanctioned by the commissioners." I am not prepared to go the do not think that any sanction by the commissioners will entitle them convert a common debt into a preferable debt, or to pay any of the costs in full, at their pleasure. Their power of transacting doubtful claims different thing from that. As to the fourth finding respecting the expenses application for the bankrupt's discharge, I think it premature, and that to be more investigation. When the bankrupt was found personally expenses, and the trustee was subjected "qua trustee," that was just a

---

* NOTE.—"The defender candidly admitted at the bar, that upon principles lately acted upon in the House of Lords in the case of McTaggart, he believed, in consequence of the alleged negligence of the commissioners, not be maintained under the facts of this case."

trust-estate was liable to relieve those creditors who had successfully opposed No. 266. petition. The decree against "the trustee" just rendered the whole body of itors liable, per aversionem, for the expenses. But after this was done there June 3, 1857 other question whether they are not entitled to relief against the trustee. The Maben v.
ment in the petition is not enough to make Perkins personally liable to them ; Perkins.
neither is it enough to exempt him from personal liability, if otherwise he it to be subjected. And on this point I think there should be more enquiry re deciding. I am of the same opinion with respect to the question of penal rest. If Perkins made the several payments in bona fide, though acting under error as to the liability of the bankrupt estate, then I think there is no claim for d interest against him. But if he acted collusively and mala fide, then the n will lie.

ORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion with Lord Gillies. In regard he account paid to Cameron, if it had merely referred to services subsequent he sequestration, and it was alleged that too much had been allowed on that unt, I might consider that it fell within the province of the commissioners. the interlocutor finds, that, even as to services prior to the sequestration, the ment made is good if sanctioned by the commissioners. I cannot go so far as Payment of a debt due by the bankrupt is the most complete of all prefers, and I cannot hold that the commissioners possess any power of creating such rence. As to the expenses of opposing the petition for the bankrupt's dis-ge, it might very well happen that nothing appeared on the face of these eedings to warrant the Court in subjecting Perkins personally. There might only enough to warrant decree against the trust-estate. But after the trust-e was so subjected, the creditors were surely entitled to bring an action of f against Perkins, if it can be shown that it was through fraudulent or collusive act on his part that the judicial proceedings had been held which occasioned expenses. And as to the relevancy of the record on this point it appears to hat the averments made are broad enough, but that they are deficient in details.
this account an amendment of that part of the record, the 8th article of the uer's condescendence, should be allowed, and the question decided after a fuller ment of the facts. As to the penal interest, I can understand that where a ee makes a mere pretence of payments, or acts mala fide, he may be liable to d interest, just as if the sums were in his hands ; but not if he acts bona fide in ing erroneous payments.

ORD COREHOUSE.—I concur in the opinions which have been delivered. The tors have a clear right to ask relief of the expenses of the unsuccessful ion, if they can show sufficient grounds to entitle them to it. On that subject verments in art. 8th of the pursuer's condescendence, state relevant matter appears to me, but are not sufficiently specific. It is in our power to open up record and allow a more specific statement in regard to what is there ed. And I may add in regard to the question of penal interest, that it must ade clearly to appear that the payments were made mala fide, otherwise I not hold myself warranted in subjecting Perkins to penal interest upon the re, as if it had always been in his hands.

MR. PRESIDENT concurred.

MR. CLARK pronounced this interlocutor :—" Adhere to the interlocutor of 14th March, 1857, reclaimed against, and refuse the desire of the reclaiming

As to the article of £96, 17s. 11½d., as the amount of in opposing the bankrupt's composition and discharge, b to the Lord Ordinary with power to him to open the that article, and to require and receive a more spec condescendence of the facts in proof of the fraud and adhere to the interlocutor of the 9th March, 1837, reek refuse the desire of the reclaiming note as to the article therein disposed of; and remit the process to the proceed as shall be just, consistently with this interloc questions of expenses for future determination."

T. BAKER, S.S.C.—J. BIRSE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 267.      JOHN ATHOLL BANNATYNE MURRAY MACGREGOR, Patton.

Lease—Curator Bonis.—The curator bonis on the estate obtained a report from men of skill, bearing that under certain exorbitant rent was stipulated, and also specifying what was several lands; the report stated that in one of the leases a four stipulated when a five-shift rotation would be more beneficial curator petitioned for authority to reduce the rents, for the remaining lease, to the sum specified in the report, and to alter the crop farms to a five-shift rotation, or to accept renunciations of the service on the presumptive heir, and presumptive executors of besides the usual intimation, the Court granted the petition.

ended a change from the four-shift rotation specified in the lease to No. 26:
 shift rotation. In regard to another farm, Wester Logierait, let to June 7, 183
 I<sup>c</sup>Gillervie, the petitioner stated that it had been let by the late Duke Macgregor.
 t of £204, 7s., but that the fair rent of the lands appeared, from a y men of skill, to be only £173, 9s. And in reference to a third peedyhill, let to Widow Robertson, a rent of £40 was stipulated current lease, while the fair rent was reported to be £30. The er alleged as to these last two farms also, that it was injurious to rests of the estate to leave them under their present leases, as the were unable to pay the rents. He prayed for warrant of special of the petition on the brother and sisters of the Duke, as being vely his presumptive heir and executors; and for authority to the er, “as curator bonis to his Grace the Duke of Atholl, to reduce rent of the farm of East Nether Benchil, possessed by Wil-itchie, to a sum of not less than £116 sterling, and that for the d endurance of the present lease of said farm from a four to a five-tation: Also in like manner to reduce the rent paid by widow son, for the possession of Speedyhill, to a sum not less than £30, t during the term and endurance of the present lease of said farm:
 e rent presently payable for the farm of Wester Logierait by James ervie, to a sum not less than £173, 9s., and that for the term and ice of the present lease of said farm;—all as expressed and con-in the report of the said William and James Chalmers hereto ed; or to reduce the said rents to such reasonable sum as your ips may think a fair and proper rent for the said farms, or to accept ations of said leases.”<sup>1</sup>

r the petition was thus served, and was also intimated as usual, it vised by the Court.

o COREHOUSE.—I feel some doubt whether it is competent for the Court
 : this petition. I remember an occasion when Sir Ilay Campbell, then it of this Court, stated strongly and emphatically that the Court would ertake the duty of altering leases, but that if such alteration required to be he curator must do it on his own responsibility.

o GILLIES.—I think there are recent precedents where a similar petition as been granted, particularly in the management of the Billie estate.<sup>2</sup>

o MACKENZIE.—I am satisfied that there are such precedents.

o PRESIDENT.—I remember them also: I think the prayer of this petition be granted.

THE COURT accordingly granted the petition.

H. GRAHAM, W.S.—Agent.

Lean, June 25, 1828 (ante, VI. 1018); Peddie, Dec. 13, 1822 (ante, II. new ed. 79); Robertson, Jan. 24, 1823 (ante, II. 150; or new ed. 137); son, Dec. 13, 1823 (ante, II. 579; or new ed. 498). lne, March 10, 1836 (ante, XIV. 681); Milne, Feb. 25, 1836 (ante, XIV.
 Milne, Dec. 20, 1834 (ante, XIII. 222).

Greenock, was appointed factor loco tutoris. In 1837 Agn a petition stating that one of the children was now dead ; property left by the deceased James Galbraith, after payi was a tenement of houses yielding rents amounting to £50 besides one-sixth of a property, yielding £55 per annum, grandfather, under a settlement which, if successfully chall head of death-bed, by the eldest of the children, after he would cause the whole rental of £55, to fall to him ; that of the two children was eleven years of age ; that the p already in advance on their account for necessary disbu maintenance and education, to the amount of nearly £100 was necessary for him to obtain reimbursement. He prayed " to borrow the sum of £100, and grant security for the s heritable subjects under his management as factor loco tu apply the amount so borrowed in payment of his said adva loco tutoris for behoof of the said minors."

After a remit to the Lord Ordinary, his Lordship rep appeared to be necessary for the maintenance of the minors tion should be granted.

THE COURT granted the prayer of the petition.

J. B. GRACIE, W.S.—Agent.

altered the interlocutor in so far as to raise the modified sum to No. 26

June 9, 18

Stocks v.

ST, HUNTER, and WHITEHEAD, W.S.—SCOTT and BALDERSTON, W.S.—A. MACLEAN, Gardner.
W.S.—Agents.

ROBERT STOCKS, Suspender.—D. F. Hope—Marshall.
RS WHYTE OF GARDNER and OTHERS, Chargers.—Sol.-Gen.
Rutherford—Maitland.

No. 27

in Security—Interest—Accounting—Homologation.—A heritable bond d that the rate of interest for the first five years should not exceed 4 per be full legal rate was exigible after that period: the creditor lived for years after the lapse of that period, and after his death a question arose his representatives and the debtor, whether the interest had been conti-the rate of 4 per cent: Held, in the circumstances, that the debtor was le for more than 4 per cent, in respect, inter alia, that the creditor had, objection, received an account, and a balance from the debtor, on the foot-the interest continued at that rate, and also that the market rate of interest he years in dispute, did not exceed 4 per cent.

REL of the case reported ante, February 13, 1836,<sup>1</sup> which see. June 9, 18 argers, as representatives of the late Provost Whyte of Kinghorn, 1st Divisi heritable bond for £7000, dated January, 1826, granted by the Ld. Fuller ler Robert Stocks of Abden, which contained a clause restricting rest to four per cent for five years after Whitsunday, 1826. After e of that period, the legal interest of five per cent was exigible he bond. After the death of Provost Whyte, which happened on ne, 1834, Stocks intimated his intention to pay up the bond at nday, 1835, and a question arose between Whyte's representatives cks as to the terms on which the bond should be discharged. The ce arose chiefly on the question whether the rate of interest under id, had been continued at the restricted rate of four per cent Whitsunday, 1831, and until the death of Whyte. There had been transactions between Stocks and Whyte, and on paying over to gers the sum confessedly due, and consigning the disputed balance, rt passed the bill of suspension.

peared that Whyte, the creditor in the bond, was tenant of an elonging to Stocks, for which he paid £400 of rent. It also d that at Martinmas, 1831, being the first term after the expiration ve years specified in the bond, Stocks had rendered an account to which went back to Martinmas, 1829, and contained an entry of rest due at that term, and each of the intervening terms, including of Martinmas, 1831. Each of these, including the last, was

It also appeared that Stocks had again, on 15th May, before the death of Whyte, rendered a state of accounts, with interest at the same restricted rate of four per cent Martinmas, 1831, downwards. To this state Whyte had assented. But it was said by the chargers that he was then in bad health, and was unable to attend to his affairs. This state of accounts also was deposited in the repositories after his death. It further appeared that during the period subsequent to 1831, the market rate of interest was at four per cent. In these circumstances the Lord Ordinary was sufficiently instructed that Stocks was not liable for interest at a rate than four per cent, and pronounced this interlocutor, that the late Mr Whyte held a bond from the suspender, 1826, for £7000, which sum was to remain in the hands of the suspender for five years certain, from Whitsunday 1826, bearing interest at four per cent, it being provided that at the expiration of the said term the sum was to be payable: Finds that, on the other hand, Mr Whyte held a farm on lease from the suspender, at the rent of £400 per annum, for five years mentioned in the bond expired at Whitsunday 1831, that, on the 11th of November, 1831, the suspender rendered an account-current to the late Mr Whyte of their mutual transactions; and that in the said account he debits himself with the rent of the farm, for the last half-year from the Whitsunday preceding, only of four per cent: Finds that the balance on the account was £74, 17s. 8d., and that the said sum was sent by the suspender to the late Mr Whyte: Finds that the sum was retained by Mr Whyte, and no objection made by him to must be held to have acquiesced in the said rate of interest: No. 270.

 ore, in regard to the amount of the interest from Whitsunday 15th of May, 1835, sustains the reasons of suspension: Farect the principal, with interest at the aforesaid rate of four as tendered to the chargers, was refused, and was in conse-ed in a bank by the suspender, with an offer to make over the ipt when the chargers chose: Finds the suspender liable only rest from the last date of the 15th of May, 1835, and decerns
 ””

June 9, 1837.

Far-Stocks v.

Gardner.

—The Lord Ordinary has no doubt that, by the terms of the bond, e of interest was exigible from the debtor after Whitsunday, 1831.
 estion is, Whether there is not sufficient ground for the presump-e creditor acquiesced in the continuance of the loan at the former ither the debtor was not fairly entitled to rely on that presump-idering this question, all the circumstances must be kept in view.

 pendner was debtor in the half-yearly interest on the bond; but the yte, the creditor in the bond, was debtor in the larger sum of the ents of the farm which he held from the suspender. While the printhe bond was not called up, the suspender had thus to receive money t to pay money to, Mr Whyte. This led to an occasional accounting parties. On the 11th of November, 1831, there being then half a t due on the bond from the Whitsunday preceding, when the period bond had expired, the suspender furnished an account to Mr Whyte date, in which the last half year's interest is distinctly charged at only four per cent. The balance brought out is £74, 17s. 8d. In joined to the account, the suspender writes—‘ I send you the balance and it is not denied that this sum was received by Mr Whyte; but t it was not received as a balance. It is no doubt true, that the ac-not returned signed by Mr Whyte, agreeably to the request in the te. But the balance was received, and no objection ever was made of interest charged for the last half year, during the whole period that survived. The second account was transmitted on the 15th of May, h regard to it, the presumption of acquiescence is not so strong, as it Mr Whyte was then on his deathbed. But, in estimating the true e silence of Mr Whyte, it must not be thrown out of view, that the of interest on heritable securities was, during that period, not higher r cent.

ering the whole circumstances of the case, the Lord Ordinary thinks rose here an implication on which the suspender was entitled to rely, e of interest tendered by him was held sufficient. The mere circum-party retaining an account without objecting, may not be in all cases

But here it is to be observed, 1st, That the entry in the account, as was a clear intimation to the creditor that the suspender proposed only per cent, even after the expiration of the period fixed by the bond. s entitled to a definite answer on this point; for upon that answer it nd whether he chose to pay up the principal or not. 2dly, It cannot
 ; he was bound to pay half-yearly, and was consequently bound to each successive half-year, whether the creditor chose to accept the of interest or not. For as the rent payable by the creditor exceeded t due on the bond, it was Mr Whyte, the creditor in the bond, who each half-year; and as he did not, it appears to the Lord Ordinary spender was entitled to rely on the principle of the accounting adopted went to Mr Whyte, as long as no intimation was made to the contrary.

June 9, 1887. Special Case.—This was a property question as to a right 2<sup>d</sup> Division. process raised before the Sheriff of Elgin, in an advocacy of Lord Jeffrey. Court adhered to an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary containing special findings, "in so far as it advocated the cause and respondent from the conclusions of the original complaint," found expenses due.

JOHN ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—HAIG, HAY, and PRINGLE, W.S.—Ag

No. 272. WILLIAM THOM, Advocate.—Robertson—A. McN JOHN TURNER, Respondent.—More.

Reparation—Judicial Slander—Process—Summons.—1. In damages before an inferior court for assault and judicial slander, slander was not libelled as a separate and substantive ground of damage as an aggravation of the assault.—Held, in an advocacy, that such ling the slander was not competent.—2. In such action the judicial libelled as having taken place in an action depending before the Glasgow, when the action appeared to have been before the Magistrate and the libel was not amended to suit the state of the fact,—Obm was an additional reason for holding the charge of slander to be inco

June 9, 1887. THE respondent Turner brought an action before the M
2<sup>d</sup> Division. Glasgow against the advocate Thom; setting forth that T Lord Jeffrey. conceived groundless malice and ill-will against Turner had towards the pursuer was much aggravated by the fact that in a ground- No. 272.
T.

 action which he lately instituted against the pursuer before the Magis- June 9, 1837.
 trates of Glasgow, he put in replies containing the most false, scandalous, Thom v.
 libellous attacks on the pursuer's character," &c., which statements Turner.
 belled on, and alleged that they were made maliciously for the pur-of injury ; and concluding for £200 damages " for the injuries sus-d by the pursuer in his feelings, character, good name, reputation, person, through the illegal and unwarrantable conduct of the defender afore-mentioned, aggravated as aforesaid."

record was thereafter made up and a proof led, from which it appeared, alia, that the action mentioned in the summons had been before the istrates of Gorbals instead of the Magistrates of Glasgow. In his escendence, the pursuer made a variation to this effect, but made no ive amendment of his libel. He introduced into his condescendence us irrelevant statements as to the defender's temper and other matters.
 he Magistrates, looking to the proof both of the assault and of the ler, decerned in favour of the pursuer for five guineas of modified ages and for expenses.

hom then brought an advocacy in which the Lord Ordinary proced this interlocutor :—" Advocates the cause ; and finds, 1mo, That e is no proof whatever of the first assault libelled ; and insufficient f of the second assault ; none of the witnesses for the pursuer having the beginning of the encounter between the parties ; and the witness er adduced by the defender (whose testimony is not in any material ect contradicted by the other), deponing positively that the first and violent assault was made by the pursuer, whose conduct in pushing ly after the defender as soon as they were departed, leads to corrote the supposition, that he had been the aggressor ; finds, 2do, That udicial slander is not libelled as a separate and substantive offence for h damages (under this libel) could be awarded per se, but only as an avation of the assaults now found not to be proven, and separatim, if competently libelled the present claim for damages on this account ld have been restricted to the lowest possible amount, if not altogether gnished by the utterly irrelevant and inexcusable imputations which as made on the defender in the close of the first, and especially in the article of his condescendence in this very process ; and therefore the interlocutor of the Magistrates complained of, assoilzies the ator (original defender) from the conclusions of the action, and ens ; finds him entitled to the expenses incurred by him in this Court, as an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same, when lodged, to auditor for his taxation, and report ; finds him also entitled to modiexpenses incurred in the inferior court, modifies the same to the sum 10, and decerns against the original pursuer for that sum accordingly." *

NOTE.—" This is one of a series of actions between those parties, none of

Foreign—Executor—Bona Fide Payment.—A party domiciled there intestate; a banking company in Scotland then owed him which by desire of his relations they transmitted to England to his representatives; an English creditor of the deceased having obtained administration received payment of the money in question from the bank; it had been remitted; thereafter a Scotch creditor obtained decree against the bank for second payment. —Held that the bank was not bound to pay a second time to the creditor, the prior payment having been valid as made in England, the contribution, regularly and in bona fide.

June 9, 1837.

2d Division.
Lord Jeffrey.

IN July, 1834, William Thomson, a Scotchman, died in London, the place of his domicile. At the time of his death the Aberdeen Banking Company, owed him a balance which was lying in their branch bank at Peterhead. In September they received a letter from his brother, residing in London, to transmit the balance in their hands to their London agent, it might be paid to Thomson's legal representatives. No objection yet been made or interpellation given on the part of any person in Scotland, the banking company remitted the money to Messrs G. and Company, and notified the fact to their own agents in London, and Company, with instructions to them to pay it over to the person who should appear to have the legal title.

The next of kin of the deceased having renounced, Messrs Gummersall and Gandell of London, who were the legal representatives, had obtained letters of administration from the Court of Canterbury in August preceding. In consequence received from the brother of their debtor, they subsequently applied No. 27:

Swain, Stevens, and Company for payment of the debt due by the June 9, 18:
Aberdeen Bank. These parties, after examining into the title and ascer- Hutchison ing that the letters of administration had not been recalled, drew Aberdeen money from Glyn and Company, and on 20th September paid it over Bank.
Gummersall and Gandell, upon a regular receipt from them as admi-rators of Thomson deceased.

On January, 1835, the pursuers, Hutchison and Company of Kirkaldy, creditors of the deceased, obtained decret dative as executors-crediin Scotland, not being confirmed, however, till May thereafter. On February they gave intimation to the Aberdeen Bank of their claims of that character, and were informed of the circumstances above-mentioned.
Whereupon they raised action against the Banking Company for second payment of the sum which had been due to the deceased, on the ground that the first payment having been unwarrantably made to parties holding no confirmation from the courts of this country.

Against this action it was pleaded in defence:—

. Even if the payment to Gummersall and Gandell would not have been available if made in Scotland, it was indisputably valid as made in London, to which place the funds had been regularly and lawfully transmitted, as the proper forum of distribution.

. The payment was equally good, though it should be held as made in Scotland, in respect that English letters of administration constitute a good title to pursue in this country, and that extrajudicial payments made bona fide to a party holding such a title are a perfectly good discharge to the debtor, though it might require confirmation to warrant the enforcement of a decree against an unwilling party.

The Lord Ordinary sustained the defences and assoilzied the defenders of their expenses, adding to his interlocutor the note subjoined.*

“ The facts in this case are not disputed ; and they raise, very purely, the two points in law on which the defences are founded.” (The note then states the circumstances of the case, the action and defence, almost in the terms of the above report.) “ The defence is twofold. 1st, That, even if the payment would not have been available if made in Scotland, it was indisputably valid as made in London, to which place the funds had been regularly and lawfully transmitted, as the proper forum of distribution ; and, 2d, That it was equally good though it should be held made in Scotland—in respect that English letters of administration constitute a good title to pursue in this country, and that extrajudicial payments made, bona fide to a party holding such a title, are a perfectly good discharge to the debtor, though it might require confirmation to warrant the conforcement of a decree against an unwilling party. These defences are separately conclusive : and the Lord Ordinary thinks both well founded, though not without a shade of difficulty as to

The defunct being domiciled in England, there can be no doubt that the disposition of his personal estate must be regulated by the law of that country, and that the place of his domicile was the proper and natural place for its administration. This being the case, the Lord Ordinary conceives that persons holding funds under consideration. The money, then, it will be recollected, was ~~not~~ to the administrators or next of kin, but to Glyn and Company, bankers of the defenders, to be held by them at the disposal of Sw Company, their London solicitors, with instructions to those last pay it over, not immediately on receipt, or to any one specified, but to the party who should make out an unexceptionable title to receive on the part of the defunct. These instructions too were correct; money lay for some time with Glyn and Company; and it was Stevens, and Company were satisfied that the next of kin had ~~not~~ Gummersall and Gandell (of whom the defenders had never heard) held regular letters of administration, that it was, upon their coming into their hands. Now, it is not disputed, that if the money was ~~not~~ to England, its subsequent application was unchallengeable; and every body humbly conceives that it was sent lawfully, and so as to infer no injury to any creditors afterwards coming forward in this country. If the defenders, instead of being debtors in a sum of money, had been persons with whom a chest of plate belonging to the deceased had been merely deposited, that, on his death, they had been applied to by his brother to transfer it to their own London bankers, that it might be within reach of those who were entitled to take charge of his property, it is difficult to see on whom it could be subjected to such a claim as the present by complying with the order, and merely sending it to London with injunctions to see that it was paid except to a party having a clear title to receive it? Suppose, again, that the defenders had been in the habit of sending all the balances in their hands at the end of the month to London, and intimating to the deceased's representative that they were at their order at a particular banker's, would they incur any such responsibility as is now asserted by making the usual remittance three months after, and intimating this to his near relations, and desiring their bankers to take the money, not paid over without a legal title? Or would the case be different if the defenders were accustomed to send the rents of a Scotch estate to a London banker domiciled in that city, and forwarding those that were in his hands at the end of the same quarter, with or without the order of his nearest surviving relative? There is no allegation (and there is none here) of any purpose to pre-creditor appeared either as general disponee or next of kin, and so No. 27 on him a character which could be completed in Scotland to the June 9, 18 of entitling him to take payment, and were therefore not analogous Hutchison present. Aberdeen Bank.

THE COURT proceeding chiefly upon the Lord Ordinary's view in reference to the first defence, and considering the defenders to have acted in the transaction with perfect propriety and bona fides, adhered, finding additional expenses due.

R. LAIDLAW, S.S.C.—H. HANDYSIDE, W.S.—Agents.

to a person holding such a title, though without a confirmation, does it under mer responsibility than that of being able to show that he was truly in right t title, and might have confirmed, if that had been necessary.

The first of those propositions seems sufficiently made out by the cases of law, 21st January, 1715 (Mor. 4500); Clerk, 20th December, 1759 (Mor.
 —and 5, B's Supplement, 369), and Stewart, 21st November, 1826 (5th
 ; 29),—from the tenor of which it is also apparent, that the notion of this o pursue being limited to the case of debts payable in England, which seems countenanced by Mr Erskine, (3, 9, 39,) is altogether groundless—the debts sition, in each of those cases, being clearly payable in Scotland.

The second proposition is established as to payments made extrajudicially to t of kin, or executors nominate, though unconfirmed, by the cases of Buchanan, July, 1784 (Mor. 14, 378), and Sir William Forbes, 9th June, 1827 (5 Shaw,
 ; and the only doubt is, whether the same rule can be extended to executors ors with testament dative and license to pursue only, and to persons holding sh letters of administration, which, it has been seen, are of equal value. But at of those cases, (which is that more immediately in question,) appears to een settled by a very precise decision, reported by Fountainhall, vol. i. p.

This is the case of Trent against Duff, 11th November, 1692, in which a ; pursued by creditors of a defunct, defended himself by showing that he had o one of the daughters of the defunct, who had English letters of administraand this was sustained, though it appeared that the payment was made after aim of the pursuers had been intimated to him, there being no legal diligence, oper interpellation. But, even without this authority, the Lord Ordinary have inclined to hold, that the rule now settled as to nearest of kin, and tors nominate, must apply to all other persons who held, like them, such an ite legal title as would clearly give them right to take confirmation if the pro-ig were in Court, and against a reluctant debtor; and it is quite clear, that a suing in this country under English letters of administration would be enti-and indeed required) to confirm before extract.

The pursuers alleged that letters of administration only gave right to sue for ery of the funds of the defunct locally within the province or diocese in which e was taken, and pressed for an order to have that matter established by an n of English lawyers. The Lord Ordinary was at one time disposed to allow efore answer, but came to be satisfied that it would not only be useless, but per; the question here being, not what the effect of such letters are in Eng- but to what effect they have been admitted, by the law and practice of Scot-which is necessarily and purely a question of Scotch Law. If the pursuers ght in their representation of that of England, it is manifest, at first sight, that e decisions, from 1692 to 1826, are in direct opposition to that law. Since, ministration in the province of York would be no title to recover funds in that sterbury, nor letters from the metropolitan office to recover in Ireland, it is enough, that no English letters could possibly have made a title to sue in trust ; and that a question having arisen as to the validity of the assumption of new trustees, executed by one of the deceased trustees, the estate had been sequestrated, and the petitioner was appointed judicial factor. The petition farther stated that part of the estate consisted of feu-rights in the village of Eyemouth, and that the feu-casualties could not be adequately collected, unless a power was granted to sell, and grant charters and other necessary deeds was conferred on the judicial factor, which power was also necessary for the interests of the vassals, who might otherwise sell or burden their properties. He prayed that the Court should authorize him, as judicial factor on the estate of Billie, to receive vassals, in all and sundry lands and others, holden by the deceased George Home, Esq. of Wedderburn, or his predecessors, and now under the judicial management of the petitioner, to grant to them charters, precepts of clare constat, and other necessary deeds, and deeds necessary for that purpose, on payment of the feu-casualties and usual casualties of superiority."

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have looked into all the applications of the kind which have been made for some time past, and I see that where special powers have been applied for along with the appointment to the office, the Court have granted them, but where the judicial factor was first appointed, and he afterward applied for special powers, stating at the same time such circumstances as rendered these powers necessary for the administration of the estate under his management, the Court have granted them. I think this petition should be granted. In a recent, and remarkable case, we authorized the sale of the heritable estate of a deceased person, which was necessary for his support.

as to show that it is understood by the Court, and must be understood by the country, that the judicial factor is not exonerated of responsibility by obtaining the sanction of the Court as now prayed for, I have no objections to grant the petition. But if our judgment is to take off that responsibility, we should have the facts thoroughly investigated in each individual case, before we interpose our authority.

No. 274

June 10, 18
Hamilton v
Henderson.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Authorize and grant warrant to the petitioner to enter vassals, and to execute the necessary writs, all as craved, and decern."

SANG and ADAM, S.S.C.—Agents.

ROBERT HAMILTON, Advocate.—Maitland—W. Bell.

No. 275

JAMES HENDERSON, Respondent.—D. F. Hope—Monteith.

Advocation—Process—Proof.—Where a Sheriff's interlocutor allows a proof by scripto vel juramento, an advocation under 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 40, is competent.

ROBERT HAMILTON, wright in Limekilnburn, raised an action before the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, against James Henderson of Peasebanks, for payment of an account of £66. Henderson stated several pleas in defence, including prescription. The Sheriff pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender has produced receipts for money paid pursuer for wages to himself and others, for wood, &c., one of which anterior in date to any of the charges in the account libelled on: and under these circumstances that the presumption is, that all prior debts were paid, and therefore that the account can only be established by writ or oath of the defender; before answer allows the pursuer a proof by scripto vel juramento of the defender; grants commission to the clerk of court to take the deposition and proof, and diligence against havers, to be reported within fourteen days."

June 10, 18
1st Division
Ld. Cockburn
T.

Hamilton then presented a bill of advocation under 6 G. IV., c. 120, in respect that this was an interlocutor "allowing a proof," and, as the claim was above £40, the process was therefore liable to be removed to the Court of Session by bill of advocation, which must be passed at without discussion and without caution. The bill was passed, and the advocate stated, as his first plea in law, that there were no grounds for limiting the proof, to the writ or oath of Henderson, and that the petitioner should have been allowed a proof prout de jure. He also stated that the interlocutor of January 27, 1837, was otherwise erroneous. Henderson stated as preliminary pleas, that the process of advocation was incompetent, in respect that no "proof" had been allowed in pursuance of the 40th section of the Judicature Act, which applied only to proof at large, or such "proof" as might be made the subject of trial

scripto vel juramento. In the first part of the section it is provided that if proof has been allowed and taken in the inferior Court, the Court reviewing it, shall specify in their interlocutor the several material facts found to be proved, and express how far their judgment rests on fact, and that their judgment shall have the force of the verdict on the several facts specified in the interlocutor. Now I never understood in practice that, where the whole proof in the inferior Court was by writ, or a reference to oath, it was necessary for this Court, in reviewing it, to separate the fact from the law, and specify the several facts directed. It has never been understood in practice that the 40th section of the Judicature Act reaches such a case. And I think the practice in this Court is the true construction of the statute. If the advocate's mode of proving a case was to be sanctioned, it would become a simple matter to make a case by every process without exception. A defender may easily make a case as renders a proof of some kind necessary. Suppose, for example, a debt was raised for payment of the contents of a heritable bond for £1000. The defender denies the debt, and the pursuer produces a regular probative writ. That, however, is proving the case, scripto vel juramento. And, according to the statute, there would be room for advocacy immediately, because a proof has been allowed. Taking the whole 40th section of the statute together, it is evident that the word "proof," there used, means a proof prout de facto, scripto vel juramento, does not fall under it.

LORD CORNHILL.—I am of the same opinion. The terms of the Judicature Act are not so well chosen, as they might have been. It is provided that when "a proof at large" was allowed, it should be by writ, or a reference to oath. I think the advocates, who have been advocates, they would have expressed the true enactment of the statute more accurately than they now do, by using the single word "proof."

practice of our Courts, to use the word "proof" in that sense, and as distinguished from reference to oath or writ. No. 275

June 10, 18

A. B. v.

Berry.

THE COURT adhered, and awarded additional expenses.

J. CULLEN, W.S.—A. HAMILTON, W.S.—Agents.

A. B., Petitioner.—D. F. Hope—Paterson.

No. 276

GEORGE BERRY, Petitioner.—Penney.

Competing.

Bankruptcy—Trustee—Affidavit—Personal Objection.—In a competition for the office of interim-factor, and trustee, one of the competitors, in putting a value, upon oath, on a collateral obligation, preparatory to voting, under § 24 of the Bankrupt Act, put a mere imaginary and elusory value, which he knew to be false; alleged that this was consistent with the practice of others, in like circumstances;—Held that the practice, if it existed, was no justification of so gross an act, and that the competitor who had so acted could not be confirmed as trustee at sequestration, even although he possessed a preponderance of votes, in the election, after deducting all those on which the false value had been put.

In a competition for the office of trustee on the sequestrated estate of James Strathenry, flax-dealer, the competitors were George Berry, 1st Division, a merchant in Leith, and A. B., a bank-agent, who had been elected Lord Cuninghame. Berry was elected interim-factor, and who had the greatest apparent amount of votes for the office of trustee. D.

Among other grounds, George Berry stated a personal objection against his competitor, that, with a view to carry his election, he had made a false affidavit, under § 24 of the Bankrupt Act. That he declared that every creditor, who has other obligants bound to do along with the bankrupt, except where the bankrupt is the primary obligant, "shall be obliged, upon oath, to put a value upon such security upon the collateral obligation, so far as he may thereby be covered, and to deduct such value from his claim, and to give his vote in all matters affecting the bankruptcy, as creditor only for the balance, which balance shall be specified in his affidavit, without prejudice to his correcting his declaration afterwards, and without prejudice to the amount of his debt in all respects." Berry stated, that there was a list of bills in which the bankrupt was not the primary obligant, and in all of which the competitor put a merely nominal and fictitious value on the collateral obligation.

In particular, he alleged this as to a bill for £190, on which Messrs Arthur and Sons, merchants in Kirkcaldy, were obligants, and another bill for £207, on which George Wilson, flax-spinner, Fife, was obligant.

Proof was allowed, from which it appeared that, in the affidavit by the competitor, preparatory to voting for the appointment of an interim-trustee, he had valued the security of Arthur and Sons, as co-obligants in or responsibility of that other obligant; and I may mention a recent occasion, where I was elected trustee on a sequestration of the Bank of Scotland, in opposing me, and who held a bill for £5000, valued their security on it for voting, at £50, although it was a proprietor of their own stock to the extent £5000.

"It was very wrong in any one to write you, and fault you to have believed that I valued the security of your firm in question, for payment, at only 5s. per pound. I only valued the security for voting at 5s. altogether, although at the moment and still consider your firm good for more than ten times the value of the bill in question."

At the election of a trustee, A. B. put a value of half-a-crown on the security of George Wilson as an obligant in the bill for £207. At the time Wilson was engaged in business to a very considerable amount, both prior and subsequent to this period he continued to discount bills by A. B. and other bankers to a large amount, on retiring them. But the bill for £207 lay over until the retirement of A. B.

On this proof, Berry pleaded, that the statute had enjoined the creditor, in every debt where the bankrupt was the primary obligant, to put a value, on oath, on the security bound with him, and to vote only on the balance of the debt deducting that value. This was so enacted, on the ground, that it was only as to such balance that the creditor was to be paid.

er competitors similar to this ; but if such practice existed, it was now Nö. 276 e for the Court to check it.

A. B. answered, that, independently of the two bills, in regard to June 10, 18 ch the under-valuation was made, he possessed votes enough to carry A. B. v. Berry. appointment ; it was, therefore, immaterial whether these votes were d or not. But, in truth, they were good, as he had only acted con-ently with universal practice in putting a nominal value on the co-ob-nts. And, for the same reason, he was liable to no personal objection having done so. And nothing could more clearly show the bona s in which he had acted than the explicit admissions in his ex-iatory letter to Arthur and Sons, when they wrote to him on the ject.

The Lord Ordinary “ found that the respondent, Mr Berry, has failed establishing the objections stated by him to the eligibility of A. B., at prior to the election, and as recorded in the minutes ; found no suffi-it evidence adduced of any relevant personal objection against A. B. ; efore confirmed the said A. B. in terms of his petition as trustee on sequestrated estate of William Strathenry, and refused the petition to same effect of George Berry ; and found, in terms of the statute, said George Berry liable in expenses.” *

In a note the Lord Ordinary disposed of various other pleas maintained by parties, and then proceeded :—

But while the objections urged at the election are thus disposed of, a different was urged at the last debate, which it is proper to report to the Court, as ly of the serious and deliberate attention of your Lordships. The respondent, Berry, founded very strongly on A. B.’s affidavits, first, in the election of interim factor on this estate, and afterwards of the trustee, as showing an ent disposition on his part to disregard or evade one of the most important ations of the Sequestration Statute. In particular, he referred to A. B.’s avits, on which he put a value on certain collateral securities, but instead of lying properly with the 24th section of the Act, A. B., it is said, put on merely nominal and elusory valuations on the securities enjoyed by him, in ng the joint obligations of the bankrupt, along with some of the most ectable and solvent merchants in the east of Scotland, who are drawers or tors of sundry of the bankrupt’s bills. Thus, in the election of interim factor, alued the joint obligation of Messrs Arthur and Sons of Kirkaldy, on a bill of D, just as 2s. 6d. in whole, though that is a concern of great wealth, and
 - then held, as a banker, a balance of Arthur’s funds in his own hands ; and in election of trustee, he valued the joint obligation of George Wilson, a person solvent and in extensive trade, as worth only 5s. on the bill of £207. The ing of such claims and oaths the respondent argues was an act of such gross opriety, and showed so strong a disposition on the part of A. B. to violate misconstrue a plain direction of the Sequestration Statute (sect. 24), as to unfit for any office which falls to be executed strictly according to the directions down in this Act of Parliament.

Now, the Lord Ordinary must say, that he cannot too strongly express his approbation of such valuations on oath as are here referred to. He does not stand upon what quibble or gloss respectable men can reconcile it to them-so to proceed on oath. And the only apology that occurs for an individual has fallen into such a mistake is the universality of the practice. The Lord sent to a committee last year by the Committee of Commerce in the proper remedies to be applied to the evil in the new Sequestration been under discussion in Parliament for the last two years.

"General as the practice may have been of making them eluder A. B. or any party procured a colourable majority by such an Ordinary would not have sustained a majority so obtained, whatever have been quoted in palliation. But these erroneous valuations in this election, as A. B. would have a great preponderance of even if the whole of the bills, which were the subject of the valuation struck out of the ranking.

"This being established, the Lord Ordinary does not think him find that a party who has joined many others in putting a wrong what is required of him by the 24th clause of the Sequestration Act disqualified from holding any office under this Act. More especially the Lord Ordinary hesitate to come to this conclusion in the following facts:—

"1. In the interval between the election of interim-factor and gave in a corrected claim and affidavit. This he did apparently in his claim to these bills, in which he was informed the bankrupt was debtor; on that affidavit alone he voted in the election of trustee.

"2. It has been now proved by the evidence lately adduced in the bankrupt was the principal debtor, in all the bills claimed in the election of trustee, though in the claim No. 3 (Appendix 1 p. 27), the bankrupt did not appear in the position of principal debtor entered in that state.

"3. By the express terms of the 24th section of the Sequestration valuation is required where the bankrupt is the principal debtor valuation at all might have been dispensed with. And when A. B. ferently, it rather justifies the idea, that he had some erroneous true meaning and object of the 24th clause of the Act, which it is consequence to trace. He certainly does not appear to have been decision in the case of Buchanan in 1827, in which it was found election of a trustee, it is no objection to the vote of a creditor if accepted jointly by the bankrupt and another, that he has not valued

pressly enjoins every creditor, "upon oath, to put a value" on his security and deduct such value from his claim, and vote only on the balance. But this is peremptorily ordered by the statute, it appears that this competitor is in the face of the statute. His letter bears that it is both the law and practice for a creditor "to value the security of the other obligants at any amount, merely to enable the holder to carry the election," and in such imaginary value to swear as if it were the true value. He justifies saying that he only did what others are in the habit of doing. If he be this statement, it is only the more necessary that this Court should interpose that this practice is brought under our notice. It is of no moment how many individuals, or how many hundreds of individuals, may have acted as he has done, all who may have done so are just as far wrong as he is. And I consider a man possessing common sense, or fit to be a trustee on a bankrupt estate, cannot entertain the slightest doubt of the true meaning of the statute. In the case of John Brown and Others, in 1808,<sup>1</sup> where there were two competitors for a trusteeship, who had entered into a private agreement to share between them the emolument of the office, this was brought under the notice of the Court as a corrupt and illegal agreement. The answer was made, that the practice was universal, and was admitted that many most respectable trustees in Glasgow had been guilty of it. But, notwithstanding this, the Court had no doubt that a corrupt practice did not become legal, even by becoming universal, and that the parties to such an agreement were disqualified from acting as trustees. The present practice, however, is much worse than that. The competitor of Berry has gone directly in violation of the plain words of the statute. I do not mean to say he committed a delinquency: he was under the delusion of holding himself excused by the practice of others who did the like in similar circumstances. But it is nevertheless certain that he deliberately swore that which was false. And I feel no doubt that this Court, as the guardian of the public morals, must put down such a practice as it will fail in its duty to the country.

MACKENZIE.—I concur. The enactment of the statute is just as explicit as can make it. It declares, as to debts in which the bankrupt is not the obligant, that the creditor "shall be obliged, upon oath, to put a value on such security or collateral obligation, so far as he may thereby be covered, and deduct such value from his claim, and to give his vote in all matters relating to the bankruptcy as creditor only for the balance." It is far beyond all question, that this enjoins the creditor to put a real and true value on the collateral obligation to the best of his belief, and that he should do this under the sanction of a solemn oath. Now, in this case, it is admitted that, in the teeth of the statute, this person put a value which was not true, but utterly false; a value, far from the truth, that he might as well have stated it at one farthing; and that he swore a solemn oath that this was the true value to the best of his knowledge and belief. This is said to be customary. It may be so; but what species of plea is it to be pleaded before a Court? It is nothing less than a shocking delinquency. It may seem difficult to account for the existence of it in the country, but I think it grew up in this way, that putting a value upon an obligation is a loose and common practice. The men who were required to do it, being excited by the eagerness of a

No. 27

June 10, 1808.

A. B. v.

Berry.

<sup>1</sup> Dec. 13, 1808. F. C.

sanction the nomination of this gentleman as trustee. As he adopts an abuse, in the face of the restraint of an oath, what other abuse may he adopt if it only be sanctioned by practice? If neither the injunction nor the solemnity of an oath, will restrain him, what can the Court be a restraint? I do not mean to say that he, or those other persons indulged in this practice, have committed perjury. But if the facts were the Criminal Court, on the face of an indictment charging perjury, I at the same time, that I at present feel it would be much more difficult want of relevancy, than would be at all agreeable. But still I do not think the guilt of perjury was committed here. I rather think that this gentleman under a very infatuated self-delusion, arising from the practice of also undoubtedly from some faulty deficiency in himself. But however be, it is enough for this case that I feel satisfied we cannot con- sider him a trustee.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion. It may often happen that, in keen competitions, parties on both sides resorted to this practice equally culpable in that respect, neither of them brought it under the Court. In this way the practice might gain head before the Court; but now that it is brought before us, we can have no hesitation in putting it down. The words of the statute are too explicit to be misunderstood. The function of voting is the precise function, for the proper exercise of the statute required the true value of a collateral obligation to be made and deducted from the creditor's claim. The statute provides for a correction of the valuation afterwards, if necessary, but that does not in any degree weaken the necessity of making a true value according to the best knowledge and belief, at the time of deducting it from his claim, and to voting on the balance.

PETER MACLEOD, Pursuer.—M'Neill—A. M'Neill.
 ARCHIBALD BUCHANAN and HAMILTON ROSE, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen.
Rutherford—Russell.

No. 277

June 10, 1853
 Macleod v.
 Buchanan.

Reparation—Wrongous Imprisonment—Stat. 6 Geo. IV. c. 129—Jurisdiction Process—Jury Trial.—1. Circumstances in which questions of law decided before a jury cause to trial. 2. In an action of damages for wrongous imprisonment, the ground of the alleged illegality of certain proceedings under the Combination Act, which had been previously the subject of a bill of suspension and liberation at the instance of the pursuer before the Court of Justiciary,—Held, (1.) That the decision of the Court of Justiciary granting liberation imported no res judicata in this action, in regard to the legality of the proceedings under the consideration of that Court; (2.) That it was not relevant to infer damages that the petition to the Justices, by which the proceedings originated, referred only generally to the Act of Parliament authorizing the complaint; (3.) That it was not relevant to infer damages from the petition nor relative oath of the petitioner bore any date, the warrant of apprehension following thereon having a date affixed to it; (4.) That it was not relevant to infer damages against those legally responsible therefor that the pursuer was apprehended and brought before the Justices in virtue of a warrant granted by only one Justice; (5.) That it was relevant to infer such damages that the pursuer was incarcerated, not in virtue of the original conviction, but by a letter to the Justice from the Justice of Peace-clerk containing a copy of the conviction.

THE defender, Buchanan, one of the proprietors, and the manager of June 10, 1853 main cotton works at Catrine, in Ayrshire, with concurrence of the other defender, Rose, deputy procurator-fiscal of the Justices of Peace of the 2<sup>d</sup> Division County of Ayr, presented to the Justices a petition under the Act 6 Geo. Ld. Moncrief
 T.

c. 129, complaining, inter alios, against the pursuer, Macleod, and praying, in common form, to have the oath of the private petitioner sworn, as required by law, and for warrant to apprehend the offenders,

The petition, and the oath of credulity following thereon, were not read. The warrant for apprehension was signed by only one Justice.

Incarceration in the jail of Ayr, following on the sentence of imprisonment pronounced by the Justices, took place in virtue of no legal warrant transmitted to the jailor, but of a letter addressed by the Justice of Peace-clerk to the Magistrates of Ayr, and the keeper of the tolbooth, containing a copy of the conviction.

Macleod was afterwards liberated on a bill of suspension and liberation presented to the Court of Justiciary.

Hereafter he raised an action of damages against Buchanan and

---

This petition, and the subsequent proceedings, together with the clauses of the above Statute bearing upon the present question, are detailed in the report of the Commission for suspension and liberation, ante, XIII. 1153.

or retain it as his warrant, but that it was exhibited to him. In defence,—that the proceedings in question were regular in accordance with the statute 5 Geo. IV. c. 129; and, even if irregularities had inadvertently been committed, they were not such as to entitle him to damages.

The case having been remitted to the jury-roll, the following question was proposed by the jury clerks:—

“Whether, on or about the 18th day of December, 1833, or either of them, wrongfully caused the pursuer to be apprehended and imprisoned, and detained from on or about the said 18th day of January, 1835, or during any part of that period, or wrongfully caused him to be apprehended or imprisoned and detained as aforesaid, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer, and to the loss of the said £1000?”

Thereafter a question arose, whether the points of law in the proceedings under the Act should be decided before the issue, upon which question, and also upon the questions of fact, the Lord Ordinary appointed the parties to give in evidence.

Pleaded for Macleod—

In the general case of an action of damages, such as the present, nothing ought to be left for determination at the trial, since it happens that any point can be brought out so purely as to be determined without reference to the whole res gestæ. The law has provided for the determination of points of law in the res judicata. The pursuer having been committed to prison No. 277. hereof, complained to the only competent tribunal, which was <sup>June 10, 183</sup> of Justiciary, and by that tribunal the character of illegality <sup>Macleod v.</sup> was finally fixed on the procedure complained of. Supposing, how- <sup>Buchanan.</sup> points to be open;—

party founding on and taking benefit by a particular statute, specially in cases where strictness of procedure is required, must be different sections on which judgment is demanded, and it is to refer generally to the statute as containing certain enact-procedure is void, in respect that neither the petition nor the any date. Summonses must contain a date given by the party;<sup>2</sup> the same principle, it is indispensable in a petition. Sanctioning the use of a date in such a petition as the present will give rise to in practice, and may affect questions both of common law and prescription. The same rule applies to the oath, which the requires to be prior to the granting of the warrant, implying that it has its own date. In Archbold's English Forms, the date is mentioned in the forms of oaths. But if dates are required they must appear from the documents themselves, independently of evidence which may be afforded by reference to other pro-on a right construction of the 7th section of the statute, the apprehension, under which the pursuer was brought to trial, have been granted by two Justices.

A letter of the Justice of Peace-clerk was no sufficient warrant of detention; and, even if the allegation of the original conviction of Justices having been exhibited to the jailor were true, that would not remove the irregularity in question.

See also Buchanan and Rose—

One of the cases expressly provided for by the Acts 59 Geo.
 § 12, and 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 33, making it competent for the Court to decide questions of law or relevancy before trial; and, on the nature of the questions, the propriety of their being so decided is evident. The character and objects of the present proceedings of the Court of Justiciary, differ so that what was done in the one can never become necessarily a precedent for what is to be held in the other. In the Court of Justiciary, the question was, whether enough appeared to entitle the pursuer, on the facts, to his liberation; and the question was influenced by the

---

See also Fairley v. Fairley, March 1, 1823 (ante, II. 261; new ed. 232); Parlane v.
Parlane, June 28, 1825 (ante, IV. 120; new ed. 123).
See also Buchanan v. Malcolm, March 5, 1829 (ante, VII. 547).

77. common-law presumption in favour of liberty. At all events 1837. be necessary that the record of that Court should show, w not, what were the points of law which it was intended author determine, as it is insufficient to say that the judgment implic that the imprisonment was irregular.* As to the irregulari selves;—

1. The petition itself proves that it fully set forth the se which it was founded, and which recites the offences prohibite was no necessity in law or practice for setting forth the section the jurisdiction of the Justices, this not being a matter conn the form of the complaint, or the description of the offence.
 referred to by the pursuer do not apply.

2. The statute does not give the form of the petition, or re it shall bear a date, but merely says, that there shall be “a and information on oath;” the form being thus left to be reg the common law as applicable to summary applications. A matter of daily practice that no date affixed by the party is, in nary case, necessary in summary petitions; and even an ordi mons bears no date by the party, but only the date of the v citation granted thereon. Again, the complaint or informat the statute may be the foundation of a summons as well as of :
 Suppose the petition in the present instance had prayed the J summon the pursuer, an authority to cite would have been v the petition and would have been executed by a constable. Suc and the deliverance upon it, would not differ from any other application, and the deliverance thereon authorizing service on and there is no authority for holding that the common law judicial practice of Scotland, requires more in the one case th other. A meditatione fugæ warrant, or a committal by a S breach of sequestration, would not be voided by the origina having no date of its own; and yet these are cases in whic stant apprehension may lead to instant imprisonment.† In suc the present, according to English practice, however prudent a a written petition may be, it is not essential,‡ which seems to

---

* The judgment of the Court of Justiciary was as follows:—“Su sentence and warrant complained of simpliciter, grant warrant to and Magistrates of Ayr, and keeper of the tolbooth to set the nuspeuder fo liberty, and decern.”

† In Dewar v. Mariani, July, 1835, the Court of Justiciary, in a of a warrant of imprisonment under the 4 Geo. IV. c. 34, disregarded tion that the petition was not dated.

‡ The following statement of the English practice on this point is fro fendens' paper:—“In England, according to the forms given in practica there is nothing of the same kind with the original petition used in a of a date being required. But, looking at the proceedings as a No. 277.

 there can be no doubt of the date, the petition setting forth that ence was committed on the 17th December, while the warrant <sup>June 10, 1837.</sup> Macleod v. l thereon and the ensuing conviction bear date the 18th. This <sup>Buchanan.</sup> ration applies likewise to the oath; and the question as to the ty of its bearing a date is also a question of common law, and on the statute, which says nothing as to any formalities being
 d.

giving a fair construction to the statute, the warrant for apprea was legal, although granted by only one Justice; and this is ent with the practice in regard to summary prosecutions in Eng-

The incarceration took place upon a sufficient warrant, as the l warrant was exhibited to the jailor,<sup>2</sup> and the copy sent by the s' clerk certified that officer authoritatively of the fact of convic-But even assuming an irregularity as to this matter, the defenders be affected by it, the execution of the sentence, and the responsi-therefor, resting exclusively with the Court and its officers.
 Lord Ordinary made avizandum with the cause to the Court, and at the same time the subjoined note.*

igned by the party himself. The information is a statement exclusively the hand of the Magistrate, setting forth that a certain person has informed certain things done by the party accused, and therefore granting warrant, ing a summons, as the case may be; and it is laid down in regard to an ation, that 'where it is not expressly directed to be in writing by the creating the offence,' it is never required 'to be drawn up in form, except s where the proceedings are at the suit of a common informer for a penalty.'<sup>1</sup> statute in question does not expressly direct that the information shall be ing, it would thus appear that in England no written statement would be ed."

Archbold, p.p. 95, 97.

his was not admitted by the pursuer.

It appears to the Lord Ordinary that it would be wrong for him as a single to pronounce any judgment on the important questions discussed in these . But it may be proper that he should briefly state the opinion which he med upon them.

. If it be thought right that the questions of law raised, or any of them, be decided before sending the case to trial, it can form no objection to that ding that the record has not been closed. When an opinion shall have been to that they ought to be decided, the Court can order the record to be closed, en proceed to decide the points.

. The Lord Ordinary has no doubt that it is competent, and may sometimes edient, to determine questions of law before trial, although the decision of may not necessarily supersede the necessity of a trial.

b. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this is a case in which it is pecuexpedient, and in some cases necessary, that the Court should give judgment

<sup>1</sup> Archbold on Commitments and Convictions, p. 93.

from the perfect immunity, as to acts in the interim, that the question of illegality in the proceedings has been finally decided, and is not competent for this Court at all to consider it, that plea alone requires that the Court should give their own judgment upon it before trial.

" 4. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this action, in which complaint is made of ad civilem effectum, is not only competent, necessary, to consider and determine the effect of the legal objection, the petition, the warrant, and the imprisonment. The Court of Justiciary, a competent Court, necessarily judged of the grounds put before it by the prisoner. But when an action of damages is raised, the Court is the proper Court for trying the whole merits of it, must be entitled to consider all the elements on which the claim to damages, or compensation, may depend. They would not be bound even by a judgment of the Court itself in a question of liberation; and still less can they be bound by the judgment of the Court of Justiciary. The questions must be considered, with reference to the very different issue which is raised by the Judges, or even the same Judges, sitting in the civil court, may, in a different case, come to a different opinion from that on which the prisoner was liberated. The judgment of the Justiciary properly decided normally that there was ground for suspending the sentence and setting aside the warrant. But the special grounds of illegality, as they may be, may enter essentially into the question of damages.

" 5. The Lord Ordinary thinks it no good objection to the petition that it does not refer to the particular section of the statute founded on. The petition is a statute, and it proceeded in fact in sufficient form on the basis of it.

" 6. The question as to the want of date is very ably argued by the defenders. The Lord Ordinary is still inclined to think that it should appear ex facie of the proceedings on what day it was made. But he has more doubt than he formerly had, whether, connected in the body of the petition with the oath and the warrant written on the paper, it does not sufficiently appear that it was and could only be made on the 18th December.

with respect to the present action for damages, and that all the No. 277. which were then discussed were now open for decision. Their June 10, 1837.
 ops were equally clear that, in the circumstances of the case, it Macleod v.
 only competent, but highly expedient, that the questions of law Buchanan.
 be decided before any trial which may take place.

Court then took up the points of law in dispute.

MEDWYN.—In regard to the first objection to the proceedings, I think rence to the Act of Parliament in the petition is sufficient. As to the a date, I still retain my opinion that the objection is not well founded. rrant is dated ; and as to the petition not being dated, I referred before to is of summary applications in Mr Tait's Treatise, which show no date. s or petitions in the single-bill roll have no date, and even a bill of suspen-no date, except that of sisting, and of the order for answers. The next , Was the oath defective, because not dated ? If it was taken in the course rocedure, that is sufficient to fix its date ; just as an oath taken down at a t has no separate date per se. On that point also, I have no difficulty. As varrant of apprehension being granted by one Justice, I have changed my I was anxious to get information as to the English practice, observing e a statute applicable to the other end of the island, and I am now satisfied o justices were necessary to grant the warrant for apprehending. The last as to the jailor having no other warrant for imprisonment than the letter clerk of the peace. I hold this copy of the conviction sent in the clerk's o be equivalent to an extract of the conviction, and that the letter was ous. In the case of Andrew v. Murdoch,<sup>1</sup> for wrongous imprisonment, here was a warrant in the form of a letter, no objection was taken to the ration, but the question was as to the bail. I still think, therefore, that as no inaccuracy here.

D JUSTICE-CLERK.—As to the first point, I think there was a sufficient ce to the Act of Parliament ; and as to the want of dates, I think, under umstances, that is no legal objection. As to the third point, I have come onclusion that the Act draws a manifest distinction between the power of ning a party, which may be done by one justice, and the apprehension. I at this is the way in which it is interpreted in England. I think, therefore, s warrant for apprehension ought to have been signed by two justices. As not be thought right or proper to decide the relevancy of the averment trial.

The question whether the defenders are answerable for an illegal execu-of the sentence, may deserve attention. But in general, the Lord Ordinary that when a man has been illegally imprisoned, the party at whose instance imprisonment takes place must answer for it.

J. The point as to the state of the jail may, if proved, affect the amount of es, though it certainly may be a question partly for the jury how far the ers should be affected by it. It may be found not to be true."

<sup>1</sup> Dow, II., 401.

generally to the Act of Parliament authorizing the complainant. That it is not relevant to infer damages in this case, that the petitioner, nor the oath of the petitioner, emitted in terms of any date other than that affixed to the warrant of apprehension. That it is relevant to infer damages in this case against the pursuer responsible therefor, that the pursuer was apprehended and taken to the justices of peace in virtue of a warrant granted by a Justice of the Peace, and that it is relevant to infer damages in this case against the pursuer legally responsible therefor, that the pursuer was brought and detained in the jail of Ayr, in virtue not of the conviction and under the signatures of the two justices of peace, bearing date on 18th December, 1834, but in virtue alone of the writing of the justice of peace clerk to the magistrates of Ayr, and to the tolbooth, mentioned in this process, and dated 'Ayr, 18 1834,' and that the Lord Ordinary thereafter proceed further as he shall deem just."

FISHER and DUNCAN, S.S.C.—GIBSON-CRAIG, WARDLAW, and DALZIEL, W.

No. 278. JOHN TAINSH and OTHERS, Objectors.—Sol.-Gen. Ruthven Hamilton.

ROBERT SCARLETT, Respondent.—Thomson—Stewart

Teinds—Valuation.—The barony of A. contained several lands

r 1697, the teinds of the barony of Arnot were valued. The decree No. 278.
 ared "the just worth and constant yearly avail of the parsonage June 13, 1837.
 ls of the foresaid lands and barony of Arnot, consisting of the Mains 1st Division.
 Arnot, Easter and Wester Bows thereof, Faill, Craigside, Little Ld. Cockburn. ot, lands of Scotlandwell, and acres thereof, pertaining to the said Tainsh v.
 David Arnot of that ilk, to be now, and in all time coming, the sum Scarlett.
 77 merks, 8 shillings Scots, besides certain victual." This cumulo unt was then apportioned, by the decree, on the Mains of Arnot, and several other lands composing the barony, and it set forth, "Item, Sir David Arnot has forty acres about Scotlandwell, and that acre is worth twenty-five merks yearly, extending the hail to ane sand merks. It's the committee's opinion, that two hundred merks e teind." At the date of this valuation, the lands passing under the mination of Scotlandwell, and belonging to Arnot, amounted to h more than 40 acres, and were apparently about 150 acres. In 1709 a-charter was granted by the proprietor of the barony of Arnot, of land hail that part and portion of lands commonly called the Birks, Scotlandwell, with the yard and house belonging thereto, now possed by James Reddie in Scotlandwell, lying within the parochin of moak, and barony of Arnot." This charter conveyed "three acres" g with Birks; and among the other boundaries of the feu, which ended to about twenty acres Scots, one was "the march-stones at the of the acres of Scotlandwell on the north-west, from Kinnestown ch to the arable land that belongs to Birks, and from thence north to highway."

ubssequently to this, other parts of the lands of Scotlandwell were ired by John Tainsh and other feuars, in small portions of two or e acres each. In preparing a scheme of locality of the parish of moak, under a process of augmentation and modification of stipend, common-agent allocated the portion effeiring to the lands of Scotwell upon John Tainsh and others, and wholly exempted the lands birks, now belonging to Robert Scarlett. These lands had not been ed in the last locality, in 1802, which circumstance was alleged by ish and others to have occurred in consequence of their having been essed by a former minister of the parish from 1760 to 1796, during h period the levying of stipend from them had been suspended, and never resumed.

his explanation was repudiated by Scarlett, who contended that his s of Birks, though forming part of the lands of Scotlandwell, were art of those 40 acres which alone had been susceptible of valuation he date of the decree; that, at that date, the lands of Birks were "birks and moss land," and not liable to teind; that the entire of Scotlandwell should be laid upon these 40 acres, which were in the possession of Tainsh and others; and that no part of the and should now be allocated on Birks. In reference to the words by the proportion of cess imposed on each respective portion that the onus lay on Scarlett to prove that his lands of Birks part of the 40 acres in question, in the year 1697, which was possible; and indeed there was the strongest presumption of the same from the terms of the original feu of Birks, in 1709, which was "the arable land that belongs to Birks," and rendered it highly probable that his lands had not been all of the inferior sort which they were. They also alleged that the sub-feu, referred to by Scarlett, did not exceed one acre; that two acres, contiguous thereto, remained to be arable past the memory of man; and that this corresponded with the feu-charter in 1709, which expressly conveyed "three acres with Birks."

The Lord Ordinary "found that the lands of Birks as valued in the decree of valuation, dated 27th January, 1697, as a portion of the barony of Arnot, and accordingly, that they were in the same proportion of the cumulo teinds of the barony, as ascertained in the decreet of valuation, conform to the respective valued rent books, of Birks, and the remanent parts of the barony were to be decerned; reserving always to Mr Scarlett to insist that a proportion of the valued teinds effeiring to Birks shall be allocated upon his lands, and he shall be so advised, and to them their objections, as remitted to the clerk to rectify the locality accordingly; questions of expenses." *

---

* "NOTE.—The valuation was anterior to the feu, and is a con-

Scarlett reclaimed and prayed the Court to find “the lands of Birks No. 278. exempt from teind, and the payment of stipend.”

James and others also reclaimed and prayed the Court to find that the lands of Birks should not be made liable for a proportion of the cumulo June 13, 1837. Tainsh v. Scarlett.
of the barony of Arnot, but for a proportion of that part of the teind which was allocated by the decree on Scotlandwell. The Court, “in respect it is admitted by both parties that the respondents’ lands of Birks form part of the lands of Scotlandwell, before further consideration, remitted to the Lord Ordinary to ascertain whether the said lands of Birks, presently belonging to the respondent, include any part of the forty acres described in the decree of valuation, 1697, as belonging to David Arnot, and to report.”

The Lord Ordinary made a remit to Thomas Oliver, Lochend, to examine the lands and report. He reported that, close to the village of Scotlandwell, and exclusive of Birks, there were certain portions of arable land, called acres or half-acres, which had, from a very early date, been known by that designation; that the ground so denominated, contained 36 nominal acres exclusive of Birks, but amounted, within the third part of an acre, to 40 Scots statute acres. He reported alternatively, that, if the 40 acres in the decree of valuation referred to nominal acres, then there were 4 acres wanting to complete the 40, and these 4 acres were more likely to be part of the lands of Birks, than any where else; but if the 40 acres referred to Scots statute acres, then the 40 acres could still be made out as exclusive of Birks. The Lord Ordinary thereon reported that he was “of opinion that the lands of Birks must be held as including any part of the 40 acres described in the decree of valuation.”

The Court resumed the case along with this report.

MR. GILLIES.—I entertain very little doubt on this case. The lands of Birks are either valued or unvalued. If unvalued, they are liable to teind for one-fifth of the whole rent. The party claiming exemption from this locality, does not contend for this, as indeed it would be the worst result which could befall him in such a situation. But if the lands are valued, it must be as part of the lands of Scotlandwell, or part of the other lands of the barony of Arnot; there is no other alternative. And as both parties are agreed that they are part of the lands of Scotlandwell, I think they must be localised upon for such part of the teind of Scotlandwell as properly effeirs to them. Unless they are wholly unvalued, this seems to be the necessary result. As the reclaiming note for Scarlett prays the Court expressly to find the lands of Birks “exempt from teind,” we should refuse that note, and find the lands liable in teind, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to rectify the scheme of localisation prepared by the common agent.

MR. MACKENZIE.—It is clear that the lands of Birks were part of the barony of Arnot, and of that portion of it called Scotlandwell; and that is admitted on all hands. The lands of Scotlandwell are also admitted to have been of much more extent than 40 acres; and it is pleaded by Scarlett, that, at the date of

According to that view, the argument is at all times, as the value of the whole lands, and something of the value was attached to every part, even supposing that the decree had contained such a notandum. For, I should still feel much difficulty in sanctioning the doctrine of the lands was to be valued, and the rest exempted, from the power of the commissioners to pin down the whole valuation to the land. But it is unnecessary to go into that; I am satisfied to be put on the lands of Birks, but it may be difficult, at present amount.

LORD COREHOUSE.—There are but three alternatives under which this case must be considered. The lands of Birks may be valued along with Scotlandwell, or along with the rest of the barony, or valued at all. On considering the report of Oliver, who is an experienced valuer, I am convinced that they made no part of the 40 acres of Scotlandwell been admitted, on both sides, that they formed part of the lands of Scotlandwell. But as this is admitted, I take the view which has been expressed by Lord Kenzie, and hold that these lands were taken into view by the commissioners when they valued the lands of Scotlandwell. They were in truth valued as 40 acres. I cannot hold that 110 acres, out of 150, were wholly valueless. I never knew an instance of such a valuation as this is of no consequence that the lands of Birks may not have been included in the valuation; they were susceptible of being made arable, and made arable. I think, therefore, that part of the teind imposed on the lands of Birks. As to their being wholly teind-free in the circumstances, altogether impossible. And as Scarlett does not say they are unvalued, I think that a portion of the valuation of the lands of Birks is only alternative left to him. We should pronounce a finding

RS BUTLER JOHNSTON and HUSBAND, Objectors.—D. F. Hope No. 279.

—G. G. Bell.

ALD CONNELL (Common Agent in locality of Moffat), Respondent.—H. J. Robertson.

June 13, 1831
Johnstone v.
Connell.

—Valuation—Locality—Confusio.—The ten-pound land of C. was com-the 10 merk land of C., and the 5 merk land of C., of old extent; the contiguous, and had been possessed as one undistinguished property for centuries: in 1637 a decree of valuation of the 10 merk land of C. obtained before the High Court; in a question in 1837 how far that decree ble in a process of locality, where the 10 merk land could not be separatified,—Held, that, as the blending of the lands had taken place without ing imputable to any party, the benefit of the decree was not lost; and nothing appeared to take off the presumption, arising from the old extent, 0 merk land was two-thirds of the ten pound land, the proprietor of the l land of C. could only be localled on, to the amount of one-third of his valued, the remaining two-thirds being covered by the decree of valuation.

creet of valuation before the High Court of Teinds, in 1637, the June 13, 1831
“the 10 merk land of Corehead” of old extent, lying in the 1st Division Moffat, were valued. These lands then belonged in property Ld. Cockburn riority to James Johnstone of Corehead. In a locality of the Moffat, in 1837, it appeared that the Hon. Mrs Butler John-representative of James Johnstone, was proprietor of “the 10 nd of Corehead of old extent,” and the common agent localled nd as unvalued, in respect that the valuation of “the 10 merk Corehead” could not apply to it. Mrs Butler Johnstone gave in s, and a question arose, of a special nature, whether “the 10 nd” was identical with the “10 merk land,” which had been 1637, or whether it consisted of that 10 merk land, and another us 5 merk land of Corehead, the dominium utile of which, in years after the valuation, was acquired by James Johnstone of d, and which, when added to the 10 merk land, made a 15 merk, und land of Corehead. The superiority of the whole 10 pound Corehead appeared to have belonged to James Johnstone at the he valuation. The first process of locality of Moffat had been 1762, and the whole lands of Corehead were then localled on as
l. In 1783 that decree of locality was reduced at the instance of Johnstone of Corehead, on the ground that the valuation of 1637 received effect.

nsidering the conflicting evidence as to the question of fact, whe-10 pound land of Corehead was the identical subject valued by e 1637, the Lord Ordinary found “that the valuation 1637 of erk lands of Corehead cannot be held to apply to the 10 pound Corehead, now belonging to the objectors; therefore, repelled objections, and decerned: and found the objectors liable to the agent in the expense of this discussion.”

rated, and the respective lands could not now be identified, thus arose whether any, and what effect was due to the decree of the 10 merk land. The objector pleaded that, as the lands became blended without any fault of her, or her predecessors, the lands were originally two-thirds of the whole 10 pound land, and should be available to the extent of two-thirds of the whole, leaving only one-third unvalued.

The common agent answered that, in order to obtain a decree of valuation, it was necessary for the objector to show specific lands it applied. Although the relative proportions of the 5 merks, might mark the relative worth of the valued, and unvalued portions of Corehead, at the date when the old extent was made, there was no proof of their relative worth now. And as the 5 merk land now be producing as large a rental as the 10 merk land, she could not restrict the localling upon any part of her lands, alleging that such part was an actual portion of the 10 merk land, the 5 merk land.

Upon this question the following opinions were delivered.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I can see no ground in law or justice for the objections of the benefit of the decree of valuation. Though it is not possible now to draw the boundary line between the 10 merk land and the 5 merk land, that does not appear to me to have arisen from the fault of the objector, but from the fact that the lands have got blended into one, without blame being on the part of the objector, and if there was negligence any where, it was not on the part of the objector.

here is another view in which it may be considered. A valuation is just tantamount to a perpetual lease of the teinds at a fixed rent. But suppose that an actual lease of the teinds of the 10 merk lands of Corehead had existed, would a confusio like this have the effect of defeating the lease altogether? I do not think No. 279
June 31, 18
Johnstone v.
Connell.

I think this would not have been the result any more than if the same tenant had, for a term of years, occupied two contiguous farms, the succession to which, after a lapse of time, split, and went to separate owners. There might be great practical difficulty in dividing one of the blended farms, from the other; but that could not cause the extinction of the right of either owner. The separation would require to be made according to the best proof which could be adduced, of the extent of each farm. And so in this instance, I do not think the benefit of the decree of valuation is lost to the objectors; and if there be no more direct evidence of the portion of the lands of Corehead to which it applies, there is the relative proportion which was formerly fixed when the valuation of the old extent was made, and which will afford a rule, in the absence of any fact or presumption to take off the effect of the decree of valuation, according to this rule, will extend to two-thirds of the lands of Corehead, leaving one-third unvalued.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I incline to take the same view of this point, though it is not unattended with difficulty. It appears that no evidence now remains to show what portion of the lands of Corehead was the 10 merk land, and what portion was the 5 merk land. Confusio has taken place, and that without any thing fraudulent or blameable on either part. In these circumstances I apprehend that common sense will not allow us to hold that the decree of valuation has become obliterated. There may be some difficulty in extricating the rights of the parties. But these rights are not lost, and must be extricated according to the best means now remaining for doing so. If there be no better method, then a proportion of the whole lands, amounting to two-thirds, being the proportion of the 10 merk lands to the whole 15 merk lands of Corehead, must be taken to be valued by the decree; and the remaining third part, or 5 merk land, must be dealt with as unvalued.

LORD GILLIES.—I entirely concur. I hold that the decree valuing the 10 merk land of Corehead applies, pro tanto, to the 10 pound land of Corehead. Two-thirds of the 10 pound, or 15 merk, land are valued, and one-third is not. If each of the 10 merk, and 5 merk, properties could be identified, the decree of valuation would apply to the whole of the first, and to none of the last of the two properties.

These two properties cannot now be separated. In the absence of direct evidence on the subject, I think it must be assumed that the relative value of the one, to the other, as 10 to 5, that having been the proportion formerly fixed, and there being no circumstance stated which should alter that proportion. I hold, therefore, that these are now the relative proportions between that part of Corehead which is valued, being the 10 merk land, and that which is unvalued, being the 5 merk land. On these data, as the best which now remain, I apprehend that the decree of valuation covers two-thirds of the 10 pound land of Corehead, and leaves one-third unvalued.

LORD PRESIDENT declined judging, on account of relationship to one of the parties.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recal the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against: Find that the decret of valuation, 1687, is an effectual valuation of the lands of Corehead, but to the extent only of

H. J. Robertson.
GLASGOW COMMISSIONERS OF POLICE, Respondents.—S
furd—A. McNeill.

Title to Pursue—Statute.—1. Held under a local statute, Ewing, Jan. 19, 1837, that residenters in a city liable in police no sufficient title to complain of resolutions of the Commissioners rizing a certain appropriation of the funds alleged to be illegal who, besides being rate-payers, were the minority of the Board on occasion of passing these resolutions, but whose character expressly set forth, were in no better situation as to title. 2. Question minority of the Board, if their character as such were properly seen a good title to complain of the resolutions of the majority in respect in dispute?

June 13, 1837. THIS was a suspension and interdict applied for under similar to those in the case of Ewing v. Glasgow City Police, reported ante, p. 389, which see.

2d Division.

Ld. Cockburn.

The suspender, Morrison, and five others, formed the Board of Police Commissioners on the occasion of the resolution passed by the Board agreeing to pay a proportion of the expenses incurred in opposing the Water Company's Bill. These being themselves "General Commissioners of Police for Glasgow, and rated in the police-books as liable in payment of rates, and who have been assessed therefor and paid together with certain other parties "residenters in Glasgow of property there, and also rated in the police-books presented a bill of suspension, complaining of the resolutions of the majority of the Board.

e respondents, the Board of Commissioners, objected to the suspension title to complain, on the ground of their having no direct or immediate personal interest.<sup>1</sup> ie Lord Ordinary, proceeding on the decision in the case of Ewing, found the objection to the title to suspend, and dismissed the action, with expenses.

No. 2
June 13,
Morrison
Glasgow Missions
Police.

he suspenders reclaimed, and contended that the present was different from Ewing's case, in so far as here the minority of the Board of Commissioners were complaining of the act of the majority, which was per se void title,<sup>2</sup> and had been set forth in the bill of suspension, independent of the title as residents in Glasgow liable to the police assessment, which was found to be insufficient; and this the more especially as the suspension related not to any malversation of the Board in affairs of the city, but to a proceeding totally out of the line of their duty, involving legal appropriation of the funds, which the minority of the Commissioners, as statutory guardians and administrators of the funds, had an interest to prevent.

On this it was answered, that the suspenders had not set forth in the bill the title they now wished to proceed upon, and could not be allowed to change their position and come forward with another title in addition to what they had formerly set forth; besides, that a different remedy was provided in such a case as the present by the 133d section of the Police Act.

JUDICIAL CLERK.—It is not necessary to give an opinion on the question whether it be competent or not for the minority of the Commissioners to complain, as this is not before us for judgment. There is no difference between the present and that of Ewing. The description in the bill of Morrison and the other suspenders as Commissioners, is a mere general designation they assume to themselves. We ought to see something ex facie of the bill showing that it was in the mind of the minority to make such a complaint. But neither there nor in the reasons and pleas in the record is this title set forth. In these circumstances there is no ground for altering the interlocutor.

JUDICIAL CLERK and MEDWYN concurred.

JUDICIAL CLERK was absent.

THE COURT accordingly adhered, finding additional expenses due.

MOWBRAY and HOWDEN, W.S.—CAMPBELL and M'DOWALL, S.S.C.—Agents.

---

See this ground more fully argued in Ewing, ante, p. 395.

Aitchison v. Magistrates of Dunbar, Feb. 4, 1836, ante, XIV. 421.

general obligation to repay. As the above acknowledged along with other circumstances held to establish resting owi

June 13, 1837. THE late Joseph and David Murray were debtors Herriot in a sum of £400, and also in a sum of £100. Murray granted the following holograph acknowledged 1815—Received from Mr David Herriot one hundred pounds sterling," (Signed) "DAVID MURRAY, Bro. ruary, 1817, they executed a trust-deed for behoof o favour of David Herriot, and of the respondents C John Murray, proceeding on the narrative that they creditors, thereafter named, the respective debts a under-written, viz. David Herriot, the sum of £59 afterwards declared "that the mention of the sum persons before-named shall not import that such s unless they shall be otherwise sufficiently instructe lawful for us or the said trustees, or the other credi quarrel the same hinc inde." The trustees accepted and continued in the management of the trust. In division of the trust-funds was prepared, in which the Herriot was recognised as amounting to £591. In the management and for payment of expenses connecte Herriot advanced a sum of £174. He subsequently of the debt of £400 above-mentioned.

Thereafter, David Murray and David Herriot hav cators, Allan and others, trustees of David Herriot, i Joseph and David Murray's trust-deed as due to Herriot, No. 281. 400 already paid,) and £174, being the sum advanced by behoof of the trust.

June 13, 183
Allan v.
Murray.

of £174 was admitted by the defenders to be due, and the n was as to the debt of £191, which was composed of the mentioned, with interest thereon down to the date of the id which the pursuers contended they had established by the knowledge above-mentioned, by the terms of Joseph Murray's trust-deed, and also by certain correspondence of ff found that the sum of £174, with interest, was a subsisting the trust-estate of Joseph and David Murray, but that Her- had failed to establish the debt of £191 by legal evidence. a Herriot's trustees brought an advocacy, and pleaded, as below, that the balance of £191 was established to be due, debt as stated in the narrative of the trust-deed, under £400 thereof admitted to be paid, had been recognised by ncerned and acquiesced in as correct.

ndents, on the other hand, pleaded that there was no legal t evidence, which was expressly declared by the trust-deed te, to prove the constitution and still less the subsistence of question.

, Charles Herriot and John Murray, alleging that the trust they had acted had been some time since abandoned, pleaded r respondent Thomas Murray being in possession, as execu- state of their deceased constituents, and being able and ready ver sum might be found due to Herriot's trustees, there was no r in fact or law, on which any decerniture could pass against stees of Joseph and David Murray.

l Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Advocates the the interlocutors of the Sheriff complained of, and finds that 191, being the balance of £591, set forth in the trust-deed d David Murray, as then due by them to the author of the s sufficiently instructed to have been truly due at that period, ll resting owing; and, therefore, decerns against the defen- s Murray, as executor of and representing the deceased ray and David Murray, the original trusters, for the said sum h the lawful interest thereof, from the date of the said trust- yment: Finds the said defenders liable for the advocates' th in this Court, and before the Sheriff; allows an account e given in, and remits the same, when lodged, to the auditor ion and report: But in respect that the trustees of the said David Murray were liable only each for his own intromis- ad, to the knowledge of the advocates, and with the assent * "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary thinks the debt of £191 sufficient by the minutes of the meeting of 27th February, 1817, by the deed executed the day following, and by the holograph acknowledgment granted by David Murray (whose representative is now the least) 29th May, 1815. He takes it to be settled by the cases of Ogi 1703 (Mor. 11510); Donaldson, 12th June, 1711 (Mor. 1151); Fiddler, 24th November, 1809 (F.C.); that such a naked acknowledgment of receipt of money, as appears in the document last mentioned, do the constitution of a debt and a general obligation to repay; while that all the circumstances of this case tend most strongly to conclusion; but, if this be the true character of the document, it is that it does not require a stamp, either as a receipt or a promissory receipt stamp, as witnessing not the discharge but the constitution and not a bill stamp, as not expressing any liquid or specific engagement on a certain day, but only a general acknowledgment of debt;—see 28th February, 1833 (11 Shaw, 478), and Martin, 25th June, 1782).

"The judgment might be rested, perhaps, on this ground as to the debt in this acknowledgment, with a small addition for unpaid interest to £191, at the date of the trust-deed in February, 1817. But it may be laid out of view the precise recital, in that deed, of a debt of £500 (£400 of which has always been admitted), in spite of the proof which occurs in a subsequent part of it, or the absolute and unqualified statement of the same facts in the minutes of the preliminary meeting. A clause in the trust-deed appears to the Lord Ordinary to be intended to ratify or retract the deliberate admission of the debts previously admitted, than to provide, in a competition of creditors, for the chance of some defect in the formal evidence of some of them, of which they might take advantage; but, as against the debtors themselves, the admission is nearly conclusive, and sufficient at least to lay upon them the burden of proving that it was erroneous.

"In any view, it seems altogether impossible to hold the ca parties reclaimed, either as to the merits or expenses.

No. 281.

THE COURT, holding the balance of £191 to be instructed, not merely by the holograph acknowledgment above-mentioned, but by the whole circumstances of the case, pronounced as follows:—
 “Adhere to the interlocutor in so far as complained of by the note for Thomas Murray, and allow the decree against him to go out and be extracted ad interim: Find additional expenses due; remit the two other notes to the Lord Ordinary, to hear parties farther on the points therein brought under the review of the Court, with power to do thereanent as to his Lordship shall seem just.”

June 14, 1837.

Thomson v.
Campbell.

BENTON, W.S.—A'INSLIE, MACALLAN, and GRAHAM, W.S.—W. POLLOCK, S.S.C.— J. MORRISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

WILLIAM and ALEXANDER THOMSON, W.S., Claimants and Pursuers.— No. 282.

Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Marshall.

JOHN FREDERICK CAMPBELL, Raiser and Defender.—D. F. Hope—Walker.

Process—Reduction—Multiplepoinding.—The purchaser of a parcel of lands had a personal bond for part of the price, and at a subsequent period his heir had a bond of corroboration to the heir of the seller:—Held competent for the creditors of the seller to insist in a reduction of the bond of corroboration in so far as it was erroneously granted to the heir. 2. Circumstances in which held to be a sufficient objection on the part of the purchaser's representative that in the action and a relative multiplepoinding, representatives of the seller who were not cited were only cited edictally.

That the present claim was not brought forward when an action (afterwards reduced) was instituted in 1827, for the separate sum of £174, 17s. 6d., seems explained by the fact, that that action was for money actually advanced during the currency of the trust, and for which the trustees were personally and properly debtors, whereas the £591 was due by the trustees, and out of the trust funds and accordingly no claim was made at that time for any part of this £591 other than for the £400 all along confessedly due, and afterwards paid—or for the balance now in dispute of £191.

The trustees should not have been made parties in the advocacy, especially as no other defender is confessedly solvent, and has been in the management of his affairs ever since 1828. The trustees have therefore been found entitled to their defence in this Court. But as the Sheriff's decree against them, for the £174, 17s. 6d., has not been complained of, but, on the contrary, has been obtempered by payment (though it is not said by whom), they can have no relief from those who appear in an inferior court, where they appear indeed to have maintained many groundless and unnecessary propositions.”

Cullen, his heirs, and assignees, for the remaining sum was granted on the condition, "that at or before the simul et semel that the above capital sum is paid, the Cullen, as purchaser of the above lands, or his foresaid creditors of his father ranked on the foresaid price of the said lands, and shall obtain conveyances of the same in his favours as purchaser foresaid, conform to the deed of bond of caution granted for the said price, and shall deliver to me (the said Daniel Campbell), as purchaser of Saughs, for a further security of my said purchase, the deed of ranking, with a proportion of the grounds of debt answering to the said lands of Saughs, compared with the said decret of sale, so far as they affect my said part of the above decret of sale, and deliver the decret of the just proportion of the grounds of debt and diligences thereof, to me or my foresaid, on my obligation for ordinary form, under which condition and provision the same is granted, and no otherwise; but under this declaration the rest of the said capital sum shall be paid in the meantime due."

Dr Cullen died in 1790, no part of either principal or interest above sum having been paid. The contents of the inventory of the deceased, as part of the executry-funds, are included in a partial confirmation of the executry which was granted to his younger sons.

Daniel Campbell having also died, his successor,

I since the foresaid term of Martinmas, 1765, are still resting- No. 282.
 nd unpaid, and that the same when accumulated extends at the reof to the sum of £759, 4s. 5d. sterling, and that the foresaid of the creditors of the said William Cullen of Saughs is still in nce, and not completed; and that it has been required that I, in ation of the foresaid bond granted by the said deceased Daniel ll, should become bound in manner underwritten:—Therefore I und and obliged myself, as I hereby in corroboration of the bond above narrated, and without prejudice thereto, or any dilihat has followed or may follow thereon, sed accumulando jura bind and oblige myself, my heirs, executors, and successors, to he said Robert Cullen, his heirs or assignees, all and whole the sum of £759, 4s. 5d. sterling, being the accumulated balance of e of the above lands at the date hereof, with a fifth part more of in case of failure, together with the lawful interest of the above ated sum from the date hereof, and thereafter during the not-paynder the following conditions always, that the said Robert Culepresenting the said Dr William Cullen, as above, shall as soon ble have the said ranking of the creditors of the said William terminated and completed,” &c. The condition which followed same in import as that inserted in the original bond.

ough this bond was taken in name of Lord Cullen as heir cum beit was not included in the inventory lodged by him of the estate, e took up as heir to his father, and no part of the principal or intehe contents thereof was ever claimed or disposed of by his Lord-any one in right of him, either during his life or after his death.

Walter Campbell died in 1816, and was succeeded by the r, Walter Frederick Campbell.

ranking of the creditors of Dr Cullen, which had been in the me proceeded with, terminated in 1831, when a final decret of ice was pronounced in favour of the trustee for the creditors milton Dundas), who subsequently granted to Campbell a dispo-id assignation to this decret, and to the debts for which he (the
 had been ranked and preferred.

32, Miss Margaret Cullen and Mrs Robina Cullen or Millar, len's only surviving daughters, who were creditors of their father of £3000 of principal, besides interest, expedite a confirmation, utors-creditors ad omnia, to the debt in the above-mentioned of which they granted a trust-assignation to the pursuers, Messrs nd Alexander Thomson, W.S.

claim under the bonds had been made against Campbell till 1821, application for a new bond of corroboration was made to him on t of these ladies, and was subsequently granted. After the pros in the ranking had been brought to a close, and Campbell's title ands of Saughs secured, as above-mentioned, steps were taken to

June 14, 1887
 Thomson v.
 Campbell.

heirs or assignees, and in so far as such part of it might deprive the confirmation expedite by the pursuers' authors or otherwise, in case the bond should not be reduced to have it found and declared that the bond, in so far as granted of Lord Cullen, was truly a trust for behoof of the party in right to that part of Dr Cullen's executry-funds, consisting of the question; and that, in either alternative, it should be found that the pursuers were the true creditors therein. Some called as defenders in these actions were in the East and were cited edictally.

The two processes were subsequently conjoined.

In the multiplepoinding, Messrs Thomson claimed the medio, as in right of their constituents, in whom the debt their recent confirmation ad omnia.

In defence, it was pleaded for Campbell—

1. The present conjoined actions cannot proceed, inasmuch as parties in right of Lord Cullen are not called, and, in the case of this case, mere edictal citations are not sufficient.

2. The reductive conclusion is incompetent, as the bond cannot be held null, so far as granted to Lord Cullen, as ultra.

3. The declaratory conclusion, that the bond was a mere person of Lord Cullen for behoof of the claimants, is untenable capable of being competently proved.

4. There is no room for maintaining that the bond of 1776 is in a wrong party.

1. As to the amount of the fund, the claimants are entitled to the principal sum in the bond of corroboration, with the legal interest thereof from its date till payment; but, looking to the demand for a new bond in 1821, they are entitled, moreover, to insist upon an accumulation of interest as at that time.<sup>1</sup>

2. Decree ought to be pronounced in terms of one or other of the alternative conclusions of the summons of reduction and declarator, in respect that the debt in question was part of the executry-funds of the Dr Cullen, and that the bond of corroboration was granted in the name of his heir cum beneficio inventarii, either erroneously, or only for the benefit of those who had acquired, or might acquire the right to these executry-funds.

3. It is jus tertii to the respondent to oppose a decree of reduction and declarator, as concluded for in that action, or to oppose the demand of the present claimants in the multiplepoinding.

4. All parties interested have been called, and, if not, the remedy is in the power of the nominal raiser, who might have called any individuals he considered to have been omitted, and is barred from stating objection to making the fund in medio furthcoming.<sup>2</sup>

5. The condition set forth in the bonds has been purified not only by the proceedings and documents which the claimants offered, and are bound to deliver to Mr Campbell, but likewise by the operation of the positive and of the negative prescription.

The Lord Ordinary, after considering the question on cases, pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the note subjoined: *—“ Finds, 1mo, Scott's Creditors, Feb. 2, 1773 (M. 14189); Campbell v. Earl of Galloway, Feb. 3, 1802, M. App. to Annualrent, No. 4. The amount as adjusted by the Court before raising the action was £1890, or the sum in the bond of corroboration, with 4 per cent interest from its date.

M'Braire v. Hamiltons (2 W. and S. 66).

“ It is very much to be regretted that the parties did not settle this case judicially, when every thing was so near being adjusted in August and September, 1834. The Lord Ordinary has not thought himself at liberty to consider whether there was not at that time a truly completed agreement, because there is no statement or plea on the record under which that question can properly be decided. It is obvious, however, that after the letter of the defender's agent of 16th August, 1834, and the answer to that letter of the 18th (See Appendix, p. 36), every thing was substantially settled, and that it was captious at least, if not impotent, afterwards to break off, on the pursuers' very innocent demand of making a joint obligant with Mr Campbell, if the payment was to be postponed till Sunday; yet this was, at that period, the only remaining point of difference; the Lord Ordinary would rather infer, from Mr M'Innes's subsequent letter of October, 1834 (p. 38, G.), that even this had not been objected to. Without expressing any opinion, however, as to the obligatory nature of these arrangements, the Lord Ordinary cannot help saying, that when he considers the admissions made in them, after the whole case was fully before the legal advisers of the Court (for the period referred to is more than a year after the execution of the last bond by Mr Hamilton Dundas in July, 1833), he cannot but be surprised at the such payment.

"The Lord Ordinary has abstained from disposing of the of the action as to the bond of corroboration, chiefly because ratory conclusions sufficient and clearly well-founded. T opinion, however, is in favour of the competency of such reduction, though he sees difficulties in the way of it, in a ca the present, with which he was unwilling without necessity defender, however, shall take the case to review, and the c sufficiency of the decree of declarator, it may be right for the of the Court on the reduction also. The Lord Ordinary ( edictal citation of Lord Cullen's heir-at-law, and other i sufficient, in a case like this, to warrant decrees on the meri been dead for twenty-seven years. The defender has stat could be suggested in behalf of such heirs or executors; and in the whole case, it is that those persons could have even than the creditors of Lord Cullen, the heir served cum ben to these creditors, again, it is enough that, after twenty-seven on their part, the defender himself cannot indicate the name them. That the decret against the parties cited will be a de and may by possibility be opened up any time within fort irrelevant as an objection to decree in a multiplepoinding; si tion could be sustained, it would be enough to prevent such pronounced in any case where the raiser could prevail on one personally cited and having palpably no interest, to withhold record. If a preferable claimant is really absent without repetition from one who has been unduly preferred, but the under the decret will always be safe. See Bain, 29th No 9131).

"As to the proceedings in the ranking and sale, and the compliance with the condition of assigning the debts there estate in security of the purchase, the Lord Ordinary has li set forth in the interlocutor. He is rather inclined to thin secure at all events by the positive prescription under b superiority and the terms of the decret of sale. But he d original creditor, and, not being included in the partial confirmations No. 28 made in 1790 immediately after his death, was duly vested in the June 14, 18 constituents of the present pursuers and claimants, by their confirmation Thomson v executors-creditors ad omnia in 1832: Finds, 2do, That any right to Campbell. said sum which was vested in Lord Cullen by the said bond of corroboration in 1798, was so vested in trust only for the creditors of Dr Cullen the original creditor, and not for the use or behoof of the said Lord Cullen himself, or that of his creditors or representatives; and being distinct and distinguishable, does now belong to the said pursuers and claimants, to the exclusion of any claim on the part of the creditors or representatives of the said Lord Cullen; and therefore, and in respect of the citations and comparances in the conjoined action of reduction and declarator are, in the circumstances of this case, sufficient to give the defender, Walter Frederick Campbell, the representative of the original creditor, and the only party who opposes the conclusions of that action, all the protection against future competing claims to which he is legally entitled, decerns in the declaratory conclusions of the said action, but does not it unnecessary to decide on the separate conclusions for reduction: Finds, 3tio, That the original proceedings in the ranking and sale, the said decret of preference pronounced therein on the 8th July, 1831, in favour of Gabriel Hamilton Dundas as trustee for the creditors of Dr Cullen, and the disposition and assignation by the said Gabriel Hamilton Dundas (with the consent of the present claimants) of the said decret of preference, and of the debts for which the said trustee had been ranked and preferred, and the whole grounds thereof, executed in favour of the said Walter Frederick Campbell in March and July, 1835, and now ready to be delivered on the debt being settled, constitute sufficient implement of the conditions in the original bond and corroboration thereof relative to securing the debtor's purchase of the lands of Saughs, by such a conveyance of a decret of ranking and the relative grounds of debt; and therefore, in the conjoined processes of multiplepoinding, ranks and prefers the said pursuers and claimants to the whole balance of the price of the said lands as the fund in medio: Finds, 4to, That the said fund in medio

---

in medio, or of the debt truly owing. He has taken it at the sum finally adjusted and agreed upon by the parties themselves, when the matter was (apparently) not being accommodated in August, 1834, viz. the sum in the bond of corroboration, with four per cent interest from its date. It is very true that the pursuers then agreed to restrict their claim to this amount, only on the understanding that they were to get immediate payment, and that they had always maintained that they were entitled to legal interest, and to periodical rests and accumulations.
 If the matter were entirely open, the Lord Ordinary would not be disinclined to make some allowance of this sort; and if the case is brought before the Court by the defender, he should be well pleased that their opinion should be taken upon this point also. On the whole, however, he thought that the adjustment actually made was equitable, and that there was a better chance of the matter being settled without further litigation if it was left undisturbed."

unnecessary to decide on the conclusions for reduction, and as it found that the fund in medio is no more than £1890.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There is no doubt, looking to this case, is due. The only question is as to the matters contained in the persons' note. I think we are entitled to reduce the bond of corroboration so as to open up the way for the declaratory conclusions; and as to the fund, we shall do justice between the parties if we take the present bond of corroboration in 1798 and allow legal interest upon it downwards.

LORD MEDWYN.—After so long a period elapsing without any made for the debt, I am not surprised that Mr Campbell and his agents wished it to be investigated. But I have no difficulty either as to interest. It clearly was a moveable right, and Lord Cullen could find this was a debt due to himself. Mr Campbell is quite safe in present claimants.

LORDS GLENLEE and MEADOWBANK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find of corroboration granted in 1798 ought to be reduced with effect of opening the way to the declaratory conclusions in favour of the pursuers and claimants, and decern accordingly find the said pursuers and claimants entitled to legal interest on the above-mentioned bond of corroboration from its date in these variations adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor find expenses due."

JAMES MURRAY and JOHN MURRAY, Pursuers.—J. Anderson.
 WILLIAM ELLIOT, Defender.—G. G. Bell.

No. 283

June 14, 18
 Murray v.
 Elliot.

of—Payment—Bill of Exchange—Qualified Admission.—In an action for payment of the balance of a debt originally constituted by bill which had been delivered up, the debtor having judicially admitted circumstances sufficient to show that the balance had not been paid—Held that such admission could not be actually qualified by the statement of counter-claims of which no other evidence was produced.

November, 1820, the late Thomas Murray, father of the pursuers, delivered a sum of £300 to the defender Elliot upon a promissory-note signed by him and his father. In November, 1826, Elliot paid a year's interest on account of the debt. On 8th January, 1828, he paid £50 and on 8th July thereafter the farther sum of £50 to account, the balance now remaining due being £175. Thereafter Elliot subscribed and delivered to Murray his acceptance for this sum payable three days after date, Murray about the same time delivering up to Elliot the original bill of £300. Ex facie of the new bill, the date had been altered by erasure from 25th November, 1828, to 25th November, 1827.

June 14, 18
 2d Division
 Lord Jeffrey
 T.

Murray, founding on the circumstances now mentioned, raised action against Elliot, concluding for payment of the sum of £300, with interest, and deduction of the payments to account. Murray having subsequently died, the action was insisted in by his sons and executors James and John Murray.

Elliot admitted on the record the original constitution of the debt and its continuance up to November, 1826;—he admitted the subsequent payments to account, and also that some time after November, 1826, he had subscribed and delivered to Murray his acceptance for a sum of £175, but he alleged that the balance in question was liquidated by a debt nearly of the same amount due to him by Murray arising out of a transaction in 1800 in regard to the marches of their respective farms.

In defence against the action he pleaded—

1. The sexennial prescription.

2. That the bill having been delivered up to himself, the debtor, the contents contained in it must be presumed to have been paid, and that the payment could not be proved except by his writ or oath.

3. That the debt pursued for had not been established, and was at all events extinguished by the defender's counter-claims.

Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, with the following finding of fact:—“ Finds, 1mo, That it is admitted by the defender,

---

The defence, that the original bill of November 1820 was prescribed, and that it is no longer capable of being proved but by writ or oath, is absurd, after the

" in the circumstances of the case, and after the defender's history of the alteration of the date, the Lord Ordinary is inclined to think that, between these original parties, the bill for £175 would have been valid for action, or even for diligence. But as it could not be known whether or not such admissions would be made, it was proper to leave the summons as it stands. The Lord Ordinary thinks that it is not clear how this alteration was occasioned. The bill (he has no doubt) was made soon after the last payment to account (which was made in July 1828, and, of course, the date of that year was very near the end of the year, as no interest had been paid since 25th November, 1826, and ready with no more money, it was thought easier to change the date to 1827 (adding the interest up to that date) than to calculate the interest to the very day of the transaction.

" But the judgment is rested on the principle stated in the viz., that facts proved by a defender's judicial admissions are facts proved extrajudicially by his writ, and are to be dealt with on the footing of prescription, exactly as any other facts so proved, or admitted by him; that is to say, to be taken as conclusive against him, but not as to any qualifications or counter averments, of which they are not proof. Proof by the writ of a party, though equiparate in many cases with proof by the writ of a party, stands in this respect on quite a different footing. The oath sworn by a party, and the force entirely from the judicial contract of parties implied on it, terminates all future discussion, and excludes all other proof. It not only admits of the adjunction of intrinsic qualities, which a party would otherwise have no means of proving. But the writ of a party (referred to after prescription has been sustained) has evidence of its own. It is but an ordinary article of evidence, and leaves all concerning it to be proved as other evidence. It brings any farther proof they can command, either to refute or to confirm it. The great general rule or canon of evidence, therefore, is, that no man can prove any thing in his own favour by his own writing, though the best evidence against him is what he has deliberately said or written. Judicial admissions, however, are more in contrast with oaths of party than mere private writs, and bear date long before any adverse interest had arisen, it is

amount till November, 1826, inclusive; the defender him- No. 285 aid to the pursuer a year's interest upon the bill for this sum,

June 14, 18
Murray v.
Elliot.

the original debt by setting off against it a counter claim of a totally different nature, would rather appear to be extrinsic, and not available even in an action.

This counter claim, therefore, was in itself of a plausible description, it could not be inadmissible against the demand for this liquid and admitted original debt. But it is, in the highest possible degree, of the very dubious nature. The alleged debt, on account of the marches, is said to have been paid to the defender's father in 1800, when the defender himself was too young to have been put in the way of immediate settlement in 1810, when he was more than a child, and no way consulted about his father's affairs. It is said that he had been settled about that time, therefore (as the pursuer alleges), knowing about it, and the whole subsequent conduct, both of father and son, to demonstrate that it was either so settled or abandoned as groundless.
It is fully admitted that they borrowed £300 from the pursuer, and were bound to repay that sum in full. But, if the pursuer had actually owed him only £100 at this time, it is altogether inconceivable that the obligation should have been granted for more than the balance. But the full interest is allowed; and in 1824, the father, who alone knew every thing about the matter, dies without ever having hinted at the existence of this counter claim, or his son's standing. His son (the defender) then pays the interest of two years, and in the eighth year of the first bill's currency, makes two partial payments, one of the principal of £90 and of £50. The bill being thus saved from forfeiture, and the debt reduced in July 1828 to £160 of principal, with interest to November, 1826, he grants a new bill (now bearing date in November 1825, being the precise amount of principal and interest then resting due on the old bill) into the hands of the pursuer; who, at or about this time, gives up the original bill for £300. These are the facts admitted on the record; and the only facts which the defender would now assume, without proof of relevant offer of proof, are 1st, That the pursuer, at the time, agreed that the balance of £175 to be extinguished by the counter claim for marches, which had been heard of for near 30 years; and in consequence of this agreement, he gave up the original bill as a paid and extinguished document; and 2<sup>d</sup>, That the £175 bill, at or about the same time, had no sort of connexion with the old bill or its settlement; that the coincidence of the sum with the balance was a matter of mere accident; and that it was granted altogether and merely for the accommodation of the pursuer, though it bears the words 'value received, is drawn at only three days' date,—and could not be accounted,—and, in point of fact, never was out of the hands of the defender. It may be added then, so soon after this as December, 1828, and but a few days before raising this action, it is proved by the defender's own letters, that he had been paid by the pursuer for payment of some debt, which he admitted to be the same; and that he never insinuates that they had finally closed accounts in the course of the action, or that he was really creditor to the pursuer, for relief of this allegation.

The summary of the facts disposes not only of the defence founded on the bill, but of the whole argument rested on the fact of the original bill being given up to the defender, and the maxim 'chirographum apud debito-rem' &c. That fact, looked at by itself, no doubt raises a presumption constituted by that document had been paid, but a presumption liable to be rebutted by opposite evidence, and in this case entirely overruled by the evidence of the cause. The mere granting of a new bill for the exact balance due on the old, would be sufficient to overrule it, but the whole case demonstrates that what might perhaps have been presumed, if no other evidence had been given, cannot possibly be true. To the Lord Ordinary this three days after date : Finds, 4to, That though the date appears to have been altered from 25th November, 1826, to 27th November, 1827, and though the defender has denied that it was made by him, it is not denied that it was made with him before it was delivered to the pursuer ; but, on the contrary, by him (in the 9th article of his Statement of Facts), bill now founded on by the pursuer, was subscribed by modulation of the said pursuer, &c. : Finds, 5to, That though he has evaded any specification of the precise time when the £300 was given up to him by the pursuer, he has admitted some time posterior to the last payment to account of the said bill some considerable time prior to the raising of this action. Finds, 6to, That it is not pretended that the defender came to account of this original debt of £300, except the £50 and £50 respectively, for which he has been all along answerable to the pursuer ; and that the only account he gives of the way in which the £160 (or, with a year's interest, £175) was liquidated, is by averring that a debt nearly to the same amount had been paid by the pursuer to his (the defender's) father, upon some transaction.

---

appears as certain as if it had been judicially admitted that the £300 was secretly purloined from the pursuer, or got up on a distinct pretence at the hour with the balance in cash. Indeed, the simultaneous grant of the bill for that very balance comes in substance to the same thing.

" Towards the close of the debate, the defender made no attempt to show his readiness still to prove some of the more insignificant averments.

as of their respective farms, so long ago as the year 1800, and alleged No. 283.
 e been finally adjusted, and brought to a sum in 1810; and that this June 15, 188
 bt was brought forward and agreed to be applied in extinction of Rendall v. lance of the £300, when the original bill for that sum was delivered Robertson.
 on after the payment of the last £50 in July 1828: Finds, 7mo, here is no evidence whatever, nor any relevant offer of evidence ould affect the pursuer in support of this allegation, which is entirely l by the pursuer, and appears irreconcilable with the fact of the ad-borrowing of £300 by the defender and his father in 1820, twenty after this counter-claim is said to have emerged, and ten years after been brought to a specific account, by what is called the award of ee: Finds, 8vo, That in these circumstances, and with reference way in which this action is libelled, it is not necessary to deter-whether the bill for £175 could be the ground of diligence or direct , in respect of its alleged vitiation; or even whether it can be looked in adminicle of evidence in the present cause, inasmuch as the facts ily admitted by the defender, which are at least equivalent to facts cted by his writ, sufficiently establish that the balance of £175 has ed unsatisfied of the original debt since 25th November, 1827, and ie original document of debt was soon after given up by the pursuer, n exchange for a new document, which, whether actionable or not, hen subscribed and delivered by the defender in security of that e; and therefore, and on the whole matter, repels the defences, and is against the defender, in terms of the conclusions of the libel, reser-always to the said defender his right to claim, in any competent , any sum he can prove to have been owing by the pursuer to the of the said defender, and to the pursuer his defences against such : Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses.”
 iot reclaimed.

THE COURT unanimously adhered, finding additional expenses due.

D. GRAY, S.S.C.—W. MARTIN, S.S.C.—Agents.

MARY RENDALL, Pursuer.—Pyper.
 JOHN ROBERTSON, Defender.—G. G. Bell.

No. 284

Property—Udal Lands.—Circumstances in which held that a party who had for several years, in possession of udal lands, had no title to them, and con-ntly that the right of a disponee to whom he sold them must be set aside at uance of the heir of the last proprietor.

June 15, 18

QUEL of the case reported ante, p. 265, which see. It was then ed that the lands were udal, and the next question to be disposed of 1st Division
 Ld. Cockburn
 B.

that the title of John Rendall was so made up as reference to the right of Samuel Rendall, the pursuer way to certiorate a purchaser of the existence of the circumstances, the late John Rendall had then the real subjects in him by possession, and, even though he personal obligation to the heir of Samuel to make it him, that would merely create a claim of damages an instance of the heir, and could not affect the onerous Robertson which had been followed by possession answered that her late father, Samuel, had been act under the conveyance in his favour, so that he had the in him at his death. John Rendall, therefore, was not any sense, when he subsequently obtained possession intruder, and the right of a purchaser from him more competition with the right of the true proprietor.

In regard to the decree in absence, obtained by John against the pursuer's brother George, now deceased, pupil, no sufficient plea was stated against its being rec

The Lord Ordinary reduced the rights made up by his conveyance to Mrs Robertson, and farther "reduced the decreets in absence called for to be reduced in the mons, to the effect of parties being heard as in the found that the pursuer, Mary Rendall, as heir of her father of her brother, George Rendall, has the only good an to the lands of Ingsay, Nistabean, Brittavil, and others, libel. and is entitled to enter into possession. and to lev

THE PRESIDENT.—I think the interlocutor right. The possession of these lands was in Samuel, at his death, and in no one else. He died in the full real of the subjects, and it was not his brother John, but his son George, who was entitled to take them up after his death. Neither John Rendall nor his son can compete with the issue of Samuel. No. 284.
June 15, 183
Rendall v.
Robertson.

THE MACKENZIE.—I think the interlocutor is well-founded. John Rendall cannot have had some possession on the mere pretence of a right as heir; but it is possible to hold that that circumstance can be founded on by his disponee as ground for cutting off the right of the true heir. It is of no moment, in this case, whether he granted a conveyance to Mrs Robertson or not. He had no power to grant it, and both his right, and that of his disponee, must be cut off.

THE COREHOUSE.—I think the interlocutor ought to be adhered to. I have considered the report of the previous judgment in this cause, where it was decided that the lands were not feudal, but udal, and, had I been then in the Inner-House, I should have concurred in that decision. It is indeed considered by Bankton that lands may be feudalized by any charter containing a precept for infefting the grantee, although the granter of the charter was himself a subject, and had no overture but was an allodial proprietor. But it appears to me to be more consistent principle to hold, that lands are not duly feudalized, unless the vassal can trace his title back to the Crown as the ultimate superior. The accounts which we have as to udal lands are of a very meagre character. But they are held by the courts to be allodial lands. Possession of them, however, is not enough if it be not on a title. And therefore I lay aside the possession which John Rendall is said to have enjoyed, as it was obtained by tortious proceedings adopted by a pupil. But Samuel Rendall's possession was on a good title. The disposition in his favour by his eldest brother Robert, who was the proprietor, appears unquestionable. Whether the use of dispositive words de presenti be essential to the conveyance of udal lands, it is unnecessary to decide, as there was such a disposition in Samuel's favour, followed by actual possession. The pursuer is the son and heir of Samuel, and is not affected by any possession which John may have had after Samuel's death, as such possession was on a bad title.

THE GILLIES concurred.

THE COURT adhered, and allowed additional expenses to the pursuer as to this point; and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the ulterior conclusions of accounting.

R. URQUHART, S.S.C.—P. CROOKS, W.S.—Agents.

June 15, 1837. ALEXANDER HAMILTON, writer in Mauchline, was 1st Division. Presbytery of Ayr, to be collector of the assessment of Ld. Corshouse. church for the parish of Mauchline. That parish contains
D. town of Mauchline, consisting of from 300 to 400

These houses, for the most part, were built on small fee inferior description. They had never been erected in denomination. Their inhabitants exceeded one-half of the whole parish.

The heritors were assessed in proportion to their portion of the assessment was laid upon the feuars of James Boswell, Bart. of Auchinleck, who was the founder of valuation, resisted the assessment as irregular, and on terms of the case of Peterhead,<sup>1</sup> it must be imposed upon of land and houses in the parish, including the feuars proportion to their real rent. Hamilton raised an action Sir James's proportion of the assessment, before the Sheriff decerned for payment. Sir James brought an appeal record was made up in the Court of Session, but a pleas was lodged. The Lord Ordinary "appointed pare cases." *

In Hamilton's case he averred that the real rental of
of the parish was about £5500; and that the real rental Mauchline did not exceed £400 sterling. Sir James that these averments could not be regarded, as the record, and were not admitted.

uniformly been paid by the heritors according to their valuation, and the owners of houses had never contributed thereto. He now stated, in his case, that, in 1794, an assessment of £580 sterling, was made, for building the manse; in 1797, £355 sterling, for building school-house; in 1805, £620 sterling, for purchasing the school-master's garden, and for repairs on the church; in 1807, £137 sterling, for repairs on the church and manse; in 1820, £78 sterling, for repairing the manse; in 1821, £266, for purchasing land to add to the glebe; and, every year from 1809 downwards, an assessment for supporting the manse and other parochial purposes.

No. 285.
June 15, 1837.
Boswell v.
Hamilton.

These averments were only met by a general statement that the advocate did not admit them, and that the details had not been given on the part of the respondent. Before disposing of the cause, the feuars of Mauchline were added as parties by a supplementary action.

The advocate pleaded that the judgment in the case of Peterhead did not rest on specialties, but settled a general principle, applicable to all cases where a parish, though partly landward, or agricultural, contained a town or village population. Every feuar, however small his feu, was, in legal sense, a heritor; the circumstance of an aggregation of feuars erected into a burgh, or left unerected, was immaterial; and therefore there was no ground for drawing any distinction between Peterhead and Mauchline. He also alleged that there were no sufficient averments of any custom of assessment, in the parish of Mauchline; but, even if he had, the case of Peterhead was decided on the footing that no such custom existed in Scotland, sufficient to exclude the principle there, wherever a parish contained a town or village population.

The respondent answered, that the case of Peterhead was rested on specialties, which did not occur here, as Peterhead was a considerable burgh and Mauchline only a minor village. And in particular, the judgment went on there being no custom of assessment in the parish of Peterhead, and such custom of assessing by the valuation alone was not averred in this parish. He pleaded separately that small feuars, such as those in the village of Mauchline, could not be viewed as heritors, in questions of assessment, or it would follow, that, wherever a parish was feued out in any parish, it would be optional to any feuar to insist that the assessment of the whole parish be according to real rent.

The Lord Ordinary reported the cause to the Court.

D GILLIES.—Two questions have been raised here, first, whether a "feuar" is a "heritor;" and, second, supposing all feuars to be "heritors," must assessment be imposed according to the real rent? In regard to the first question, no doubt that the feuars are heritors. But it does not follow as a necessary consequence that the assessment must be on the real rent. Every land estate out of which these feus have been made, stands valued in the cess books, and as the feu was granted. If this Court can sanction the objections an alteration in the mode of assessment must take place Scotland. The assessment was originally directed by the imposed on the parishioners, in a ratio "effeiring to their come to be considered in practice as equivalent to effe though I scarcely think that is the same thing. For a man stance, and little income, or he may have a great income, an at all. But so it has been interpreted by practice. And I wherever there has been an established custom, that custom ought to be adhered to. If we once consider that we established custom, I do not know where we are to stop. follow? Wherever any one feu, great or small, is made in then the assessment must be laid on, according to the real the old custom to assess on the valuation only, I think the rule will give rise to much trouble and confusion, and the quences will flow from it which are probably not at present insist on the adoption of this new rule.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There are several hundred feuair ground occupied by the whole of these feus must be of consequence does not appear at all impossible, from any thing before us, per amount of valuation to each of these feus. But it is feuair is liable to assessment in one shape or another. It is ground, but the nature of the right, which constitutes a her is worth £500 per annum to the feuair, or only £5 per annum a heritor. And every heritor must be assessed.

LORD CORNHUSE.—I am sensible that there are very inconveniences which may result from applying the rule of the ci portioned to that real rent. I think great inconvenience will result from adopting this rule of assessment, as a general rule, but I do not see any ground on which the Court can refrain from adopting it here.

It was understood that LORDS PRESIDENT and GILLIES concurred in thinking the rule of Peterhead must govern this case.

No. 285.

June 15, 1837.

James v.

Downie.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—" Conjoin the action directed to be raised for calling the feuars of Mauchline, to the advocacy at the instance of Sir James Boswell ; advocate the cause, and find that the expenses of rebuilding the parish church of Mauchline fall to be defrayed, agreeably to the principle of assessment laid down by the House of Lords in the case of Peterhead by all the owners of land and houses in the parish according to their real rents. Find no expenses due to either party, and remit to Lord Cockburn to proceed farther in the cause ; and decern."

HORNE and ROSE, W.S.—J. M'KENZIE, W.S.—Agents.

AMES, WOOD, and JAMES and MANDATARY, Pursuers.—D. F. Hope— No. 286.
M'Neill.

ALEXANDER and JOHN DOWNIE, Defenders.—A. Wood.

Husband and Wife—Retention.—Held that goods furnished to the wife of a man who was absent from the country, the wife being in charge of her husband's business during his absence, were to be considered as furnished to the party himself.

SEQUEL of the case reported ante, p. 12.

The Court having adhered to the Lord Ordinary's finding that the defenders were entitled to retain the subject of the arrestment in their hands in liquidation of advances made by them " to John Gilchrist, the common debtor, or on his account," and the cause having returned to the Inner House, a question arose, inter alia, whether certain goods furnished to the defenders to the wife of John Gilchrist, who was a dyer, while in charge of his business during his absence from the country, were to be considered as having been furnished to Gilchrist himself.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced as follows, adding the subjoined note : *

" It being quite clear as matter of fact, that the wife of Gilchrist continued in possession of the work, and carried on the business during his absence, the Lord Ordinary cannot see how that charge or possession could be held by her otherwise than in right of and for her husband.

When the defenders got back a part of their goods, which had been furnished to Gilchrist recently before he left the country, they must, of course, have struck the price of those goods out of the account. Then it appears, that after that time the defenders made further advances to the wife, which the Lord Ordinary holds to have been made for the husband, and this before the date of the arrestment, whereby the account was at last brought out. It is evident, therefore, that nothing was made of the point about goods taken back, unless the pursuers could succeed

June 15, 1837

2d Division.

Ld. Moncreiff
F.

The pursuers reclaimed, but

THE COURT unanimously adhered, finding add.

T. LEIBURN, S.S.C.—W. B. CAMPBELL, W.S.—

No. 287.

WILLIAM KEITH (Anderson's Trustee), GILBERT L. FINLAY.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford RHIND'S TRUSTEES.—M'Neill.
DEWAR'S TRUSTEES and OTHERS.—D. F. Hope—A Competing.

June 16, 1837. SPECIAL case in which the Court refused reclaim 2<sup>d</sup> DIVISION. by Finlay and by Rhind's trustees against th Lord Jeffrey. interlocutor.

R. MESSER and J. S. DARLING, W.S.—SCOTT and BALDERSTON, W W.S.—JAMES BALFOUR, W.S.—MOWBRAY and HOWDEN,

---

in showing that the advances to the wife ought not to be
There is probably little doubt that they got back the goods Gilchrist; but the matter of fact seems to be of no importan of the case otherwise."

JAMES STEWART, Pursuer.—Thomson.
 GEORGE TRAILL and THOMAS POLLEXFEN (Stewart's Trustees), Defenders.—M'Neill—G. Bell.

No. 288.

June 16, 183
 Stewart v.
 Traill.

—Entail—Vesting.—A party executed an entail of heritable property, the same time conveyed to trustees certain other heritable and moveable; the trust-deed provided that, after fulfilling the primary purposes of the trustees should invest the funds in the purchase of lands, which they dispose to and in favour of the heir of entail in possession at the time, should have attained majority, and to the other heirs in their order, the burden of subsisting annuities and provisions; the heir succeeding the primary purposes of the trust being accomplished, died two months before attaining majority, leaving an infant child—Held that on the majority of the heir succeeding, a right vested in him and the other heirs to obtain from the trustees an effectual denuding and conveyance of all lands which might have been purchased with the trust funds, and that they were entitled to the whole of the principal and proceeds until the principal should be invested, and that no farther delay for investment could take place.

late James Stewart of Burgh in Orkney executed, in the year 1828, an entail of his landed property, and of even date therewith, a conveyance conveying to certain trustees his whole other heritable and moveable property, 1st, For payment of debts and provisions; 2d, For making provision for his widow the liferent of certain stocking and moveables; 3dly, after fulfilling the above-mentioned purposes of this trust, my trustee or trustees shall lay out, and bestow the free residue of the trust-funds, including the intermediate or accruing rents, and the proceeds of lands belonging to, or acquired by them, as trustees foresaid, in the purchase of lands, in their own names, as trustees or trustee foresaid, that either in Orkney, or in any other place they shall judge proper, and shall be bound and obliged, as by acceptance hereof they shall be obliged themselves to dispose and denude themselves of the lands to be purchased by them, and also the lands herein above conveyed to them, to and in favour of the heir of entail in possession at the time, of my lands and estate, in virtue of the disposition made of entail above-mentioned, and who shall have attained the age of twenty-one years complete, and to the other heirs of entail, in their order according to the course of succession therein specified, but without the burden of such annuities granted by me, as shall be existing at the time." The trustees were likewise nominated executors, administrators and curators to the heirs of entail succeeding the testator in case of their being minors.

Shortly after the execution of this deed the granter died, and was succeeded in his entailed estates by his nephew, James Stewart, then a minor. In the course of a few years the purposes of the trust, with the exception of the payment of certain annuities and provisions,

2D DIVISION
 Ld. Moncreiff
 F.

Stewart v. Traill. 234. Pursuer, James Stewart, who reached majority on 23d. Feb.

During this time the accumulation of the trust-funds went on of lands being made therewith by the trustees. A sum of capital fund was beneficially laid out by them in the purchase of lands, and the discharge of the feudal burdens affecting the entailed estate. A provision was made for the payment of the annuity still payable out of the funds.

Thereafter James Stewart raised action against the trustees and Pollexfen, the trustees, setting forth the provisions of the deed and the dates of his father's majority and his own, and concluding that it found and declared that the trustees' power to accumulate the funds terminated on the 8th February, 1811, when his father reached majority, and that the trustees were bound to account for and pay over to him the whole of the fund at present in their hands, under deduction of the amount of the fund at the said date, and to purchase lands with the amount of the fund accumulated at such date, under deduction of the £1000 payment mentioned, and to convey the lands so purchased, and the interest on the lands, to the pursuer and the other heirs of entail; or otherwise it found and declared that the trustees' power to accumulate the funds terminated on the period of the pursuer attaining majority, since which period the trustees were bound to account for and pay over the funds, &c.

In defence against the action the trustees maintained that the provisions of the deed, and the circumstance of the purchase of lands against the trust-fund not being yet cleared away, the purchase of lands by their denuding and investing the funds in the purchase of lands, and the date of the majority of the existing heir of entail in 1832, and his father in 1811.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor: That, by the terms of the trust-deed libelled on and produced, the fund of the trust consisted of all the property, heritable and moveable, which should belong to the truster at the time of his death, with the exception of the estate which he had previously entailed, and of the moveable subjects: Finds, that, after fulfilling all the purposes of the trust, by the payment of the debts and obligations of the truster and of all legacies and provisions appointed by him, it is the duty of the trustees 'shall lay out and bestow the foresaid trust-fund in the purchase of lands, or the intermediate or accruing rents and profits of the lands so purchased, or acquired by them as trustees foresaid, in the purchase of lands in their own names,' &c.; and that they shall be bound to dispose of the fund to be purchased, 'to and in favour of the heir of entail in the time' of the entailed estate, 'and who shall have attained the age of twenty-one years complete, and to the other heirs of entail in the order,' &c. 'but with and under the burden of such annuity as shall be subsisting at the time:' Finds that the said specifically provided that the said trust-funds shall be laid out in the purchase of lands within any definite period after the other purposes of trust shall have been fulfilled; and that it is in some measure ambiguous, in regard to the power and duty of the trustees to accumulate the annual produce of the trust-fund, during any reasonable period which might elapse, before such investment or investments could be made, or to employ such accumulated profits in the same manner with the principal fund: But finds that it is a leading rule and principle of the law, specially laid down, that as soon as the immediate heir of entail shall have attained the age of twenty-one, the trustees shall denude of convey to him, and the other heirs, whether of age or not, whatever may have been so purchased in terms thereof; and finds that the existence of any annuity, provided by the truster, formed no obstacle, according to the declared meaning of the deed, to the execution of the stated purposes, either by the purchase of lands or by the conveyance of them to the heirs of entail, the security of such annuities being expressly provided for otherwise: Finds it admitted that all the debts and obligations of the truster were satisfied and paid, within a short time after his death, in June, 1802: Finds that no question is raised by the present pleadings affecting the produce or accumulations of the trust-funds during the period of the minority of James Stewart, the heir of entail, existing after the truster's death: Finds it admitted that the said James Stewart attained the age of twenty-one on the 8th February, 1811: Finds that at that event, whatever question might previously have existed, there was a clear vested right in him and the other heirs of entail, to obtain from the trustees an effectual denuding and conveyance of all lands which they might have purchased with the trust-funds, and individually and successively to enjoy all the rents, issues, and profits thereof, as their own: Finds it set forth in the record for both parties, that no lands had at that time been purchased, but finds it admitted by the defenders, that the whole sum of trust-funds had then been realized: Finds that the period which had elapsed between the time when the primary purposes of the trust, with the exception of annuities, had been fulfilled, and the majority of James Stewart, was more than sufficient, according to any reasonable construction of the trust-deed, to have enabled the trustees to lay out the trust-funds in terms thereof: Therefore finds, that, from and after that event, on the 8th February, 1811, the said James Stewart, after his death, the present pursuer, as the next heir of entail, was entitled to enjoy the whole interest and proceeds of the said trust-funds, until the principal thereof should be legally invested, in accordance with the purposes of the trust, and that no farther accumulation thereof for the benefit of the trust could take place: Finds, that the accounts between the pursuer and defenders as trustees, must now be made up on this principle. In respect that it is stated by the defenders, that they have laid out out of £3518 of the capital fund under high advice, and in the bona

No. 288.

June 16, 183
Stewart v.
Traill.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—On reading the trust-deed, and circumstances of the case, I can find no grounds for passing first heir of entail; the date of which I think the time point investing the funds. I can see no specialty in the case to the principle on which the Lord Ordinary has decided it.

LORD GLENLEE concurred.

LORD MEDWYN.—I agree. The trustees may make a having earlier wound up the trust; but that is no reason why entail should not get the interest of the accumulated fund, and up on the principle laid down in the interlocutor.

LORD MEADOWBANK was absent.

---

* “NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that, added down in the case of Stair, as finally decided in the House of S. and W. 2, 614, it is impossible to resist the plea of the conclusion of the summons. The clause of the deed does which was expressly mentioned in Lord Stair's case. Brents of lands which might have been acquired by the trust contemplate successive purchases, and an accumulation going on. If the pursuer's demand, by the summons therefore, requires you must go back to the time when the primary purposes one year after that date, it would be attended with great difficulty has done wisely in avoiding such a question. But the date first heir is a fixed point; and, as it cannot be thought that without any words used to that effect, to authorize an accumulation of funds, to the manifest prejudice of the first heirs, for what trustees might delay to purchase lands, it seems to be clear eight or nine years were enough for enabling the trustees to discretion being absolutely unlimited as to the time to be taken.

THE COURT accordingly adhered, finding additional expenses due, and to be paid from the trust-funds. No. 288.

J. M'COOK, W.S.—W. STEWART, W.S.—Agents.

June 17, 1837.
Taylor v.
His Creditors.

Craigie v.
Gordon.

— TAYLOR, Pursuer.—Whigham—Smythe.
HIS CREDITORS, Defenders.—Deas.

No. 289.

Cessio—Expenses.—IN a process of cessio, raised in the Court of Session under 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56, an examination of the pursuer took place under a remit to the Sheriff; when the cause was resumed by the Court House, a question arose between the parties, whether the pursuer, defenders should, in the first instance, discharge the expense of printing, The pursuer's state of affairs; and 2d, the pursuer's deposition before the Sheriff. The Court considered the state of affairs to be in the place of the old condescendence, and directed the pursuer to be at the expense of printing it, at least in the first instance. The defenders offered to bear half of the expense of printing the pursuer's examination; but the Court directed them to bear the whole expense, in the mean-time.

June 17, 1837.

1st DIVISION.

— Agents.

MRS ANNE BURNETT CRAIGIE and WILLIAM BURNETT CRAIGIE, No. 290.
Pursuers.—R. Bell—Thomson.

THOMAS GORDON and OTHERS, Defenders.—H. J. Robertson.

Trust—Husband and Wife.—A trust was constituted in a post nuptial contract for the wife, who was deaf and dumb, but sui juris, and the heirs of the husband; the husband died, and the only heir of the marriage passed the years of minority; Held, although there was no provision in the deed for the trustees surviving in the event which occurred, yet as the widow and the heir had in themselves the entire right to the trust-property, they were entitled to discharge the trust and require the trustees to denude.

THE late Jonathan Craigie, and the pursuer Mrs Burnett Craigie, June 17, 1837.
married in 1810, the latter being possessed of the estate of Linton, of about £10,000 in money. She was deaf and dumb, but was and continued to be sui juris, and able to manage her own affairs. In July, 1810, they entered into a post nuptial contract, whereby Mrs Craigie on her part, “for securing the support of the parties and issue of this marriage,” disposed to the defenders as trustees her whole lands and tenements. Various events were provided for by the purposes of the trust. The 6th and 7th purposes provided as follows:—“Sixth, If the present marriage shall be dissolved by the predecease of the said Jonathan Craigie,

2d DIVISION.
Ld. Moncreiff.
D.

vinmas after her decease, shall dispoſe the ſaid lands & assignees, and convey the fee of one-half of the ſoreſaid ſterling, to the aforeſaid children of the ſaid Charles Hay ſurvivors of them, their heirs and assignees, and the of £10,000 ſterling, to the heirs or assignees of the ſaid Jo But in caſe the ſaid Anne Burnett ſhall enter into a ſubſe it ſhall be in her power, by marriage-contract or other de the perſon whom ſhe may ſo marry, in the event of hi and of there being no children of her body, the free life lands, and of the ſaid ſum of money, and in that caſe thi terminate till the death of ſuch perſon, at which period a tion above directed ſhall be made. Seventh, In caſe marriage diſſolving by the predecease of the ſaid Jonn aforeſaid, there ſhall exiſt, at the death of the ſaid Ann child or children procreated of her body in the preſent or marriage, or the lawful iſſue of any ſuch child or childre the ſaid truſtees ſhall, on or before the firſt Whiſtſund after her deceaſe, make over to the heir-male of her body preſent or any ſubſequent marriage, the ſaid lands, a children of both marriages per capita, the fee of the ſaid ſterling : Declaring, that if only heirs-female then exiſt and the ſaid money ſhall belong to them all equally, and heir of the ſaid Anne Burnett's body ſhall exiſt, whether ſuch heir ſhall be entitled to the whole ; provided, howe be in the power of the ſaid Anne Burnett, by any mar other deed, to provide any future huſband, in the event her, and of there being children of her body at the d marriage with ſuch huſband, to a liferent of one-hal lands and ſums of money hereby conveyed ; and that i ſaid truſtees ſhall either make over ſaid lands and m directed, under the burden of ſuch liferent, or continu until the death of ſuch huſband of the ſaid Anne Burnett produce of that proportion of the rents and intereſt ſo p of the ſaid huſband, and applying the remainder of ſaid alimnt and ſupport of her ſaid children."

Jonathan Craigie died in 1812, leaving one child of t purſuer William Burnett Craigie. None of the event the marriage-contract, wherein the truſtees were to d iam Craigie attained full age, and in a few years thereafter married, No. 290 other continuing alive and sui juris.

these circumstances, Mrs Craigie and her son raised action against trustees reciting the provisions of the contract, alleging that the real t of the trust, which was a gratuitous act on the part of Mrs Craigie, o secure her property against the acts and deeds of her husband, and eserve the same for the benefit of herself, and of the children of the age, and that, looking to the present state of the family, the pur-thereof had been fully accomplished, and concluding, 1st, to have nd and declared that Mrs Craigie and her son have in them the only right to the trust-property, and to have the trustees ordained to le ; 2dly, to have them ordained to hold count and reckoning ; and to have it found and declared that the trustees were exonerated and arged of their office as such.

the trustees pleaded in defence, that they were not entitled to denude the trust in favour of the pursuers, at all events not without the sanction of a court of law, in respect that by so doing they might injure or affect the interests of third parties.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the subjoined : *—“ Finds that the pursuers, Mrs Ann Burnett Craigie,

June 17, 18
Craigie v.
Gordon.

---

The defenders are perfectly right in requiring a judgment of the Court ; as they will of course reclaim, in order to obtain it, some explanation of the facts of the case, and the grounds of the Lord Ordinary's judgment, may be as was explained in the debate that the pursuer, Mr Burnett Craigie, being of age of twenty-six, was lately married, and that, in contemplation of that a marriage-contract was entered into, to which the other pursuer, Mrs Bur- craigie, became a party, and by which this estate of Linton, and the fund of £10,000, were, as the Lord Ordinary understood the statement, completely conveyed and secured to Mr Burnett Craigie, and the heirs of the marriage, in consideration of an annuity of £400 a-year being secured to Mrs Burnett Craigie, ther, by being declared a real burden on the estate. It seems to be the object of the present action to have that reasonable arrangement carried into completion.

The Lord Ordinary is perfectly satisfied, on a careful consideration of the marriage-contract libelled on, that no legal interest under it exists, or can exist, which can afford any good objection to the demand in the summons.
Although Mrs Burnett Craigie is stated to be in the unfortunate situation of deaf and dumb, it is not denied that she is capable of acting for herself in her own affairs. Indeed, it is manifest that, if she could act for herself in entering into this marriage-contract, she is equally qualified to act for herself in regard to her own interests under it.

The estate and funds settled by the contract were exclusively the property of her before the marriage, the husband having nothing to settle but conquest, in which there is none in question. The case, therefore, relates to the terms on which the wife settled her own property by the clauses of the deed ; and, in considering such a settlement, the general rule applicable to all marriage-contracts has the effect, just in the same manner as if it were a settlement by the husband on the wife, mutatis mutandis, viz. that there is no jus crediti to any one, or to

As it proper to keep this principle in view, through every decision of the cause, as it seems to exclude, to a great extent, arguments employed by the defenders. But it is of no notice, that, in so far as the estate is provided to the heir (taking it to be as at Mrs Craigie's death) it is fully settled by case of Dormout, May 15, 1819, House of Lords, July (numerous precedents quoted in that case; and it is perfect pursuer to put forward the succession to her son, the existing or to transact with him, to the effect of extinguishing the jointure, even without such a settlement as that which is said to contract of marriage.

" But a very little attention to the terms of the marriage renders the present case very clear. The fourth first and the be laid aside as inapplicable. The fifth provides only for case in the event of the wife predeceasing the husband, an event place. The terms of it, therefore, are immaterial, except that any illustration of the intention in the other clauses can. It may be observed, however, that the family of Hays, for event, are stated to be no relations of the husband, but distant wife. The Lord Ordinary conceives that, even if the even would have let in their interest, the wife could have altered her own deed mortis causa. But this is not of much import.

" The sixth purpose of the trust requires particular consideration also relates solely to an event which has not taken place. It goes upon the event of Jonathan Craigie, the husband, predeceasing all and every one of the provisions which it contains, are for the condition added, 'in case there shall be no children of the said Anne Burnett attain the age of majority, or have lawful issue.' Upon that together, certain provisions are made for the farther execution there is a farther alternative in those provisions dependent on 'And in case the said Anne Burnett does not enter into any marriage, or, on the contrary, 'in case the said Anne Burnett shall enter into marriage.' But the Lord Ordinary apprehends, that all those provisions (whatever may be the effect of the clauses in the

of the marriage-contract and trust-deed libelled on, the entire and No. 290.
 ght, title, and interest in the lands and estate of Linton, as spe-

June 17, 184
 Craigie v.
 Gordon.

and it could create no jus crediti to any one for continuing the trust : 2d, e lands being, in the event supposed, destined exclusively to her own heirs assignees, no jus crediti could be thereby created against herself, and she of course assign the property to whom she pleased : 3d, That the destination of one-half of the £10,000 to the children of Charles Hay, would have been a simple destination which she could have altered or revoked ; and 4th, That the provision which could have been at all maintained to give a jus crediti, that of one half of the £10,000 to the heirs or assignees of Jonathan Craigie. It is surely very unnecessary to consider the effect of such a clause when it is at the event on which it is made dependent has not taken place. There is no child of the marriage of full age, the case provided for does not exist, and signify nothing whether the pursuer or his issue may be the heirs of his mother's death or not.

Any difficulty which exists in the case arises from the terms of the seventh clause. That also goes on the predecease of the husband, but it supposes the existence of a child of the marriage, and without speaking of his attaining majority it runs thus, not quite grammatically :—‘ In case of the present marriage failing by the predecease of the said Jonathan Craigie, there shall exist at the death of the said Anne Burnett, any child or children procreated of her body in the event or any subsequent marriage, or the lawful issue of any such child or issue in that event,’ the trustees shall make over the estate to the heir-male of the said Anne Burnett, and the £10,000 to the younger children of both marriages, per capita. There is a substantive provision in this clause, of power to the wife to make a settlement on the second husband, though there should be children of the first marriage existing. It is scarcely necessary to observe, that the provision to heirs of the first marriage could create no jus crediti, and that the reserved power to settle could give no right to any one against her. But the puzzle, if any exists, arises from two circumstances ; 1st, That the event spoken of is that of their being no issue of the marriage existing at the death of the lady ; and 2d, That there is no issue at all in the event of there being no such issue existing at her death. It appears to the Lord Ordinary, that the form of the clause perhaps arose from the trustees thinking of the case of the wife dying before any issue she might have borne, and he thinks that, comparing all the clauses together, it ought to be that the fee became vested in Mr Burnett Craigie as soon as he came of age, but he is farther of opinion, that this point of the case, though it is the only point of any difficulty, would at any rate be solved by the principle of the case of Macdonald v. Macdonald, and other cases already referred to. But farther, as there is no destination beyond the heirs of the marriage, except to those of a subsequent marriage, it could create no jus crediti, he apprehends that the estate, and the money at stake must be taken in this question as being descendible, in the event of their being no issue of the marriage existing at Mrs Craigie's death, to her own heirs and assignees. The defenders argue, that you must supply words, and go back to the seventh clause. But the Lord Ordinary is clearly of opinion that this cannot be done, and that there is not the least necessity for it, as it is clear that the estate was to long to Mrs Craigie's own heirs and assignees, unless it is expressly provided otherwise by the contract ; and that the Court can never hold that the succession is to be regulated by a clause which is made for a particular event, where the reverse of that event has already taken place. It is really out of the question to put such a construction on this contract, as that in the event of her being no issue not surviving her, the pursuer loses all power over the estate, or at least over the £10,000. If he had never existed, the land estate would have gone to his own heirs and assignees ; and so it must now, if he and his issue fail. But the Lord Ordinary held that the same consequence must follow as to the £10,000.

100

LORD MEADOWBANK was absent.

J. SHIRHEAD, W.S.—GORDON and BARRON, W.S.—

"In short, the only point of any difficulty is, that possibly

ALEXANDER SIMPSON, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Moir— No. 291.
Spalding.
 DON CUMMING SKENE, and TUTORS, Defenders.—D. F. Hope June 20, 1837
—M'Neill. Simpson v.
 Skene.

Valuation—Process.—After a proof on both sides, a decree of valuation was pronounced by the High Commission, in 1697; the heritor was the titular and his tacksmen were defenders; the minister of the parish, a stipendiary, was not called:—Held, that, in respect of the minister not being called as a party, the decree was liable to reduction at the instance of the heritor, though no fraud or collusion was alleged to have taken place in the valuation.

v. Alexander Simpson, minister of the parish of New Machar, June 20, 1837 Process of augmentation, &c. One of the heritors, William Cumming Skene, of Pitlurg and Dyce, founded on an old decree of the lands of Goval. The pursuer then raised a reduction of the decree which was repeated in the locality. The ground of reduction was in these terms: “The only defenders called in the process of valuation as appears from the foresaid decree, were the principal and the Old College of Aberdeen, who were the titulars of the said parish of New Machar, and William Moir, who was heritor of their vicarage teinds; and the minister of the parish of Machar was not called as a defender in that process, as he ought to have been in order to have obtained a regular valuation of the teinds of the lands of Old Goval, so as to be binding and effectual against him and his successors.” During the discussion of this process the defender was represented by John Gordon Cumming Skene and his tutors in his room. The original record of the process of valuation and an extract was extant, which set forth that the action was brought at the instance of William Gordon, merchant burgess of Edinburgh, proprietor of the lands and others under-written, against James Middleton, present principal of the Old College of Aberdeen, James Urquhart, Doctor of Medicine, Mr John More, civilist, Mr James Fraser, sub-principal, and present procurator, Mr Patrick Gordon, solicitor, Mr William Black, Mr Alexander Fraser, and Mr George Mackenzie, agents of the said College, and William Moir, messenger, present heritor of their vicarage teinds.” The Old College of Aberdeen were the titulars of the teinds; the minister was a stipendiary, and so far as appears from the extract, he had not been called as a party. The extract of the proof had been led both by the pursuer, and by the defenders, and the High Commission had pronounced decree of valuation on 1697.

1st Division
 Lds. Moncreiff and Cockburn
 (Teinds.)

The defender urged several special pleas of acquiescence and prescription, but the Court in the circumstances, disregarded them, and the only necessity for calling the minister was admitted. It was necessary whether he was a mere stipendiary or whether the parsonage, and the authority of Erskine, Forbes, and Co on this point. At the date of this decree the correct practice was recognised and established; and as that practice had been the decree was of no avail against the pursuer whose name had never been made a party to it. It was not necessary to say that the decree had been fraudulently or collusively obtained: at a late date, it might be impossible to procure evidence of such allegations, however well founded. In regard to the case of Neill,<sup>5</sup> it referred to a sub-valuation in 1681, long anterior to the present valuation, and before the erroneous practice had been established by the decisions of the Court; it, therefore, could not now be a precedent.

The defender pleaded, (1.) That it must be presumed tempus, that every party was called who ought to have been. (2.) That as the minister was a mere stipendiary, his process of valuation was concurrent with that of the titular, and was covered by it, so that if the titular was made a party, it was unnecessary whether the minister was made a party or not. And it has been held in the modern case of M'Neill,<sup>6</sup> which applied a fortiori, that the valuation was there led before a sub-commission, and that the minister's non-citation was taken in a process of a valuation which was overruled. The rule in that case should be enforced here with less hesitation, considering the antiquity of the decree, and the absence of collusion was made.

The Lord Ordinary ordered Cases, and reported them.

<sup>1</sup> Feb. 1, 1708, 1 Connell, 279.

<sup>2</sup> Feb. 1, 1671, Forbes on Tithes, 329.

<sup>3</sup> 2 L.R.N. 10, 35; Forbes on Tithes, c. 30, s. 1, 1 Connell, 279, 1832 (ante, N. 359).

<sup>4</sup> Lord Saltonstall, May 22, 1827 (S. and D.'s Teind Cases, p. 15, March 7, 1798 (16772)).

<sup>5</sup> June 3, 1801, Dict. voce Teinds, Appx. No. 12.

<sup>6</sup> "NOTE.—This case turns on the same point as Mr Thom

t, on considering the Cases, directed a report from the Teind- No. 291:
ding the state of the practice of calling the minister in pro-uation.

June 20, 1837
Simpson v.
Skene.

k stated that, after examining the record from 1660, the year oration, downwards, it appeared that there were 62 decreets recorded; that, in 13 of these, occurring at intervals between 696, the minister had not been called; that he had been the others; and that in the case of Kirkbean, 1st February, valuation had been reduced in 1708, by an interlocutor bear-proceeded "in respect the minister was not called."

ing the cause along with the report, the following Opinions
ed.

SIDENT.—I think the decree ought to be reduced. The defender e appearance of the titular is sufficient to cover the whole right and e minister, wherever the minister is a mere stipendiary. But as there ion between the titular and the heritor, through which the interests r might be sacrificed, I am of opinion that the minister ought always party. In this process of valuation he was never called, and, there-the pursuer may set it aside.

CKENZIE.—It appears to me that an action like this involves two very different questions. In the first place, can the minister, though diary, maintain that this decree is altogether null, without alleging g irregular, or collusive, was committed in carrying through the proion? And, in the second place, if he shows that collusion, or some ous proceeding, took place, whereby he was injured, can he then ecree? In the last case, I can well understand his right of reduction; e first, which is the only question here. I do not see any statutory uiring that the minister shall be made a party, under the pain of total e no unalterable practice to establish such a rule; and it does not ble, after a total change of circumstances has occurred, to allow the ake advantage of this, and upset the decree, where no allegation is thing wrongous or collusive having occurred in leading the valuation.
en any such understanding and practice as to the necessity of calling , the records would no more have exhibited 13 cases, where the not called, than they would have exhibited 13 cases where the titular

The state of the practice appears to me to make much against the that it is necessary always to call the minister. And then there is ase of M'Neill, decided in recent times. That was a sub-valuation, ound to be conclusive against the minister, though he had not been was only a stipendiary. But an actual decree of valuation before the should be equally good, or better, against the minister in the same s. The precedent of M'Neill applies a fortiori; and I am, on the inion, that the defender in the reduction should be assoilzied.

---

Whether the circumstance of its not appearing from the record of the so far as preserved, that the minister of New Machar (being stipendlled, creates a nullity in the valuation?"

of the parish, must be made parties to the suit, for both I And the minister's interest is stated to be, "because the m a parish, he is the better secured in his stipend, and in a fu tation." His interest may often be stronger even than that when I find that the rule of law so laid down by these auth ported by the decision in the case of Kirkbean, where the e was that the minister was not called, I think that rule ought In regard to the case of M'Neill, which was the approbation very ancient date, it may be observed that, at one time, the ject was erroneous, and the error had prevailed to a very That sub-valuation was led, before the more correct rule was supported by the Court; but this decree of valuation does not so. And I am satisfied that the more correct rule which has blished in the practice of this Court, and also upon the aut writers, and by a series rerum judicatarum, ought to be appli cording to that rule, the decree of valuation under reductio aside at the instance of the pursuer; and I think the rule ou Nothing would be more dangerous or injurious than to shake so established. The law would thereby be rendered fluctuat at present, and in future. There does not appear to me limiting the doctrine of Erskine to those cases only in whic parish was not a stipendiary but the titular. I think his do ed; and Connell has adopted the same view of that doct supports. I am of opinion, therefore, that the decree ought t

LORD GILLIES.—I concur with the Lord President and I

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—"Sustain t

BENJAMIN ABERNETHIE and OTHERS, Pursuers.—M<sup>c</sup>Neill—Macdowall.

No. 292..

ENANT.-GENERAL BENJAMIN GORDON, Defender.—*D. F. Hope
—A. Wood—Anderson.*

June 20, 1837.
Abernethie v.
Gordon.

—A substitute-heir, under a recorded entail, made up a title in fee heir of line to the entailer, and was infeft: during a period of 13 years tment remained on the record, after which it was reduced at the instance xt substitute-heir, who also insisted in a declarator of irritancy against the tioned heir: the first-mentioned heir then assumed the name and arms of ler, and made up a complete feudal title under the entail; he also lodged in process offering to find the most ample and sufficient caution and to the effect of protecting the estate against his debts or deeds, conor executed prior to the period of completing his feudal title under the Held, that the irritancy which had been committed was purgeable; and tor pronounced assoilzieing the defender, in hoc statu, from the concluorfeiture, and quoad ultra dismissing the action, and finding that the deor his cautioner, should have right at any time to show, by declarator, competent process, that the necessity for the continuance of caution no isted.

rior and Vassal—Real Right—Legal Diligence.—A substitute-heir entail which was recorded, but had never been feudalised, served himof line to the entailer, and was infeft in fee-simple; the next substitute the infeftment as in contravention of the entail; the first heir then took nexecuted procuratory of resignation, in the deed of entail, by service as ntail and provision; he expedite a charter of resignation, and was infeft l the fetters of the entail:—Held that the entailed estate was liable for s and deeds of the first heir, contracted or done prior to his completing title under the entail; but was not liable for subsequent debts or deeds.

late General Gordon was proprietor of the estate of Balbithan, June 20, 1837. ft, in fee-simple. In 1803, he executed a strict entail of that oy which he disposed it to himself, and, after his decease, in life-his two sisters; whom failing, to William Forbes, of London, ew; and in fee to Major Benjamin Forbes, eldest son of Wil-rbes, and the heirs-male of his body. The next substitute was in Abernethie, merchant, London. The entail contained a pro-that “the said Benjamin Forbes, and the heirs-male of his body, ole other heirs, male and female, called to the succession, and bands of such heirs-female called to the succession of my said nd estate, shall be obliged, immediately upon their succession to ning possession of the lands and others above-mentioned, con-to use, bear, and retain the surname of Gordon allendarly, and nd designation of Gordon of Balbithan:” it also provided, that id Benjamin Forbes, and whole other heirs of tailzie, shall take ssess the lands and others before written upon this tailzie only, on no other right or title whatever; and that they shall use any ght which they may happen to have or acquire thereto as addi-

1st DIVISION.
Lords Jeffrey
and Cockburn.
D.

contained the usual prohibitions against sales, debts, succession, and it contained the following clause:— under these irritancies following, as it is hereby expressed, declared, that if the said liferenters, or the said Benjamin or other heirs of entail, or any of them, shall contravene conditions, provisions, limitations, and restrictions herein contained, failing or neglecting to fulfil and perform the said conditions, and every one of them, or by acting contrary to the said conditions and restrictions, or any of them, excepting and reserving as aforesaid, then, and in any of these cases, all such acts shall be void and null in themselves, and the person so contravening, or omitting to implement the said conditions and provisions contrary to the said limitations and restrictions, or any of them, for him or herself alone, forfeit, amit, and lose all right, title, and interest in the foresaid lands, in the same manner as if the said person were naturally dead, and the rights thereof shall devolve upon the said person, or of tailzie, though descended of the contravener's body, shall be lawful, whether major or minor at the time, to put the said person in irritancy, and to make up titles to the said lands and tenements, and to the person last infeft therein before the contravener himself or herself, without being anywise bound by the debts and deeds of the said contravener, or to the declarator or adjudication, or by any other way by law, and all the debts and deeds of the said Benjamin Forbes, or of tailzie, or any of them, contracted, made, or granted, eded, or who shall have contravened the conditions, provisions, limitations, or restrictions herein contained in any other way, shall ipso facto se and forfeit their right to the said lands and estate, and the same shall devolve to the next heir of entail, in like manner as if the contravener were naturally dead, and that freed and disburdened of all the debts and deeds of such contravener, and of all adjudications and other diligences deduced thereon.”

No. 292
June 20, 1814
Abernethie v. Gordon.

There was afterwards a clause inserted, providing “ that in case adjudications or other diligences shall pass against my said lands and others, any part thereof, for payment of debts which shall be owing by me my death, or for payment of any other real or legal burdens which y be incurred during the possession of the said Benjamin Forbes, the other heirs of tailzie, or for any other debts to which my said lands others may be subjected at any time hereafter, then and in that case, said Benjamin Forbes and the other heirs of tailzie respectively in possession of my said lands and others for the time, shall be bound obliged to redeem such adjudications, or other legal diligence, within years after the date of such adjudications, and to disburden my lands estate thereof in all time to come ; and in case of their failing to them as aforesaid, they shall respectively forfeit their right to my lands and others, in the same manner as if they were naturally dead, and the right thereof shall devolve upon the next heir of entail,”

General Gordon died in the same year in which the entail was executed, and without having feudalised it. The entail was put on record 1804. One sister of the entailer survived him, and on her death, William Forbes entered into possession. After enjoying possession for several years, a charter of resignation was expedite in 1814, in favour of him in liferent, and his son, Major Benjamin Forbes, in fee, under the executed procuratory in the deed of entail, but without any step having been used for taking up that procuratory. Infestment followed, and the conditions and fetters of the entail were duly engrossed in this instrument. William Forbes died in 1815. Major Forbes, who afterwards attained the rank of Lieutenant-General, then entered on possession. Until 1822 he continued to bear the name and arms of Gordon, being then advised that the entail was reducible, and that his own under it was irregularly made up, he served himself nearest heir of to General Gordon, and, laying aside the name of Gordon, and assuming that of Forbes, he raised a reduction of the entail, and of the made up in 1814, setting forth, inter alia, that, at the date when the deed of entail was signed and attested, it remained blank in an important part of the body of it, which was irregularly filled in, ex interdict ; that the charter of resignation had been expedite without authority from him (Lieutenant-General Forbes or Gordon) ; and, separately,

After obtaining this decree, Lieutenant-General procured a precept from Chancery, and was infeft estate of Balbithan, his sasine being recorded on No-

Benjamin Abernethie subsequently returned to 1 1833, raised a reduction reductive of the decree of 1 in 1822. As he was an English bankrupt, the act concurrence of the commissioners on his estate. T tion were, inter alia, that the decree had been obtain no sufficient evidence was adduced to substantiate which the action had been founded; and that th respects legal and valid, or at least, that it was onl that substitute-heir, who was called after Benjamin doubt as to its validity could be raised. The action reduction of the title made up in 1814, in respec tory of resignation in the entail was not effectuell the argument maintained by Lieutenant-General F this subject, in the process of reduction in 1822, action concluded for declarator that the entail was fender, Lieutenant-General Forbes or Gordon, 1 contravention of the entail, and violation of the tions, and restrictions therein contained, whereby irritancy of, and amitted, lost, and forfeited his ri rest to the whole entailed lands and others specifi of entail; and that his right, title, and interest 1 shall in all time coming be void and extinct; and th others, with the rents, mails, and duties of the sa person to the foresaid entailed estate in terms of the foresaid No. 292 ail; or at least, the said defender Ought and Should be De- June 20, 1831

Ordnained to make up titles in a proper, legal, and habile Abernethie v. e said entailed estate, and to possess the same under the Gordon.
itions, provisions, and limitations, and clauses irritant and contained in the said deed of entail, and by no title whatever any respect disconform to, or inconsistent with the said deed nder, styling himself Lieutenant-General Forbes or Gordon, nces, pleading, that the entail was null, on the grounds which t forth in the reduction of 1822; and that the titles made up re inept on the grounds stated in the said process; that the duction in 1822 was well founded, and, therefore, the defen-o be assoilzied from the present summons. No pleas were efence, relative to the alternative conclusion for forfeiture of or at least compelling the defender to make up titles under n the event of the decree of 1822 being reduced.

rd was closed on summons and defences. No averment was record that the defender had contracted any debt, or granted which could affect the estate.

d Ordinary (Jeffrey) decerned generally in terms of the nclusions of the libel, but superseded "the consideration of nclusions of the libel, as to the defender having incurred an d the pursuer being entitled to enter to possession of the is interlocutor, and the decree of reduction therein contain-final."

nder reclaimed on the merits, and the pursuer as to a techni-
n.

nt refused the defender's reclaiming note, and, under the pur-pronounced this interlocutor:<sup>1</sup>—"Alter the interlocutor renst, and reduce the decree of reduction libelled on, so far as e disposition and deed of entail libelled; and also reduce the retour libelled, under which the defender made up a title to f Balbithan in fee-simple: Of new, reduce the charter of libelled, expedite in virtue of the procuratory of resignation in position and deed of entail, and the instrument of sasine he said charter, and decern and declare accordingly: And declare, and decern, that the said disposition and deed of ed, bearing date the 20th day of July, 1803, made and he deceased Lieutenant-General Benjamin Gordon of Bal-valid, effectual, and subsisting entail of the lands and others

---

<sup>1</sup> See report, Jan. 17, 1835, ante, XIII.

No. 292. therein contained. Quoad ultra, adhere to the interdict against, reserving all questions of expenses."

JUNE 20, 1837.
Abernethie v.
Gordon.

Upon this decree being pronounced, the defender re and arms of Gordon, and, in 1835, he expedie a general process, judicially intimating, "first, that he has resurg hereafter constantly to use, bear, and retain the surname and the arms and designation of Gordon of Balbithan that, of this date (Feb. 2, 1835), and under the name of he was served heir of tailzie and provision to the de Gordon of Balbithan, under and in terms of the entail of, that an extract of the retour from Chancery has accor tained, and is herewith produced. This step is prep passing of a crown-charter on the procuratory of resign in the deed of entail, but which cannot be obtained until term in May next."

In June following, Lieutenant-General Gordon obta charter of resignation, proceeding on the procuratory is still unexecuted, under which he was infeft on June 9, 1 vestiture engrossed all the fetters and conditions of the en

The defender now contended, that as one of the alte sions of the summons was, to have him ordained to make the entail, and he had done so, the action was sufficient leave nothing behind but a question of expenses. But if it to go into the ulterior question, whether the estate could be forfeited, then the defender moved that the record sh up, unless the above minute, stating the purgation of the to entitle the defender to plead that the irritancy which l ted was purgeable, and was either purged already, or coul the course of this process by taking any farther steps w necessary for doing so before decree.

The pursuer objected to the admissibility of the min the opening up of the record.

The Lord Ordinary (Cockburn) "found that the def purge any irritancy that may have been incurred may be tained, though not stated in the original record; received an offer of purgation, and appointed parties to debate on claim to be allowed to purge, and on all the other points i interlocutor of Lord Jeffrey." *

* "NOTE.—If the offer to purge is to be received as a defen objection, to the minute would be well founded; but no such offe the record, and no motion has been made to have the record o not a defence; on the contrary, it is perfectly consistent with a rties were at issue, in their averments, whether the defender had with mala fides in taking the decree of reduction in 1822 when pursuer and the other heir-substitute were abroad, or whether he had with bona fides, and had used every reasonable exertion to certify the substitute-heirs or their agents, of the existence of that ss.

No. 292
June 20, 18
Abernethie
Gordon.

the question as to the forfeiture of the estate, the Lord Ordinary ed Cases.

aded by the Pursuer—

The act of contravention, consisting of making up an infeftment e-simple to an estate, in violation of the entail, was so eminently ous to the whole system of entails, that it was placed by the e 1685, c. 22, on a different footing from other contraventions, in- ch that it was specially declared by the statute, “that if the said sions and irritant clauses shall not be repeated in the rights and yances, whereby any of the heirs of tailzie shall bruik or enjoy the ed estate, the said omission shall import a contravention of the irri- and resolute clauses against the person and his heirs who shall omit ert the same, whereby the said estate shall, ipso facto, fall, accresce, e devolved to the next heir of tailzie, but shall not militate against ors and other singular successors, who shall happen to have con- d bona fide with the person who stood infeft in the said estate, ut the said irritant and resolute clauses in the body of his right.” gh this clause of the statute was not engrossed in the libel, it was etent to found upon it as one of the old public laws of the realm. And even if the deed of entail had not declared it to be an irritancy to up a fee-simple title, the statute itself would have supplied this: t was impossible that any entail could be made under that statute, did not give to the next substitute-heir the estate, as being ipso devolved to him, by the act of the heir in possession making up a mple title, as completely as if such heir in possession executed a directly purporting so to devolve it. And it was consistent with e, as well as policy, that this sanction should be applied, because itancy has been incurred, or probably with an unextracted decree declaring he offer to purge only arises on the assumption of the irritancy, and it is eant as a defence against that conclusion, but as an equitable mode of satis- ; and therefore it can never form a proper part of the record, unless the er were to bring it out by a conclusion against the competency of pur-

---

f the offer is to be received at all, it is not easy to prescribe its exact form ; se the Judicature Act does not apply to minutes. This one appears as re- as most others, and it has not been received as correct in its statements, but y as the defender's offer.

Certain things were pressed on the Lord Ordinary in consequence of the d&- 's announced intention to do something new with his titles. The Lord ary cannot interfere with this. The pursuer will receive from the maxim te lite, &c. all the protection he is entitled to.”

on which it was granted to him, and no longer ; and, as penal on the pursuer to be deprived of the devolution terms of the granter's entail, as it was penal on the that devolution. It was therefore impossible to sue for purgation, as an irritancy, amounting to the repudiation inferring ipso facto forfeiture, had been committed.<sup>1</sup>

3. There was a difference between an irritancy by omission and that which arose out of a commission. The former could be purged, before decreet, by performing what was required ; such performance placed all matters on the same footing as would have stood if no omission had been committed ; the latter was not purgeable, because, in the nature of things a position once committed at a given time, never could be undone, and could not be recalled during which the act was done, which was the maxim brocard applied, quod semel factum est, infectum fieri non potest. This rule applied to all gratuitous or unilateral rights, and not to a settlement, having no onerous cause, and flowing from the entail.

4. But if it was competent, in point of law, to sue for purgation wherever that was possible in point of fact, still it was necessary that the purgation should be adequate and complete. But the question could be, such purgation of this irritancy. Though a settlement was made under the entail on June 9, 1835, the defender had been in possession as a fee-simple proprietor from 25th November period. Every debt or liability then contracted by him might be made No. 25 affect the estate. And such liabilities might arise not merely from June 20, 1 debts, cautionary obligations, latent partnerships, representation of parties Abernethi ceased, &c. such as the pursuer could not trace and expose, but might Gordon. arise from various other causes to an extent perhaps unknown to the defender himself, and might be of such a nature as to continue current, and in force, for an indefinite future period. Besides this, the defender might have executed deeds of alienation of the estate, and these, especially if onerous, would still affect the estate, notwithstanding the tailzied vestment in 1835. It was not in the power of the pursuer to condes-cend on the particulars of such debts or deeds, and he did not require even to aver their existence on the record. It was enough that the defender, by his deliberate act, had exposed the estate to a great danger, against which both the entailer and the legislature had made an anxious provision to protect it: and as the defender could not demonstrate to the court that this hazard was totally removed, he had not purged the intancy, and the forfeiture must take effect.

---

5. There was good ground for maintaining, that even the current and future debts and deeds of the defender would affect the estate. He had made up a title in fee-simple by an investiture as heir of line to the party infest. Being thus fully clothed with the real right of the estate, nothing could take it out of him but a resignation, or the less regular mode of a disposition followed by a charter of confirmation. Neither mode had been adopted, but, after the estate had been actually taken up, it was no longer in the hereditas jacens of General Gordon, the defender expedite a general service to him, in order to take up the executed procuratory in the deed of entail, and he thereon expedite a charter of resignation. But though that procuratory had been valid, when anted, it could no longer afford the means of effectually resigning the estate after the real right to the estate had, by an apt and valid investiture, been taken up by the defender himself. Unless he had also resigned, in his own proper right (which he had not attempted, and which could not have supported the entail), the resignation made was not actual. It was not an answer to this to say that the pursuer had reduced the defender's fee-simple title. That reduction would debar the defender himself, in any question with the pursuer, from ever pleading the fee-simple title against the title made up under the procuratory in the entail; but it would not affect third parties who were entitled to maintain that the fee-simple title was still extant on the record; that the defender was not duly divested of it; and that it was the dominant title to the estate, the force of which was not taken off (unless in a question between the pursuer and defender) by the reduction, and therefore, that the defender's present and future debts and deeds would affect the estate.

6. No authority or precedent could be found for allowing purgation of

No. 292. the irritancy committed by the defender. It had always been held by lawyers as an unpurgeable irritancy,<sup>1</sup> and was expressly so stated in Bankton. And there were various decisions, especially that of Walsheils, which implied the same thing.

June 20, 1837.
Abernethie v. Gordon.

Pleaded by the Defender—

1. According to familiar principles and decisions in the law of Scotland, no penal irritancy could take effect until decree of declarator, and it was competent to the defender in the declarator, at any time before decree, to purge the irritancy, wherever he could restore things to the same state in which they would have been if no irritancy had been committed. This was still more readily allowed where the irritancy did arise in terms of the convention of parties, but under a statute. As regards the statute 1685, c. 22, the declaration of an ipso facto devolution, as it implied a penal forfeiture, must be construed and applied by the Court in the same manner as any other penal statutory irritancy, as to leave room to the party charged with committing it, to purge by decree.<sup>2</sup> And, in a recent case,<sup>3</sup> in regard to a similar declaration of ipso facto devolution, contained in another clause of the same statute, the Court had refused to apply the literal construction now contended for. In the present case the defender was entitled to the most favourable interposition of the power of equity in the Court, as he had proceeded under the warrant of a decree of the Court, reducing the estate when he made up a title in fee-simple. It was a separate answer to the plea founded on the clause quoted from the statute, that, as it was of a penal nature, it should have been engrossed ad longam in the libel, and was irregular to found on it at all.

2. Even in the case of a conventional irritancy, if of a penal nature, the Court allowed it to be purged at any time before decree, as in the case of a lease where a conventional irritancy had been incurred through arrears of rent, or a feu in which a declarator of irritancy was raised non solutum cum nem. But as the forfeiture of an entailed estate was truly as much a penalty as occurred in these, or any other case of conventional irritancy, purgation ought to be allowed, if it were possible in point of fact, to purge the irritancy.<sup>4</sup>

3. It was immaterial whether the irritancy arose out of a fact of commission or commission; wherever it could be purged by replacing matters statu quo, the Court equitably allowed such purgation. And, in so doing, they gave true effect to the intention of the parties who originally incurred the irritancies, because the Court only sustained purgation when

<sup>1</sup> Bankt. 3, 685; Sewart, Feb. 1, 1726 (7275).

<sup>2</sup> See authorities quoted under 3d plea.

<sup>3</sup> Bentley v. Macleod, 2, 1837 (ante, p. 711).

<sup>4</sup> See authorities quoted under 3d plea.

ravention was done away with, and the intention of the party who imposed the irritancy duly carried into effect.<sup>1</sup> No. 292.

The only question, therefore, was whether the irritancy of having made up a fee-simple title was purged. The defender had now made up a June 20, 1837.
Abernethie v.
Gordon.

under the entail which was actual purgation of that specific irritancy; as the resumption of the name and arms of the entailer, after having liberately repudiated them, had been sustained by the Court as a purgation of that specific irritancy. In regard to a totally distinct question, the risk of the estate being evicted for the defender's debts or deeds, that risk only applied to deeds done or debts contracted prior to 9th June, 1835, when his tailzied infestment entered the record. And as the pursuer had not even averred upon the record that the defender had done any deed to affect the estate, or contracted any debt during that period, it was enough for the defender to allege, as he expressly did, that he had done no such deed and had contracted no such debt. At all events, it would be time enough to declare the forfeiture of the estate on account of the contravention of contracting debts at any period hereafter when it should be made actually to appear that debt had been contracted which the defender could not discharge and which was made to affect the estate.

even if such a case could ever arise, the defender would be entitled to the benefit of that clause in the entail which allowed five years for bringing an adjudication for debt; which clause, in itself, materially aided the defender's plea, that any question of forfeiture, hoc statu, on account of the mere risk or possibility of an unknown debt, was out of the question.

The fee-simple title which had been made up by the defender was rescinded by the pursuer and declared void and null. The defender was afterwards entitled to make up his tailzied investiture, as fully and freely as if no fee-simple title had ever existed: and he had done so.

No precedent existed which showed the irritancy in question to be irredeemable. The case of Westshiels was complicated with various circumstances, and was reversed in the House of Lords, on one of these, so as to afford no authority. The whole tendency of the doctrines of institutional writers, and the practice of the law, was to sustain purgation wherever it was possible; and it should be now sustained in this case. The Lord Ordinary reported the cases; and, after the parties were heard, the defender, by permission of the Court, lodged in process a petition, offering to find sufficient caution against the hazard of the estate being evicted for his debts or deeds prior to June 9, 1835. The

---

St. 13, 14; 2 Ersk. 5, 25, and 27; M'Kay, Nov. 23, 1798 (11171); St. 8, 32; 4 St. 18, 7; Sandford on Entails, 294; Innes, March 9, 1819; Gordon, July 23, 1748 (7281); Ross, Nov. 8, 1766 (7289); Macdonald, Jan. 27, 1768 (1542); Price, July 6, 1760 (not reported, but quoted in Sandford on Entails, p. 298); Stewart, July 12, 1738 (15557, and see Craigie's Appeals, p. 233).

No. 292.

June 20, 1837.
*Abernethie v.
Gordon.*

minute was in these terms :—" That with a view to the on which decree of forfeiture of the estate was sought by the defender, in respect of the risk to which the estate is exposed during the time the titles were made up in favour of the defender had then contracted debts, that is, prior to June, 1835, being the date of recording the sasine pro Curia, the Crown charter expedite on the procuratory contained in the deed of entail of the said estate of Balbithan, he, the defender, distinctly averring that there were no debts in existence during the period above-mentioned, and that he had executed no deeds, and no obligations or securities of any sort or kind, of whatever description, which could affect, or purported to affect, or related to the said estate, and that he could ever be made to affect or relate to the said estate indirectly, is ready and willing to find the most ample and effectual caution and security, to the effect that he had contracted no debts whatever, incurred before the said 9th day of June, 1835, and that no debts contracted by him prior to the period before mentioned should ever be made available against the said estate of Balbithan, or of course, that all such debts, and all adjudications or decrees in respect thereof, might be led therefor, should be redeemed within five years after the date of such adjudications, and the said estate of Balbithan disburdened of the same, in terms of the condition to that effect contained in the deed of entail, or within such other time as the Court may hereafter appoint; and further, that he has executed no deeds, and no obligations or securities of any sort or kind, of whatever description, which could affect, or purported to affect, or related to the said estate, or which could ever be made to affect or relate to the said estate directly or indirectly."

The pursuer objected to this offer of caution as altogether inadequate. There were no sufficient means of determining to what party, the caution was to be found, or in what extent. The value of the estate, at the end of forty years, might be increased by the discovery of mines within it, or by the fencing of a part of the estate, which would be incalculably greater than at present. And even after the estate had run, there might be obligations unexpired which had been contracted by the defender prior to 9th June, 1835. But besides this, caution might appear to offer some protection against the claims of the defender, it could not avail against any deeds of alienation which the defender might have executed.

The Court resumed consideration of the cause along with the offer of caution, and the following Opinions were delivered.

LORD GILLIES.—An undoubted irritancy has been committed in the deed of entail, and it is whether it can be purged. It is the general rule and practice to allow a debtor to purge a debt, and prevent forfeiture whenever it is possible to do this. The difficulty is that absolute and complete purgation appears to be impossible.

ender has now made up a feudal title under the entail. But I apprehend No. 292.
 rsuer is well-founded in maintaining that the debts and deeds of the er, while he stood on the record of sasines as a fee-simple proprietor, may June 20, 1837 le to affect the estate notwithstanding the subsequent title made up under Abernethie v.
Gordon.
 ail. I should, however, incline to adopt the rule of allowing the defender ge the irritancy, if he can take such steps as will satisfy any reasonable that adequate precaution is used to protect the interests of the substitutegainst any hazard resulting to them from the act of irritancy. Now an offer e of caution, such as should satisfy any impartial person and should satisfy art, that the risk to which the estate has been exposed shall be duly guarded
 . I do not think that the irritancy is sufficiently purged without this; but cient security be found, then I consider that the defender should be ed from the conclusions of forfeiture. Perhaps real security, and not mere l security, may be requisite on the part of the defender; but, in the mean would pronounce a judgment finding him entitled to be assoilzied upon te security being found. I may farther observe that I consider the pursuer ntitled in point of form to found on that clause in the statute 1685, c. 22, ng ipso facto forfeiture as the consequence of making up a fee-simple title, he omitted to engross that clause in his libel. The enactment of 1685, may be referred to as part of the old public laws of Scotland. But I have explained the grounds on which I apprehend that statute does not entitle decree.

D PRESIDENT.—I arrive at the same result with Lord Gillies. And I am ed in my opinion by perceiving that the maker of the entail had foreseen ssibility of such a risk as the estate has incurred, and he has made a provithat subject which is the law of this case. The risk now remaining to the is that it may be carried off for the debts of the defender. The entailer d a prohibition on the heirs against contracting debt, but as he foresaw his might be contravened and that adjudications might be led against the upon such debts, and made real against the estate, he declared by the entail period of five years should be allowed by the heir to redeem these adjudi-, failing which, a forfeiture should be incurred. The statute 1685, c. 22, sly allows the lieges to tailzie their estates with such conditions as they fit, and to fence these conditions. The entailer has accordingly provided an heir, failing to make up a title under the entail, should contract debt, he should not de plano forfeit the estate, but should be allowed a period of ars to purge the contravention. And I think it must have been to this very hat such a provision referred, for there is no other way in which the debt cted by an heir in possession could permanently affect the fee of the estate.
 efender therefore appears to be entitled to maintain that he satisfies all the ements of the entail if he purges adjudications within five years after they d for debts of his against the estate. The pursuer, on the other hand, is d to require that he shall be duly secured that such purgation shall be made; he defender meets this with an offer of ample caution. The defender is to find such security, if the Court are of opinion that, on doing so, he has l the irritancy, and will be enabled to retain the estate. I think him d to our judgment to that effect: and after pronouncing it, the cause should titted to the Lord Ordinary to hear parties as to the details of the kind of y which must be found.

June 20, 1887.
Abernethie v.
Gordon.

favourable of all cases for allowing purgation, as the irritancy is after obtaining a decree of this Court, which would have effected the defender, if it had not afterwards been reduced. And by a more certain mode is adopted of protecting this entail than a decree of the estate would be. After such declaration, the estate, though next substitute, would remain liable to be attached for the debt contracted while he stood on the record as a proprietor in fee-simple. Purgation can only be allowed upon ample security being found against such hazard. By allowing purgation the estate will continue in the hands of the heirs of entail; by declaring a forfeiture, it would still run in fee-simple, and the estate would be totally carried off. In regard to those words of c. 22, which declare the irritancy to be incurred, ipso facto, by the fetters in the investiture of each heir, they do not appear more stringent than are found in the ordinary provisions of each entail on this subject. I do not think they operate as a bar against purgation. I think the only question is, whether purgation is made, and is it sufficiently made here? The first point in this case is the injunction of the entail has now been complied with and the estate is under the entail. I am of opinion that it has. There is no doubt that a fee-simple investiture can have the effect of rendering the estate liable for the future debts of the defender after he has made up a complete fee-simple entail, the entail having been long ago recorded. I at one time doubted whether the effect of the fee-simple investiture was the dominant title done away with, but I am now satisfied that it is. The next question is whether the defender must prove the non-existence of debt, or must he relieve the estate from all hazard on account of debt. Upon this I am of opinion that if the defender find substantial caution to that effect he requires to do. But I do not think that the action should be unqualifiedly dismissed. It should only be dismissed hoc statu, and ought to be not only to purge, but it should be that no debts have been incurred and remain extant. If we dismiss the action on these terms, and it appears that debts come up, we can still forfeit the estate, and the estate will be liable for any loss which may accrue through the delay. Under the equitable jurisdiction of this Court I apprehend we are not bound to follow this course, and as it appears to me that all possible mischief to the estate will thereby be done away, I think we are not bound to be so strict, and entitled, to forfeit the estate on account of the contravention committed.

LORD CORNHOLST.—I never approached the consideration of this case, and it appeared to me to be attended with more doubt and difficulty than one important question in law besides the question whether a court of equity, interpose in such a case, though no precedent in which it ever did so or was asked to do so. My doubts are now removed, and the opinion I am to deliver is not given without some hesitation, and I am concurring, in the result, with those which have been now given.

It is unquestionable that a double irritancy has been incurred first, under the terms of the statute 1685, c. 22, and next under of entail. The statute expressly directs all the irritancies to be repeated in rights and conveyances of the estate; and the deed of entail as expressly binds every heir to possess the estate under no title but the tailzied title engrossed by the fetters. The defender, in violation of both the statute and the entail, made title in fee-simple, and was so infest. He did this deliberately and advisedly, violating the entail, and possessing with a fee-simple infestment on the record, for a period of about thirteen years. The question is, what is to be the effect of this? In dealing with that question, I proceed on the footing that the entailed estate may be made liable for the deeds and debts of the defender done or contracted during that period. The defender indeed intimated at the bar that he was prepared to dispute that position if it was necessary for his safety to do so: but it was not necessary, according to the view which I take, and if it had been so, I do not think it could have been successfully disputed. I assume, therefore, that for the defender's debts, and also for his deeds of alienation during the above period, the estate may yet be affected unless the double irritancy be sufficiently purged. The pursuer has maintained that these irritancies are altogether un purgeable in nature, and that the authority of Bankton and of the case of Westshiels establishes this. The pursuer insists that there is a distinction between an irritancy like that which is specially declared by the statute, and an irritancy created solely by deed of entail. In meeting this plea the defender has contended that it was regularly brought forward, as the pursuer was bound to have libelled, ad longam, clause in the statute on which he founded to a penal effect. I rather think it ought to have been done; but, independently of this, I consider the argument of the pursuer to be ill-founded. I think no such distinction exists as is contended out that all irritancies, whether statutory or inserted in the entail, are intended solely for the purpose of preserving the estate in the tailzied line of succession, wherever this object is fully accomplished, the effect is to purge any contravention on which may have been incurred. The opinions both of the late Lord Lowbank and Lord Armadale, in the Bargany cause, are expressed in the most decided terms to this effect. The general rule is that all irritancies may completely be purged if in point of fact they are purgeable, as the infliction of penalties is odious in the view of the law. This was so held by Craig as well as by Lord Stirling, and, according to the constant practice of this Court, the statute 1685, has always received an equitable interpretation. One recent illustration of this occurred in the case of Bontine,<sup>1</sup> decided on 2d March last. It was objected by the pursuer that he had no title to pursue a reduction and declarator which was directed against his father, that he had libelled on an irritancy which, if proved, was declared by the statute to forfeit not only the right of the contravener, but also of "his heirs." Although these were the words of the statute, the Court held it clear that they did not render such forfeiture necessary in every case as to the heirs; that the statute was to receive an equitable interpretation; and that, on due consideration of the terms of the entail in that case, the forfeiture, even if incurred by the pursuer's father, did not extend to cut off the right of his heir the pursuer himself. Upon the same ground which influenced the Court in that case, I hold it clear that the statute is to be equitably interpreted, and that a statutory irritancy is just as purgeable as an irritancy created solely by the deed of entail.

June 20, 1883
Abernethie v
Gordon.

<sup>1</sup> Ante, p. 711.

been committed. The estate remained liable for all the deeds of the defender during those thirteen years prior to 1835, while his simple stood upon the record. The estate, therefore, was in a position from that on which it would have been, if no contravention had been committed. It has indeed been suggested by your Lordship, that a special clause in the entail which regulates this, by allowing to the creditor a term of five years to redeem an adjudication which may have been made on the estate. But I conceive with deference, that that clause does not regulate this. This is not a declarator of irritancy on account of the neglect of debt by an heir in possession. If it were so, I think the clause would be allowed the requisite period to purge, and if I were to grant it, then, not only might the estate be declared forfeited, but the adjudication might be annulled. But in this case, where the irritancy arises from possession on a fee-simple title, that last consequence could not follow. The adjudication on it, could not be annulled, but would effectually stand, and I apprehend that the clause of the entail allowing five years to purge, has no bearing whatever upon the question of purgation in this case.

In regard to the case of Westshiells, I lay it altogether aside, and do not refer to this. The Court of Session had held that as Sir Robert Denham the settler of the tailzie in his general retour, and had enjoyed the benefit of that general retour, and had contracted debts after the general retour, incurred irritancies which he could not purge. But the House of Lords, on sounder principles of conveyancing, held that no irritancy could be sustained, failing to engross the settler in a general retour, and they reversed the decision of the Court of Session. Sir Robert Denham of Westshiells never made up a fee-simple title, but on a mere personal right, and all objections which would have been good against him, would have been equally good against those who had lent money to him, who could plead upon no right higher than his. And it may be said that an offer of caution was made in that case, such as has been made here. I consider the decision in that case to affect the determination of the present case.

I come then to the question as it presents itself in this case. Whether a security has the effect of producing purgation, and, by the equity of redemption, may be sustained as sufficient, provided that ample real security is given. It is my opinion that such security will amount to purgation as to all debts which exist, they will be entirely extinguished by payment, and it is sufficient to provide for such extinction, by finding ample security. But that is not the whole difficulty of the case. There is a hazard remaining, which I apprehend, with me, and it is this. Though security may be found for the debt, that is not enough to take off the effect of deeds of alienation, if they have been executed by the defender while his interest in fee-simple stood upon the record. Suppose that he sold and alienated the whole, or any part

The purchaser may perhaps refuse, on any terms, to give up his bargain, No. 292.
 as the entailed estate may be affected in a way which cannot be cured by tion, or even by placing other lands of equal value under the fetters of the June 20, 1837.
 There was one individual estate entailed, and the irritancy incurred by the Abernethie v.
 Gordon.

on of a portion of it, is not purged by entailing another piece of land, howluable, under the same fetters and destined to the same heirs. This is the as to which I have experienced chief difficulty in holding that there can be al purgation, by any security however ample. The grounds on which I at sidered the difficulty to be overcome were these. The defender acted with bona fides in raising the reduction of the entail in which he obtained a of reduction in 1832. He then possessed the estate, believing himself to be olute proprietor; and if he, proceeding on that belief, entered into a sale of ate, and executed a disposition of it, he made a contract in which it has ely proved that there was an error in substantialibus. He entered into the t of sale, believing on justifiable grounds that the lands were his absolute ty, and that the estate which he sold was altogether his own. The purchaser ver acquired a real right in the lands, as appears from the records. And as was an error in substantialibus on the part of the seller, I conceive him to be d to resile. If a party sell a vessel, as brass, which proves to be actually he would be entitled, on making the discovery, to resile; and still more that privilege to exist here, where the party was in the bona fide belief e estate was absolutely his own, whereas his right to it was so strictly d that the alienation of the smallest part, inferred a forfeiture of the whole.

 s, therefore, that, under the circumstances, the defender would be entitled to from any contract of sale into which he may have entered, and which now is in nudis finibus contractus. The worst consequence which I apprehend in any view, fall on the defender, would be a liability to damages, for resiling.
 ot at present see any good ground even for subjecting him in damages; but, e were, that is a species of hazard to the entailed estate which may be effecguarded against by the caution which is to be found by the defender.

Considering the exorbitant penalty which is here demanded by the pursuer, I end that we are warranted, in equity, to receive the purgation which has ffered, as being sufficient hoc statu. But I think the decree must be qualified o bear that it takes effect only hoc statu. Circumstances may yet emerge, as we cannot at present foresee, and as to which we ought not to foreclose res, by pronouncing any final and absolute judgment between these parties.
 state over which the security is to be given may prove of less value than the d estate; or other circumstances may arise of a nature which cannot at pree anticipated. But, as the case now stands, I have come to the opinion, t not without difficulty, that the offer of purgation which has been made, is ble to the effect which I have just stated.

Opinion of Faculty for Defender.—Will the Court allow personal caution as sufpurgation, if the pursuer does not object?

THE PRESIDENT.—Undoubtedly the Court will consider it enough, if the pur-is satisfied with it.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that, in respect the defender has made up, and possesses under, a feudal title to the estate of Balbithan, completed in terms of the deed of entail, and has offered, as the foresaid minute bears, to find the most ample and sufficient caution and

No. 293. JOHN ARCHIBALD MURRAY, His Majesty's Advocate
Gen. Rutherford—Ivory.

THOMAS BRUCE, Respondent.—D. F. HOPKINS

Public Officer—Process—Title to Pursue.—1. Question of Session, whose assistant clerk has died without being performed the duties of the assistant clerk, is entitled, without the authority of the Court, and notwithstanding the provisions of § 16, to levy and appropriate those fees, which his assistant, if levied.—2. Circumstances in which the Court found, that a Advocate (stating that a depute-clerk had collected fees, contrary to express statute, and praying the Court to find that to appropriate the fees, and to ordain him to account for, and to the directions of the Court; and also praying the Court to of the office in which this levying of fees had occurred, so as to ment of 1 Will. IV. c. 69, § 13, and place the business of it footing), was informal and incompetent, in so far as it was of tion and complaint; and was unnecessary, in so far as it was the Court, in respect that a memorial had been previously laid the Lord Advocate, on which the Court were to proceed for the enactments of the statute.

June 22, 1837. It was enacted by 1 Will. IV. c. 69, § 13, "That which shall next occur in the office of principal clerk 1st Division. in the office of depute-clerk of Session, shall not be Whole Court. in like manner, the vacancies in the office of the other
R.

clerk, or closet-keeper. Prior to the act, the depute-clerk possessed No. 26 right of appointment of his assistant clerk; but by the act, the right June 22, 1 appointment was vested in the crown. Thomas Bruce, W.S., was one Murray v.
 the depute-clerks, and his assistant clerk was George Lang; their Bruce.
 being attached to the First Division of the Court.

In February 25, 1833, Lang died. There was no power in the crown to appoint a new assistant clerk, as the requisite reduction in the total number of the clerks, including those connected with proceedings in trial court, had not yet taken place. There was no longer any power in the crown to appoint an assistant clerk, as it had been taken away by the act. But the work, belonging to the assistant clerk, still required to be performed. Bruce made a communication on the subject to the Lord President, who approved of the suggestion, then made by him, that he should himself discharge the duties of the office of assistant clerk, in the meantime, with the aid of a clerk, already experienced in the assistant's office, acting under him, until a more permanent arrangement should be made. Bruce also intimated by letter to the Lord Advocate (Jeffrey) in London, attending Parliament, his willingness to undertake this work, and suggested that it was inexpedient, at present, to fill up the vacant office.

By 50 Geo. III. c. 112, § 16, it was enacted that each depute-clerk of session should have a salary of £400, per annum, but should not be entitled to draw any fees. The assistant clerk of each depute-clerk was, however, paid by fees, which were levied from litigants on the occasion of any piece of work was performed, such as giving out a process when demanded, &c. For these fees, the assistant clerks were not liable to account to any party; and they formed the sole remuneration to the clerks for the performance of their office. When Bruce entered on discharge of the duties of the office of assistant clerk, he levied the fees incidental to the performance of these duties. The annual amount of these fees, as drawn by Lang had been returned to the law commissioners at an average of £800 per annum, but, according to the statement of Bruce, they did not, in his hands, exceed the net sum of £260, per annum, after paying clerks and expenses.

In May 1835, a memorial was presented by the Lord Advocate (Murray) calling the attention of the Court to the position in which the business of the office of Bruce was placed, and also the business of three other offices in which two principal clerks had retired, and one depute-clerk had died, since the passing of the act 1 Will. IV. c. 69. His Lordship submitted to the Court the necessity of their interposing, under the powers of 13 of that act, by "making such regulations as may be necessary for re-apportioning the duty among the remaining clerks." The memorial further suggested that Bruce should be required to account for the fees which he had uplifted since the death of the assistant clerk, Lang, and to sign them, after deducting such amount for remuneration on account

Murray v.
Bruce.

out of these fees as the Court should direct.

The Court did not make any regulations or adopt any the presentation of this memorial; and Bruce continued his duties, and levy the corresponding fees of assistant clerk.

In 1836, an application was made to Bruce on the part of the Treasury, requiring an account of the amount of the fees which he had received, and of the authority under which he acted. Bruce claimed right to these as his private property, the fees for work done; and he denied the title of the Lords of the Treasury to inquire into the matter. Soon after this, in July 1836, a petition was presented by the Lord Advocate (Murray) which was brought before the Division of the Court, stating, that, notwithstanding the Statute Geo. III. c. 111, § 16, prohibiting a depute-clerk to levy fees, the abolition of the office of assistant clerk consequent on the death of Lang, the fees, which would have been leviable by Lang, were levied, without any authority, and in the face of the Statute; and that Bruce, who was all the while drawing the salary of a depute-clerk, who refused to account for the fees so uplifted, and insisted that they were duly earned by him, and became his private property. The petition described this as a "usurped appropriation" of the fees, and prayed that an undoubted abuse of Bruce's official character and functions might be redressed. The petition was not entitled a petition and complaint, and had no conclusive effect against Bruce; but, after simply stating the facts and the provisions of the Statute, it prayed the Court to consider the petition and to do therein as in the premises shall seem meet: and, more especially, to appear to your Lordships to be the proper course, to grant a decree, directing a copy of this petition upon the said Thomas Bruce to be given to him to give in answers thereto, if he shall be so advised by the Court, to find that the said Thomas Bruce is not entitled to appropriate to his own use the fees in dispute; and to order the said Bruce to hold count and reckoning for the same: and to pay the amount thereof, as the same may be ascertained, in manner and to the persons to whom the same may be disposed of and applied to the public service, or otherwise as your Lordships may hereafter direct; and in the meanwhile to prohibit the said Bruce from making any order, and to make such regulations as to the business of levying and applying the fees in future, as your Lordships shall think proper and necessary in the circumstances."

Bruce stated in his answers, that the provision of 50 Geo. III. c. 111, § 16, prohibiting a depute-clerk to accept fees, had reference to duties which properly devolved on him as depute-clerk; that which he was placed by the death of his assistant Lang, subsequently No. 293

 the enactment 1 Will. IV. c. 69, § 13, was altogether anomalous, so June 22, 1851 as the Court did not exert the powers thereby conferred on them, Murray v.
 and apportion the duty among the remaining clerks; that as he could Bruce.

competently discharge the duties of assistant, but was not bound to do so,
 was entitled to charge for performing these duties, the same fees, which Lang, had he survived, would have charged, as he had equally borne them; that this was the course most conducive to the public interest, until the Court made some new regulation; and that he had committed no unwarrantable irregularity, but acted with strict propriety, in following this course, especially as he had not adopted any steps before communicating with the head of the Court, and with the then Lord Advocate, and receiving the express sanction of the former, and no intimation of dissent from the latter, of these high officers.

After replies and duplies, a hearing in presence of the whole Court was ordered. The Court threw out a doubt as to the competency of the application, in respect that it rather appeared substantially to charge malversation in office, and yet was not drawn in the form of a petition and complaint. The hearing in presence turned chiefly on this question, in regard to which the Lord Advocate maintained, that, considering the party whose conduct was the subject of animadversion, and who was a clerk of Court; and considering the subject of the application, which was a call on the Court to exercise the powers vested in them by 1 Will. IV.
 c. 69, § 13, for apportioning the duties of the clerks, he had sufficiently discharged his duty in bringing the facts distinctly before the Court, and now remained for the Court to do their duty by acting on the information which was thus communicated to them. If the due performance of public business, in a regular and authorized manner, was thus sufficiently provided for, by the Court, the principal object of the application was satisfied; and, in regard to any conclusions in the petition, which were directed against the respondent personally, it was competent for the Court to enter on them, if necessary, and many instances were on record in which their Lordships had done so, when acting upon memorials, or informations, which were still farther removed from the form of a regular petition and complaint, than the present application was. It was therefore wholly discretionary with the Court to proceed against the respondent if they saw cause; and the petitioner by bringing the case into this position, had attained every object which he had in view in presenting the petition.

 The respondent answered, that, where the substance of the petition involved a charge of malversation by a public officer, it ought to have been in the form of a petition and complaint; that the adoption of this form was essential for the safety and protection of such officer; and, therefore, that the petition, in so far as it was of the nature of a petition and complaint, was informal and incompetent; and that, in so far as the conclusions of the petition were of a purely civil and patrimonial nature, such as those for accounting, the Lord Advocate had no interest to pursue

June 22, 1837. paying to another officer, on whom extra duty had devolved out of these fees as the Court should direct.
Murray v.
Bruce.

The Court did not make any regulations or adopt any in the presentation of this memorial; and Bruce continued to duties, and levy the corresponding fees of assistant clerk.

In 1836, an application was made to Bruce on the part of the Treasury, requiring an account of the amount of the him, and of the authority under which he acted. Bruce circumstances under which he had been led to perform the duties, the fees which Lang, his assistant, if surviving, would have claimed right to these as his private property, the fees being for work done; and he denied the title of the Lords of the Court to inquire into the matter. Soon after this, in July 1836, a petition presented by the Lord Advocate (Murray) which was before the Division of the Court, stating, that, notwithstanding the provisions of Geo. III. c. 111, § 16, prohibiting a depute-clerk to levy fees, the abolition of the office of assistant clerk consequent on the death of Lang, the fees, which would have been leviable by Lang, were levied, without any authority, and in the face of the provisions of the Act of 1836, which gave to Bruce, who was all the while drawing the salary of a depute-clerk, who refused to account for the fees so uplifted, and insisted that they were duly earned by him, and became his private property. The petition described this as a "usurped appropriation" of the fees, "an undoubted abuse of Bruce's official character and functions," and was not entitled a petition and complaint, and had no conclusive nature against Bruce; but, after simply stating the facts and the statutes and acts of sederunt founded on, it prayed the Court to take the premises into consideration, and to do therein as in their discretion to your Lordships shall seem meet; and, more especially, if it should appear to your Lordships to be the proper course, to grant an order, directing a copy of this petition upon the said Thomas Bruce, and to require him to give in answers thereto, if he shall be so advised by counsel, and to find that the said Thomas Bruce is not entitled to appropriate to his own use the fees in dispute; and to order the said Bruce to hold count and reckoning for the same; and to pay the amount thereof, as the same may be ascertained, in manifold copies to be disposed of and applied to the public service, or otherwise as your Lordships may hereafter direct; and in the meanwhile to make such order, and to make such regulations as to the business of the Court, as to levying and applying the fees in future, as your Lordships may think proper, authorized by the statute, and to be proper and necessary in the circumstances."

Bruce stated in his answers, that the provision of 50 G in prohibiting a depute-clerk to accept fees, had reference to the duties which properly devolved on him as depute-clerk; and that which he was placed by the death of his assistant Lang, subsequently No. 29:

 the enactment 1 Will. IV. c. 69, § 13, was altogether anomalous, so June 22, 18 as the Court did not exert the powers thereby conferred on them, Murray v.
Bruce.

apportion the duty among the remaining clerks; that as he could competently discharge the duties of assistant, but was not bound to do so, was entitled to charge for performing these duties, the same fees, which Lang, had he survived, would have charged, as he had equally paid them; that this was the course most conducive to the public interest until the Court made some new regulation; and that he had committed no unwarrantable irregularity, but acted with strict propriety, in following this course, especially as he had not adopted any steps before communicating with the head of the Court, and with the then Lord Advocate, receiving the express sanction of the former, and no intimation of dissent from the latter, of these high officers.

After replies and duplies, a hearing in presence of the whole Court was ordered. The Court threw out a doubt as to the competency of the application, in respect that it rather appeared substantially to charge malversation in office, and yet was not drawn in the form of a petition and complaint. The hearing in presence turned chiefly on this question, in regard to which the Lord Advocate maintained, that, considering the conduct of the respondent whose conduct was the subject of animadversion, and who was a member of Court; and considering the subject of the application, which was laid on the Court to exercise the powers vested in them by 1 Will. IV.
 c. 69, § 13, for apportioning the duties of the clerks, he had sufficiently discharged his duty in bringing the facts distinctly before the Court, and now remained for the Court to do their duty by acting on the information which was thus communicated to them. If the due performance of public business, in a regular and authorized manner, was thus sufficiently provided for, by the Court, the principal object of the application was satisfied; and, in regard to any conclusions in the petition, which were directed against the respondent personally, it was competent for the Court to enter on them, if necessary, and many instances were on record in which their Lordships had done so, when acting upon memorials, or informations, which were still farther removed from the form of a regular petition and complaint, than the present application was. It was therefore wholly discretionary with the Court to proceed against the respondent if they saw cause; and the petitioner by bringing the case into this position, had attained every object which he had in view in presenting the petition.
 The respondent answered, that, where the substance of the petition involved a charge of malversation by a public officer, it ought to have been in the form of a petition and complaint; that the adoption of this form was essential for the safety and protection of such officer; and, therefore, that the petition, in so far as it was of the nature of a petition and complaint, was informal and incompetent; and that, in so far as the content of the petition were of a purely civil and patrimonial nature, those for accounting, the Lord Advocate had no interest to pursue claimed right to these as his private property, the for work done ; and he denied the title of the Lord inquire into the matter. Soon after this, in July presented by the Lord Advocate (Murray) which was a Division of the Court, stating, that, notwithstanding Geo. III. c. 111, § 16, prohibiting a depute-clerk from receiving the abolition of the office of assistant clerk consequent on the abolition of the office of assistant clerk, the fees, which would have been leviable by the said Thomas Bruce, were levied, without any authority, and in the full knowledge of the said Thomas Bruce, who was all the while drawing the salary of the said office, and who refused to account for the fees so uplifted, and in the full knowledge of the said Thomas Bruce, and duly earned by him, and became his private property, the said Thomas Bruce, in his narrative, described this as a “ usurped appropriation of the public money,” and as “ an undoubted abuse of Bruce’s official character ;” and he prayed that the petition was not entitled to be considered a petition and complaint, and had no legal force or effect, and no nature against Bruce ; but, after simply stating the facts, he prayed that the statutes and acts of sederunt founded on, it prayed that the same be taken into consideration, and to do therein as to your Lordships shall seem meet ; and, more especially, he prayed that it should appear to your Lordships to be the proper course to be taken, in serving a copy of this petition upon the said Thomas Bruce, and to require him to give in answers thereto, if he shall be so required, and in the event, to find that the said Thomas Bruce is not entitled to appropriate to his own use the fees in dispute ; and that the said Thomas Bruce be accordingly held to account and reckoning for the same amount thereof, as the same may be ascertained by the Court.

[illegible]

following unanimous judgment:—"Find, that, in a petition is of the nature of a petition and complaint, it not being in the correct form of an application or that, in so far as it is a mere information to the Court, necessary to act upon it, there being a separate memorial Advocate before the Court, on which their Lordships proceed without delay, and, under which, all the oral Lord Advocate has brought under the attention of this information, can competently and expediently in so far as this has not been already done by the Court of 11th March last; and decern."

D. CLEGGHORN, W.S.—DICKSON and STEWART, W.S.—Adv.

No. 294. ARCHIBALD FYFE (Trustee of Steele and of Baxter), Plaintiff—J. Anderson.

THOMAS HAMILTON MILLER, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Ruthven.

Prescription, Triennial—Oath on Reference.—Circumstances sustained the plea of triennial prescription, and found an oath of state of debt, negative of the reference.

June 27, 1837.* ARCHIBALD FYFE, accountant in Edinburgh, trustee of John Baxter, confectioner in Edinburgh, and 1st Division. Steele, confectioner there, raised an action in 1834 for payment
Ld. Cockburn. R. for £15 10s. 6d., accepted by Thomas Hamilton Miller.

January, 1829, and 1st March, 1830; and for an account of £9, 9s. 6d., in account due for confectionary articles, furnished by Baxter, between August 1811, and July 1813.

No. 294.

June 27, 1830
Fyfe v. Miller

The bill for £15, 10s. 6d. fell due in April 1830, and the defender signed the amount of it and subsequent interest. He stated that he knew nothing of any farther debt being due to Steele; and that he knew nothing of Baxter's account. He pleaded prescription, and the pursuer asked a reference to the defender's oath.

Under his deposition the defender stated that Baxter had been employed by his family to furnish confectionary articles; that he did not know whether the articles in Baxter's account were ever furnished or not, they fell entirely under the charge of his wife now deceased; that in 1818 he executed a trust-disposition for behoof of his creditors, but had never since seen the deed, and had no recollection whether the debt to Baxter was stated in it, or in any relative list of debts, or not at all; and that he had occasion to believe that some of the creditors were paid in whole, or in part, by the trustee, and some were not paid at all. He deposed to the account of £5, 4s. 8d. to Steele, that Steele was one of the tradesmen with whom the deponent's family dealt; but that he had no knowledge whether the articles in that account were ever furnished or not, as he never took any charge of such matters. He also deposed that he had not paid the account to Steele, and knew nothing about the account to Baxter.

The deponent was, of consent, re-examined, and deposed that, he had made every inquiry at his trustee for the missing trust-deed, and for all the necessary information; that he had "obtained from the trustee an excerpt of a paper in the trustee's possession entitled state of debts due by T. Hamilton Miller as at Martinmas 1820, which the deponent now produced and described as relative hereto; that a copy of the state from which the excerpt appears to have been taken, was, as the deponent understands, sent to him in 1820 by the trustee; and sometime thereafter returned by him to the trustee, with observations on some of the articles therein contained." The state thus referred to, was in these terms:

State of debts due by Thomas Hamilton Miller, as at Martinmas

Due to John Baxter, Edinburgh,
Account ending 27th Oct. 1812,	.	.	£9 8 8
Interest from 27th Oct. 1813,	.	.	3 6 5
			<hr/>
Sum,			£12 15 1

(Entitled on the back thus.)

State of debts due by T. H. Miller, as at Martinmas 1820."

" Copy of this sent to Mr H. Miller."

The defender answered, that independently of the state of debts, there was nothing to found on, and the referred to in the oath, that did not import any admission contained in it. The excerpt produced was a mere copy appear that the statement of the debt in question was a writing of the defender's trustee. But, even if it had have been made up from the alleged creditor's own statement out the privity or sanction of the defender. The state the defender, had been returned to the trustee with objections of the articles. These had not been recovered, and, in proof on the subject, the presumption was that this debt in these observations. And even if the defender had owned in the state shown to him, that would not have amounted of it; and every presumption in regard to so old a debt should be in favour of the defender.

The Lord Ordinary found the deposition negative and assoilzied the defender with expenses.

The pursuer reclaimed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the defender ought to be asked does not instruct the debt; and, in regard to the writ while being equivalent to the writ of the defender, it is not proved mentioned the entry of the debt which is there made. It may be made by the defender's trustee, merely on the information of him in making up the state which was submitted to the defender. the defender had made observations upon some of the items have not been recovered, so as to be laid before the Court. I vations may have consisted of objections to this very debt. run, and the onus lies on the pursuer to take off the effect of what he has failed to do this, and that the Court should assoilzie the LORD GILLIES.—As the case at present stands, I am of the only doubt is whether there ought not to be farther inquiry be it. The fact whether the state, containing the entry of that debt writing of the defender's trustee, seems still open to be expiscated

It was understood that, after some discussion at the bar of making farther inquiry, both parties intimated, that they were No. 294 fied to take a judgment on the case as it stood.

June 27, 18
 Dundas v.
 Robertson.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I think the defender should be assoilzied. Among other ands I may notice the disappearance of the trust-deed, which may have cond most important conditions in reference to a question like this. The mere action of that excerpt from the state of debts will not, in the circumstances, off the effect of prescription. The production of the trust-deed would, I hend, have been desirable and necessary in order to show how it bears on the

The oath and the state, taken by themselves, do not afford sufficient evi-
 , to overcome the plea of prescription.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I think the defender must be assoilzied. The oath just nts to this, that the defender knows nothing about the debt. That will not out the pursuer's case, and he accordingly fails in his action.

THE COURT adhered, and awarded additional expenses against the pursuer.

P. CAMPBELL, S.S.C.—J. RONALD, S.S.C.—Agents.

LORD DUNDAS, Advocate.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Speirs.

No. 295

JOHN ROBERTSON, Respondent.—G. G. Bell.

Teinds—Titular—Superior and Vassal.—The titular of the parsonage teinds parish was also superior of certain lands within the parish: he feued out the and teinds together, for payment of a cumulo feu-duty; the minister of the b, titular of the vicarage teinds, had always levied them himself: in a subsequent entation the minister gave up a proven rental, including both parsonage and age teinds, and the Court modified a stipend without drawing any distinction een these two classes of teinds, which apparently exhausted the whole of both em: in the locality, the above-mentioned vassal was localled on for 15s. 5d. ipend, exhausting the whole parsonage and vicarage teinds of his lands; by a ss of valuation the respective proportions of parsonage and vicarage teind fixed at 11s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. for parsonage, and 3s. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. for vicarage; the vassal nto arrears of the cumulo feu-duty, and the superior raised an action for the nt, deducting the annual sum of 11s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., being the whole parsonage s; the vassal claimed deduction of the entire annual sum of 15s. 5d. localled m for stipend: Held that as the superior and titular had never feued out the age teind, but only the parsonage, and had no concern with the vicarage teind, as not bound to make any farther deduction from the cumulo feu-duty than um of 11s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., being the parsonage teinds, and decree pronounced accord-for the full balance claimed.

LORD DUNDAS was patron and titular of the parsonage teinds of the June 27, 18 ed parishes of Birsay and Harray, in Orkney. He was also superior rious lands in these parishes, including the lands of Corrigall, which feued out to Mrs Christian Robertson or Johnstone. Both the and the parsonage teinds were feued out together for a cumulo feu-
 . From time immemorial the ipsa corpora of the vicarage teinds of nited parishes were levied by the minister from the respective occu-of the lands.

1st Division
 L.

rior to 1805, the stipend of these parishes consisted of £22, 4s. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

ments, the whole out of the teinds generally, and without between the parsonage and vicarage teinds, both of which by the minister in the proven rental. Subsequently to doubted whether the whole teind, parsonage or vicarage the stipend, a valuation of the parsonage, and of the respectively, was led by Lord Dundas. The minister after the valuation, but it was not challenged by any other party upon by the heritors amongst themselves. The property under the augmentation 1822, which was localised by an act of locality on the lands of Corrigall, was 15s. 5d., which, that process, "exhausted the whole parsonage and vicarage rigall." Under the process of valuation, it appeared that the teind, payable out of the lands of Corrigall, on an average was 8s. 6½d., leaving 11s. 10½d. for parsonage teind.

In 1832, Lord Dundas brought an action before the Sheriff against Mrs Robertson for payment of £32, 12s. 1½d. arrears of the feu-duties payable out of the said lands of other lands belonging to her. Mrs Robertson had paid 15s. 5d. localised on Corrigall, and Lord Dundas, in making account of arrears, allowed a deduction of the annual sum out of the cumulo feu-duty, payable to him, in respect of for parsonage teind, and, if paid to him, would have been in his hands, liable to be localised on primarily for payment to which purpose Mrs Robertson had already applied it. In payment of the stipend, his Lordship admitted that she acquired relief against him to which he gave effect by deducting it hing to take off the effect of the valuation of the vicarage teind at  $2\frac{1}{2}$ d., which, in the process of valuation, had been deponed to by the minister, who levied it from her; or to take off the effect of the express agreement in the locality that the sum of 15s. 5d. exhausted the whole of the parsonage and the vicarage teind of Corrigall. Lord Dundas fore pleaded that as he had never possessed any right to the vicarage, and had never feued it out, or received any part of the cumulo feu-duty on account of it, there was nothing beyond the sum of 11s.  $5\frac{1}{2}$ d., the duty for parsonage teind, which could be deducted and set off at the arrears of cumulo feu-duty, due to him: that the balance of stipend, consisted of the vicarage teind, of which the minister himself was the titular, and which Mrs Robertson had always paid, and must pay, but any right of relief against any party.

No. 295.

June 27, 1837.

Dundas v.
Robertson.

The Sheriff, considering that there was not sufficient evidence that any of the stipend of 15s. 5d. was imposed on account of vicarage teind, that the whole of that sum appeared to be imposed on account of parsonage teind, gave effect to the pleas of Mrs Robertson, and decerned for such balance as remained after making the deduction of the whole of the sum of 15s. 5d. during the years for which the arrears were due.

Lord Dundas brought an advocacy, in which a new record was made and the process of augmentation in 1822, and the process of valuation were specially examined and referred to.

The Lord Ordinary then “sustained the reasons of advocacy, advocated the cause, and in the original action repelled the defences, and decreed in terms of the libel.”

A reclaiming note was presented by John Robertson, the representative of Mrs Robertson, who had died during the dependence of the case.

THE PRESIDENT.—I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is well founded. Lord Dundas, neither de jure had a right to draw the vicarage teinds, in fact, drew them. The vicarage teind of the lands of Corrigall has been valued at 3s.  $6\frac{1}{2}$ d. The whole teind, including parsonage and vicarage, is valued at 15s. 5d. From that amount the vicarage teind should be deducted, and the balance, being parsonage teind, forms a good set-off against the claim of Lord Dundas, as is admitted by his Lordship. But the amount paid for vicarage teind, for which his Lordship is not liable. He never feued out the vicarage teind to the respondent, or received any part of the cumulo feu-duty on account of it.

THE COREHOUSE.—I am also of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to. And this does not appear to me to be a case requiring much difficulty. There were two distinct benefices which must be valued separately—the parsonage and the vicarage teinds. Lord Dundas was not the titular of the parsonage teinds; and the minister was titular of the vicarage teinds. In reference to their liability for stipend, the vicarage teinds, in the hands of the

as titular, drew the ipsa corpora, conform to use and wont. augmentation was granted, apparently exhausting the whole which, the Court drew no distinction between the parsonage. It is true that, on this occasion, the interlocutor did not express, in 1805, that the minister should draw the ipsa corpora of the lands that did not by any means prevent the vicarage teind, which was in the hands of the titular, from being liable for stipend, just as before the free parsonage teinds. The proportion of stipend, being 11s. 10½d. at Corrigall, was due partly for parsonage and partly for vicarage. In the process of valuation it has been ascertained that 3s. 6½d. was due for vicarage, leaving 11s. 10½d. for parsonage teinds. And though the minister reduced the valuation, so far as affecting his interests, its effect was not among the heritors who were parties to it, including the advocator. But as the cumulo feu-duty, payable by the respondent to the superior, on account of teinds, as well as lands; and, in so far as it was due, in the situation of free teind in the hands of the titular liable for stipend, the respondent is confessedly entitled to the arrears of cumulo feu-duty, corresponding to 11s. 10½d. per annum. The whole sum payable by the respondent on account of parsonage and vicarage teinds is 11s. 10½d. The only question is, whether, in ascertaining the balance of arrears of cumulo feu-duty, due by the respondent, to his superior, the advocator, he is entitled to deduct not only the sum of 11s. 10½d., corresponding to the parsonage teinds, but also the sum of 3s. 6½d., corresponding to the vicarage teinds. The vicarage teinds were always levied by the minister himself from the respondents and decessors, and I can perceive no ground whatever for laying the burden upon the advocator directly or indirectly. I am, therefore, of opinion that the Court should adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORDS GILLIES and MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT accordingly adhered.

KERR and DICKSON, W. S., Advocator's Agents — PETER CROOKS, W. S., 1

BRODIE and OTHERS (Shirreff's Trustees), Raisers and Claimants.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Walker. No. 296.

ADAM WILSON and OTHERS, Claimants.—Wilson.

June 27, 1837
Brodie v.
Wilson.

Retention—Expenses.—1. Where the holder of a fund, due to a party, possesses a right of retention as against that party, such right is equally against the arresting creditor of that party. 2. Circumstances in which it was applied in favour of trustees, holders of a legacy due to a party who was put to them in improper litigation, and was subjected to expenses; the trustees were not entitled to retain these expenses out of the legacy, in a question with the party's arresting creditors, though part of the expenses was incurred, and the whole of the expenses was pronounced, only after the arrestments had been used.

late James Shirreff of Bastleridge executed a trust-disposition and settlement, conveying his whole heritable and moveable estate to George Cockburn, advocate, and others, as trustees and executors. By the settlement the trustees were directed, inter alia, to pay a legacy of £1000 to the testator's nephew and heir-at-law John Shirreff. James Shirreff died in 1834. In October following, the trustees raised a multiplepinding, calling all the legatees and beneficiaries under the trust, and declaring that John Shirreff was threatening an action of reduction of the settlement, and also that several creditors, or pretended creditors, of the testator, had used arrestments in their hands, so as to interpel them from paying the legacy. John Shirreff raised an action of reduction of the settlement, which he afterwards, in July, 1835, abandoned. After paying the expenses incurred by the trustees in that action, he brought a new action of reduction, which was tried before a jury on 19th July, 1836, and a verdict was found for the trustees. On November 24, 1836, the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Apply the verdict in this case, and, in consequence thereof, assoilzie the defenders from the whole conclusions of the pleadings; find the pursuer liable to the defenders in expenses; and order an account thereof to be given in, &c." On December 6, an order was pronounced, approving of the auditor's report, and decreeing for £164, 2s. 5d. as the taxed expenses.

June 27, 1837
1st Division
Ld. Cockburn
R.

On 9th January, 1836, arrestments had been used in the hands of the trustees by Adam Wilson, S.S.C., as holder of a promissory note for £1000, subscribed to him by John Shirreff. And in March, 1836, he used arrestments, as the holder of two acceptances of John Shirreff for £1000 each. There were other creditors who had used similar diligence. In these circumstances a competition arose in the multiplepinding between the trustees, who claimed a right of retention of the sum of £164, 2s. 5d., being the taxed expenses, out of the legacy due to John Shirreff, and the arresting creditors, who contended that such right could not prevent their diligence from attaching the whole legacy. The Court decided, that, even if the whole expenses had been incurred prior arresting creditor to transfer to himself a greater right than a common debtor. Such creditor might plead as high as he could do, but no higher.

The Lord Ordinary "having heard parties' procurators of the arresting creditors of John Shirreff, found, that these creditors for the legacy due to the said John Shirreff are not entitled to deduct the expenses for which they are liable against him."

The trustees reclaimed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—My only difficulty as to this case arises from the circumstance that the expenses incurred by the trustees, were incurred in the settlement of the deceased James Shirreff. The whole beneficiaries of the trust were benefited by that defence, and there might be some ground for holding that the expenses should come out of the legacy and should not form a preferable claim against the legacy of John Shirreff by effect of postponing his arresting creditors. But I have been of opinion that this plea is not sufficient; and, laying it aside, the question comes to this:—A party holding an intimated assignation, is preferable to any other party. But the party who is the actual holder of a fund, under a right of intimation, is preferable to any subsequent assignation, however duly intimated. Therefore, under their right of retention of the legacy, the arresting creditors of the legatee, and the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary are accordingly.

LORD GILLIES.—I think the interlocutor should be altered so that there is any difficulty in the case. The arresting creditor is not to be, in a better condition than the common debtor. He may

D MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. The trustees were holders of No. 296. and an unjust action was brought against them by the party in right of that
That party was found liable in expenses, and I cannot doubt, for a moment, <sup>June 27, 1837.</sup> ight of retention as against him. But if it be good against him, it is equally <sup>Wight.</sup> ainst any arrestments used by his creditors.

D COREHOUSE.—I am of the same opinion. The arrester is not, and he be, possessed of a higher right than that of the common debtor.

THE COURT accordingly altered, and pronounced this interlocutor :—“ Recal the interlocutor complained against ; and find that, in settling with the arresting creditors of John Shirreff the pursuers are entitled to deduct the expenses for which they obtained decree against him, and decern : and find also that the creditors are liable in the expenses of the present action, and allow an account thereof, &c.”

WALKER, RICHARDSON, and MELVILLE, W.S.—J. KNOX, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN WIGHT and OTHERS, Petitioners.—Fletcher.

No. 297.

For Loco Tutoris—Process.—Where a pupil, resident in England, was pos-of a heritable estate in Scotland, and all the next of kin were resident
; the Court, in the circumstances and on the application of his mother and stees and guardians under an English settlement of his deceased father, ed a factor loco tutoris, after the usual intimation on the walls and in the book.

The late Sir William Grant of Beldorney, in Banffshire, settled that <sup>June 27, 1837.</sup> in liferent on his brother Major John Grant of Dawlish, Devon- and in fee on William James Grant, the eldest son of Major <sup>1st Division.</sup>
. Sir William was survived by his brother, who was resident in nd. In April, 1836, he executed a last will and testament, in the th form, in which, after narrating his desire “ to appoint trustees to re, so far as by law they are empowered to do, and to receive the of the said estate in Scotland during the minority of my said son, he attains the age of 21 years, in case he should be under that age time of my decease,” the instrument proceeded, “ Now, I do by
y last will and testament, nominate and appoint John Wight, Esq. r, of Teignmouth ; Mr Abraham Vicary, senior, draper, of Dawlish id ; and my dear wife, Sarah Grant, to be guardians and trustees said son during his minority, and until he shall attain his said age years,” &c.

Or Grant died in December following. His trustees presented a to the Court, stating that they were doubtful of their authority in Scotland as tutors and curators of the pupil William James
. under the above testamentary nomination, especially as Major interest in Beldorney was only a liferent ; and that it was expe- to have a factor loco tutoris appointed. They suggested Peter on, solicitor in Banff, for this office. The petition also stated that

Patton.

JOHN MENZIES, Defender.—D. F. Hope-

Reparation—Seduction—Proof—Summons.—1. In an marriage with an alternative conclusion for damages as for held insufficient to support such alternative conclusion.—2 port such conclusion, the summons ought to contain a ps seductive arts having been used.

June 27, 1837. SEQUEL of the case reported ante, XIV. 427. T
2d Division. Stewart, having failed in her conclusion for declarat Lord Jeffrey. in her alternative claim for damages as for seduction
T. tained no particular statement with reference to t founded principally upon two letters (in addition to adduced in the declarator of marriage) admitted to defender Menzies. In the first, which was address the parish on the occasion of the birth of Stewart's l ing expressions occurred; "I am so annoyed and altogether, that I can scarcely say or tell you any th to be baptised as soon as possible, and I have aske sponsor. I will pay all the fines and things that a letting me know as soon as possible all the different what would be the amount expected. I beg of you n any session or thing of that kind, as I was myself th again, "I feel for the poor woman more than it is tion, when I think of the mischief I have done in d ter for ever." In the other letter, which was addre ing to take you to myself, but there are just two things to be con- No. 298 sidered, one is, that all my respectability and connexion with my equals June 27, 1837.

 has come to an end, and another, that I will lose all the respectability which Stewart v.
 which my friends at this time pay to me, but that won't be a sufficient excuse Menzies. for destroying you." In this letter he also made offer to settle an annuity on Stewart, and a sum of money on her children, provided she removed to some distance from his property.

The Lord Ordinary found that there was no sufficient proof to support a claim for damages, and accordingly assoilzied the defender there-leaving no expenses due. His Lordship added to his interlocutor the following note.*

There is no direct evidence (for what Robert Stewart deposes at p. 24 and the pursuer's proof, can scarcely be considered as an exception) as to the nature of the intercourse between the parties, or their behaviour to each other, prior to the time when an illicit connexion must (at the very latest) have begun, viz., six months previous to the birth of the first child in June 1827 ; and all the evidence is to be found upon, in relation to this most important period, is, that as she was by this time about eighteen months in the defender's family, it is to be inferred that she had all that time resisted his solicitations. But as this assumes, on any intelligible ground, that he had begun his solicitations as soon as she came to his house, it is obvious that no regard whatever can be paid to such a vague and groundless surmise.

The whole case, in short, depends on two admitted letters of the defender, one addressed to the clergyman of the parish, on occasion of the birth of the first child, 15th June, 1827 ; the other, and by far the most important to the pursuer, without any date, but proved, by its contents, to have been written during her second pregnancy, and sometime in spring 1829. Both these letters, the pursuer contends, contain admissions of seduction on the part of the defender, and impose a consequent obligation to make her reparation for the injury she had consequently sustained ; and the last of them also contains clear traces of a purpose of concealment, and indications that such a connexion had been long contemplated by the defender, which, she says, she is entitled to draw back to the period of their first intercourse, and to assume as the cause of her yielding.

It is impossible to deny that the tenor of these documents gives a certain weight to those allegations, and gives the case somewhat of a painful character, in favour of the defender. But the Lord Ordinary, though he cannot but regret that the merits of the cause could not be sent to the appropriate tribunal of a jury, has held that he should be justified in finding upon this evidence alone that a case for damages had been made out.

The defender's general expressions of self-condemnation, and of his deep feelings of ruin and misery he had brought upon the pursuer, though stronger than would perhaps be natural, in a case of mutual transgression, do not necessarily prove that he was conscious of any thing which our law would consider as seduction ; nor is, any artful practices, or false insinuations, held out to entrap a resolute ;—any deliberate plan to corrupt the principles or inflame the passions of an experienced female ; or even any long and persevering solicitations after repulse and resistance. In almost every case where a young woman gives herself up to temptation, the man is the aggressor, and in fact, as well as in law, decidedly the most to blame ; while, in every case almost without exception, the woman is incomparably the greatest sufferer. Yet it would be of perilous consequence to hold that every woman, upon her first lapse from virtue, should be obliged to recover damages as for seduction, from her paramour. But if this could be proved, it would scarcely be less perilous to hold the feeling expression of which the defender chiefly insists, as excluding the presumptions of intended marriage which have formed the chief in most of the decided cases, would have become of no consequence had been such proof of actual matrimonial communings, which she thinks would certainly have been afforded by a letter of this kind, intimating, and connected, as it then would have been, with the consequences of the pursuer's too implicit reliance on the defender. The difficulty, however, is in the dates. In the long interval when their matrimonial contemplations may have originated, the pursuer yielded either to the mere request or to the importunities of the defender. In that interval she had become the mother of a child; she was about to give birth to another; she had entered into a cohabitation with him; and had become an object of more constant solicitude than there is any proof of her having been before she desires. It is believed to be far more common for men to take up purposes of marriage with the mothers of their illegitimate children, whom they had not previously entertained, or professed any intention of marrying, than for women of inferior rank, to seduce men of any description to reduce women of inferior rank, to marriage; and therefore, when the only proofs of such pursuit are the birth of children, the Lord Ordinary thinks he is bound to hold that they do not amount to ex eo quod plerumque fit, and to hold that they do not amount to a sufficient inducement held out to give effect to amorous solicitation.

“It is upon this ground that the Lord Ordinary rejects the plea. He is not at all moved by the reference in the second letter to MacDougall, to which she consented to be an accessory, but which is chiefly with the defender, or by his suggestion, that the letter in that letter may have been dictated, rather by gratitude for an unworthy transaction, than by any original attachment. The terms of the letter are exclusive of such a supposition. Neither does it give the pursuer of her right to reparation. If there was seduction, on account of her improper conduct in suppressing the truth, during the discussion of the declaratory conclusions, it was proved that she had acknowledged in the statements of that to the conclusion for damages, I think there is as little ground for it as for the No. 298.

er.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question is, whether we are warranted in giving <sup>June 27, 1837</sup> <sup>Williamson's</sup> damages on the single ground of seduction. There must be a basis on which this <sup>Executors v.</sup> <sup>Fraser.</sup> action is to rest, as that seductive arts had been used. There is no element to this effect, but simply the alternative conclusion for damages as for action. As to the defender's letter to the clergyman, it is written with a feeling that he wished the blame to fall as lightly as possible on the girl. There is no defence in either of the letters that he acknowledges himself guilty of seductive

LORDS MEADOWBANK and MEDWYN having concurred,

THE COURT adhered.

GRIG and MORTON, W.S.—JAMES FERCUSSON, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAMSON'S EXECUTORS, Pursuers.—Monro.

No. 299.

A. T. FRASER, Defender.—Maitland.

Process—Jury Trial—Issue.—No reclaiming note being presented within 10 days after an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary settling an issue—an alteration of the issue to the effect of inserting a sum of interest in addition to a principal therein mentioned (the alleged error not being a clerical mistake), held to be incompetent without consent of parties, although the issue had not been signed by Judge.

In this case an issue had been prepared by the jury-clerks, and approved of by the Lord Ordinary, who pronounced the usual interlocutor settling the issue. No reclaiming note was presented within 10 days, <sup>June 27, 1837.</sup> <sup>2d Division.</sup> <sup>Ld. Moncreiff.</sup> the issue was engrossed, in order to be signed by his Lordship. <sup>Jury Cause.</sup> After, but before it was signed, one of the parties discovered that interest of the principal sum in question had been omitted to be mentioned in the issue, and applied to the Lord Ordinary to have this altered, which was not, however, alleged to have been a clerical mistake, stated. His Lordship having doubts as to his power under the Act 20. IV. c. 120, § 31, to allow the proposed alteration in the issue, referred the point to the Court, who were of opinion that he could not, without consent of parties, make any alteration on the issue after pronouncing the interlocutor settling it.

Consequence, however, of the Court having passed an Act of Sederin this young woman on the world without some provision. There may be a case of turpis causa, if the intercourse continued after the date of the last letter, but then terminated, he does not see why action should not lie for the provision stipulated; at all events, he has no idea of allowing any expenses in process.

No. 300.

WILLIAM YOUNG, Pursuer.—Robertson— ANDREW PATON BELL, Defender.—McNeil

June 27, 1837. Bill of Exchange.—This was an action by the acc relieved of his liability as such on the ground of v
2<sup>D</sup> DIVISION. Court held by a majority that there were no circum
Ld. Jeffrey. take it out of the rule of law that want of value cou
F. the writ or oath of the holder, and this the pursuer h they accordingly adhered to an interlocutor of the I izing the defender.

JAMES FREDIE, W.S.—W. and J. B. DOUGLAS, W.S.

No. 301.

COMMERCIAL BANK, Pursuers.—M
THOMAS PATON, Defender.—Penn

Bill of Exchange—Vitiatio.—A party, who was trust promissory-note, bearing to be "for value in trust-account ing the trust, and there having been ex post facto added stances in which held that such alteration did not import a

June 28, 1837. THE defender, Paton, was acting trustee on tl 2<sup>D</sup> DIVISION. Pentland, under a voluntary trust-deed, one San Ld. Jeffrey. appointed trustee in succession. On 13th June, 18 th personally and as trustees of Pentland, for payment of the No. 301.
T.

put in defences, and pleaded, that the bill, having been vitiated ue, by a material alteration made without the assent of the
; was thereby rendered null and void, both at common law er the Stamp Acts; and that the action, being expressly laid on could not be maintained. He moreover alleged, that the bill in had no connexion with Pentland's affairs, and offered to prove,
e jure, that it was not meant to be applied to Pentland's trust,
; the proceeds had not been credited to that trust.

June 28, 183
Commercial Bank v. Paton

meet this allegation, the Bank produced a state of outstanding hich was holograph of Paton, beginning with these words:— mercial Bank bills on account of Pentland's trust—T. Paton, 16s.," and then enumerating various other bills.

, without attempting to deny this document, stated it to be "a tting of temporary accommodations."

Lord Ordinary decerned in terms of the libel, and found expenses ding the subjoined note.*

The promissory-note having been originally granted, according to the s own admission, not simply for value received, but 'for value in ount,' the Lord Ordinary is not of opinion that the mere specification by an ex post facto operation) of what trust it was that was intended, ounted to the fabrication of a new document, in the sense of the stamp to such a variance in the granter's obligation as to make him no longer y his signature, provided always that the specification so added can be have been according to the real truth of the transaction. To make a ument out of an old one, or to alter the nature and tenor of an original n, it would seem to be necessary that there should have been an original t and obligation of a definite and precise tenor, to which effect might have en according to that tenor, but for the variation. In this case, however, nal document was perfectly vague and indefinite; and all that was done ive it that necessary particularity, without which it could not have been
. It was evidently intended to give those who discounted it the security trust-funds or estate; but, without specifying what that estate was, it is y could practically have no such benefit. If the name of the trust truly was added, therefore, this was not an alteration, but a mere completion riginal document; and brought in no new party, but only took away a ambiguity as to who the original party was. It has always been compeording to our law, to fill up the name of the payee of a bill, though left en subscribed by the acceptor, or even to fill up a whole bill above his bscription, and such appears also to be the law of England; and although cases there may be fuller evidence from the occurrence of a blank of the ring contemplated such filling up, yet the principle truly applies to such the present, for here also the instrument is signed in an imperfect state, ect cannot be given to it without some filling up, there is the same imrant so to fill it up as in the other. It is in all respects parallel to the
of a Christian name, or a designation in a bill or promissory-note, which, ecessary to give it effect as an actionable document, had been accident-ted, and to which, if done according to the truth of the transaction, and d meaning of the parties, it is thought no possible objection could be own hand; and, 2d, That with reference either to his actual writing, or to the nature of the case, he had not averred or aversantly.

" 1st, The note in question, for the precise sum of £1675, 16s. issued with the Commercial Bank, who now pursue the grantor, Pentlands. The defence is, that it has been altered so as to bind individually, but as trustee for Pentland, with whose affairs it is in connexion. Now, to meet this allegation, the pursuers produce standing bills holograph of Paton himself, which begins with the words in his writing:—'Commercial Bank bills on account of Pentland's £1675, 16s.,' and then proceeds to enumerate several other bills. The defender makes no attempt to reduce or deny this document, and all that the defender says about it is, 'that it was a mere jotting of temporary account, and that the money really never was accounted for to the trust of Pentland.'

" 2d, In the face of this written evidence, and of the admission that the payee of the note, was connected with him in Pentland's office, named as the subsidiary trustee on that estate, the defender has produced any written evidence not required any diligence for the recovery of the note, but claimed absolver at the debate upon the naked ground of a general averment, with a general offer to prove, prout de jure, that it was not the trust that the note was meant to be applied, and that, in fact, it was not been credited to that trust. The latter allegation the Lord Ordinary receives to be plainly irrelevant in a question with the pursuers—it cannot be proved scripto, and in the face of his own holograph, he thinks the defender can never be allowed to prove the other by parole.

" But the whole of his allegation, when carefully looked into, is found to be irrelevant for want of necessary specification on points where the defender offers an apology for vagueness. He says confidently enough, that the note was issued on Pentland's trust was not 'the trust-account' against which the note was issued, but has nowhere ventured to state what other trust-account it was. He says that he and Mr Sandeman were jointly engaged in the business of the trust, and that in the course of their transactions much accommodation was done between them. But though repeatedly called upon to name any of the accounts of which they had a joint management except Pentland's, he was not willing to comply, and to this hour maintains a politic silence on the subject. The Lord Ordinary, therefore, humbly conceives that he has made no allusion to a vital part of the case, which is so qualified as to be remitted to proof.

" In thus deciding the case against the defender without a remission, the Lord Ordinary has not forgotten that he is bound to assume the truth of the facts offered to prove in a competent manner, and accordingly he has granted several allegations positively denied by the pursuers, and which, if true, they say they are ready to disprove. In particular, he has assumed that the words, 'for Mr Pentland,' were not in the note when it was issued, or that he ever knew of their being there till after the note was paid upon for payment, and that they were not there when it was first issued.

GLENLEE.—I think we may with great safety refuse the note.

No. 301.

Their Lordships adhered, finding additional expenses due.

June 28, 183
Cameron v.
Young.

J. A. CAMPBELL, W.S.—ROY and WOOD, W.S.—Agents.

R CAMERON, Claimant.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—J. Anderson.

No. 302.

ANE YOUNG and OTHERS, Claimants.—D. F. Hope—Anderson.

Competing.

and and Wife—Marriage-Contract—Fee and Liferent.—Terms of an al contract which held to import that the fee of a sum conveyed to the as tocher, but sub modo, was vested in the representatives of the prede- wife.

e year 1826, the claimant, Peter Cameron, who had been pre- June 28, 183 married and had a family, entered into a second marriage with 2D DIVISION. at Donaldson, sister of the other claimant, Mrs Young. By the Lord Jeffrey. of marriage, which was antenuptial, Cameron, with consent children of his first marriage, in consideration of Margaret on's portion, and for making a suitable provision for her and dren of the present marriage, bound and obliged himself, his d executors, to settle and secure the sum of £2500, or such addi-m, in case of a depreciation of the rate of interest, as should a free yearly annuity of £120; and, for that purpose, he consigned, and disposed the contents of a bill for £1000 grantimself; "which principal sum of £1000 sterling, contained in bill, together with the said Margaret Donaldson's portion of sterling hereafter made over for the like purpose, amounting too the aforesaid principal sum of £2400 sterling, the said Peter a, with the consent, concurrence, and approbation of the said but were added at the time with the knowledge and on the suggestion rsuers themselves. He has likewise assumed that, in point of fact, the were not accounted for to Pentland's trust, and that there is no mention te in the trust-accounts. Holding all these things to be true, he has yet esitation, on the grounds above stated, in decerning in terms of the libel, enses.

land has sisted himself by a minute, but has lodged no separate defences, is only to say that the proceeds of the note never were applied for the f his estate, and that, therefore, that estate should not be liable for their
it. If the fact be so, he and his creditors have great cause to complain fenders; but the allegation is palpably irrelevant as against the pursuers, defences have been rightly overruled. Paton was avowedly his trustee, power to bind his estate to the last farthing of its value, and if he and r-trustees discounted a bill 'for value in that trust-account,' the onerous f that bill must have access to it for payment."

£1400 sterling should go to the heirs, executors, said Margaret Donaldson after her death." It was in case Cameron should predecease before these and secured, without there being a child procreated that the above sum of £2400 should not be equal to an annuity of £120, the obligations come under on the part of Cameron and his foresaids, should notwithstanding be binding and effectual, "to the effect of providing and effectually securing to Margaret Donaldson in a free yearly annuity of £120 for life, the interest of her own portion of £1400 sterling as part of her annuity; and in the said events also the foresaid principal sum of £1400 sterling, her own disposal, and to go to her heirs, executors, or assigns whatever sums or subjects she may succeed or acquire by matrimony, as after provided for." These provisions were made in full of her legal rights; and it should be in Cameron's power to divide and dispose of the said sum of £2400, among the children to be procreated of him and Margaret Donaldson, in such manner as he should think proper, among the children to be procreated of him and Margaret Donaldson; and in case of his having done so, Margaret Donaldson should possess the said sum of £2400, in writing under her hand, while she continued unmarried; and in case of her death, the said sum was, to be divided equally among the children of the marriage by either of the parents, the fee of this sum was, to be divided equally among the children of the marriage.

For these causes, Margaret Donaldson, on the 10th day of October 1840, did give and grant unto Cameron and his foresaids, "for the special purpose of the said principal sum of £1400," &c., in order that ve him, and to the child or children to be procreated of the marriage in fee; whom failing, to the said Margaret Donaldson's tutors, and assignees." It was farther provided, "that although the marriage shall happen to dissolve within year and day, yet, if a living child being procreated, yet, that the whole provision contained, conceived in favour of either party, shall take effect, any law or practice to the contrary notwithstanding, excepting allennarly that, in the event of the said Margaret predeceasing the said Peter Cameron within the foresaid year, without leaving a child procreated of the marriage, that the £900 sterling of her said portion shall fall to, and belong to her nearest of kin, and for the said space, and to the amount foresaid, she renounces the power of testing, assigning, and conveying, to the use of her nearest of kin, though she reserves the power of doing otherwise, if she shall be so inclined; and she also reserves to herself the power of participating and dividing the said £900 sterling among her nearest of kin, in such shares as she may see proper by any order under her hand."

No. 30

June 28, 11

Cameron v

Young.

, Mrs Cameron's portion of £1400 was invested on bond to Hans Leslie of Denlugas, with consent of the parties named in the contract, to superintend the investment thereof. After narrating the facts of the contract, &c., the bond proceeded:—"Therefore the said Peter Cameron has instantly made payment to me of the foresaid principal £1400, whereof I hereby acknowledge the receipt, renouncing all claim to the contrary, which sum of £1400 sterling I, the said Hans Leslie, hereby bind and oblige myself, and my heirs, executors, and assigns, whomsoever, to content and pay to the said Peter Cameron, or to the said Margaret Donaldson alias Cameron, and the longest of them two, in conjunct fee and liferent, and for her liferent use, if she shall happen to survive him, and to the child or children to be procreated of the marriage between them in fee; whom failing, to the said Margaret Donaldson, or to her executors, or assignees of the said Margaret Donaldson alias Cameron, after her death."

, Mrs Cameron died, leaving no children of the marriage, and having executed any settlement. Thereafter doubts having arisen whether her next of kin or the surviving husband had right to the sum in Mr Leslie's bond, he brought a process of multiple-petition to try the question.

Report of his claim to the unlimited disposal of the fund in medio, pleaded—that the fund in medio having been expressly declared by the contract to be her "portion" of the wife, and having been conveyed to the husband and wife in conjunct fee and liferent, and for her liferent use contract, on the failure of the children of the marriage executors, and assignees, the right of Cameron was to be liferent, and the fee, in the event that has happened to her nearest of kin.

2. The bond by Mr Leslie having been expressly vestment of Mrs Cameron's own fortune, and under and provisions contained in the marriage-contract, in respective rights of the contracting parties as previously settled.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interdict subjoined note:—" Finds, that, by the conception of * "The £1400 in this case came from the wife, and it was by the marriage-contract that it should be vested, at the sight of her fortune, payable to the spouses, in conjunct fee and liferent, and the marriage in fee; whom failing, to the heirs or assignees of the wife. It is thought to be clear, that if it was not given as tocher or nomination, it would carry the fee to the wife. But the specialty here is tocher, though sub modo, and that there are provisions in the contract to import that it was truly the intention and understanding of the parties that the fee should be in the wife. There is no question here with third parties, but only as to the rights of the contracting parties, the representatives of the deceased wife being the only competitors of the husband. There can be no difficulty, therefore, from mere legal machinery, in giving effect to what may appear to have been the intention.

---

<sup>1</sup> Angus v. Ninian, 1733, as reported by Elchies, v. Fiar, N. Henderson, Jan. 20, 1790 (F.C.)

"The Lord Ordinary assumes that looking merely to the terms between the claimant, Peter Cameron and Margaret Donald- No. 302 ceased, and according to the true construction thereof, the fee of the contract begins, as is usual, with the obligations undertaken by the husband, the first and principal of which is that he shall secure the wife in an annuity of £120 in the event of her survivance, and for this purpose shall vest of his own, 'together with her portion of £1400,' and add as much more as may be necessary to yield that income; and then, and on the other part, the husband gives the said portion of £1400 to the husband, not, however, absolutely, but only under the destination mentioned, but 'for the special purpose above mentioned,' that is, to form part of the fund to be secured for her own jointure. It may be said, therefore, that this sum was ever given to the husband, and that it was bona onera matrimonii, or was placed sub jure mariti, or became part of the fund in communion, as in the case of an ordinary tocher. It is not, however, to be considered that the Lord Ordinary rests his judgment, though it is to be altogether overlooked in expiscating the true meaning of the whole instrument.

June 28, 181
Cameron v.
Young.

There are three provisions upon which he principally relies as fixing that destination:—1st, That for the case of the husband dying before the £1400 was paid, or when it (and the £1000) was not yielding the full annuity of £120; 2nd, That fixing the destination of any acquisitions or succession by the wife stante matrimonio; and, 3d, That regulating the effect of the dissolution of the marriage year and day, and without a living child. It is his impression that it is impossible to account for the terms of any of those provisions on any other supposition than that the parties clearly understood and intended that the fee of this fund should be in the wife.

It is provided that if the husband shall predecease (for it is thus both agreed that a clerical omission must be supplied) before the said sum of £1400 is invested and secured, or when it shall not yield a full income of £120, his heirs shall notwithstanding be bound to secure the widow in such an annuity; 'and in the said events she shall still have the said principal sum of £1400 of her own portion at her own disposal, and to go to her heirs, executors, administrators, assigns, as well as whatever sums or subjects she may succeed to or acquire by her matrimonial rights, as after provided.' Now, it seems impossible to reconcile either the usage or the existence of this provision, with any thing but a clear understanding on all hands, that the fee of £1400 had been in every other case previously secured to the wife, and at her disposal for her assigns. The phrase is, that, even in the special cases mentioned, she had not the security of the investment stipulated, or though the husband's estate was to be burdened beyond the £1000 for her annuity, she was to have the absolute disposal of that sum for the benefit of her own heirs and assigns. It can scarcely be disputed, that in those cases she was to have this fund, and that the fund was to go to her heirs. But it is altogether inconceivable that the parties should have intended this, if, in the other case of the fund being secured and yielding the full annuity, it was all to belong to the husband, and be entirely beyond his control. The cases specified are indeed those in which there was most reason for holding that this right and control of her's might be lost or impaired, and it is plainly on this account that they are specified. If she had no deed formally securing the fee to her, it seems to have been ought that her right might have been disputed; and if her husband's heirs had been made to pay more than the £1000 expressly stipulated towards her annuity, they might have objected to her still drawing her whole £1400. But it is incomprehensible that she should have a right to draw it only in these special cases.

The inference from the provision as to the wife's acquisitions or successions during the marriage, will have been already anticipated from the concluding words of the last citation from the contract. Her right to the £1400 and to such as to the marriage dissolving within year and day, and the declaration, that the whole rights and obligations of the parties subsist and be effectual, it adds this remarkable exception, that in the event of the said M. Donaldson predeceasing said space, the sum of £900 of her said portion shall fall to the nearest of kin; and for the said space, and to the amount, restricts her power of testing or assigning to the prejudice of but reserves the power of doing so quoad ultra.' Now, if, up to the end of thirteen months, it had really been understood that she was to go to her husband, is it conceivable that it should have been the event of her dying two months earlier, he should not only not lose his legal right but should actually lose his legal right even to the liferent of her portion? If the contract is to be construed with any view to enable him to hold that this was intended when the premature dissolution was to take nothing whatever from the wife's rights under it. It is not a little striking, when it is confined to thus narrowing the liferent. But to suppose that it also extended to the total fi which, but for this exception, would have remained with him, to be seriously contemplated. As the Lord Ordinary reads the passage, however, the matter is not left to implication, the sum on the whole £1400 after year and day being expressly set for this joint deed of herself and her husband. She restricts her power (thus openly asserted and admitted by both spouses to exist) 'to the amount 'foresaid,' but expressly reserves the said portion, that is, after year and day should be elapsed, and to the whole extent. By putting his name to a deed containing these words, the Lord Ordinary holds the husband signed an express admission that the predeceasing wife disposed of the whole sum now in question.

"The Lord Ordinary rests his judgment on these grounds. His degree strengthened by the fact of there being an express stipulation should have power to fix the shares in which the property should be divided of the marriage, which, if he had been understood to be his, is obviously unnecessary. Considerable weight seems to have been placed on the stipulation in the late case of Miller of Dalswinton, 14th No on, and therefore ranks and prefers the claimants, Mrs Jane No. 302.

and others, the representatives of the said Margaret Donaldson, June 29, 183 fee, and the other claimant, the said Peter Cameron, to the life- Wilson v. of the said sum of £1400, and decerns in the ranking and prefer- Lumsdaine. accordingly; finds the wife's representatives entitled to expenses."
Cameron reclaimed.

THE JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am for adhering, and I have no difficulty in arriving I consider to be the true construction of this contract. Although both put together particular sums to make up a sors, yet it is demonstrated by of the whole deed, beginning with the very first clause, that the enixa was that the fee of the sum in question should be in Mrs Cameron and
s.
other Judges having concurred,

THE COURT adhered, finding additional expenses due.

GORDON AND MACKAY, W.S.—JAMES BENNET, W.S.—Agents.

BERT WILSON, Objector.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Thomson— No. 303.
Stark.

JANET LUMSDAINE and JOHN LUMSDAINE (Lumsdaine's Representatives), Respondents.—D. F. Hope—Milne.

in Security—Hypothec of Law-Agent—Personal Exception—Competi-
in a ranking and sale a competition arose between the third and last herieditor, and a party who both claimed a hypothec over the titles, as law-of the debtor, and had also paid certain interests on the two prior heri-bts, and been assigned by the prior creditors to their rights; that party ed as law-agent of the postponed heritable creditor, in making his loan, as agent of the debtor, borrowing the loan:—Held that, in the special stances, the law-agent was barred from competing with the heritable crerespect, inter alia, that the law-agent had been aware, at the time when was made, that no mere stranger would have lent money on the lands former two securities; that it was by means of the agent's personal ac-ce with the creditor that the creditor was induced to enter into the loan; most the whole loan was applied in retiring obligations in which the agent and jointly with the debtor who borrowed the money, or in paying debt the borrower to the agent; and that, at the date of the loan, the agent n paying, for several years, the annual interests on prior heritable debt, also a considerable business-account due to himself by the borrower, title-deeds were in his hands, neither of which facts was communicated to the lender.

---

penses have been given against the husband, partly because the judgment upon the ground that the true meaning and intention of his own deed was ich he has now been disputing, and chiefly because it appears from his recently before the action, that he (being a professional person) was indi-of opinion that this was its meaning."

thereof, and that the same shall be available to principal sum and interest that may become due thereon bond."

Keltie became involved in pecuniary difficulties, connected with him in extensive bill transactions. Lumsdaine was holder of some of these bills, both Keltie and Wilson were parties to them, and their amount being £736, 17s. 6d. It was suggested that these bills were granted solely for Keltie's behoof, and to the best of Keltie's knowledge, as to the best means of relieving Keltie from his embarrassments, a farther loan on this subject was suggested by Wilson, and Lumsdaine was mentioned as the person to whom it might be obtained. Keltie, in a letter of the 1st of March 1819, referring to this, observed, that Lumsdaine might be able to raise up his money, so that the relief would be but temporary. Wilson, "Would it not be better to try to get it from some other person who has no design of calling it home?" Lumsdaine answered, on March 2, 1819, that Keltie could not get it without obtaining some relief; and he added:—"The only resource was suggested as the only visible resource of relief, and as my previous acquaintance with the gentleman, no such relief could have accrued from that quarter, or any other quarter. No stranger would lend one shilling on the lands after the charges and duties upon them, and as to the time of repayment, no time could be got from any one (even if the security could be got from him, and, indeed, no probability of whole of the transaction as to the loan of £900, Wilson acted as confidential agent both of the borrower, Keltie, and of the lender, Lumsdaine. No. 303.

 June 29, 1837.
 Wilson v. Lumsdaine.

Wilson had part of the title-deeds of Gelvan in his possession prior to the loan by Lumsdaine, and he continued to hold them afterwards. He died in 1823, at which time a considerable business-account was due to Keltie, besides a large account for cash advances, &c. His son and executor, Robert Wilson, writer in Edinburgh, succeeded him as confidential agent both of Keltie and of Lumsdaine, and continued to transact business for them. He also, as representative of George Wilson, was in right of the debt due by Keltie to George Wilson.

For a period of several years * anterior to the date of Lumsdaine's loan, George Wilson had been paying the interest on the heritable debts affecting the estate of Gelvan. That estate was ultimately cleared by a process of ranking and sale, and after paying the heritable debts prior to that of Lumsdaine, there remained only a fund, stated as amounting to £200, for which a competition arose between him and George Wilson.

Wilson's claim of Robert Wilson was rested, 1st, on his right of hypothec on the title-deeds. This could not be brought into competition with the claim of Mrs Kerr, the creditor next in order before Lumsdaine, as George Wilson had bound himself to warrant her security, as available both for the principal and interest of her loan. But in support of Lumsdaine's right, it was maintained by Robert Wilson, that it should prevail as in the ordinary case of a competition between a law-agent's hypothec and the infestment of a heritable creditor. The business-account to which this ground of preference applied amounted to £500, of which the greater part was incurred to the late George Wilson. Robert Wilson's claim of preference was made, 2dly, on a sum of above £900, being annual interests on the two prior heritable debts for £800 and £600, paid by George Wilson and himself to the prior creditors, and as to which he alleged he was now assigned to the benefit of the reference which would have belonged to these prior creditors if the interests had been unpaid. This sum included a charge of interest on the principal. But as the sum so paid to Berry was stated at £395, and as George Wilson had assigned his bond of £800 to Craigs in 1818, it appeared that the annual interests on Berry's bond must have been paid by George Wilson for a considerable number of years prior to Lumsdaine's loan of £900 in 1819.

Lumsdaine died during the process, and his representatives pleaded, even supposing Wilson to have obtained a good assignation to the benefit of the prior creditors for their interest (which was denied), still the

---

There was no closed record in this case, and several facts were, on that account, specifically stated than usual.

by his uncle, Wilson, that did not diminish Wilson's amount. Besides this, almost the entire sum of cash paid to Keltie, as making up the sum of £900, was paid to Wilson, in extinction, pro tanto, of the debt due to Wilson. Wilson thus reaped eminently the benefit of the loan, the confidential agent of Lumsdaine throughout the transaction, debarred from pleading as against Lumsdaine, either an additional burden on the price of the lands, in the shape of the titles, or of an accumulation of the interests on the property, unless he could prove that Lumsdaine was expressly aware of the existence of these burdens. And, separately, in so far as his claim, founded on the hypothec, that was excluded by the fact that the disposition to Lumsdaine assigned the whole of the property to him, for his farther security; and that the possession of the property by Lumsdaine, subsequently to that deed, must be imputed to Lumsdaine, and for behoof of Lumsdaine, to the same effect as if the deeds had been deposited, of even date with the disposition, in the hands of the agent of Lumsdaine, the right of hypothec either for prior or subsequent accretion to Keltie. And, separately, and in general, as George Wilson, acting as Lumsdaine's agent, had drawn him into a local influence, which he knew that no stranger would have done, Robert Wilson must be postponed in this competition to Keltie, that he had fully certiorated Lumsdaine, his client, of the loan, and had to run.

Robert Wilson alleged that Lumsdaine had been

; that the clause of assignation of writs, in the disposition to No. 303. ne, was not meant to affect, and did not affect, the security then June 29, 1881 George Wilson under his hypothec for the account already in- Wilson v. y. Keltie; but farther, as he was the agent of Keltie, as well as Lumsdaine. Lumsdaine, his continuing the possession of the titles, in the same as before Lumsdaine's security, ought not to be allowed to affect of hypothec for the subsequent account. And, generally, re no circumstances in the case which should have the penal depriving him either of his right of hypothec, or his right as of prior heritable creditors for their interests, so far as paid by paring the state of interests in the ranking, the common-agent l Lumsdaine's representatives to Robert Wilson, who lodged is, which were followed by answers on the part of Lumsdaine's tatives.

Lord Ordinary found, "first, that in the special circumstances of , the possession of the title-deeds of Keltie, the common debtor, te George Wilson, and the objector, does not found a right of those title-deeds in competition with Mr Lumsdaine, the post- eritable creditor; secondly, that the objector has a right of pre- for the amount of the interest paid by him, and out of his own n prior heritable debts, in so far as he has produced assigna- the said interests or obligations to assign, granted by the credi- eceiving such payments, and while vested in the said heritable

---

OTE.—As the fund in medio is confessedly insufficient for the payment eritable debts, the only matter of any importance here, is the objector's preference in competition with Mr Lumsdaine, the last heritable creditor. this limited view of the subject of dispute, it would have been desirable ome more precise statement of the facts on both sides, than is to be found argumentative and perplexed pleadings. But, as the Lord Ordinary thinks do afford the means of forming a judgment, he has not thought it expe- the circumstances of the case, to put the parties to the expense of making ord.

objector's claim of preference involves two points,—first, the business- alleged to be due by the common debtor to the objector's uncle, the late Wilson, and to the objector himself, for which, it is said, he holds a lien on mon debtor's title-deeds; and, secondly, the interests paid by George and the objector on certain heritable debts, in regard to which interests, it e has the benefit of these heritable securities.

the first point, the Lord Ordinary has no doubt that the title-deeds are of ter which in themselves might have afforded a valid right of lien; and the fficulty in his opinion arises from the relative situation of the parties in vour the lien is urged, and the postponed heritable creditor, Mr Lums- ainst whom it operates. Those parties were the agents not only of the debtor, Keltie, but of that heritable creditor. It was George Wilson, t of Keltie, who, as agent for Mr Lumsdaine, obtained for the latter the security for £800; and he and his nephew, the objector, continued to

when the security was granted, George Wilson had a lien as agent for Keltie; and the business-account then due formed regard to which the lien is pleaded on the title-deeds, was only in the hands of Wilson, or were placed in his hands completing the security. Fourthly, it is not shown that any communication was made by George Wilson to Lumsdaine of the existence of the security, or of the effect of them on the heritable security.

"Now, in these circumstances, the Lord Ordinary's decision must be sustained. Wilson being the agent of both parties, Lumsdaine, having a right to the title-deeds by the force of the table bond, the agent must be understood to have held them for the creditor, at least to the extent of excluding all encroachment or interference. In fact, since those decisions by which an agent's lien has been established in reference to heritable securities, the only mode of preventing such a claim is to stipulate for the delivery of the title-deeds; and here, as the title-deeds were in the hands of the agent for the creditor, the very situation vantage, the Lord Ordinary cannot hold that the party, in being the agent for the common debtor, was entitled to found on his claim of preference cutting down the security of his other creditor. A preference in such a claim is still stronger, when it is considered that George Wilson was aware of the narrowness of the heritable security; there is no evidence that he ever communicated to the lender his own client, the existence of his own business-account, amounting to hundreds of pounds, and forming, as is now contended, a debt table security which he was taking for his client.

"The greater part of this reasoning also applies to the facts of the case after the loan by the common debtor to the late George Wilson, the present objector. Those parties still continued the agents of both parties, the heritable creditor, as well as of the common debtor. It is never given notice to the heritable creditor of the encroachment by their own business accounts which their other client, the common debtor, is incurring to them. But if a professional person chooses to act for both parties, he must do justice between both,—still more clearly is he bound to do so.

as Wilson's claim, for the interest paid by him or George Wilson, on No. 303 the prior heritable debts, had been preferred.

June 29, 184
Wilson v.
Lumsdaine.

LORD GILLIES.—I think that the pleas maintained by Wilson, though perfectly good if there had been no special circumstances in the case, are not available to him in consequence of the personal exception to which he is liable. But I consider him barred, in a question with his client Lumsdaine, or Lumsdaine's representatives, from maintaining that he has a right of preference either on account of the writer's hypothec, or on account of the interest of prior creditors, which he alleges he paid, on condition of obtaining from them an assignation, or an obligation to assign their security. I would, therefore, refuse the reclaiming note of Wilson; and, in the counter reclaiming note by Lumsdaine's representatives, I would alter and postpone Wilson in the competition, even as to his claim, founded on payment of such interest.

LORD MACKENZIE concurred as to refusing the note for Wilson; but, in regard to the counter note, his Lordship was inclined also to refuse it, and was understood to be of opinion that, although a claim of damages might lie against Wilson, when an action of damages should be brought, and a record made up containing a more distinct statement of facts and details, it was premature, in this competition, to postpone Wilson, in regard to the interest paid by him on preferable debts. His Lordship considered that, though a law-agent failed to give notice to his client that years of interest were accumulating on a prior heritable debt, that would not, per se, necessarily subject the agent in liability to his client to keep him scatheless, to the extent of the whole of that interest; and that being the case, the injury resulting to a client from an agent's omission to make this communication, was a question of circumstances requiring minute and distinct details; that, in the present case, some of these annual interests, and perhaps the greater part or the whole of them, might have been paid under circumstances which did not in the least degree prejudice the postponed creditor, Lumsdaine; and there was nothing before the court to justify the postponement of the whole claim, which was, in truth, to render it altogether nugatory, as the bond of Lumsdaine would absorb the whole fund in medio.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I rather incline to concur in the view taken by Lord Gil-

The late George Wilson was the agent of Keltie, the borrower, and he was the agent of Lumsdaine, the lender. He thus held an equivocal and ambiguous character, the conflicting duties of which it may often be difficult, or impossible to reconcile. I do not say that it is unlawful for one man to act in this double capacity, but it borders very closely on being contra bonos mores. And at all events, if a man will take on himself the very delicate responsibilities which are involved in such a character, he must take care that he makes the most complete disclosure to each of his clients of every thing which it is for their interest respectively to know, before entering into the transaction. And where a question afterwards arises whether such disclosure was made, I should certainly throw the onus not extend to the interest on those advances, which seems to be charged in accounts in process. There is no authority for holding that the heritable security covers interest upon interest on behalf of the original creditor, and the assignee of it be in a better situation."

---

that, in regard to such interests, paid by Wilson, and concerning Wilson or his representative cannot found a claim which a claim of Lumsdaine's representatives, arising under that loss how much had been lost to Lumsdaine by the misfeasance quite inextricable. But it is saved, and I think justice is done. The claim of Wilson, in competition with that of his client Lumsdaine, should very carefully enforce the principle, that where a man acts in a capacity of agent for two parties having opposite interests, he incurs very serious responsibilities, and that it is not possible, that the safety of one or other of his clients is not

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur with LORD GILLIES and LORD GLENELG. It is entirely on the personal exception that the case is to be decided. It is sufficient to postpone Wilson in competition with the representative of Lumsdaine. There is a sound opinion expressed in the note which the Court should emphatically support, and which is the basis of the case. His Lordship observes, that, "if a person acts for two parties, he must do justice between both,—bound to do strict justice to each, in relation to his own interest." The Ordinary thinks that it would be a gross infringement of the duty if he were permitted, as agent for one client, to avail himself of the title-deeds in which the other had an interest, to secure his claim due by the former at the expense of the heritable security of the latter, this too without giving the latter any notice which might have been taken for his protection." I think that principle applies to the present case, and the preference which have been put forward by Wilson.

It was observed by LORD GILLIES, with the concurrence of LORD GLENELG, that this decision did not imply any imputation on the

WILLIAM ROSS, Suspender.—G. G. Bell.

ROBERT WADDELL, Charger.—Deas.

No. 304.

June 29, 1837

Ross v.

Waddell.

Bill of Exchange—Forgery.—Bill of suspension of a charge on a bill of exchange, refused, in respect that the only ground of suspension was allegation of forgery; that caution was not offered; and that no genuine signatures, anterior to the date of the bill of exchange, were produced.

Proctor v.

Anderson.

1st Division

Ld. Cockburn

Bill-Chamber

N.

J. DUNCAN, W.S.—BROWN and MILLER, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM DAVID PROCTOR (Judicial Factor on the estate of Carse), No. 305.

Raiser.

CHARLES ANDERSON, Claimant.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—A. Wood.

FRANCIS GRAHAME, Claimant.—Robertson—H. J. Robertson.

Right in Security—Competition.—A creditor (A.) whose right was secured by position and sasine, conveyed this security to B. who was infest; in this conveyance and in the sasine, several erasures occurred; in a competition on the rents of the estate affected by the security, another creditor (C.) whose right was posterior to that of A. objected to the right of B. on account of the erasures, and was refused, but did not impeach the real security of A.;—Held, that it was just and equitable to take such objections, while the right of A. was unimpeachable, and, therefore, B. preferred in the competition, without deciding as to the effect of the erasures.

WILLIAM DAVID PROCTOR, judicial-factor on the entailed estate of Carse, No. 305.

belonging to Charles Gray, raised a process of multiplepoinding for the purpose of distributing a balance of rents remaining in his hands for 1st Division.

Ld. Cockburn.

R.

paying certain preferable annuities. Charles Anderson, physician at Aberdeen, made a claim which was founded on a bond of annuity granted by 1814, by Charles Gray, in favour of Messrs Robinson of Banff, which, sasine was taken in 1815, and which had been disposed and conveyed by them to Anderson in 1818. Anderson took infestment under the conveyance. Francis Grahame of Morphee made a competing claim, in respect of a bond by Gray for £1500, dated in 1816, on which he had obtained an adjudication of Gray's liferent interest in the estate of Carse in 1817, followed by a charter of adjudication and infestment, and decree of expenses and duties, against the tenants of the estate, all in the same year. Grahame stated that both the disposition and the sasine in favour of Anderson were erased in substantialibus in various places; and also that the sasine was inept in respect that the precept was to infest Anderson himself, without mentioning his procurator, whereas sasine had not been taken to him personally, but to his procurator or attorney only, and it was therefore without a warrant. Anderson, besides pleading that the

in their right, and Anderson. The Court therefore additional expenses.

C. BLUCE, W.S.—CAMERON and OGILVIE, W.S.—J. J. FR

No. 306.

ALLAN CAMERON, Advocate.—D. F. Hop
MRS MACLEAN CLEPHANE and ALEXANDER SHIELLS
Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—G. G. B

Process—Advocation—Final Judgment.—A party ha to a sheriff to decern and ordain certain other parties to sheriff, after answers had been given in to the petition, b record, having pronounced an interlocutor containing fin tion was laid for determining on the prayer for decerni having immediately brought an advocation of this judgme vocation was incompetent, the judgment not exhausting the

June 29, 1837.

2<sup>D</sup> DIVISION.
Lord Jeffrey.
F.

IN May, 1832, the advocator, Cameron, took a l dent, Alexander Shiells, factor for the respon Clephane, of her farm of Ensay, in the West High from Whitsunday of that year. The following l Shiells to Cameron:—"In consequence of your the sheep upon the farm of Ensay at a valuation, fr to remove from that farm, I hereby agree to take fr Mrs Maclean Clephane, when you quit said farm, you may have on said farm of Ensay, at a valuat sons mutually chosen and agreed upon. I am," & commencement of this lease, and during its course accepted, he intimated his intention of requiring Mrs Clephane No. 306.

 the sheep stock thereon at a valuation in terms of the factor's we quoted. Shiells, at the close of the lease, refused to accede June 29, 183' arrangement, alleging that Cameron had mixed sheep usually Cameron v.
 in Calgarry with the proper stock of Ensay, and was endeavoring Clephane.
 to have more taken off his hands than belonged to the latter farm.
 Cameron presented a summary petition to the sheriff of against Mrs Clephane and Shiells, praying the sheriff to decern on them instantly "to take delivery of the petitioner's sheep on the farm of Ensay at valuation, in terms of their obligation to the petition produced herewith, and in the mean time, and until such order is lodged, to pronounce an interdict, prohibiting and discharging Mrs Maclean Clephane, and the said Alexander Shiells, from dealing with the petitioner's stock and possession at Ensay foresaid, and to be liable in the sum of £10 sterling, or such other sum as may be ordered as the expenses of this application and future procedure, or to do in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem meet."
 The sheriff appointed the petition to be intimated and answers to be filed in the mean time granted interdict as craved, "all in terms of the petition until farther orders." Answers were given accordingly, and thereafter, without a record being made up or closed, a ruling interlocutor was pronounced:—"The sheriff-substitute resumed consideration of the petition of Allan Cameron, therein answered thereto by Mrs Maclean Clephane and Alexander Cameron factor or mandatary, with the copies-schedules of protest respectively by the parties on each other, finds it not denied by either party that the sheep stock in question grazed and now graze on the farms of Ensay and Calgarry; and further finds, that by Alexander Shiells's letter to the petitioner, No. 3 of process, he had only authority to take the sheep stock which the petitioner may have on the farm of Ensay by valuation, at the termination of the petitioner's lease in respect of which, finds it only obligatory upon the respondents to remove the sheep stock actually grazing upon the farm of Ensay at valuation; appoints the valuation to proceed forthwith by arbiters mutually chosen in terms of the missive already referred to; appoints the sheep to be valued within the bounds of each farm, and such sheep as may be found within the bounds of Ensay to be considered and valued as the remaining to that farm, and the stock which the respondents are to take at valuation; the sheep not to be disturbed on their respective farms for two days previously to the gathering of the sheep for the purpose of being valued; recalls the interdict for prohibiting the respondents from entering into possession of the farm of Ensay, reserving to them to proceed in any action of damages which they may be advised to take."

And, having found caution in common form, brought an advoca-

THE CASE OF JOHNSON AND OTHERS, HOWEVER, HAS BEEN inclines him to think that it is still admissible, though more properly dilatory than entirely exclusive, as that here is. However, he has given the respondent the benefit of the objection as ill-founded upon its merits, and not on been virtually abandoned, in consequence of not being proper time.

“ Upon its merits, or on the question, whether the judg of was truly a final or only an interlocutory judgment, the some difficulty. But on the whole, he is of opinion, that disposes of all that the parties had differed about, and settl had been raised in their pleadings, it is properly to be rega in the sense of the statute, and acts of sederunt, as certainly not such as a warrant for extract or ultimate exc Sederunt of 1828, it is expressly provided, that any judgm merits are disposed of, shall be held to be a final judgm the competency of advocacy, though no expenses are distinctly settled by the case of Anderson, 1st June, 183 where such a judgment was in substance pronounced, it w cation, that no words of decerniture were employed, t necessary as a warrant for extracting. The question, ther must be, whether what is authoritatively determined by inferior court, does truly embrace all that was in litigati and, according to this criterion, the Lord Ordinary is of op in this case was final.

“ In order to come to a right conclusion upon this, it is to what was substantially in dispute between the parties, may have used in their pleadings; and, in short, to ascert of those pleadings, they were agreed, and to what precise which they called on the Court to determine, was confir there was not the least dispute as to the obligatory nature o been entered into, or as to the way in which its obligation
The one party admitted that he was bound to deliver over was bound to receive ‘ the sheep stock upon the farm o n, founded on the allegation of its not being a final judgment; advocate the cause, and in respect that the judgment complained of was

No. 306

June 29, 18
Cameron v.
Clephane.

ed, if the admissions should not be thought sufficient; and, second, an application for interdict against removing the tenant in the meanwhile, and until the question of construction was settled. Now, both these points are finally disposed of by the interlocutor of the sheriff complained of. He finds, 1st, That upon the facts of his own admissions, the whole sheep brought forward by him for valuation should be considered as 'the sheep stock' (referred to in the agreement) 'upon the farm of Ensay;' and he gives certain directions as to the way in which those sheep do form that stock may be distinguished; and, 2d, He removes the interdict against his being removed from the farm, and reserves to both parties their right to claim damages hinc inde, in any separate action.

By these findings, it appears to the Lord Ordinary that the whole matters in dispute were finally disposed of, and that no farther judicial determination was contemplated, or could be required. The sheriff does not appoint judicial valuation, and he had not been called on to make any such appointment, but recognises a valuation already extrajudicially chosen by the parties, and he does not direct them to appoint port to him, no reference to his authority in that respect having been made, but after giving judgment upon the only point on which he had been appealed to, removing the interdict, he leaves the matter to proceed in the course in which it was proceeding, but for that special appeal, it would have proceeded, and according to which he plainly understood it would again proceed, after that only difficulty had been resolved.

When this is obviously the substance and tenor of the whole proceedings, it is wholly unnecessary to cavil with a view to this question of competency, to observe, that the conclusions of the original petition are petitory, and not declaratory, and therefore could not be exhausted without a decree. The words no doubt are, that the respondents should be ordained and decerned to take delivery of the sheep upon the farm of Ensay, at a valuation in terms of their obligation, but the meaning is only, that it should be declared, that the just construction of their petition imported that they should be bound to take, as the stock of Ensay, all sheep the complainer had required them to take, for upon no other point was there the slightest dispute; and, accordingly, when the respondents came to state the substance of their answers, what it is that they required of the sheriff, it is not very remarkable, that what they propose as the antithesis of this conclusion of the complainer, is in words almost exactly identical. They, in express terms, require that judge 'to find the complainer bound to deliver the stock on the farm of Ensay, according to agreement,' the substance and palpable meaning here again being merely that he should find the true import of the agreement to be, that the part of what had been offered to the valuers, was not truly the sheep stock of Ensay.

In these circumstances the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that the judgment of the sheriff has exhausted the whole cause, although it had merely found that the respondents were only bound to take at a valuation, the sheep which were commonly or habitually grazed upon Ensay, and not all that might have been occasionally there, or might by possibility have been maintained on its pasture; and as the respondents were willing to do this, declared the interdict at an end. But, in any case, the Sheriff has done a great deal more: He has not only made a delivery to this effect generally, but has laid down a distinct criterion, for ascertaining which sheep should be held to belong to this farm, and found in express terms that the respondents 'are to be considered as the stock which the respondents are bound to take at a valuation.' Now this appears to the Lord Ordinary to be a complete answer to the prayer of the complainer's petition 'to ordain and decern the respondents to take delivery of the stock on Ensay at a valuation, according to their obligation,' as well as to the corresponding craving of the respondents 'to find the complainer bound to deliver the stock on Ensay according to agreement.' The judgment therefore not only explains the agreement, in a practical and conclu-as compared with the judgment wherein pronounced the petition was not exhausted by this judgment, appointment without a decerniture.

The advocator, in support of the interlocutor, and judgment admitting advocacy in terms of the Act of merits having been substantially disposed of.

LORD MEDWYN.—I have some difficulty. It is said th

---

sive way, which was all that was really wanted,—but it co requisition of both parties, by finding, that the respondents valuation (and the complainer consequently to deliver) th the range of the agreement by the meaning thus judicially case of Anderson it will scarcely be maintained, that a l were bound respectively to deliver and to take the stock th valent to a decerniture on them so to take and deliver ; an such a decerniture, it does not occur how it could have b judgment was final.

“ The respondents indeed suggested that the parties mi take and deliver on these terms, or that the valutors migh or that they or the parties might have misconducted, or be conducted themselves in the course of the valuation ; in a have been competent to have come back to the Sheriff as i in spite of the judgment complained of, which they there have been a final judgment. Now, in so far as these casee tion of the contumacy or refusal of the parties to obtemper once admitted that it would be both competent and neces Sheriff ; not, however, for any new or additional judgment, of a decree, under which it might be legally enforced ; and conduct of the valutors, or other persons, it is apprehende acting under any judicial appointment, nor with any view interlocutor for a final disposal of the cause, such interlocutor may be advised; but it has never been held that this is a final judgment so as to admit of variation. As to the matter in question, all that the Sheriff has done is to pronounce certain declaratory findings. The gist of this application was to have respondents decerned and ordained to take delivery of the petitioner's sheep, &c. I think the matter was not exhausted, and that the advocacy is incompetent in the circumstances. As to the objection to the competency not having been taken up at the proper time, I always thought such objection should be disposed of in initio litis, as in the case of Black v. Auld,<sup>1</sup> January 19, 1832; this is one of those matters which the Court are bound to take up, though at any period of the cause. The other Judges having concurred,

No. 306.

June 29, 1833

Adam v.

Anderson.

THE COURT altered the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and sustained the objection to the advocacy; but found no expenses due.

SANG and ADAM, S.S.C.—GIBSON and DONALDSON, W.S.—Agents.

JAMES ADAM, W.S., Advocate.—Anderson.

No. 307.

GEORGE ANDERSON, Respondent.—Patton.

Right to Pursue—Arrestment—Sale by Auction.—An auctioneer was employed by the party to sell his furniture under a previous agreement that it should be sold at the sight of the party and the prices of the articles forthwith handed over to him. The sale took place accordingly, in course of which a creditor of the party arrested the furniture in the hands of the auctioneer; at this juncture part of the prices of the articles sold had been handed over to the party's clerk, part (to the extent of £10) was in the hands of the auctioneer, and part had not been received from purchasers; the auctioneer thereafter presented a petition to the sheriff praying that the party be prohibited from delivering the furniture of which the prices had been paid, or receiving the money, and for warrant to the clerks of Court to take possession of the effects, deliver the same, and receive the prices;—Held, in advocacy, that the auctioneer was not entitled to insist for such prohibition and warrant.

THE respondent Anderson, an auctioneer, was employed by the advocate Adam, W.S., to sell by auction the furniture in his house in Edinburgh. It was specially agreed upon beforehand that the goods should be sold at the sight of Adam or of a person attending for him; that no more should be sold than he thought proper, and that no money, except to a limited extent, should be allowed to remain in Anderson's hands; the sale was to be for ready money, but the prices of the articles, as they were paid to Anderson's clerk, or when they amounted to £10, should be forthwith paid over to Adam; and Anderson was

June 29, 1833

2D DIVISION

Ld. Moncreiff

T.

<sup>1</sup> Ante, X. 205.

above-mentioned), and the proceedings at the sale of the goods on credit had demanded delivery of the goods, the petitioner refused to allow unless the prices were paid direct to the petitioner, the petitioner would incur the risk of a serious loss, and praying for an interdict to prohibit Adam from interfering with the purchasers, or interfering with the furniture, or the effects, thereof, and for a warrant to the clerks of Court to take possession of the effects, and deliver them to the respective purchasers and receive payment of the same.

Anderson, in support of his petition, adduced evidence to be the understanding and practice of the auctioneer, that in the case of a sale of furniture the auctioneer stood in the shoes of the owner of the goods, and stood in the shoes of his right to interfere; and that he was liable, as in possession, for assessed taxes and for the landlord's rent. Adam, on the other hand, adduced evidence to the effect that the footing on which the sale was conducted, and the proof of the taxes and rent having been paid by him, was certain points to Anderson's oath, from which it appeared that the sale had been conducted upon the special agreement already mentioned.

The Sheriff granted interdict, and after various proceedings in the circumstances, the petitioner was entitled, and that of all parties interested, to apply for the petition to be concluded for; and at the same time granted warrant to the Court or any of their assistants to take possession of the goods, and deliver it to the purchasers, and receive payment of the sums so received till the further order of the Court.

The local practice of Edinburgh as to the powers and rights of auc- No. 307
 s, cannot control those leading principles of law which determine June 29, 18 icacy of property or possession, and it can have still less effect on Adam v.
 esent case, seeing that the sale was conducted on a footing different Anderson.
 rdinary sales, and in virtue of a special agreement.

erson pleaded in answer—

The respondent, who had guaranteed the proceeds of the roup, and ad, by the actual sale of the furniture in question, incurred a liabithe purchasers on the one hand, and to the advocator on the other, titled, on the use of the diligence of arrestment in the circumstan-which it was used, to apply to the Judge Ordinary to take measures ich the rights and interests of all parties might be secured.

The object of the application being to secure the rights of par-and the interlocutor complained of having merely directed the on of a course by which these rights might be secured, the advocal no legitimate interest to oppose the prayer of the petition, and has h interest in maintaining the present advocacy.

The nature of the transaction involving responsibility on the part of pondent for delivery of the furniture to the purchasers, the duty of ing and accounting for the proceeds, and liability for rent, taxes, overnment-duties, the respondent could not be regarded as a mere er of the furniture, and the arrestment used in his hands was valid.

The evidence of the practice and understanding of auctioneers, in stances similar to those occurring in the present case, and as to the ractically given to diligence so used, is material in justifying the adopted by the respondent, and in proving the actual law upon the
 t.

Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the elow :*—“ Advocates the cause, and recalls the interlocutors com-

It is very manifest to the Lord Ordinary, that though the judgment of eriff might be a safe and easy way of avoiding the decision of the question resented, it had all the same effect to the prejudice of the advocator as t judgment against him upon that question. The advocator's object in a part of his furniture was to obtain immediate command of the price for purposes. But to tie up these funds in the hands of the sheriff-clerk till the rights of an arresting creditor should be discussed, was entirely to defeat ect, and create even the worse mischief of an expensive litigation; and to the advocator to find security, or give a guarantee, had in substance the ect as to require him to loose the arrestment on caution. The Lord Ordi-nnot deal with the case in this manner, however plausible it may seem when stated. He finds himself bound to determine the question put before him, r, in the circumstances, there was any legal ground for the application or e Lord Ordinary is by no means prepared to sanction the doctrines which en delivered by the auctioneers with regard to their own supposed rights in sales by auction in this city; and he greatly doubts whether any such local , or rather understanding (for there is no actual practice given in evidence), respondent's clerk, or when they amounted to such a sum as with paid over to the advocator; and the respondent was the object of this arrangement being to prevent the effect of a person who, the advocator apprehended, might vexatiously dilige[n]ce. On this footing the sale went on under the arrangement, and money was from time to time paid over to him. At last the time came, when there was only a sum of £20 in the respondent's hands, to the extent it is admitted to be good, subject to the respondent's commission, for which the sum is admitted to have been paid in full. But goods had been sold, the prices of which had been paid, and goods remained undelivered in the advocator's house. The respondent entitled, under this contract, to insist that, upon the goods, should be paid to him, and RETAINED BY HIM till the arrears were paid? Or, what is the same thing, should be locked up in the sheriff's hands till that should be done. The petition referred to retention, and taxes, as a ground of retention. The Lord Ordinary asked the question how far the auctioneer is liable for these preferable claims, if it is proved by the receipts produced, that they were all paid, and no objection was presented. The simple question, therefore, is that the Lord Ordinary conceives that the Sheriff was bound to decide in favour of the respondent.

"The prices of the goods not delivered were never in the hands of the respondent, and, by the special contract, if they had been paid to him, he was to deliver them instantly to the advocator. Never having been in the hands of the respondent, therefore, they were in no way touched by the arrestment. Under the contract, the advocator had allowed it, the auctioneer no doubt was bound, or mandatory, to recover the money on tendering delivery. The Lord Ordinary found in the late case of Dowal v. Allan, that the respondent's lien being provided for by the money in his hands, beyond what was paid by the advocator, on payment TO HIM, would have been a valid lien in the hands of the purchaser; and as the very question raised relates to the delivery and receive payment, the idea of any responsibility on the part of the purchaser is out of the case.

"The Lord Ordinary therefore holds it to be clear, that the uer was not entitled to present the application to the Sheriff, which is No. 307. he foundation of this process; therefore dismisses the same, recalls the interdict so far as now necessary, and decerns; finds expenses due both in this Court and the inferior court."

June 29, 1837
Adam v.
Anderson.

Anderson reclaimed.

LORD GLENLEE.—I have no doubt except upon one point, viz. whether the Lord Ordinary should have found the respondent liable for the whole expenses in the inferior court. I am not sure that under the circumstances it was altogether unreasonable to present a petition to prevent the furniture in question being disturbed.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I agree as to the merits, but am for giving the whole expenses.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have no doubt on the merits, and I go on the circumstances of the agreement as established by the respondent's oath. There is no question as to the sum of £20, to which alone the arrestment applies.

LORD MEDWYN concurred.

THE COURT adhered as to the merits, and the expenses in the Court of Session, but only found expenses in the inferior court subject to modification; finding additional expenses due.

JAMES ADAM, W.S.—SMITH and KINNEAR, W.S.—Agents.

goods themselves which could make an arrestment in his hands effectual to reach them? The Lord Ordinary thinks it very clear that he had not. The goods were in the advocator's own house, and the sale was under his own control. No more could be sold than he thought fit; and when articles were sold but not delivered, they still remained where they were, neither in the actual nor in the constructive possession of the respondent.

The end of the thing is, that the respondent, by his application to the Sheriff, attempted to defeat the whole substance of the contract between him and the advocator. Very possibly he may have made it under some imagination of danger to himself. But a man is not entitled, on imagination of danger, to disregard the interest of the party with whom he has contracted, more especially after being warned that such a contingency might occur.

The Lord Ordinary has not entered into all the points discussed in this case, which, though of no great importance in itself, does involve questions of some delicacy. But he is, on the whole, of opinion that, according to the good faith and legal operation of the special contract, the judgment of the Sheriff cannot be sustained."

June 29, 1837.

2<sup>d</sup> Division.
Lord Jeffrey.
T.

THE advocator, Brown, raised action before the Sheriff against the respondent, Moncur, setting forth that he had paid to him the sum of £40, minus a payment to account of amount of a bill "drawn by the pursuer upon, and payable to the order of, Stewart, 23, West Richmond Street, Edinburgh, 12 months after date, which bill was indorsed by the pursuer, on the express condition of his immediately furnishing with malt whisky to the amount thereof; that the said Stewart had paid the amount of said bill, but has failed to furnish the said whisky promised;" and concluding for payment of the sum claimed. The respondent, Moncur, stated in defence, that the bill had been indorsed to him by Purves, by whom it was indorsed to himself, Purves being indebted to him in more than the amount; pleading that he was a bona fide indorsee, and that it was irrelevant to the present case whether Brown had received value for his indorsation or not. The Sheriff's statement in the condescendence referred solely to the fact that the bill was indorsed to Moncur, without any statement made of his not being a bona fide holder.

Thereafter Brown referred to Moncur's oath, "swearing to the truth of the statements relative to the said bill or indorsation thereof." The Sheriff sustained, but found it "incumbent on the respondent to show within the limits of the record." Moncur deposed in his defence to a position containing various statements tending to show that he was a bona fide indorsee in taking the indorsation, but not showing want of value. The Sheriff found that the pursuer's allegations were not proved.

which allegation Brown had failed to prove by the reference to No. 308.

The Lord Ordinary “found it sufficiently instructed by the oath that the pursuer was not a bona fide indorsee to the bill in question,” and decided in terms of the conclusions of the original action; finding expenses incurred reclaimed.

June 29, 1837.
Brown v.
Moncar.

MR GLENLEE.—This may be a proper claim against the defender, but it does not follow that it is a claim which can be decerned for in the present shape of the bill. I think the Sheriff’s interlocutor is right, and that the facts proved by the evidence do not bear out the libel; the sole ground of action being that the defender gave no value for the bill indorsed to him, and of which he recovered the amount. If we look also to the condescendence, this is the allegation which is in error. Then the reference was sustained by the Sheriff, with an express finding that the pursuer should confine himself to the record; and the question is, whether the oath has made out the pursuer’s allegations, which I do not think it

other Judges having concurred,

THE COURT altered the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor, and remitted simpliciter to the Sheriff, but found no expenses due.

SCOTT, RYMER, and SCOTT, S.S.C.—J. MEIKLE, S.S.C.—Agents.

---

The Lord Ordinary, in his note, after adverting to the statements in the defence, showing mala fides, proceeds:—“Though the reference is generally of facts and circumstances relative to the said bill, and indorsations thereof, the interlocutor sustaining it ‘finds it incumbent on the pursuer to keep within the limits of the record;’ and it is no doubt true, that the want of bona fides is not expressly or separately set forth in the record, but only the want of onerosity. It does not, however, appear to the Lord Ordinary that this can afford any objection to the competency of the present judgment: 1st, Because a want of bona fides is included in a want of onerosity, and may therefore be held to be included in the more general allegation; and, though it may afterwards come out separately, yet be held to have been substantially libelled; 2d, Because bona fides is immaterial to the defence of a party in the situation of the defender, and it is unnecessary to give effect to the want of it, if that is clearly made out in the course of the proceedings; and, 3d, Because the whole process being now advocated, the finding in the Sheriff’s deliverance may be held to be recalled, so as to make the reference what it truly is in its terms, and ought to have been, as a reference to the whole case, viz. an undertaking to prove, by the oath of the defender, not only on what media concludendi, that the sum claimed is truly owing, and the action to it unconscientious and unjust.”

raised an action against the shipowners, libelling that the loss was through improper stowage, and that he had "undelivered" and was answerable to the purchaser for the safe delivery of the punch. The purchaser deposed, as a witness, "that the said punch was delivered on the quay at Newcastle before he was to consider it as his property. Held, that, by the contract of parties, as proved scripto, the punch, shipped, as above, at Leith, became the property of the purchaser, and was delivered to him, and was at his risk during the voyage; that, at his risk, and understood to be so, was confirmed by his acceptance of the bill of lading, and his acceptance of a bill of exchange drawn on him, pending the action, did not take away from him the property in the punch, as to the party at whose risk the punch was actually lost. The punch was lost to the owner (the purchaser), and the shipowner had no title to pursue for the value of it."

June 30, 1837. SEQUEL of the Jury trial reported ante, p. 884, 1

1st Division.

The pursuers presented a bill of exceptions against the presiding Judge, which direction was stated in the report. It appeared that the pursuers, at the time of furnishing the spirits in question, had sent an invoice thereof to the purchaser, bearing that the same had been insured against fire and insurance were charged against the same. On the said invoice, the pursuers were not entitled to recover the value of the said punch from the defendant. The pursuers maintained that upon the matters admitted by the defendant, and proved in evidence before the said Jury, if they found for the pursuers, they were entitled, in point of law, to a decree in their favour. The said Jury found for the pursuers, and decreed to the said Jury."

s renewed when due : That the said bill was so renewed, in consequence of another puncheon being sent a month later : That deponent hired Mr Dunlop to insure the same, and to charge the expenses of it and the freight in the invoice to said deponent : That the said puncheon was to be safely delivered on the quay at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, before deponent was to consider it his property : That deponent has not received a farthing for the loss : That deponent made an affidavit that the puncheon was ordered from Messrs Dunlop, and lost at sea : That deponent got a letter from Newcastle from the agents of the Ardincaple there, saying that he had to make an affidavit before a magistrate, that the puncheon that was lost was his : That the said letter was a circular letter : That deponent made that affidavit, supposing it to be a matter of form, to enable Messrs Dunlop of Edinburgh to recover the amount of insurance : That deponent had no idea that Messrs Dunlop had acted at that time as their own underwriters : That the loss of said puncheon did not cost deponent one farthing : That deponent believes that the loss of the said puncheon was sustained by Messrs Dunlop : That deponent insured the second puncheon at Sunderland, in consequence of Messrs Dunlop advising him to do so.”

The letter of advice as to the second puncheon, referred to in this declaration, was dated 30th September and 3d October, 1833. The price of the spirits and freight amounted to £78, 6s. 4d., being £2, 9s. 4d. more than the bill for the price, and freight, and insurance of the first puncheon. The letter stated that as there was now no hope of the first puncheon being ever heard of, “this puncheon will replace it, and the transaction will stand settled by your former acceptance, all but the trifling balance. If you wish to insure, you can get it done lower in Newcastle.”

The pursuers, in support of the bill of exceptions, pleaded, 1st, that, by the terms of the verdict, and of the direction, they were entitled to assume that the first puncheon was lost through improper stowage, and that the defenders were liable for its price either to Robson or them. That Robson could have no claim for it, as he had sworn that “the first puncheon was to be safely delivered on the quay at Newcastle before he was to consider it his property.” If that were true, the puncheon never became Robson’s, and he could not have claimed its value; and, after the oath, the defenders were effectually protected from any claim at his instance. But farther, the second puncheon was sent expressly to “replace” the first; the bill drawn for the first, was afterwards renewed on account of the second, and Robson was debited only with the price for the second. And as Robson had agreed to receive, and had received, the second puncheon on these terms, the effect was to re-instate the pursuers in their full right to demand from the defenders the value of the first puncheon. Even if Robson himself were competing with them in

was his property and at his risk, during the voyage stood it to be so or not. And, in point of fact, he understood it to be at his risk, since he directed it to the insurance. When it was lost, he, or his assignee entitled to exact its value from the defenders, if it was a fault. And accordingly the summons was expressed in the assumption that the puncheon had remained at the place where it should be landed at Newcastle ; which assumption, I think, is contrary to the fact, as proved by the evidence.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I think this question is attended with difficulty, but I concur in the direction which was given by the court at the trial. The grounds of liability, laid in the summons, are against the pursuers. It is true that the issue taken, as to the defence, was on general terms, whether there was wrongful failure to deliver the spirits, and whether the defenders were indebted, for the value of the spirits, to the pursuers. But that issue cannot be read as a mere assumption taken in connexion with the terms of the summons, and the liability laid in the summons was, that the pursuers "undertook to deliver the spirits, and were answerable to the said Matthew Robson for the puncheon." But it appears to me to be impossible to hold the pursuers liable in regard to the first, and the second puncheon, Robson having effected the insurance. In regard to the first, he did so, by directing the spirits to be insured, and afterwards accepting the bill which they gave for the amount of the price of the spirits, and the freight, and the duty on the second puncheon, he directly effected the insurance. But in both cases the insurance was made either by him, or ir risk till they landed it at Newcastle, at the same time that they insure it on No. 309. Count of Robson, and take payment from him of the amount of insurance.

LORD COREHOUSE.—When I first looked at the record in this case, I was in- June 30, 1837.
 ed to think that the direction given at the trial was well-founded, but, on fur- Dunlop v.
 r consideration, I have arrived, though with great diffidence, at an opposite Lambert.
 conclusion.

The facts of the case are admitted. The pursuers sold a puncheon of whisky Robson of Newcastle, which they duly shipped on board of the Ardincaple. They transmitted to him a bill of lading, and an invoice of the price, together with draft for the amount, which he accepted. It is clear, therefore, that the pursuers had made constructive delivery of the puncheon to Robson by the ship-ent.

In reference to the question which afterwards arose, there are two views which deserve attention. The first involves a matter of fact; the second depends upon law of the case.

In the first place, the pursuers aver that it was a condition of the agreement, that they should undertake and be answerable to Robson for the safe delivery of the puncheon. Robson has positively sworn that this was the case. The defenders say that he must be in a mistake, because he had directed the pursuers to get an insurance on the puncheon. But that is not a necessary consequence. An insurance would cover only one class of risks to which the puncheon was exposed in its transit, the risks which arose from the perils of the sea. But there are other risks not covered by the insurance; for example, loss by the fault or negligence of the mariners, not amounting to baratry: that is, the very circumstance here alleged to have taken place. The fact of Robson having directed an insurance to be effected, is not incompatible, therefore, with his deposition that it was the understanding and agreement of both parties that the pursuers were to be liable for the safe delivery of the puncheon. Further, it is proved that the pursuers considered this to be the nature of their agreement, for, as soon as they learned that the puncheon was lost, they sent another to Robson. They did not do this in account of any liability attaching to them as insurers, for they were not liable as insurers to make good a loss which arose from the fault or negligence of the mariners. Considering the oath of Robson, therefore, as to his understanding of the nature of the contract, and the real evidence afforded by the conduct of the pursuers as to their understanding upon the subject, I am inclined to think it probable in point of fact, that the contract was of the nature libelled. But if the pursuers were responsible for the safe delivery of the puncheon to Robson at Newcastle, the loss during the transit was a loss to them and not to Robson, and they were entitled to recover the value from the defenders if the puncheon was lost in consequence of improper stowage, which, in the question now raised, we must assume to be the fact.

But, in the second place, granting that the agreement was different from what the vendors and the vendee alleged it to have been, and if the puncheon, the ownership of which was transferred to the vendee by the transmission of the invoice and by the constructive delivery, is to be held to have been at the vendee's risk, it appears to me, even on that assumption, that the pursuers were entitled to recover the value from the defenders, if it were lost by their fault; and that the defence therefore is good. After the storm had occurred, and the puncheon was the owners of the ship occasioned the loss of the puncheon by stowing it improperly, as was found by the verdict, they were liable for the price of it, either to the pursuers, the vendors, or to Robson, the vendee. Robson does not claim. I am satisfied, therefore, that the right is in the pursuers, that they have a title to insist, and that the action was correctly brought in their name. No. 309.

June 30, 1837.
Dunlop v. Lambert.

doubt which was started with regard to the terms in which the summons is framed, appears to me unfounded. I am, therefore, of opinion that the pursuers were entitled to maintain the action, and that the jury should have been so directed.

ORD PRESIDENT.—I retain, in this case, the same opinion which I delivered at the trial. By a completed written contract it is proved that the pursuers, after sending the puncheon to Robson's order, were free of all risk or liability on account of the loss.

The property of the puncheon was Robson's, and the risk of it was his. So both parties were both parties of this, that he desired the pursuers to effect an insurance on his account, and was charged by them for the cost of insurance, which he paid.

After all this, it does seem to me to be an extraordinary attempt which is made to give a different colour to the contract, and to qualify the written agreement of parties, by a statement that it was understood in a sense contrary to the tenor of the written contract, and contrary also, I think, to the actings of both parties in reference to the insurance of the puncheon. It appears to me that it would be highly dangerous, if the effect of a written contract could be thus taken away, at any time when it might afterwards appear to be for the advantage of either party of the parties to do so, and thereby to affect the interests of third parties. It is never understood that a written contract could be so done away with; and as it appears to me that the pursuers had not a title to recover the value of the puncheon, in terms of the contract, as proved by legal evidence, I think the bill of exceptions ought to be refused.

ORD GILLIES.—I feel much impressed by the observations of Lord Corehouse. It appears to me that the effect of them is taken off, by the terms in which the summons is conceived. The summons sets forth that the pursuers "undertook by agreement, and were answerable to the said Matthew Robson for the safe delivery of the said puncheon." It appears to me that, in point of fact, this is not what had to have been the case, and that, on the contrary, the puncheon was at the risk of Robson during the voyage. Robson directed it to be insured, as being his puncheon and at his risk; and he paid for the insurance which was effected. I think it would involve a direct contradiction to allow him at the same time, to maintain that this same puncheon was not at his risk, but the risk of another. But I said that even although by the original agreement, the puncheon was at Robson's risk, yet that agreement was annulled by the subsequent transactions of the parties.

I shall only say in reference to that view, that it seems to me to be subversive of the foundation of the pursuers' summons which is based on that alleged agreement. I think the direction given at the trial was right, and that the bill of exceptions ought to be refused.

THE COURT accordingly disallowed the bill of exceptions, and subjected the pursuers to expenses.

answers, "refused the bill; found expenses due thereof to be given in, and, when lodged, remitted the same, and to report." A certificate of refusal was issued from the Bill Chamber on July 22d. The bill was taxed on August 8th, and on August 11th, the bills, pronounced this interlocutor, "The Lords against the complainer for £16, 14s. 7d., in terms besides the dues of extract." An extract of this judgment by Webster, in these terms: "At Edinburgh, the 1834, in the bill of suspension presented for Robert Mackenzie, Ordinary on the bills, of the day and date, and ordained, and hereby decerns and ordains the payment to the said respondent of the sum of sixteen shillings and sevenpence sterling of expenses, besides fourpence as the dues of extract: And ordains letters of horning, and all other legal execution needful, hereon, in form as effects.—One word deleted. E. ROBERTSON." Robertson was assistant clerk of the Court. Webster presented a bill for letters of horning, and usual bearing to proceed ex deliberatione dominorum, in terms of horning which narrated that he had "obtained sentence"—"before L. Mackenzie, Ordinary, then in a bill of suspension, &c., whereby his Lordship ordered the said Robert Ross to make payment, &c., as the letters of horning, &c., shown to the Lords of our erwise satisfying that enactment. The A. S., on a preamble, that, No. 310.

 according to established usage, all extracts of the decrees of this Court, June 30, 1837 of other courts of law in this kingdom, bear the dates at which such Ross v. decrees respectively were pronounced, but that, under the present regu- Webster.

ons as to the extracting of decrees established by Acts of Parliament Acts of Sederunt of this Court, questions have arisen and may arise, on the exact dates at which extracts of decrees were completed by the signature of the extractor," proceeded to "enact and ordain, that from after the first of May next, there shall be annexed to all extracts a quet in the handwriting of the officer by whom the extract is signed, ing by whom it was written, by whom it was collated, and at what it was completed by the signature of the extractor. And in all cases ere such docquet has not been duly made, the extract shall be held as robativè." A penalty of £5, was also imposed on the extractor who ould fail to comply with this regulation.

Webster answered that the A. S. did not apply to judgments in the Chamber, where 488 extracts, similar to the present, had been issued e the A. S. was passed; and none had been issued, in which that ulation had been held applicable to them. The Lord Ordinary (Corese) passed the bill without caution or consignation. Minutes of debate e afterwards ordered "upon the point, whether the diligence under pension be void, in respect of the alleged non-observance of the provi-a of the Act of Sederunt, 6th March, 1829." The minutes were orted to the Court.

Pleaded by the Suspenders—

1. The intention of the A. S. was to regulate all extracts of decrees, d it had an important remedial object in view, which was not only to the date when an extract of a decree was issued, but also to record the me of the party collating it, &c. The preamble applied to "all extracts the decrees of this Court, and of other courts of law in this kingdom," d the words of enactment applied universally to "all extracts."

2. Though the Bill Chamber was not specially mentioned as one of e courts of law to which the A. S. applied, yet it must fall within its actment, if it were a court of law, and if the judgment of August 11, 1834, was a decree. But the jurisdiction of the Bill Chamber, although rked by various specialties, was still nothing else than that of a court law, and, especially in processes of suspension of decrees of inferior orts, it was just the jurisdiction of a court of review. And the judgment of August 11th, was, in terms, a decree. It decerned for expenses d ordained letters of horning to follow on the decree. And the horning ordingly expressly recited the "decree" as its warrant.

3. There was the same reason for requiring the date, the name of the later, &c., to be affixed to an extract of this decree, as of any other.
 his was true, even if the date had been the only thing required by the
 A. S., and there was no ground whatever for saying that the other requi-ses were not equally applicable to this extract as to any other.

ment of the A. S. And the words "all extracts," occurring clause, must be read with reference to the preamble

2. The judgment or sentence of August 11th, was decree within the meaning of the A. S. And it was di any decree of the Court of Session by several marked ch that it did not form a warrant for letters of horning, bu followed by a special bill for such letters; and the let when granted did not bear to proceed per decretum domi ex deliberatione dominorum, &c.

3. The remedy of the A. S. was not required for cases By A. S. 11th July, 1828, § 16, it was provided that ex modified after a certificate of refusal was issued, and that dec should be given out "immediately after the certificate sh issued." As there could be no decree till the issuing of refusal, and as there was no need for any time whatever after before issuing the extract, the date of issuing it was

4. The uniform practice of the Bill Chamber not o understanding of all parties concerned, as to the true mean but also showed how ruinous would be the consequences extracts were now to be declared improbative.

The Court, on considering the minutes of debate, direct of the other Judges to be taken. Lord Cuninghame, havin in the cause before his elevation to the bench, declined other consulted Judges returned this unanimous opinion. opinion, that the Act of Sederunt, 6th March, 1829, doe in this case is founded. At the same time, we think it advisable that practice should be continued, which it appears has been of late adopted in the Bill Chamber, of affixing the date of completing it to such extracts." No. 310

 On resuming the cause along with this opinion, the Lord President June 30, 18 ordered that an A. S. should be passed for the purpose of carrying into Ferguson v.
 effect the recommendation contained at the close of the opinion. Glenny.

Their Lordships pronounced this interlocutor :—" Find, in conformity with the opinions of the consulted Judges, that the Act of Sederunt, 6th March, 1829, does not apply to the extracts of decrees for expenses in the Bill Chamber, and, therefore, that the diligence is not on that account objectionable; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed, &c., reserving all questions of expenses."

GREGG AND MORTON, W.S.—W. MILLER, S.S.C.—Agents.

THOMAS FERGUSON, Advocate and Defender.—Ivory—Cook. No. 311
WILLIAM GLENNY, Respondent and Pursuer.—D. F. Hope—Miller.

Verdict—Proof.—In an action originally before an inferior Court for repayment of the price of certain goods, on the allegation that they were of inferior quality, and of the quality of the goods having been taken and concluded, while the goods were still in the inferior Court, and the goods having been subsequently judicially sold;—Held that in considering the proof, the result of the sale was not to be taken into account, and that no investigation thereanent could be competently made into.

THE respondent, Glenny, rag merchant in Edinburgh, having received June 30, 18 an order for rags from Dawson, a merchant in Newcastle, purchased a 2d Division a quantity from the advocate, Ferguson, rag merchant in Leith, Lord Jeffrey which were packed in bags by the latter, and shipped on board a New- T. castle trader. Dawson rejected the rags as of bad quality, whereupon Glenny raised an action against Ferguson before the Sheriff of Edinburgh, concluding for warrant to have the rags sold at such price as might be obtained for them, and to have Ferguson ordained to make repayment of the price. A proof was led at Newcastle and Leith as to the quality of the rags, and whether Glenny had examined them, or had an opportunity of examining them, before they were shipped. The Sheriff found that the rags sold by Ferguson were not marketable rags of the kind required, and that Glenny had neither time nor opportunity for properly examining them, and decerned against the defender for repayment of the price. Of this judgment Ferguson brought an advocacy.
 In the course of the proceedings the rags were sold at Newcastle by order from the Court, and brought a price of 5s. 6d. per ton; the original price at which they had been bought by Glenny having been 7s., and he had paid in paper of his own manufacture.

the shop door. 'If he had not seen the rags before, it is that he should not have taken a look at them then, when final possession, and to deliver, as he soon after did, the cargo they had been bartered. When four witnesses concur, that they saw him go into the loft, or come out of it, and one he was in it along with him for fifteen or twenty minutes, do the rags, and came away, saying, 'they will do,' they state concordant with what his admitted conduct would lead one to require a great deal more than those circumstantial variance to all testimony given years after the transaction, to warrant as untrue.

"But, if he did examine the rags for fifteen minutes, being admitted that their quality (whatever that was) in one bag or package was very like another, is sufficient to and to exclude all future challenge on the score of insufficiency was so, is proved by his own leading witnesses, the Dawsons, they themselves accordingly finally rejected the whole parcel of not more than eight or nine bags, out of sixty or seventy of quality is further established by the result of the ultimate the seven lots having there brought a price varying from five varying more than prices are apt to vary at public sales of commodity,—wine from the same pipe, or cotton of the same it be quite true that fifteen minutes was a great deal too little of such a parcel of rags, if the quality of one package or lot tially from that of another, it is in evidence, and indeed is a than sufficient to ascertain the quality of one or two bags quantity of an uniform commodity. Half the rags in this case lying in an open heap on the floor, and half to have been holes. It is proved that one bag might be well examined in and much more than the amount of its contents in the same the ground. Fifteen minutes, therefore, was ample time to of a large and fair sample; and as it is not pretended that formable, it is the same thing as if the whole had been ful of inspecting the rags in question, before removing them from the premises of the complainer in August, 1833; and did upon that occasion inspect them for a period, which, though short, is proved to have been sufficient to enable him to judge of their quality; it being instructed that their quality was uniform in all the different heaps and packages, and the defects which he now alleges being in no respect latent, but palpable and apparent: Finds, 2do, and separatim, That the valuation, or nominal price, at which the said rags were then bought, or taken in barter, by the said William Glenny, being seven shillings per hundred weight, is admitted and set forth by himself, to have been a higher price than he would have consented or offered to pay in cash; and that the said rags, having been afterwards disposed of by public judicial sale at Newcastle, did, at such sale, under the discredit of having been rejected as unmarketable, and after being deteriorated by nearly three years' keeping, realize a price of not less than five shillings and sixpence per hundred weight, and must therefore be held to have been originally worth the money which the said

No. 8

June 30,
Ferguson
Glenny.

Now, as the goods certainly were not better at the last date than at the former, this fact at once convicts of great exaggeration the statements of such of Glenny's witnesses as swear that they were not marketable at any price,—and would not pay the necessary expense of sorting; and of those, who say that, at all events, they would not fetch more than 3s. 6d. or 4s. at most, in the market. But when it is considered, that Glenny has admitted that he would not have paid so much as 7s. in cash, and that he made that the nominal price, only because it was to be mostly liquidated in paper, of which he wished to get rid, and the balance to be taken in satisfaction of a doubtful debt, it may safely be held that the money price at which he actually purchased, was not more than from 6s. to 6s. 6d.; when the goods, though not sold till after they had mouldered in Dawson's stores for two years and a half, with the discredit of having been rejected as unmarketable; and though sold all at one time, by public auction, as a condemned cargo, yet realized an average price of 5s. 6d. Now, making but a moderate allowance for the effect of these unfavourable circumstances in depressing the price, it does appear to the Lord Ordinary that they warrant the inference that they must have been fairly worth 6s. 6d., or even 7s., when they were first sold by the complainer. It is in evidence that rags of this kind suffer by keeping; especially if they have ever been wet, and that there were mildews, and marks of damp upon those in question. Nay, it appeared, when they came at last to be sold in 1836, that no less than eight hundred weight had actually crumbled into dust, and totally disappeared during this period; from which it is impossible not to infer that the quality of what still held together must have been seriously impaired. It appears, therefore, to be sufficiently proved, that the goods were really worth the price which Glenny had agreed to pay for them. But even if it should be thought that there is not precise and direct evidence of this fact, it is to be recollected that the complainer is under no obligation to prove any such thing; that the burden of proving marked and clear insufficiency, is altogether on the purchaser; and that it is quite enough for the defence of the seller, if he is able to show, that the evidence referred to, if it does not fully establish the reverse of the purchaser's allegation, is at least palpably insufficient to prove its truth.

“There was a separate defence on the ground of undue delay, in giving notice of the alleged insufficiency; and the Lord Ordinary inclined to think that this was pretty well made out. But as it rather appeared that no plea to this effect was properly set forth on the Record; and as the case seemed sufficiently clear without it, he thought it better not to state it among the grounds of his decision.”

whether a further investigation should be allowed thereon

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have doubts as to the interlocutor should be gone into as to the sale in Newcastle, we no doubt the competency of this. The judgment on the merits is Sheriff's interlocutor, and the case we have before us is whether decided right on the proof which was led. I think there would be in point of form in allowing such an investigation, for which application have been made in initio litis.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I agree ; but looking to the justice of some difficulty. The weight of the evidence tends to prove that of inferior quality, and that Glenny had no opportunity of examination depends on the value of the goods at the time of the sale by F precluded by form, I think it would be right to allow an investigation in Newcastle, but I have doubts as to that.

LORD MEDWYN.—Had this party expected that a sale of the benefited him in his proof, he would have applied for it earlier. the case without reference to this matter.

LORD GLENLEE concurred.

On the merits of the proof THE COURT held that the Sheriff well founded, and accordingly altered the interlocutor of nary, and remitted simpliciter to the Sheriff.

L. M. McALE, W.S.—M. and J. LOCHAN, S.S.C.—Agents

whereon the Sheriff granted warrant for intimation by notice in the Gazette, and by transmission of letters to each of the individual creditors named in the petition. These notices having been given, it was objected by the creditors, that a creditor named Goode was resident furth of Scotland, and that decret could not be obtained without calling him, but that the Sheriff had no jurisdiction over such party, the Court of Session being the only forum for foreigners. To this it was answered that it was competent to cite Goode as a party in the Sheriff Court by a supplementary cessio to be conjoined with the present; it being evidently the intention of the recent statute to make it competent for debtors to proceed either before the Court of Session or before inferior courts, without distinction whether any of the creditors happened to be furth of Scotland or not.

The Sheriff sustained the objection and dismissed the petition with expenses.

Fraser then presented a reclaiming note to this Court, in terms of sect. 8th of the Act, praying to have it found that the application to the Sheriff was competent, and to remit to him to recal his interlocutor, and sist process until any creditor residing in England should be called by a supplementary petition and intimation. It appeared that Goode's name had not been included in the list of creditors in the original petition; but it was contended that this omission might be supplied by a supplementary petition, as was the practice in the Court of Session, when a creditor had not been named in the original summons.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Were it necessary at present to decide whether the interlocutor of the Sheriff is well founded as regards his power to entertain an application under this statute, where there is a foreign creditor, I should have some hesitation in affirming the judgment, finding the application incompetent. Were it to be determined that in all cases where there are foreign creditors, the applications must be to this Court, I am afraid that the object of the Legislature would be in a great measure defeated. However, it is not necessary at present to decide this question, because, by section 3d of the statute, the applicant is required to insert in his petition to the Sheriff “a list of all his creditors, specifying their names and designations, and places of residence, so far as known to him.” But the present pursuer did not comply with this condition, for it appears that the name of Goode, one of his creditors, was not inserted in the petition; and I apprehend that the original petition, being in this respect defective, cannot be sustained, and that the defect cannot be remedied by a supplementary petition, but only by a petition de novo, containing a list of every creditor, in terms of the enactment now referred to.

The other Judges having concurred,

THE COURT, in respect that all the creditors were not named in the original petition, adhered to the Sheriff's interlocutor.

before the jury, intended to support the alleged ground of reduction for the pursuer, and a bill of exceptions was taken, in respect of which the Lord President observed, in answer to a question from the jury, "did direct the jury, in point of law, that if they believed the witness to be a suspicious witness to the execution of the deed, they were not to find a verdict for the pursuer."—Held, 1st, That the Court of the direction, precisely as stated in the bill of exceptions, was correct; and, 2d, That it was the duty of the jury to find a verdict for the pursuer, if they believed the witness A, even though they disbelieved the evidence in the case; and, 3d, That this direction was not wrong in Scotland, it being a general rule that a pursuer cannot prove his case against a witness, and there being nothing in the nature of this action to that general rule. Observed, that, where an exception is taken to a portion of a charge, it is important that every other part of the charge (excepted against) should be given in the bill of exceptions, so as to bring before the Court the true import of the portion excepted against. The bill of exceptions was actually given to the jury.

July 6, 1837. WILLIAM CLELAND, residing in Bathgate, raised a bill of reduction of a deed of settlement and codicil executed by the late William Cleland, in favour of Mrs Jane Paterson or Cleland, and of the grounds of reduction was, that the instrumentary was not signed by the deceased adhibit his subscription, or hear him acknowledge it. The defenders pleaded that the deed was regularly executed. The following issue went to trial:—

"It being admitted that the pursuer is heir-at-law to William Cleland of Knownoble, and that the said William Cleland died on the 10th day of September, 1834:

"Whether the disposition and deed of settlement, dated 10th December, 1832, and codicil thereto an August 1834 sought to be reduced, are not valid."

land, without having seen him subscribe, or without having heard him No. 3 acknowledge his subscription, he was liable to be punished; and it was July 6, 1 explained to the witness that he was at liberty to decline giving evi- Cleland v dence. The witness claimed the protection of the Court, and was Paterson. dismissed. But, on the suggestion of the pursuer's counsel, being called back, at last said he was willing to be examined." * He then deponed, that he and Johnston, the other instrumentary witness, were in the same room with the deceased, and the deed was lying there on a table; that " witness and Johnston signed it; there was no name at the deed when he put his to it; then Johnston signed it; did not see old Cleland sign it, and he never acknowledged his subscription in his presence." * He also deponed he was not above three minutes in the room.

Alexander Johnston, the other instrumentary witness, received the same explanation from the Court as to the statute 1681, c. 5, and declined to be examined. He left the Court, and, after a considerable interval, during which two other witnesses were examined, he was tendered for examination by the pursuer, but the Lord President then refused to receive him.

Other evidence was led, showing, inter alia, that the deed had been framed in Edinburgh, not under the immediate instructions of Cleland, but of an intervening party, named Paterson, who was present along with Cleland when the instrumentary witnesses signed.

In charging the jury, the Lord President " did direct them, in point of law, that if they believed the witness, Robert Muirhead, in point of fact, though a suspicious witness to the execution of the said deed mentioned in the said first issue, they ought to find a verdict for the pursuer on that issue: Whereupon the counsel for the defenders did except to the foresaid charge, on the ground that, there being no circumstances proved, with respect to the execution of the deed, independent of the testimony of Muirhead, and he being a single and unsupported witness, the Lord President ought to have directed the jury to find a verdict for the defenders on the first issue, instead of having charged the jury, that, if they believed Muirhead's evidence, they might, in point of law, find for the pursuer on the said first issue." *

The jury found for the pursuer, and the defenders presented a bill of exceptions, to the direction above quoted.

They pleaded, that, from the terms of the charge of the Lord President, as set forth in the bill of exceptions, it appeared that the jury had been directed to find for the pursuer, if they believed the single witness Muirhead. That nothing was stated, in the direction, as to the existence of any circumstances corroborating that witness; nor were the jury told that the existence of such corroboration was necessary to warrant they believed Muirhead, his Lordship must have implied that they were to look at the corroborating circumstances, in deciding whether they should believe him. These circumstances had occurred in the course of the trial, such as the hesitation of Muirhead to give evidence after hearing the terms of the statute 1681, c. 5; the refusal of the instrumentary witness, Johnston, to give evidence, &c. In such a situation, the direction to the jury could not be justly held to be a deposition of Muirhead from all the rest of the case, and that still it was enough to warrant a verdict for the pursuer if they believed it.<sup>2</sup> But, separately, in this peculiar case, that one instrumentary witness was enough to cut down a deed, and that the deed supported only by a single witness, and, therefore, was not conclusive.<sup>3</sup>

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am strongly inclined to believe that no such point of law, existed, in the direction which was actually given. I have little doubt that it was then stated, in substance, that there was no evidence besides that of Muirhead, and corroborative of him; that he was a credible witness; but that if the jury thought his testimony duly supported, they were warranted to believe him, and, in these circumstances, to find for the pursuer. Unfortunately the Court can only look at the terms of the bill of indictment, judging of the tenor of the direction excepted against. That direction was expressly stated to have been, that, “if the jury believed the witness Muirhead, in point of fact, though a suspicious witness to the execution of the deed, ought to find a verdict for the prisoner.” Thus the direction simply required the jury to find for the pursuer if they believed Muirhead. It was not for

y thought there was other evidence corroborative of him, and believed his testimony, they might then find for the pursuer, but simply and unqualifiedly, without reliance to any corroboration, that if they believed that witness they ought to find for the pursuer. Under this direction the jury were entitled and bound to find for the pursuer, even though they disregarded all the other evidence in the case, provided only they believed that one witness. That is the import of the direction as given in the bill of exceptions, and I do not think there is any ambiguity or uncertainty in the mode of expressing the direction. But as I consider that to be incorrect, I cannot hold it to be consistent with the law of Scotland. It is a general rule that no pursuer can prove his case by a single witness; and I see nothing in the nature of this action to take it out of that rule. I think, therefore, that the exception should be sustained and a new trial allowed.

MR. GILLIES.—I am of the same opinion. A slight variation in the mode of expressing the direction in the bill of exceptions, would have taken away the whole of the exception. But as the bill stands, I think the exception must be sustained.

MR. COREHOUSE.—I concur. I am strongly inclined, in the circumstances of the case, to think that the direction actually given at the trial was perfectly correct. But the direction as expressed in the bill of exceptions, cannot be supported. The Court are tied down by the words of the bill, which are quite explicit and free of ambiguity. I think the exception should be sustained.

MR. PRESIDENT.—In consequence of the opinions now delivered, the exception must be sustained. Yet it is a case of great hardship for the party, as I fully stated to the jury, in my charge, a variety of circumstances, appearing on the evidence, as corroborative of the testimony of Muirhead. It was in connexion with the observations I had made in pointing out these circumstances, that I told the jury that if they believed Muirhead they ought to find for the pursuer. So far from relying on the isolated evidence of Muirhead as enough of itself to support the case, I pointed out to the jury that he was a witness who stood exposed to unusual suspicion, being called to contradict his own attestation of the signature of the deceased. The defenders, in taking an exception to part of my charge, singled out a particular part of it, and, in consequence of the manner in which the bill has been framed, a different construction is given to that part, from that which it would have received, if the full charge had been given in the bill. I own that such a construction as this ought to make a judge very cautious in subscribing a bill of exceptions against any part of his charge, unless he is satisfied that the bill contains all the other parts of the charge which are necessary for the correct appreciation of the whole charge excepted against, even although, by so doing, it should become necessary to except the whole charge together.

THE COURT sustained the exception and allowed a new trial.

J. ROSS, S.S.C.—WOTHERSPOON and MACK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 313.

July 6, 1837.

Cleland v Paterson.

and 30, where the complement of the council was twenty-died ; and ten were absent ; and the provost, who had a deliberative vote, concurred with the ten members present, casting vote was given as well as his deliberative vote, W vote, which would have formed an actual majority, even if had been present, and dissented, could be rendered less eff of their being merely absent.

July 6, 1837.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Cuning-
hame.
Bill Chamber.
B.

It is enacted by the statute for amending the el and councils of royal burghs, 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 76 vacancy shall in the course of the year occur in the c or office-bearers of any such burgh, by death, disat the same shall be filled up, ad interim, by the remai council, by election, as herein-before provided, at a on five days' notice by the town-clerk, by intimation such remaining members of council ; but any cour office-bearer, so elected, ad interim, shall go out Tuesday of November next ensuing his election, and occurring shall be supplied at the next annual electi

It is provided by the preceding section (§ 24), in tion of magistrates or office-bearers by the council " to be made by plurality of voices, and the chief magistrate, to have a double or casting voice in case

The Magistrates and Council of Inverness were a posed of twenty-one members. In April, 1837, one Ronald Stalker died. A meeting was called, for Ma by the town-clerk to the remaining twenty members admitted, on payment of the fees, a freeman burgess, under reserva- No. 314.

of the rights of all parties concerned; and that he then declared his tance of the office of councillor, “and qualified himself to his Majesty July 6, 1837.
king the oath of allegiance and abjuration, and subscribing the same Fraser v.
the oath or declaration of assurance; and the oath de fidei having Rose.
also administered to him, he took his seat as a member of the meet-protest was taken against the legality of these proceedings, on the of the ten absent members, and also of some of the registered electors burgh; and a bill of suspension and interdict, on caution, was pred in their name, against Rose, and the ten members of council who lected him, which prayed the Court to prohibit Rose “from acting at all taking upon him the character of councillor, or member of the Council of Inverness,” and the other parties from recognising him ch; and concluded that “the whole of the said parties ought and should prohibited and interdicted from taking any steps or measures, or doing thing, directly or indirectly, whereby the Magistrates and Council of rness, at a proper and lawful corporate meeting, duly convened for purpose, may be in anywise disturbed, impeded, or interfered with e filling up of the vacancy which has occurred in the Council, as is, and that in the way and manner pointed out by the statute; and er, and in the meanwhile, from doing any act or deed connected the management or administration of the public, political, or corpo-affairs of the burgh, except upon the footing that the Magistracy and cil, in consequence of the vacancy that has occurred in their num-consist at present of only twenty lawful members, and that the said ncy remains still to be supplied, in terms of the statute, before the nd legal number of the said Magistracy and Council can or ought to ld to be duly completed, as accords of law.”

support of this application the suspenders pleaded that the election member, to fill a vacancy, either in the Council or Magistracy, was t of the corporate body, and could not validly be performed except a quorum of the corporation was present;<sup>1</sup> that, as the corporation sted of twenty-one members, it was necessary, both by the public and by the usage of the burgh of Inverness, that at least eleven bers, being a majority of the whole, should be present in order to a quorum; and as only ten were present on the day of election, the E election was null and void. The suspenders pleaded separately, the statutory meeting for filling up a vacancy should have been con-exclusively to that proceeding alone, and the admission of Rose to

---

<sup>1</sup>Ed., June 17, 1824; (ante, III. 150; or new ed. 102); Mason, July 29, (1871); MacNab, Dec. 24, 1803 (Dict. voce, Appeal; Appx. No. 2.); John, May 28, 1805 (Dict. voce Burgh Royal, Appx. No. 17).

to fill up a vacancy till the next election, was not the presence of a majority of the whole Council providing that due notice should be given, bestowed upon "the remaining members of the Council;" and these were duly called, the majority present possessed. It was necessary to make this provision, because the burgh affairs imperatively required that the vacancy and this might be wholly frustrated unless the statute contended for by the respondents. And besides, the members had attended and voted against the election of the ten members present, with the casting vote, would have carried the election; so that Rose was a constituency which would have composed a majority of twenty members had been present. Besides this, the voting acted by a preconcerted scheme, for the purpose of the burgh, were barred by personal exception from making pleas; and the registered electors had no title to the election which was bestowed by the statute on the Council alone. In regard to the admission of Rose as a councillor, previous special notice, this was quite consistent with the statute and that admission sufficiently satisfied the provision of the statute in question, which only required this to take place as a councillor. And separately, as the election of Rose into the office of councillor was completed or no longer competent to obtain redress by suspension of the election.<sup>1</sup> suspenders reclaimed.

vising the note, it was arranged that the interdict should be July 6, 1837 but the bill passed to try the question, and an interlocutor to Fraser v.
it was accordingly pronounced. Rose.

W. MACKENZIE, W.S.—D. GRANT, W.S.—Agents.

his opinion on the merits, at present, is in favour of the validity of Mr mination.

plea of the suspenders is one of strict law, viz., that the vacancy occa-Bailie Stalker's decease, was vested in the Town-Council,—that it required a majority or legal quorum of the Council, to make a valid elec-that no quorum was assembled at Rose's election. But, 1st, It is very of the nomination or election, on occasion of the vacancy arising in the y Stalker's death, was vested in the Council as a corporate body. This urns entirely on the 25th section of the Burgh Reform Act, which exacts that the vacancy 'shall be filled up, ad interim, by the remaining of the Council;' to each of whom a special intimation of a meeting to be the purpose (not by the Council, but) by the town-clerk, is to be sent.
ers of Council are thus individually made quasi electors, in room of the the wards;—and the election by such councillors as choose or find it to attend, without reference to quorum, seems to be as valid as an y a small and inconsiderable number of the constituency is valid on sions. In short, this is a power given in particular terms, to a certain dividuals, and not to the corporation. And there are strong reasons for uction in many different cases of vacancy that may arise in Town-erves notice also, that the clauses as to filling up the place of vacant s,—and that of vacant Magistrates (see sect. ), are very differently

The power is given in the one case to 'the remaining members of in the other to the Council. Hence, the former is a personal right, by those who attend,—while the latter is a corporate act, and requires even if the election of vacant Councillorships, under the late Act, were a act (as the supplying of such vacancies under the old law was),—still, here the want of quorum is created by an illegal concert or combination members,—the election, even by a minority, is sustained. This was in one branch of the Culross case in 1809 or 1810 (the papers in which Ordinary has not had time to seek out and refer to),—and in the later irkcaldy, about twelve or fifteen years ago, where the relevancy was though the case was given up before the proof was concluded. Now, on to absent, is directly alleged here;—and though, of course, that will still the prima facie aspect of the case is not such as to make it reason-oper to give either the absent Councillors, or any founding on their s the summary interposition of the Court by suspension, whereby the ness of the corporation might, for a time, be brought to a stand. A of course, is open to the complainers, if they think they have any case be substantiated after mature discussion and investigation.

being the Lord Ordinary's views, it is unnecessary to say any thing as petency of suspension in the abstract, in such a case as the present. ly remark, that though he does not conceive suspension to be altogether it even in cases of election said to be completed, the Court will not e disposed to interfere in this form, except in cases where any election e complained of is not plainly null and void, i. e. on some ground either anifest on its statement, or capable almost of instant verification. The e is obviously not of that description."

Marshall.

Curator Bonis—Lease.—Circumstances in which the
to the curator bonis of a fatuous person, to grant a lease of 19 years.

July 6, 1837.

1st Division.
D.

HENRY MORELAND BALL, curator bonis to Jo Kersiebank, who was fatuous, presented a petition rent lease of the farm of Kersiebank, part of the est expire at Martinmas, 1837; and that it could be let per cent, upon a 19 years' lease, but could not be under rent, for a shorter term of years. He produ man of skill, that it would be greatly for the ben estate, to let the farm under a lease of that duration

In the event of the death of Eiston, the petition were next in succession to the estate.

The petition prayed the Court "to grant warrant curator bonis to the said John James Eiston, to let Kersiebank on a lease in the ordinary terms, and to years from the term of Martinmas next."

THE COURT granted the petition

J. MEIKLE.—Agent.

No. 317.

— TAYLOR. Pursuer.—Whioha

ARTHUR GIFFORD and MANDATARY, Pursuers.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford— No. 318.

G. G. Bell.

ARTHUR GIFFORD of Busta, Defender.—D. F. Hope.

July 6, 1837.
Gifford v.
Gifford.

expenses.—The question of expenses in this case (reported ante, p. M'Dougall.
, having been reserved, the pursuer now moved for expenses.

July 6, 1837.

MR GLENLEE.—I think the party succeeding in the reduction must be enti- 2<sup>D</sup> DIVISION. to expenses, unless there should be a number of special reasons showing it to been very doubtful in the course of the proceedings which party was right and was wrong. The interest which the unsuccessful party may have had in ding is nothing. This defender was temere litigans, and that is enough.
The other Judges concurring,

THE COURT found the pursuer entitled to expenses.

T. RANKEN, S.S.C.—J. and W. NAPIER, W.S.—Agents.

ALLAN M'DOUGALL, Petitioner.—Patton.

No. 319.

actor Loco Tutoris—Minor.—Circumstances in which the Court granted entry to a factor loco tutoris to complete the pupil's title as heir to an entailed , and to certain superiorities, in which the pupil's interest required him to be in condition to give immediate entry to the vassals.

ALLAN M'DOUGALL, W.S., factor loco tutoris to Donald Patrick July 7, 1837.
Campbell, presented a petition stating that the pupil was heir to the en- 1ST DIVISION.
tailed estate of Ballevolian; to the superiority of the lands of Arrois and N. lands, in which the vassal was demanding an entry, under pain of a forfeiture of tinsel; and also to the superiority of the lands of Shenegart lands, which were in non-entry, and from which a year's rent was payable, so soon as the pupil was in condition to give an entry. He asked the Court "to authorise him, as factor loco tutoris for Donald Patrick Campbell, to complete his pupil's title to the entailed estate of Ballevolian, and to the said superiorities, to enter and receive vassals in the said sundry lands holden of the pupil, the said Donald Patrick Campbell or his predecessors, as superiors; and to grant charters, precepts of constat, and all other writs and deeds necessary for that purpose, on payment of the feu-duties, and usual casualties of superiority."

THE COURT granted the petition.

BAXTER and M'DOUGALL, W.S.—Agents.

rather; and that there was nothing in the structure or the ordinary rules of construction, on this point, from applyi

July 7, 1837.

1st Division.
Ld. Fullerton.
D.

THE late John Cundell, brewer in Leith, and his v Legrand or Cundell, jointly executed a disposition 1794, by which they disponed the heritage, then be them respectively, to their only son, Edward Cundell was granted "with and under the conditions, bur power, and faculty underwritten." Besides the herit by the disponers, which was specially described, the to Edward Cundell the whole heritage, and the whol which might be belonging to either of them at the dell's death, and it appointed him executor of both sp always and declaring, as it is hereby expressly prov that these presents are granted, and shall be acce Edward Cundell, with the burden of the payment that we may be resting and owing at the time of our ally with the burden of paying the following provis Dorothea Legrand, and our younger children after the said Dorothea Legrand, a free annuity of £100 two terms in the year," &c., and commencing after Cundell. This annuity was declared "to be a real able debt upon and affecting the subjects before burden shall be inserted in the infeftment to follow he these presents are granted under the burden of payi garet, Jean, Agnes, and Dorothea Cundell, children be divided among the survivors equally, including our said son, No. 320.

Cundell." It was declared that, during the lifetime of Mrs or Legrand, "each of the patrimonies aforesaid, payable to the younger children, shall be burdened with the payment to her of the £15 sterling yearly, to go and be applied in part of the annuity mentioned provided to her, the said Edward Cundell being entit-his mother's death, notwithstanding what is herein before writ-retain such a part of the principal sum of their patrimonies afore-at the legal interest, will be sufficient for answering and paying £15 for each of the said younger children to their mother yearly, mentioned, the remainder of said annuity being to fall a burden be paid by the said Edward Cundell himself, as before provided." provisions were declared to be in full of all legitim, &c. to the
The deed contained this clause, "reserving always to me, the in Cundell, not only my liferent right of the whole lands and heritable and moveable, above disposed, but also full power and at any time of my life, or even on deathbed, to cancel, alter, and revoke the present deed, in whole or in part, so far as my children, and to sell, gift, or convey my lands and esheritable and moveable, above written, either gratuitously or for causes, and to contract debts, and burden and affect the same ch donations, legacies, and provisions, as I shall think proper; general, to do every other act and deed, in relation to the free limited disposal of my said lands and estate, real and personal, in e manner as if these presents had never been granted." The power of alteration and reservation was reserved by Mrs Legrand Cundell in reference to the estate disposed by her. The deed conan appointment of tutors and curators to the children.

804, another disposition and settlement was executed by John l, in which he augmented the annuity to Mrs Cundell to £150 um, and the provision to each of his younger children, now five er, "to the sum of £1500 to each, to be payable at the first term tsunday or Martinmas that shall happen after they severally arrive rity, the same being subsequent to my death, or if previously, one er that event, with interest from the first term of Whitsunday or mas immediately after my death." A declaration was added, as settlement of 1794, that, in the event of any child dying before e or majority, the share of such child should be divided among er children, including the son. It was also declared that the adpatrimony of each child should be burdened with the payment of er sum of £10, in addition to the £15 already mentioned, as part annuity to Mrs Cundell; and Edward Cundell was empowered, as during Mrs Cundell's life, to retain so much of the principal sum additional patrimony of each child as would annually yield £10 of t, as the proportion of Mrs Cundell's annuity effeiring to the addi-

July 7, 1837.
Waugh v.
Cundell.

Jamieson and Oliphant, his cautioners in a bank, in August, 1812, he granted a bond and disposition over another of these heritable subjects, to Sir James Cundell, who died on 18th May, 1812.

In 1813, Edward Cundell, being engaged in peculiar circumstances, executed a trust-disposition in favour of John Waugh, James Ogilvy, and James Oliphant. The deed proceeded on a narrative of the grantor's affairs, and bore to be "for behoof of my true, just, and lawful heirs." The deed contained a clause, declaring "that the said trustees shall not import, be construed, or be taken, by any one creditor to another, or to postpone the diligences of any creditor already done or to be done, or the creditors' preferences among themselves shall not be prejudiced, in the same manner as if these provisions were granted."

The trustees sold and realized the trust-estates of it, they, inter alia, paid off the three mentioned, to Mrs Hay Mudie, Sir Alexander Murray, and Oliphant, the whole sum in the bond of due.

In 1833, Mrs Margaret Cundell or Jamieson, of the late John Cundell, raised a process of money against the trustees of Edward Cundell, for the purpose of accounting for their intromissions. Several questions her's settlements, they were creditors of his, and were entitled to No. 320. benefit of the Act 1661, c. 24. Assuming this to be established, they <sup>July 7, 1837.</sup> maintained various pleas, in order to prove that the payment of these <sup>Waugh v.</sup> creditors of their brother was unwarrantable, until after their <sup>Cundell</sup> claims were satisfied.

trustees pleaded, on many special grounds of homologation, &c., even if the claimants had been creditors, and entitled to the benefit of the statute, they could not, in the circumstances, challenge the payment of the heritable debts. But they maintained, separately, that the trustees were not creditors of their father for their provisions, as no part either the principal or interest was exigible till after his death, and the whole remained revocable by him at any period of his life. The trustees, therefore, were not creditors, but mere legatees of their father, and the statute 1661. c. 24, did not apply to them. They had no ground of preference which entitled them to challenge the payment of the heritable debts.

Lord Ordinary "repelled the objections to the condescendence of the deed in medio, in so far as those objections rest on the payment by the raisers, the trustees, of the heritable debts contracted by Edward Cundell to Mrs Hay Mudie, Sir Alexander Keith, and Messrs Jamieson and Company; quoad ultra, appointed the case to be enrolled, that parties be heard on the disposal of the remaining points in the cause."*

NOTE.—"The objections forming the subject of the discussion which has taken place are founded on the preference supposed to have been held by the trustees, as the creditors of John Cundell, the father, over the creditors of the son, Edward Cundell, the son, and the alleged undue neglect of that preference by the nominal raisers, the trustees of Edward Cundell, in consequence of which it is maintained by the objectors that the nominal raisers have rendered themselves personally liable for the sums paid to the heritable creditors mentioned above interlocutor.

The Lord Ordinary thinks it clear that these objections cannot be sustained.
 In the first place, he has great doubts whether the objectors can be considered as creditors of the father John Cundell, entitled to take the benefit of the Act 1661, From the express terms of the statute, and the nature of the provisions made by the settlements of John Cundell, he rather thinks they cannot be so considered. But 2dly, It is unnecessary to enquire into that point; because, confession being made that no diligence was done by the objectors within the three years, in terms of the statute; and because that defect could not be supplied by the circumstance of Edward Cundell, the son, granting a trust-deed to the raisers, for the payment of Edward Cundell's, creditors, without any reference or distinctive allusion to the debts of his father. 3dly, In so far as the objectors found any thing on their side, they are entitled to reduce any of the securities in question, on the ground that they were granted within a year after the father's death, the present process does not admit of such a discussion, as it is confined to an accounting with the raisers; and as there is no action for reducing those securities, or even calling in court the parties who took benefit from them. 4th, The trust-deed, under which the raisers acted, and to which the objectors, by their own account, acceded, was a trust-deed executed by Edward Cundell, the son, for payment of his own debts, among whom the objectors were classed. Such being the case, it is clear that the trustees, had no title to raise a question in regard to any supposed pre-makes such provisions in favour of his children, that the for example, when he grants a bond to them which may to principal or interest, during his lifetime. But that provisions in this instance. Neither the principal nor the after his death. And in addition to this, the settlement were granted, contained in express terms the most ample power was fully reserved, in so far as the children were regard to the widow. Such provisions do not make the thing else than legacies. And it should also be observed concurred in executing the settlement of 1794, they did form of a mutual contract, but merely granted a joint each of them retaining power of revocation. It might p ent case if the claim of the younger children had been fo is no such claim, as they have renounced their legitim. ther such claim could obtain the benefit of the statute, as sence, the creditor of his parent for legitim. But it is u as the claimants have renounced their legitim.

I am therefore of opinion that according to well-establish of settlements, the claimants were not creditors of their f and not being creditors, they are not entitled to the ben Lord Ordinary has not expressly decided this point, but his note, to be his opinion, and he has also stated other ference held by any parties representing themselves as c the father, and it is not even averred upon the record apprised the trustees of any claim of preference in that cl they considered themselves entitled to it. Lastly. It is not ment, many of which might be quite satisfactory if it were necessary to resort to them. It is, however, unnecessary to go into these questions, as I should prefer to leave the judgment of the Court upon the single ground that the claimants are the editors of their father, as that ground is insufficient of itself, and does not require the aid of any other. No. 320

---

July 7, 1831
Waugh v. Cundell.

MR. MACKENZIE.—I concur; and I think it a decisive circumstance in the question whether these children were creditors, that the provisions were revocable at any time at their father's pleasure. He could not be constituted the debtor of the children by such provisions. The mere circumstance that the term of payment in the provisions was after the father's death, though extremely important, might have been in itself decisive that there was not a debt reared up against the children. Had the obligation of the father been of an indefeasible nature, it might have been a very different question; but as it is, there is no difficulty. In regard to the other grounds of the Lord Ordinary's judgment, some are sufficient I think to support it, but there are others as to which my opinion would not be so clear without farther discussion. There is one strong ground in support of the judgment, no reduction of these heritable securities has ever been attempted, and that the children are not even parties in this process. It is quite impossible to sue the trustees personally in an action like this, which I suppose is just a claim for damages against them; at least I do not see how else it can be described. Without going into any other ground except that of the children not being creditors of their father, there is enough to warrant us in adhering.

THE LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion. And as the various reasons which the Lord Ordinary has assigned in support of his judgment, are merely given in evidence, and are not embodied in the interlocutor itself, I think it unnecessary to state them individually. The claimants were not creditors but mere legatees of the father, so that the statute does not apply to them; and that is sufficient to warrant us to adhere. Our interlocutor, I apprehend, should specially set forth this as the ground of our judgment.

THE LORD GILLIES declined himself on account of relationship to one of the children in the heritable securities.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the reclaimers, the daughters of the late John Cundell, are only legatees, not creditors, of their deceased father; and, with this finding, adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and refuse this note: Find the reclaimers liable in expenses since the date of the judgment reclaimed against, and reserve the question of expenses incurred prior thereto, for the determination of the Lord Ordinary."

J. and W. DYMCK, W.S.—W. MACKENZIE, W.S.—Agents.

facts of the case, the apprentice had already found caution his contract of indenture, by means of the cautioner who was now a party in the suspension.

July 7, 1837.

1st Division.
Lord Cuning-
hame.
Bill Chamber.
D.

In 1834, John Munro, Jun., entered into an indenture for a term of years, to John Clark, cabinetmaker, father, John Munro, senior, became bound as cautioner for the currency of the indenture, Munro, junior, left who gave a charge on letters of horning, raised indenture, for implement of the contract of indenture 3s. 6d. during each day of Munro junior's absence the term of apprenticeship, besides payment of £20 penalty stipulated in the indenture.

Munro, senior, and Munro, junior, presented a bill of exchange, that, though Clark was bound not only to instruct him in his trade, but also to supply him with bed, board, and clothing, during his apprenticeship, he had entirely failed to fulfil these obligations; that he had been absent from his premises, so frequently, and for so long a time, that Munro, junior, of the benefit of instruction and supervision; that he had struck and kicked Munro, junior, when asked him as to the mode of executing a job, and that, being done in an outrageous and abusive manner, on the day when he quitted him; and that he had not supplied Munro, junior, with adequate sustenance whilst boarding with him. Clark expressly denied this, and stated that Munro, junior, had deserted his service

Clark reclaimed.

No. 321.

LORD GILLIES.—I think the interlocutor should be adhered to. The two parties are directly at variance, as to the facts of the case, and the apprentice has already found caution already, as he has a cautioner in his indenture, who is here going with him. July 7, 1837.
Russell v.
Rae.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I am of the same opinion. The apprentice has found caution to his master for the fulfilment of all his obligations as apprentice; but the master, of course, has found no corresponding caution to the apprentice. I think the bill ought to be passed as it is.

The other Judges concurred, and THE COURT thereon adhered.

ROY and WOOD, W.S.—A. DUFF, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN RUSSELL, Suspender.—M'Neill—W. Bell.

No. 322.

JAMES RAE, Charger.—D. F. Hope—Patterson.

Process—Suspension—Communis Error.—A bill of suspension was presented containing no formal conclusion for suspension of the charge, but merely a prayer for letters of suspension in common form; the bill though objected to as incompetent, was passed, and letters expedite which contained a regular conclusion to have the charge suspended; the competency of the letters, as disconform to their warrant, was objected to; it having appeared that in practice a considerable discrepancy in the style of bills of suspension prevailed;—The objection repelled, in respect of the discrepancy in the practice; but observed, that in correct style a bill should contain a distinct conclusion, drawn from the narrative and grounds of suspension, stating that the decree and charge, &c., should be suspended, which should be preceded by a prayer for letters of suspension.

RUSSELL presented a bill of suspension of a charge by Rae for payment of the price of certain heritable property. No caution was offered, and Lord Ordinary (Medwyn) refused the bill. Thereupon a second bill was presented. After stating the reasons in respect of which the suspender submitted that the charge was wrongful, so as to warrant an application for letters of suspension, the bill contained the following prayer: "Therefore, the complainer beseeches your Lordships for letters of suspension in the premises, without caution or consignment, in common form; or otherwise upon caution.—According to justice, &c." July 7, 1837.
2D DIVISION.
Ld. Moncreiff.
T.

---

There may at first appear some ground for the charger's complaint, where he alleges on the danger of making all questions between the masters and apprentices to depend on suits in the Supreme Court, by passing such Bills of Suspension as the Court may think fit. But the answer is obvious; the charger forced the suspender into Court, by giving him a charge, which can only be suspended at present by the Supreme Court. If the apprentice had really been guilty of desertion, the master might have applied to the Justices or Judge Ordinary to get him to return, and he might have sued the complainers for damages before the Sheriff. He has himself only to be sorry for being now involved in a litigation in this Court."

without caution or consignation."

A record was made up on the merits, embracing of the formality of the bill and expedite letters. (C) pleaded—

No process, in respect (1.) the bill contained no mention of the diligence. (2.) There is no warrant for suspension of the diligence, which has been inserted in the bill.

The suspender on the other hand pleaded—

The charger's plea of no process is not maintained. He did not reclaim against the Lord Ordinary's interdict and by implication, repelling the objection to the bill of suspension. (2.) That on its merits the bill succeeds in obtaining that bills of suspension, with a prayer in the bill for suspension, are in accordance with daily practice. And (3.) that a warrant for letters of suspension, is a sufficient warrant for introducing into the expedite bill the conclusion contained in the present letters, which is the normal conclusion of all letters of suspension.

The Lord Ordinary (Moncreiff), before closing the case, heard parties on the objection to the competency of the bill, the objection raised in the charger's first plea in law, and the Lord Ordinary of the Second Division," ordered short case to be called.

Argued for the Charger—

1. The bill, to be regular and formal, ought to contain a prayer for suspension of the charge and a prayer for letters of suspension.

assed bill. The expeding of the letters is nothing more than the act of engrossing the bill, the will being substituted instead of the prayer of the bill.<sup>1</sup> The present letters therefore are incompetent, being disconform to their warrant.

No. 322.
—
July 7, 1837.
Russell v.
Rae.

Argued for the Suspender—

1. Looking to the nature and object of a bill of suspension, it ought not to contain a conclusion for suspending the charge, however appropriate such conclusion may be in the expedite letters. A bill is a pleading in which the suspender shows cause why a warrant for expeding letters of suspension should be granted; its object being merely to stay execution in the mean time, and to obtain the requisite warrant for letters suspending the diligence until the charge is produced and the matter dismissed;<sup>2</sup> and this is illustrated by the style of the will of letters of suspension. In the juridical styles the formal conclusions in the bill and in the letters are not counterparts of each other, the clause in the bill being mere subsumption amounting in effect to no more than an expression of the suspender's own opinion of his case.

2. The objection to the letters as disconform to their warrant is incompetent, the bill of suspension being now out of Court. Besides it cannot be pleaded by way of exception, not being discoverable ex facie of the letters, and incapable of being instructed even by recovering their warrant, since the question of law would still remain whether these letters being undoubtedly "in common form" were or were not warranted by the fiat.

3. In regard to practice, the books of styles are not absolutely conclusive, although the older formalists support the suspender's view;<sup>3</sup> while the usage of the profession, although not uniform, also tends to support the same view.<sup>4</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> Jurid. Styles, 979, 993, 301, and 302; Erskine, IV. 3, 18, and 21; 1 Ross, 380; Mackenzie's Instit. IV. 3; Note in Brownlee, supra.

<sup>2</sup> Stair, supra; Hope's Min. Pract. by Spottiswoode, p. 76.

<sup>3</sup> Dallas, Part IV. p. 70, 117, 121 (quarto ed.); 6 Bell's Forms of Deeds, 324,

<sup>4</sup> In the appendix to the suspender's case a table was given showing the result of search made by his agents of the warrants of signet letters filed at the signet office. The course followed was thus stated: "Instead of pursuing the search through any one entire year, it was thought better to take at random all the passed bills for one month, in several successive years. Thus the month of January 1812 has been taken, because that is the year on which the signet office record of passed bills of suspension and advocacy, apart from other passed bills, commences. Then the same month in the years 1815, 1820, 1824, 1826, 1828, and 1830; and more recently the two months of June and January have been taken, and the examination continued till the month of June 1836. The annexed return, showing the result, sufficiently explains itself, and all the suspender has to state is, that the bills and years have been taken merely at random, and that in the months and years so taken, every bill of suspension presented and filed is included. Moreover, the names of the practitioners who have sanctioned the supposed irregularity are given, and the suspender appeals with confidence to this list of names as more than sufficient to counterpoise the authority even of the Juridical Society." The general repelled the objection to the competency of the letters of suspension, but found no expenses due, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly.

No. 322

July 7, 1837
Munnoch.

CAMPBELL and MACDOWALL, S.S.C.—J. CULLEN, W.S.—Agents.

ARCHIBALD MUNNOCH, Petitioner.—Marshall.

No. 323

—A party while in an infirm state of health having been served tutor-at-law to an infant nephew, and having two years afterwards applied by petition to be relieved of his office, on the ground of his health having become still more infirm, and other relatives of the pupil making no opposition, the Court allowed the petition, and appointed a factor loco tutoris.

ARCHIBALD MUNNOCH presented a petition setting forth that in 1835 July 7, 1837 as nearest male agnate, been served tutor-at-law to the infant 2<sup>D</sup> DIVISION a brother deceased, which office he had undertaken at the solicitation of the infant's other relatives, although the state of his health was such as to confine him constantly to his house, and prevent him taking any part in the management of business; that the estate of the pupil consisted of soap-works and other premises, a farm, cash and outstanding debts amounting in all to about £12,000; that he had endeavoured to manage the estate by naming a maternal uncle of the pupil to be factor loco tutoris, but that his former debility had now become more aggravated, and he was unable to continue to perform in any way the duties of his office, that in these circumstances, there being a reasonable cause for his resignation, it was in the power of the Court to relieve him of his office, and to provide otherwise for the management of the pupil's estate.<sup>1</sup> He prayed the Court to sustain his renunciation of the office of tutor-at-law, or at all events to declare the said office at an end, and to remit the expenses to be examined.

An application was presented unico contextu with this petition for the appointment of a certain party as factor loco tutoris.

The petition having been intimated to the relatives of the pupil, the party proposed by the mother's side appeared by counsel at the bar, and consented to the prayer of the petition of the tutor, and to the appointment of the party proposed as factor loco tutoris.

THE COURT, looking to the state of the petitioner's health, granted the prayer of the petition, and appointed a factor loco tutoris in terms of the application thereanent.

J. F. WILKIE, S.S.C.—Agent.

---

<sup>1</sup> Stair, I. 6, 24; Erskine, I. 7, 29.

1st Division.
Ld. Fullerton.
D.

of Session against William Ewing, residing at South payment of a set of law-accounts, incurred in num which he had acted as the law-agent of Ewing. Th mons was 7th November, 1836. Ewing concurred w lodging a joint minute, agreeing to hold the sum due be £2481, with £479 of interest, and the Lord Ordin cree for that amount in favour of Wotherspoon on The accounts had never been submitted to the audi extracted the decree, and raised a process of adjudica tage belonging to Ewing. In this process, the Lord 23, 1837, pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respec this is the first process of adjudication brought against subjects libelled, appoints intimation thereof to be m Book, and on the walls of the Parliament House, to s tors of the defender, for the purposes and in the form statutes thereanent."

On June 12th, a reclaiming note against this interlo by defences, was presented by Andrew Bell of Bla Ewing was a bankrupt at the date of lodging the at that he was now pursuing a cessio in the Sheriff-Cour which process the defender had been appointed trustee by interlocutors of May 17 and 29, 1837; that Ew concert with Wotherspoon, and to the prejudice of t creditors; and that the decree taken by Wotherspo ledged balance of accounts, was irregular, and in the words of Act of Sederunt Edinburgh 6 1806 which

The defender then pleaded, that, as this was a first adjudication, there as no ground for dispensing with any of the ordinary forms, before pronouncing decree, as there was no hazard thereby occasioned to the pursuer of being postponed in a race of diligence. No decree of adjudication could therefore be pronounced hoc statu; but the defences should be received and a record made up in common form, before pronouncing any decree. And this course should the more readily be adopted, as there existed an objection to the decree of 17th February, 1837, which was constantly verified, the fact being admitted, that decree was taken without obtaining a report from the auditor.

The pursuer answered, that, as he only asked a decree of adjudication, reserving all objections contra executionem, the defender would not be thereby prejudiced, as it was open for him afterwards to point out an objection, if any existed, against the decree of 17th February, 1837. And as the defender was avowedly acting for a body of creditors, adverse to the pursuer, there was that species of competition which justified the court in granting such decree of adjudication. In regard to the objection stated against the decree of 17th February, 1837, it would be shown, when the proper stage for discussing it arrived, that the Act of Sederunt did not affect the validity of that decree.

The Lord Ordinary, on June 20th, “allowed the defences for the defender, Andrew Bell, to be received by the clerk as of this date; quoad ~~the~~, refused the prayer of the reclaiming note; found the said reclainer liable to the pursuer in the expenses incurred by him in relation to the note in the Inner House, and before the Lord Ordinary; modified ~~same~~ as interim expenses to four guineas; and decerned for payment thereof accordingly to the pursuer against the said Andrew Bell; and ~~ordered~~ this decret to be extracted ad interim, and decerned.”

On June 28th the pursuer produced another libelled and signeted summons of adjudication against Ewing, which he craved might be conjoined with the first, and, in respect of the intimation made, that decree of adjudication should be pronounced in the conjoined process. The Lord Ordinary “conjoined the other summons of adjudication at the pursuer’s instance above-mentioned with the present process, and added, declared, and decerned against the defender, conform to the conditions of the libel in both actions, reserving all objections contra executionem, and allowed the decret to go out and be extracted ad interim; ordered the petitioner, Andrew Bell, to give in a condescendence of grounds of his defence by the second box-day in the vacation, and the pursuer to answer the same by the third sederunt-day in November ~~next~~.”

The defender again reclaimed, and prayed the Court to alter, “and to refer to the Lord Ordinary to hear parties upon the defences, or to order them to make up a record.”

No. 324

July 11, 1837

Wotherspoon

v. Bell.

No. 324.

July 11, 1837.
Russell v.
Crichton.

LORD GILLIES.—This is a first adjudication; and, looking at the Act of Sederunt, it rather appears to me at present that the Act of 1711, 1837, was taken in direct contravention of it, and is therefore, inclined to recal the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary Lordship to allow a record to be made up in common for decree.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I think the judgment of the Lord Ordinary altered, and a record made up before pronouncing decree. In my opinion, I am influenced chiefly by the consideration that the Act of 1711, 1837, is only as a matter of indulgence, and under the same considerations, that the Court departs from its ordinary form in making adjudications, and summarily pronounces decree reserving executionem. But in a first adjudication, no necessity for ordinary forms exists. Had this been a second adjudication, I should have held the plea in reference to the Act of Sederunt to satisfy the Court in refusing to grant the usual decree reserving executionem. A first adjudication stands on a totally different footing.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. I see no objection to justify the Court in departing from the ordinary course of decree in this process. A record should first be made up in common.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion; and I may say that it appears to me to be doubtful whether the decree of 1711, 1837, is struck at by the Act of Sederunt.

LORD GILLIES.—I am not prepared to say, that if this had been a second adjudication I should have refused to pronounce decree under the Act of 1711, 1837. But it is unnecessary to go into a case which is not

Their Lordships altered the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary to allow a record to be made up in common for decree of adjudication; and remitted to the Lord Ordinary, reserving all questions of expenses.

W. J. RUSSELL and MACKENZIE, W.S.—A. ROBERTSON, W.S.—

No. 325.

JAMES RUSSELL and MANDATARY, Pursuers. D. F. v. Andrew Crichton, Defender. Sol. Geo. Rutherford

Process—Petition—Proof.—A petition raised an action of damages for an alleged infringement of patent; after a condescendence lodged, he moved for an order of inspection of the defender's

AMES RUSSELL of Bescot-hall, Staffordshire, and his mandatary, Andrew Liddell, ironmonger in Glasgow, raised an action of damages against Andrew Crichton, gas-tube manufacturer in Glasgow, on account of an alleged infringement of a patent held by Russell, for the manufacture, particularly the welding, of gas-tubes. After a condescendence and answers were prepared, the pursuers moved the Court to pronounce an order, allowing persons of skill, and also the pursuer's mandatary, Liddell, to inspect the manufacture of the defender, and to examine his process, for the purpose of giving evidence at the trial. They alleged that such course was followed in similar cases in England,<sup>1</sup> and particularly in the process at the pursuer's instance, in which an order for inspection was pronounced by the Vice-Chancellor, a copy of which was now laid before the Court; and that it was necessary to allow such inspection, in order to prevent the infringement of patents with impunity, which might always be done if the party who committed the infringement were permitted to resist all inspection of his manufacture. In support of the motion, affidavits were produced by scientific persons, stating that, in their judgment and belief, the pipes made by the defender appeared, from inspection of them, to be made by the patent process; and specimens of pipes made by both the pursuer, and defender, were produced, in reference to the affidavits. The defender stated that his process for manufacturing gas-tubes was materially different from the patent process; that it was a secret process, unprotected by any patent, and would entirely lose its value if an inspection of it were permitted; that the application for inspection was at least premature; and that, in any event, such inspection should only take place in the presence of neutral parties named by the Court, and not in presence of the mandatary of the pursuer, who was a gas-tube manufacturer, nor of any person in the pursuer's employment. After minutes of debate had been prepared, and reported to the Court, their Lordships expressed an opinion that some mode of inspection of the defender's work must be allowed, otherwise any patent might be infringed with impunity; that such inspection should be afforded, as to enable inspectors to inform themselves on every thing relevant to the points in dispute; that the law-agent of the pursuer should be permitted to attend, as had been authorised by the Vice-Chancellor's above-mentioned order; and that all those who were admitted to the inspection must be aware of its being their bounden duty to make no farther disclosure afterwards, than was required for doing justice in this process. Their Lordships then pronounced this interlocutor:—"Appoint the defender, An-

No. 325.*
 July 11, 1837
 Russell v.
 Crichton.

1st Division.
 Lord Fullerton.

Decided on June 1st, 1837, but omitted under that date.

Russell v. Cowley and Dickson; Repertory of Arts (Law Reports), vol. II., p. 168; Russell, Nov. 21, 1834; Crompton, Neesom, and Roscoe's Reports, vol. I., p. 64.

this action; it being the object and intention of the said viewers to give such evidence to the Court as the cause, as will enable them to prove the infringement patent, if the facts be so as alleged in the action; the Lords farther appoint the pursuer, Andrew Liddell, inspecting the defender's manufactory, as aforesaid, and to the following viewers, viz., John M'Call, William W. Christie, ironfounder, &c., and accompanied by the defender's solicitor, of his (Liddell) manufacturing pipes, or tubes, for gas or other purposes, and methods of doing the same; for which purpose Liddell, is to put his machinery to work in presence and to afford every facility to them to ascertain the welding tubes, in every respect, as has been allowed in the works of the defender: And the Lords farther appoint the inspections shall take place quam primum, the one or other, at sight of the Sheriff-Depute, or any of his days' previous notice to be given by the pursuer's agent, with power to the viewers to continue or as from day to day, if necessary, till finished."

J. MACANDEW, S.S.C.—FERGUSON and DUNCAN, S.S.

No. 326.

COLIN CAMPBELL, Pursuer.—For

the succeeding autumn at Inverary. The defender now applied to the place of trial changed to Glasgow, where a Judge and counsel would be present and interpreters in attendance at the Jury Sitings, and which would be altogether more convenient. The pursuer contended for the right to name the place of trial, and that the witnesses resided nearer Inverary than Glasgow; and this was a question as to Highland marches, which a Highland jury would best understand, and they would also be more able to follow and appreciate the evidence.

No. 326.
July 11, 1837.
Tait v.
Duncan.

THE COURT granted the defender's application, one of their Lordships stating that Highland jurors were very apt to put different interpretations on evidence given in Gaelic, and to quarrel as to the interpretation of the interpreter.

—Agents.

ALEXANDER DUNCAN TAIT.—D. F. Hope—Robertson. No. 327.
HONOURABLE LADY DUNCAN and SPOUSE.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Miller.
(Competing.)

Trust—Legacy—Vesting.—Terms and provisions of a trust-deed of settlement, which held not sufficient to import a postponement of the vesting and payment of the residue of the trust-estate in unlimited fee-simple, beyond the death of the settlor and the majority of the residuary legatees.

By disposition and deed of settlement dated in March 1820, the late Alexander Duncan, W.S., conveyed to certain trustees, whom failing to his own nearest lawful heirs whomsoever, his whole heritable and moveable property; providing always that they should be “obliged to account and apply their whole intromissions with the trust-subjects hereby mentioned, and the rents, issues, and profits arising from the same, in manner following,” viz. 1st, For payment of the expense of making up titles executing the trust; 2d, for payment of the truster's debts, including a sum of £2000 contained in a bond granted by him to his youngest daughter, Mary Duncan; 3d, For payment of annuities and legacies; which the deed proceeded—“and with regard to the rest, residue, remainder of the said trust-estate, and the value and proceeds thereof not converted into money, including as a part thereof the capital sums not set apart or reserved for answering and paying the several annuities

July 11, 1837.
2D DIVISION.
Lord Jeffrey.
T.

This bond, dated in 1811, contained two clauses of return, 1st, to the heirs of Alexander Duncan; 2d, to the heirs of the granter, which were so expressed as to import no limitation on the right granted.

the annuities aforesaid, in manner following, viz. half thereof to Mary Simson Crawford, my surviving child of the marriage between the said Captain Ford, and the now deceased Anne Duncan, my eldest daughter, and the heirs of the body of the said Mary Simson; and the other just and equal half thereof to Alexander Duncan, only child of the marriage between Captain Ford and the Royal Navy, and the said now deceased Mary Simson, daughter, his wife, and the heirs of the body of the said Alexander Duncan Tait, but under this provision always, as it is provided and declared, that in case the said Mary Simson, my granddaughter, shall happen to decease without leaving issue of her own body, the half of the residue or remainder settled on her shall belong to the said Alexander Duncan, son, and the heirs of his body; and on the other half, without leaving heirs one or more of his body, the half and remainder settled on him shall belong to the said Mary Simson Crawford, my granddaughter, and the heirs of her body, and the said grandchildren, without leaving heirs one or more of their bodies, that then the whole of the said residue and remainder shall belong to my own nearest heirs or assignees exclusive of the legal heirs or representatives of my said daughters either of them; and also exclusive of Henry Twysden, Isobel Duncan or Twysden, my niece, and the heirs of the said trustees are hereby requested and authorised to distribute the said residue and remainder of my trust-estate according ue of this settlement, any thing herein before contained to the No. 327.

 notwithstanding. And in case my said grandchildren, or either shall happen to be in minority at the time of the death of the July 11, 1837.
 ver of myself and my said wife, I hereby appoint my surviving Tait v.
 before named, and the survivors and survivor of them, or the Duncan.
 aforesaid, to be guardians and curators to such minor or minors, ging the estate and subjects to which they may happen to suc-virtue of these presents, until they respectively attain the age of complete."

uncan died in 1821, being survived by Mrs Duncan, his wife, in 1825. Subsequent to this event, Mary Simpson Crawford, ie grandchildren, provided for in the above settlement, attained
 She was married to Sir Henry Duncan, who afterwards died, two children of the marriage. Alexander Duncan Tait, the andchild favoured by the settlement, attained majority in 1834, ll unmarried.

after doubts having arisen as to the rights and interests of these and the duration of the trust, the surviving trustees brought an f declarator and multiplepoinding, calling all parties interested, eluding to have it found and declared either that the trust had ired, or that it was still in force, and must continue to subsist death of both the truster's grandchildren above mentioned; and vent of its being found that the trust had already expired, con-in common form, as in a multiplepoinding. Alexander Dun-and Lady Duncan severally put in defences to the action, the maintaining that the trust had come to a close, and that he was to have paid over to him, in fee-simple, one half of the free resi-the trust-estate; while Lady Duncan, on the other hand, main-hat the trust must continue to subsist until the death of both s, and that the substitution of each to the share of the other, in t of the death of either without issue, was not vacated by the ances of their having both attained majority.

Lord Ordinary, after appointing Cases to be lodged, made avizan-h the cause to the Court, and issued the subjoined note.*

he parties having concurred in expressing their wish for an early deciie Inner House, the Lord Ordinary has reported this case without a judgd cannot say that he has yet come to any mature or confident opinion on sidering it to be a questio voluntatis, his leaning is certainly in favour of an Tait, and that chiefly upon these grounds:—1st, That the leading into the trustees is expressly to pay over the residue to the two grand-after the decease of the widow.' 2d, That the trustees are appointed to the grandchildren, if in minority, at the death of the widow, for the purpose of 'managing the property, to which they may succeed by these until they respectively attain the age of 21 years complete,' plainly im-it, when they attained that age, they were, both and each, to be admitted nary's apprehension, that neither of them could ever reultimate substitution of the truster's nearest heirs, in th without children, being precisely and identically in t mutual substitution to each other, under the clause im legitimate effect, therefore, of this construction would be cendants of the truster, and, beyond all doubt, the per settlement, would, in no event, derive any benefit whate their own persons, but must be dealt with as if they from whom the actual inheritors might spring, or as pe the property was to accumulate, for the advantage of a representative of the testator.

" It will be readily admitted, that, in a questio volunt tion is to be preferred to one which would lead to suc does not appear to the Lord Ordinary (though the dec expressed), that that suggested by Mr D. Tait is liable It is only necessary to hold, that all the provisions ab either of them dying without issue, were meant only for before the succession opened to them by the death of th make all parts of the deed at once consistent with each o is manifestly its leading destination, and conformable to tural and usual disposition of property among such relati that Lady Duncan is thought to be quite wrong, in the read the introductory or qualifying words, 'in manner fi with the conditions on which she relies. These words would represent, to qualify the special disposition and grandchildren, but are merely introductory to the direct generally. The direction, in short, is not as she wou grandchildren, sub modo, or, 'in manner following,' b apply the residue 'in manner following,' viz. to the widow's decease), and, in the event of their dying (it u without issue, then to the truster's nearest heir, &c.
their true connexion, do not in the least affect the c another.

for Alexander Duncan Tait—

No. 327.

the generally advanced period of life of the trustees, as compared with the age of the two defenders, and from there being no provision for carrying on the trust upon the failure of the trustees, its continuance for a tract of time could not have been contemplated.

July 11, 1857.

Tait v.

Duncan.

The presumption of law is in general against entailing or tying up property, and this is more especially applicable to a case where the trustees are directed to pay over the residue of moveable property to persons so named.

The regulating clause of the deed, by which the trustees are directed, after the death of Mrs Duncan, “to pay over the said residue and the income of my trust-estate, and the rents, issues, and profits accruing thereon, or to assign and convey the rights and securities of the same, in and to the persons who shall always to payment of the annuities aforesaid, in manner therein expressed,” viz. one equal half thereof to Lady Duncan, and the heirs of her body, and the other equal half to Alexander Duncan Tait, and his heirs, —is inconsistent with the subsistence of the trust, the payment of the annuities being directed to be made notwithstanding the subsistence of the trust, no deeds being directed to be granted by the trustees, nor investments to be made at their sight, in order to maintain the destination, and the direction being merely that the moveable property shall be equally divided between the two residuary legatees; in contrast, contrasting strongly with the case of Campbell’s Trustees<sup>1</sup> (1836), in which, though there was a direction to pay, yet the sentence directed the trustees also at the same time to entail the

---

prentrix. Even upon the opposite construction, the Lord Ordinary is not satisfied with her Ladyship’s exposition of the law. The alleged clause of the deed is not expressed in the proper form of such clauses; and, in particular, it does not provide that, in the event stated, the property shall revert to the granter thereof, but only that it shall belong to his nearest heirs. Now, Mr Erskine says (3, 8, 45), that this does not import a prohibition to alter, and such seems to be the ground of the decision he refers to; Wauchope, 22d Nov. 1752 (Mor. 4404). It seems also to be settled, that such clauses do not prohibit gratuitous alterations, where the original destination was to heirs alioqui, and not to stranger disponees. See case of Marquis of Clydesdale, 1726 (Mor. 1262), affirmed on appeal. Now the grandchildren of the testator are the heirs at law. In the case of Irving, in 1824, referred to by the Lord Ordinary, the disposition was to a sister not the lawful heir. Those cases, as they are not mentioned in the cases; but for the reasons already stated, the Lord Ordinary thinks all this branch of the argument as well as that of mutual substitution, is excluded by the construction to which he and authorised to settle and secure" the residue of ordingly," cannot control words of direct will and not imply a substitution of the one grandchild to there is no distinction made in the deed betwixt t and the rents and profits, so that if the trust was to of one of the grandchildren without issue as to the of reasoning, subsist as to the liferent also, which is

---

<sup>1</sup> Ante, XIV. 770.

6. The appointment of the trustees as curators fo and subjects to which the grandchildren might suc deed, "until they respectively attain the age of 21" inconsistent with the idea of the continued subsiste that term.

Pleaded for Lady Duncan—

1. Upon a just construction of the several claus viewed in connexion with each other, and especia the provision made for the continuance of the trust testator's heirs-at-law, in the event of the failure by him, the direction to the trustees to settle and funds according to the prescribed order of successio clause by which that direction is so far qualified grandchildren respectively, if they should marry, to in favour of their spouses, out of the funds to whic in virtue of the said settlement; it is clear that it w tion of the testator, that the substitution of each of
of their respective children, to the share of the othe

s, "in manner following," and the subsequent provisions No. 327.
ed to, necessarily import.<sup>1</sup> use of return, providing that, on failure of both the testator's <sup>July 11, 1837.</sup> without leaving heirs of their bodies, the whole of the <sup>Tait v.</sup> <sup>Duncan.</sup>

l belong to his own nearest heirs or assignees whatsoever, their legal heirs and representatives, supports the construc-ended for; as does also the direction with which the clauses n and return are followed up, authorising the trustees to secure the residue of the estate accordingly."

stitutions in question are conceived in such form as to effectual in law; for the present is no absolute or unlimited to either grandchild, but is modified and limited by the stitution and return, which are conditions of the grant.

a case of mutual substitution, and, as such, imports a prost any deed being done in prejudice thereof by either of implying that the grant in favour of the grandchildren re-conditional, and that the substitution must receive full event of one of them dying without issue.<sup>2</sup>

g in view the gratuitous nature of the present deed, the g inserted therein a clause of return, declaring that, in the grandchildren dying without issue, the estate should be-wn nearest heirs, he thereby made it a condition of the grant n should not be defeated in case the event provided for lace.<sup>3</sup>

ove views derive force from the consideration, that the set-be carried into execution through the intervention of hold the subject for the general behoof of the principal sted, according to the respective rights provided to each by he testator, which rights and provisions these trustees are powered and enjoined to secure accordingly.<sup>4</sup> ing the presumption of law to be against substitution in ill, if the intention of the testator be sufficiently expressed, give it effect;<sup>5</sup> and this presumption no longer applies in trust.

; and in the event of its being found that the pursuers are

v. Campbell's Trustees, supra.

8, 44; Williamson v. Littlejohn, 1684 (M. 4331); Moffat, 1724 Iacredie v. M'Fadzeon's Executors, 1754 (M. 4402).

Johnston, 1740, Kilkerran v. Fee Absolute, No. 2; Beatson, 1747 ohnston v. Irving, June 22, 1824 (ante, III. 163; new ed. 110;

. Myles, June 27, 1809 (F.C.); Glendinning v. Walker, Nov. 30, V. 237; new ed. 241; and F.C.); Scougal v. Walker's Trustees, ante, XII. 910), affirmed.

1740, affirmed in 1743, Stewart and Craigie, 343.

the consulted judges returned the following :

LORD PRESIDENT.—We are of opinion, that the trust is to be paid over to Mr Duncan Tait his share of the residue of the principal and profits accruing therefrom, or to assign and convey the same and securities of the same.

We do not see any terms in the trust-deed which imply, or indicate the intention of the truster, that the person of the trustees beyond the lifetime of the widow and grandchildren.

The liferent to the widow is a separate matter, not a question ; but in regard to the grandchildren, it is not a question of theirs, leaving the fee to remain in the persons of the trustees, after the decease of the widow, to pay over, not the principal and profits of the estate, but the residue and remainders, and convey the rights and securities of the same, in equal shares to the grandchildren, without any restriction or limitation whatever, except to each other, if they died without issue ; and the after the death of the truster's own nearest heirs and assignees, exclusive of the trustees, then the trustees are directed to settle and secure the same accordingly.

But, if they had executed any such settlement, it could not have limited the previous destination, which expressly gives the fee of the residue or remainder.

The opposite construction, as is well stated in Lord Brougham's opinion, necessarily have this strange effect, not only that neither of the trustees could receive anything whatever, till the death of one of them

, by the destination, the grandchildren have no broader or better right to the No. 327.
 its and profits of the residue, than they have to the residue itself.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I concur in the Lord President's opinion. I am perfectly July 11, 1837.
 Tait v. Duncan. able, that by a certain forced construction, in order to extricate the settlement an absolute absurdity, it might be held that it was the testator's meaning, to give the rents and profits of the estate to the grandchildren, without inferring that the disposal of the capital fund was to be under the same rule. But I think not only that this construction is altogether arbitrary, but that the more just and legal inference is, that because the rents and profits were so given within the same operation of words which appointed the payment of the capital itself, if the one could not be withheld without running the settlement into absurdity, neither could it be the meaning to withhold the other, appointed to be given by the same words. The mention of rents and profits, as if it were superfluous in this view, presents no difficulty to my mind. It is a very common clause, where it is clearly intended that trustees are to convey the fee or principal at a fixed term. But, besides, there might be rents or profits in the hands of the trustees, to which the liferentrix or executors had no right.

It appears to me, in general, that there is no difficulty in reconciling all the clauses of the deed with the supposition that the trust was not intended to subsist beyond the life of the liferentrix. But, independently of this view, and supposing that a case of proper substitution was created, I still think that the obligation to pay on the death of the liferentrix is absolute, and that no such substitution could control the power of the legatee to dispose of the fund. It might be a good substitution, if the money were left undisposed of; but of no effect to restrain the power of the institute. I rather think, that it was a conditional institution, purity and extinguished by the event. But taking it to be a substitution, I am of opinion, that that would not alter Mr Tait's right to receive payment as appointment or deprive him of the power of disposal of the money.

LORD FULLERTON.—The case is not free from difficulty; as the deed is expressed in terms which it is perhaps impossible to reduce into absolute consistency.
 But, upon the whole, I am disposed to adopt the conclusion arrived at by the Lord President and Lord Moncreiff, that Mr Tait is entitled to the immediate and restricted possession of the half of the residue.

In the first place, I consider the clause appointing the trustees to "pay over the residue," &c., at the death of the liferentrix, to be an express direction to denude, consequently to be inconsistent with the farther continuance of the trust.

Secondly, I think that the nature of the various provisions, contingent on the issue of the testator's grandchildren without issue, as well as the form of expression of those provisions, obviously point at the subsistence of the trust, during the period when they were intended to take effect.

And the only legitimate conclusion seems to me to be, not that the mere prescription arising from the latter consideration should control the express terms of the clause fixing the termination of the trust, but that these latter provisions should be construed consistently with that express clause, and should be held to apply to the case of events there mentioned occurring during the undoubted continuance of the trust, that is, during the lifetime of the liferentrix.

There may be difficulties attending this construction, as well as any others which have been resorted to: But it involves no absolute inconsistency with any of the express clauses of the deed; and viewing the question as one of presumption, it pre-and the survivors or survivor; "and failing all these acceptance, my own nearest lawful heirs whomeoever." of trustees, he conveys all his property, heritable and ceptions. The first exception is in favour of the trustee predecease, or by death after that of the testator, but w sal, then in favour of his granddaughter Mary Simson ( case she shall die in minority and unmarried. And it n that though this bequest is given by exception from the the legatees named expressly in absolute property, yet t trust was not to be limited to any short period of dura of such decease of Mary Simson Crawford, in minority special articles should be comprehended in, and make pa to the trustees for the uses of the trust.

The trustees are then empowered, in reference to the debts due to it, transfer shares of stock in bank, &c., in moveables; as also to establish in their own persons, ti heritages (with one exception); to sell these, levy the r appoint factors for management of the trust-estate; an do all "and every thing requisite and necessary for t hereby granted."

Then follow the purposes of the trust, the trustees bei for and apply their intromissions with the trust-subjects, sing from them, as follows: viz. 1st, For payment of 2dly, For payment of the truster's debts, funeral expen allowance for his widow and family, from his death til should be recovered; "and including also among my sterling, for which I granted a bond to the now dec an, my wife, for her support and maintenance during all the days of No. 327.

 after her decease, to pay over the said residue and remainder of my July 11, 1837.
 ate, and the rents, issues, and profits accruing therefrom, or to assign Tait v.
 he rights and securities of the same (but subject always to the pay- Duncan. annuities aforesaid), in manner following." This is said to be a direcediate unconditional payment or conveyance over. But—it had been the case, there could have been no room for any direction rents, issues, and profits." The capital being immediately payable ould be no such rents, &c. to be paid over.

payment or conveyance is "in manner following," and then follow as to the disposal of this residue, and profits thereof, which makes o read the general direction to pay or convey with reference to these id not in any abstract way; and it immediately appears that these not be executed with effect if the payment or conveyance was to be d unconditional.

it is particularly worthy of attention, there follows, in the end of the tive to the disposal of this residue and its profits, these words, "and ees are hereby requested and authorised to settle and secure the said emainder of my trust-estate accordingly,"—distinctly and expressly trustees not to make any simple and immediate payment or convey-ut to take care, in all events, that their acts should be such as to se-the directions of the truster. How this was to be done is not pointed
 : by continuance of the trust, or by the constitution of new securities; way, and through the acts of the trustees, it seems plain that it was e effectuated.

: are these directions? They are to convey—"One just and equal o Mary Simson Crawford, my granddaughter, only surviving child of between the said Captain James Coutts Crawford, and the now de-Duncan, my eldest daughter, his wife, and the heirs of the body of the mson Crawford; and the other just and equal half thereof to Alexan-Tait, my grandson, only child of the marriage between Captain James of the Royal Navy, and the said now deceased Mary Duncan, my ghter, his wife, and the heirs of the body of the said Alexander Dun-t under this burden always, as it is hereby expressly provided and t in case the said Mary Simson Crawford, my granddaughter, shall cease without leaving heirs one or more of her own body, the half of the nainder of my estate hereby settled on her, shall belong to the said uncan Tait, my grandson, and the heirs of his body; and, on the he shall die without leaving heirs one or more of his own body, the half sidue and remainder settled on him shall belong to the said Mary ford, my granddaughter, and the heirs of her body; and failing both lchildren, without leaving heirs one or more of either of their bodies, whole of the said residue and remainder shall pertain and belong to est heirs or assignees whatsoever, wholly exclusive of the legal heirs tives of my said grandchildren, or of either of them; and also exclusive wysden; the eldest son of Isobel Duncan or Twysden, my niece, and his body." Then, after the clause of power to the trustees above-e deed goes on,—“But without prejudice, nevertheless, to the said Crawford, my granddaughter, in case she shall be married, to settle ance over or them must defeat the will of the trustor, & been seen, are expressly empowered and required to g the trustees execute the trust so—how can they pay o profits so—or settle and secure the residue so, that the directed to be conveyed to Mary Simson Crawford shal without leaving heirs of her body, belong to Alexande half of the residue directed to be conveyed to him, shall, out heirs of his body, belong to her ; and that both he trustor's own legal heirs or assignees, wholly exclusive tatives, if the immediate duty of the trustees be to pay residue simply and absolutely to these two favoured persons use of a special power to them to settle part of their resp contract, if they were to receive the full halves in un frequently with full power to dispose of them wholly by a these powers were given in contemplation of the parties i of the trustor's wife, and when the fee of the halves had neither the expression, nor the place of the powers, appe interpretation. Nor do we think, that if the funds i without limitation, to these parties, there could be any w of right to the fee in them from the term of the trustor's any marriage contract executed by them before the death The trustees, then, having sufficient powers, and their t thing but the true meaning of the trustor, and take effe full effect, we are not able to think that the trustor's me of the residue should be immediately made over in free p ally, to Mary Simson Crawford and Alexander Duncan '

It is said that this provision is merely a substitution, a with clauses prohibitory. it creates no limit on the rich

, the return being to the heirs of the granter, not to the granter himself, it No. 327.
 reate any limitation against even gratuitous alterations, to establish which, of Wauchope, 22d December, 1752 (Mor. 4404), is referred to. We <sup>July 11, 1837</sup> at case not sufficient to support the doctrine. For in that case the clause <sup>Tait v.</sup> Duncan.
 tained in the bonds of provision granted in implement of a contract of (so found); and therefore it was incompetent to insert in them any clause ffect went beyond a mere substitution, or to give such effect to such a inserted. It is impossible, therefore, to rely on it as establishing any gectrine of the kind alleged.

, it is observed that when a grant is to heirs alioqui successuri, a clause of as no force beyond a substitution; and the case of the Marquis of Clydesth January, 1726 (Mor. 1262), is referred to on this head. We doubt also ciency of this decision to support the doctrine rested on it. For in that party contending for the benefit of the clause of return, was not the heir the return was provided, but a prior heir-male, called only as a substil in whose favour the return was not conditioned.

nswer, however, which appears to us to be the true one on this point is, clause here is not a clause of return, but a clause of direction to trustees.
 ough it has been said that clauses of return are to be strictly construed, re aware of no authority for applying such strict interpretation to clauses tions to trustees, particularly where provided with sufficient powers "to the trust," and general instructions "to settle and secure the estate" acto these directions. Such trustees, we think, have no duty but to find out e true meaning of the truster; and when found out, to give it effect, in the
 it is best fitted for that purpose; but at any rate in some form, so that it be defeated. In whatever way, therefore, the present trustees ought to ir duty, we do not think they can comply with the demand of Alexander Tait, because that is a demand not agreeable to the true intention of the been observed by the Lord Ordinary, that this interpretation would dee parties primarily favoured of all use of the trust-funds for a long time, their right to the rents and profits of these funds is not separable from ht to the capital. In this we do not agree. It is the residue, i. e. the f the residue of the trust-funds only to which the limiting conditions of the ections apply. There is no direction of that kind having application to the d profits, or from which it can be inferred that the trustees were to secure that they should remain subject to the rights of any person in any contin-

 We see no words to prevent the paying or assigning over of these annually arise, after the death of the truster's wife, Mary Simson or Duncan. They able or assignable over immediately, just as the capital also might have there had followed no conditions referable to it, by which such immediate or assignation was restrained. The separation is effected by the applicahe limiting conditions to the capital, and the non-application of them to s and profits accruing annually. On the whole, then, we remain unable to at the claim of Alexander Duncan Tait ought to be sustained.

cause was this day finally advised.

MEADOWBANK.—I concur with the minority of the consulted Judges.

various special legacies and annuities by another deed, the residue of his estate, heritable and moveable, by the trust-deed. After nominating his wife and certain gentlemen to be survivors or survivor of them, whom failing, by death, the nearest lawful heirs whatsoever, he assigns to them the residue of the trust, for certain ends and purposes, excepting therefrom the annuities. He names the trustees his executors, with power to the trustees who are declared to be a quorum, whom failing, with power to the survivor, to uplift and receive the whole of his effects, to make and execute the same, and to sell and convert into money, and then apply the same as pointed out. The trustees are directed to lay out the residue of the estate in such securities as they shall deem best, in their own names. There is no direction whatever to select any series of substitutes, and nothing, in fact, indicative of a settlement. The trustees are then to pay over the annual income to this residue, the disposal of which is committed to the trustees, without doubt, first, that the persona predilecta as to its annual income be the testator's widow. The persons preferred to the fee, as his grandchildren, the present competitors; and, looking to the future regarding them, which must be taken in their entire state, the true will of the testator, I cannot bring myself to any other conclusion than that the deed does not provide for a continuance of the trust beyond what has already occurred. So long as Mrs Duncan survived, she was entitled to the residue of the produce of the residue, under burden of the annuities, the trustees are directed to pay. Lady Duncan was married to two children; and, being of age, she is entitled to have the residue paid over to her. Mr Duncan Tait, having been a minor to the deed which directs the trustees "to pay over the said residue and No. 327.

der, &c., or to assign the rights and securities of the same" to the grand-
n. It appears to me that the proviso for the payment of the residue, &c. July 11, 183
"subject always to the payment of the annuities aforesaid," is an import- Tait v. use as indicative of the true meaning of the testator. For it clearly contem- Duncan.
the event, that the grandchildren, having got possession of their shares, are them only subject to such payment, the trustees being liberated from their sibility, and their duties being terminated on having so "paid over," in terms trust-deed. I certainly agree with the Lord Ordinary in having discovered ds indicating any provision for paying the income or interest of the shares er of the grandchildren. The issues and profits are only to go along with ds themselves. But if this is truly so, and it is to be held that the trust is inue till the deaths of either or both of the grandchildren, it must follow ither of them can receive any thing from the residue of their grandfather's which seems to have been so anxiously provided for them. If the duty of stees is to watch the interest of the testator's other nearest heirs whatsohey must wait for the possible event of no lawful issue being left by the d grandchildren. But this does not appear to me to be at all reconcilable plain meaning and intention of the testator. He had had the misfortune to th his daughters during his own life, and he seems to have looked to the ity of his grandchildren also dying early; and he accordingly made anxious on in the clauses above referred to for the possibility of their dying before cession opened to them. He was also undoubtedly desirous, in reference event, that on his grandchildren dying without lawful issue, his own nears, and not those of the grandchildren, viz., their paternal relations, should l; and this the trustees are directed to guard against, and to settle and accordingly. I can lay no stress on the argument so much enlarged upon he clause of return, being unable to hold that doctrine at all applicable to
e. But if it were so, the Lord Ordinary's observations would deserve at-
. On the whole, I am for deciding in favour of the pleas of Lieutenant

D GLENLEE.—I have no doubt that the proper time has come for the trusperform their duty, and not to keep up the trust to all eternity. The period for denuding has arrived, and they are to be exonerated. In point the real interest of Lady Duncan and Mr Tait accrued at the death of the though their affairs were to be managed by the trustees during their mino-
The trustees have brought both a declarator and a multiplepoinding, and ly to denude on granting a deed at sight of the Court. Two claims as de-are given in; one, that Tait should be absolute and unlimited fiar of the be paid over, as the true meaning of the deed of the testator. Why should se a disposition expressly in terms of the deed? I had some difficulty as two sets of opinions: One gives Tait the full right, while the three Judges Gillies, Mackenzie, and Corehouse) give no opinion as to the right, but us to take the terms of the deed, let the result be what it may. I incline opinion. Supposing there had been no trust-deed, but a direct settlement, ator might have put in the express provision that one dying should suffer of a half of the succession. A declarator will be competent after such and it is rash to modify the will of the testator. An instruction to entail on

No. 328. GEORGE WILLIAM HOPE, Pursuer.—D. F. Hope
C. Hope.

ROBERT SPEARES, Defender.—A

Teinds—Warrandice—Superior and Vassal.—Term held not to import an obligation on the superior to relimentations of stipend.

July 11, 1837. In the year 1721, the lands of Kinninmont were ties by Sir Thomas Bruce Hope of Craighall, herita 2<sup>d</sup> DIVISION. lands and teinds, to Thomas and Robert Pitcairn, b
14. Moncreiff. the same terms. The reddendo was expressed as F. therefor yearly, the said Thomas Pitcairn and his heirs and successors, of feu-duty, the sum of four h pounds eleven shillings three pennies Scots mon bolls well-dight good and sufficient bear, six boll well-dight oats, fifteen threaves of straw, and, in t Sir Thomas Bruce Hope, three shillings Scots for sixty-nine poultry and a half, or, in my option, fou Scots for each of the said poultry, with the sum of
for each capon, of three dozen capons, and to furni five carriages of coals at the manor-house of Cra three carriages of a horse to and from any place fourteen miles distant from Craighall: all these

w will ; and also to free and relieve the said Thomas Pitcairn, and No. 328.
 foresaids, from all cess, outreeks of horse and foot militia, and other ic burdens whatsoever, ministers' and schoolmasters' stipend and sa- July 11, 1837 (except the sum of seven pounds three shillings four pennies Scots Hope v.
 ly, payable by the said Thomas Pitcairn, and his foresaids, to the Speares. olmaster of Ceres,) beyond the feu-duty afore-mentioned, teinds and alties payable furth of the said lands, to my superiors thereof, and of all years and terms bygone, present, and to come."

he feu-duties payable in terms of these charters were about the agriral value of the lands at the date thereof. These feu-charters con-ed no conveyance of the teinds.

1729, Sir Thomas Hope sold to Charles Earl of Hopetoun the lands baronies of Craighall, comprehending the lands of Kinninmont, with teinds thereof, the following clause being contained in the disposi-
 :—" And in regard the said Charles Earl of Hopetoun has paid the price to me for the said teinds as he has done for the stock of the lands and baronys above disposed, it is expressly stipulated that I ld warrant the said teinds against further augmentations of minister's nd, and all other eviction whatsoever : Therefore, and but prejudice e absolute warrandice above-mentioned, I bind and oblige me, and foresaids, to warrant, acquit, and defend the haill teinds, parsonage vicarage, of the said haill lands and baronys afore disposed, from all er augmentation of ministers' stipends, or other burdens or imposiwhatsoever that can be imposed upon the sd<sup>s</sup> teinds, parsonage and age, of the said haill lands and baronys, in all time coming."

here was also the following exception :—" As also, excepting and rving always furth and from this present warrandice, all charters and ositions, and precepts of clare constat, and other feu-rights granted e, my predecessors and authors, to the vassals, feuars, and possessors e said lands, baronys, and others afore disposed, with the pertinents." he personal obligations for relief of ministers' stipend, &c., contained e feu-charters above-mentioned, did not appear in the record of ns, and were not repeated in the subsequent renewals of the right.
 ource of years the late General Sir Alexander Hope acquired by ress the estate of Craighall, and stood in the right of Sir Thomas e, the original superior and granter of the feu-charters, while the nder Speares became proprietor of both halves of Kinninmont, and eeded to the right of the original vassals. Since the date of the ters, no payment for ministers' stipend had been made by the vassals account of the lands of Kinninmont, such payment being for the first e demanded from Speares in 1828.

peares having fallen in arrear of the feu-duties payable to the supeand which he refused to make forthcoming on the ground of a ater claim against the superior, as bound to relieve him of the stipend able out of the teinds of the lands, Sir Alexander Hope, in 1832, of stipend exigible on account of the lands, and the conclusions were groundless and inconsistent with the feu-charters, which must regulate the rights of parties.

The Lord Ordinary appointed the parties to prepare their attention chiefly to the question, Whether of the superior generally, or by the terms of the charter in the present case, there is an obligation laid on the superior of augmentations of ministers' stipend, in order to be reported to the Court?"

Pleaded for Sir Alexander Hope—

1. The terms of the clause of warrandice, in the present case, are not such as to found a claim against the present superior for augmentations of stipend allocated subsequent to the charter. This is established by a series of cases where the terms have been held insufficient to operate such relief.<sup>1</sup> In the present case, on the opposite tendency, the constitution of the obligation is supported by very explicit expressions, and in none of them had the superior a right or heritable right to the teinds of the lands. The grantor of the feu-right, who was proprietor of the lands, although he did not convey the teinds with the lands, granted a clause of relief, which is to receive greater teinds than conveyance of the teinds could have had, and this is an absurdity.

2. Even assuming that the clause in the charter imports an obligation, the obligation contended for against the grantor and pearing ex facie of the records, is not binding upon a singular and onerous successor in the superiority.<sup>1</sup> No. 328

Pleaded for Speares—

July 11, 1833
Hope v.
Speares.

1. The terms of the clause of warrandice infer the relief insisted for.<sup>2</sup> The obligation of relief from stipend would have had no meaning at all, unless it had referred to a future claim therefor, no stipend having been payable for the lands at the date of the charters, nor down to 1828.

2. The only title upon which the superior can claim the feu-duties now in question, is the feu-charter under which the defender holds the lands of Kinninmont; and by it the right of demanding the feu-duty is made to depend upon the superior relieving the vassal of minister's stipend. In precepts of clare constat, and other renewals of the investiture, all the conditions of the original charter are held to be repeated, unless in so far as they are departed from or altered by the express agreement of parties.<sup>3</sup>

3. As the feu-duty payable for the lands was their yearly agricultural value at the date of the feu-charters, and as no stipend was ever paid by the vassals prior to 1828, the superior would be obliged, according to the decision in M'Donald v. Heriot's Hospital,<sup>4</sup> to relieve the vassals of any claim for stipend or any similar burden. But assuming this law to be questionable, in the present case there is an express obligation of relief from stipend and all other public burdens.

The Lord Ordinary made avizandum with the cause to the Court, adding to his interlocutor the subjoined note.*

<sup>1</sup> Nasmyth v. Storie, Dec. 17, 1740 (M. 10276); Gall v. Mitchell, Feb. 6, 1729 (M. 10306); Duke of Argyle v. Creditors of Barbreck, 1730 (M. 10306); Lady Castlehill v. Stewart, 1731 (M. 10275); Salmon v. Lord Boyd, July 25, 1751 (M. 4181); Tailors of Aberdeen v. Coutts, Dec. 20, 1834, ante XIII., 126; Stair II., 3, sect. 53 and 46.

<sup>2</sup> Cunningham v. Cuthbertson, Jan. 27, 1829, Shaw's Teind Cases, 175; and Cases there referred to in Opinion of Majority of Court; M'Ritchie's Trustees v. Sir Alexander Hope, Feb. 26, 1836, ante XIV., 578.

<sup>3</sup> Stewart v. Russell, June 3, 1813 (F.C.); M'Leod v. Ross, 5 Brown's Sup. 115; Nasmyth v. Storie, Nov. 9, 1748.

<sup>4</sup> Feb. 12, 1828, Shaw's Teind Cases, 156; and April, 1830, 4 W. and S., 98.

* "The Lord Ordinary will not enter particularly into the argument of these Cases. He will only say, that he reports the cause solely on the ground on which Lord Jeffrey reported the case of Pedie v. Heriot's Hospital, viz., the application which is here made of the decision in the case of Macdonald. He is humbly of opinion, 1. That on principle, and according to the authorities, there is not even in the first title of the vassal any obligation of warrandice against future augmentations of stipend; 2. That such an obligation cannot be inferred against a superior, merely from the nature of the feudal title, whatever may have been the value paid for the land: where the teinds are not conveyed, any estimate of the value of the lands supposes them to be taken with their natural burdens, if not expressly excepted; 3. That the attempt to maintain this against a singular successor in the superiority, where no words at all are inserted in the vassal's seisin, as if such an obligation were a natural incident to the feudal tenure, shows in a very strong light the singularly dangerous nature of the plea itself; and 4. That it can make guar successor in the superiority.

On the first of these points, we are of opinion, that no nally constituted. It has occasionally been supposed, that between the judgments which have been pronounced in t red in this matter. But any such discrepancy has only t the rule to the special circumstances of particular cases ; i fixed. It is, that in order to create and leave such a bur must be a distinct warrantice to this effect,—not nec particular words, but by the use of terms which unequiv tion. The course of practice by the parties subsequently ferred to in order to explain their understanding of the n one way or other, an unequivocal obligation to relieve mentations must be established, and no mere implication, will suffice.

Now, on applying this rule to the terms of the grant b pear to us to import any such obligation. We need not It is sufficient to refer to the explanation given of them i to say, that we think they can all receive a satisfactory co ing up this burden, which is not one of the natural in tion.

This being the case, the second point is superseded ; fc tion created, it is unnecessary, or rather impossible, to transferred.

---

no difference whatever on the legal state of the question, demand of the superior for payment of his feu-duty. To a take for-granted that the feu-right is burdened with such a thing to be proved.

“ The Lord Ordinary cannot but regard the case of Ma

The cause was this day put out for advising.

No. 328.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am not prepared to say that I think this so clear a case. July 11, 1837.
Morrison v.
Munnoch.

LORD GLENLEE.—I doubted at first. The teinds here are not expressly conveyed; but by the whole clause I think Sir Thomas Bruce Hope meant to convey the teinds. If the only object was to relieve from minister's stipend, I can conceive a right to be relieved while the superior held the teinds, as a claim of recourse against the titular. Though the teinds are not conveyed by dispositive words, they are virtually conveyed. It would be intolerable to relieve this party, and I agree with the principles adopted by the consulted Judges.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I also concur in their opinion.

LORD MEDWYN.—I agree. Holding this to be a conveyance of the teinds, it is very like the case of North Callange,<sup>1</sup> and the decision must not be inconsistent with that case.

THE COURT having considered the opinion of the consulted Judges, decerned in the declarator as to the defender's relief from payments of teinds, superseding quoad ultra till next Session, and allowed interim decree to be extracted.<sup>2</sup>

JAMES HOPE, W.S.—WALTER COOK, W.S.—Agents.

HUGH MORRISON, Pursuer.—J. Murray.
ROBERT MUNNOCH, Defender.—A. Wood.

No. 329.

Jurisdiction—Process—Foreign.—A party, domiciled in England, contracted a maritime debt, to the amount of £14, for ship-furnishings made in Leith by a ship-chandler there; the ship-chandler used arrestments (in the hands of a debtor residing in the shire of Edinburgh) to found jurisdiction, and raised an action for payment, before the Court of Session:—Question, whether such action, the sum being under £25, was competent in that Court, or ought to have been brought, in the first instance, before the Sheriff (of Edinburgh) in respect of the provisions of Stat. 1 W. IV. c. 69, § 21 and 22, although the debtor resided abroad.

In the circumstances above stated, the Lord Ordinary dismissed the action as incompetent. The pursuer presented a reclaiming note, and the Court ordered minutes of debate, after which the parties compromised the case. July 11, 1837.
1st Division
Ld. Fullerton
D.

LAWSON and GILMOUR, W.S.—J. MILLER, S.S.C.—Agents.

<sup>1</sup> Ante XIV. 578.

<sup>2</sup> Sir Alexander Hope having died in the course of the proceedings, his son and successor, George William Hope, was sisted as pursuer in his stead.

the executry of his deceased brother WILLIAM BOW ing on the decree, and the defenders presented a bill case was entirely of a special nature. There was facie vitiation of one of the bills; and in regard to at one time been written by the deceased William lee, acknowledging that he had received payment hers. But this letter was afterwards stated by the probability, to have been a mere ruse, resorted to pose. A plea of minority was also urged by Alex.
the late William Bow was alleged to have acted as der Mrs Brownlee, under a family trust, for behoof lee, the affairs of which required to be extricated between these several parties.

The Lord Ordinary refused the bill, as it was of or consignment, and there had been considerable riff Court: but, on a reclaiming note being presen mously altered and passed the bill.

FISHER and DUNCAN, S.S.C.—J. STUART, S.S.C.

No. 331.

— KENNEDY, Pursuer.—Montgomerie
HIS CREDITORS, Defenders.—J. ALEXANDER

Cessio—Interest—Proof.—Held that a creditor of the has been duly cited as such, is not admissible as a witness sition to the cessio (though he has made no appearance a except that he is a creditor and has an interest in the issue pearance. Kennedy objected that, as they were creditors, they No. 331. parties to the suit, and could not competently be examined. The July 12, 1837 decree was taken and sealed up, and the question was now raised, in Kennedy v. regarding the cessio, whether it was competent to open up the sealed de- His Creditors crees.

The opposing creditors pleaded, that those creditors who did not appear as defenders, and oppose the cessio, were not objectionable, especially the fact of their having given evidence would operate as a personal bar against their ever afterwards being allowed to appear as parties and oppose to the process. By giving evidence, therefore, they truly discharged their interest in the depending process, and so became competent witnesses.

The pursuer answered, that, even though the non-opposing creditors actually to bind themselves to offer no opposition as parties, that they could not discharge their interest in the process; that if the cessio was refused, whether they appeared as opposing parties or not, they would leave the pursuer left open to their diligence, as much as to the diligence of the other creditors; and that the general rule applied to this debarring any one, who was a defender in a process, or who had an interest in its being defended, from giving evidence in support of the process.

MR. MACKENZIE.—I apprehend that there is no authority for holding that a creditor of the pursuer of a cessio, can give evidence as a witness in the process in support of the defence. If one creditor may do so, all the creditors who appear as defenders, may equally do so. And even although the giving of evidence might bar a creditor from afterwards appearing and making direct opposition as a defender, I do not think he is thereby made a competent witness. It would not be enough, though he offered to discharge all right to appear as a defender. He would require to offer a discharge of all right to do legal diligence against his debt against the pursuer, as fully as if the pursuer had obtained decree in cessio, before he could truly discharge himself of interest in the issue of the process. The cessio, if refused at all, would leave the pursuer exposed to the diligence of all his creditors alike; a creditor appearing as a witness would therefore have the same interest in the issue of the process, with a creditor appearing as a defender. I think all the creditors, therefore, are inadmissible, under the general rule which excludes parties, or witnesses having an interest; and when I consider frequently it happens that creditors are under the influence of strong excitement and anger, on such occasions, I can see no ground whatever for relaxing the general rule in this instance.

The other Judges concurred, and the Court found the evidence inadmissible.

On considering the other parts of the proof, THE COURT refused the cessio hoc statu, and subjected the pursuer in the expense of the proof.

July 12, 1837.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

At the registration for the county of Ayr in Walker, schoolmaster in Tarbolton, lodged a claim to be enrolled as a voter. The pursuer, Gray, and James Brown, ma, and tradesmen there, had been employed to examine upon, and gave evidence in the Registration Court claim was rejected by the Sheriff, on the ground of the registration in 1836, Walker again lodged a claim following terms :—" I, Robert Walker, schoolmaster claim to be enrolled as a voter in the county of Ayr last year on the culpable and wilful mis-statement of Tarbolton, viz., Mathew Gray and James Brown, that Tarbolton schoolhouse contained four rooms, and consisted of five rooms, viz., parlour, kitchen and a fifth room is worth 25s. per annum, and falls to be noted of £9, 18s. sterling. I further claim on the claim of the foresaid house, and under the same roof. A Tarbolton church, given to the schoolmaster, &c., by decree of Division in 1821, value £1 per annum, and land of upwards of £10, all in the parish of Tarbolton Ayr. Signed at Tarbolton, the 18th day of July, 1837.

" R

Thereafter Gray, founding upon the statement of claim, raised an action of damages against Walker intended to represent, and did represent him to have er put in defences, stating, inter alia, that Gray and Brown, who No. 382.

 posed to him in politics, had not entered his house so as to ascernumber and value of the apartments it contained, and in conclu- July 12, 1836 ting forth as follows:—"Again, with respect to the statement Gray v.
 the defender in his claim for enrolment, it is positively denied, Walker.
 was intended to represent, or does represent, that the pursuer was f culpable and wilful perjury. As already mentioned, the defen-ject was simply to explain to the Sheriff the reason why he had prived of his vote in the previous year; and with this view he out the fact, that the pursuer and Mr Brown had made a culpa-wilful mis-statement in their valuation, in so far as they had reed, that the defender's dwelling-house consisted of four rooms, n point of fact, it consisted of five different apartments. But, in his explanation, he certainly never intended to charge the pur-Mr Brown with perjury, that is, with making a statement upon ich they knew to be false. All that he meant to convey was, y had made an erroneous statement as to a matter of fact, in dethe subjects occupied by him, without taking the proper means taining the truth, by a careful inspection of the premises.

remains to be observed, that if the statement complained of in the enrolment, contrary to the defender's understanding, can be held, fair construction, to imply an accusation of perjury, he most wil-takes this opportunity of judicially retracting the charge, and, at the time, expressing his sincere regret for having inadvertently se of expressions of such an injurious tendency. Most assuredly nder does not now, and never did believe or suspect that the purs guilty of perjury on the occasion referred to. On the contrary, no hesitation in declaring his conviction that there is not the t ground for such an imputation."

n admission that the defender in July, 1836, prepared and trans-to the Sheriff-Clerk of the county of Ayr the claim as above an issue was sent for trial, "Whether the whole or any part of words are of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumaccuse the pursuer of perjury, and were maliciously inserted in claim or schedule, to the loss, injury, and damage of the purmages laid at £500."

land, for the pursuer, maintained that the writing in question conn accusation of perjury,—that it was false, calumnious, and like-licious, and did not come within the privilege of judicial slander, nder having made mis-statements knowingly.

pursuer adduced evidence to show the impression produced in the ation Court, when Walker's claim was read, and also to the cha-f Messrs Gray and Brown.

d what the nature was of the charge made. The claim was to be read in open No. 332 court, and the witnesses spoke to the impression it made at the time. Keeping July 13, 1831 these things in view, you have also to look to that branch of his defence, where Robertson v the defender disclaims the intention of accusing the pursuer of perjury. This is Ainslie's to be taken into consideration if you should think damages due; but you will also Trustees.
 consider why this was not done before the action was raised.

THE JURY found for the defender.<sup>1</sup>

W. MENZIES, S.S.C.—JOHN BOWIE, W.S.—Agents.

MRS CHRISTINA ROBERTSON, Pursuer.—D. F. Hope—Moir. No. 333.
 AINSLIE'S TRUSTEES, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Rutherford— G. G. Bell—Neaves.

Bankrupt—Composition—Pactum Illicitum.—A bankrupt and his creditors having agreed to a composition by private contract, and one of the creditors having become cautioner in the composition and granted composition bills, the bankrupt granted to this creditor an assignation of his whole effects, with the view of the creditor operating payment to himself, over and above his proportion of the composition sum;—Held that such assignation was illegal, and verdict given accordingly.

IN the end of the year 1829, Robertson and Company, merchants in July 13, 1831 Leith, of whom the sole partner was the late Alexander Paterson Ro- 2D DIVISION.
 bertson, became insolvent, and a meeting of creditors took place on the Lord Justice-4th November. Some days afterwards Robertson made the following Clerk. offer of composition :— R.

“ Leith, 4th December, 1829. ”

“ We hereby make offer to you of a composition of seven shillings per pound, on your respective debts due by us, payable by bills, in three equal instalments, at six, nine, and twelve months, from the 15th December current, with the security of Mr William Ainslie, and Mr John Ainslie, merchants, Leith; also of one shilling per pound more at eighteen months, payable by our own bills, on condition that this offer is accepted to by all our creditors, previous to delivery of said bills.

(Signed) “ ROBERTSON & Co.”

“ to the Creditors of Robertson & & Co., Merchants, Leith.” }

On the same date, William and John Ainslie, who were relations of the bankrupt, and creditors to a considerable amount, formally bound themselves “ to the effect stated in this offer,” which was accepted by the creditors. Composition-bills were thereafter granted by the Ains-

The same verdict was returned, pro forma, in the action at the instance of the pursuer.

taken, and thus granted by the said William Ainslie for the sole use and behoof of the said Company, Alexander Paterson Robertson, as an individual, and condition and stipulation that we, the said Robertson said Alexander Paterson Robertson, should not only said William Ainslie and John Ainslie, the whole gra tion belonging to us, whether in bond or otherways, warehouses in Leith, with full power to sell and disp their own behoof, and which delivery has already that we should grant the assignation underwritten:
said Robertson and Co., and I the said Alexander sole partner of that Company, and also as an individ transferred, conveyed, and made over, likeas we do fer, convey, and make over, to and in favour of the s and John Ainslie, and their heirs and donators who goods, gear, debts, sums of money, corns, cattle, b and whole moveable property of whatever description the said Robertson and Co., or to me, the said Alex bertson, wherever situated, without exception or limi larly without prejudice to the foresaid generality, bonded grain," &c., with full power to dispose of the declaring, that in the event of us, the said Robert the said Alexander Paterson Robertson, within on date, repaying the whole sums advanced by the said John Ainslie, on our account, with all expenses incu tive to the premises and relieving and indemnifying

William and John Ainslie the whole sums advanced by them, and No. 333.
 r relative expenses, shall be their absolute property, and at their posal); which assignation above written, we, the said Robertson July 13, 1837.
 ., and I the said A. P. Robertson, bind and oblige ourselves, and Robertson v.
 esays, to warrant," &c. Ainslie's Trustees.

he same date, Messrs Ainslie granted to Robertson the following tter:—"As you have this day granted an assignation in our fa-f all the grain and other effects at present belonging to you, in of the obligations we have come under, for a composition to your s of seven shillings in the pound, we hereby engage, that in case any reversion remaining after paying all these obligations, and enses you may have incurred in winding up the concern, to make e same to you; and, in case of your death before that event takes o make over the reversion to Mrs Robertson, and which is to be sole disposal. It is also understood, that we are to retain full it of John Balfour and Co.'s bills, amounting in whole to £3000." first instalment of the composition was paid by the Ainslies, from dvanced for this purpose by Robertson, and the other instalments aid as they became due.

lay, 1835, William Ainslie having died in the interim, his trustees cutors, including John Ainslie, presented a petition to the Admiral , setting forth the assignation above-mentioned, and that the Messrs had entered into possession of the grain so conveyed (of which son's property chiefly consisted), but that with their sanction Rohad intromitted with various parcels of this grain,—that in conwith the whole transactions there remained due to the petitioners, esenting the assignees, a balance of £1000 and upwards, which quired to be settled,—and praying the Court to authorise the grain sposed of, or at least so much of it as should be necessary to satispetitioners' claim.

efence against this petition, Robertson, alleging that he had made s to the Ainslies more than sufficient to cover the obligations con-by their composition-bills, and the amount of their just claims,
 ,—

he assignation founded on by the petitioners is illegal, and can e no action, in respect that the petitioner was an acceding creditor espondent's offer of composition of 8s. per pound, by which his is discharged, quoad ultra, except in the event of the non-payment composition. In endeavouring to enforce full payment of this ie petitioners are attempting a fraud upon the other creditors who l to the composition, on the express understanding that all the s, including the petitioners, were to be placed on the same

ven. if it were competent for a creditor who had once acceded to
 r. of composition, thereafter to stipulate for full payment of his

1. As the regular and normal deed upon which cannot be rescinded or taken away incidentally, declarator, or other process before the Supreme ( plea of invalidity is incompetent in this action.

2. That plea is totally groundless in itself, the the assignation not having been entered into at a position was accepted of, or given as the price of sion ; but being a new and subsequent undertaking lawful consideration, and duly instructed by writing, fully valid and binding, whether viewed as a revival of the former debt.<sup>1</sup>

After a variety of procedure, the Admiral pronounced interlocutor on a closed record :—“ Finds the petitioner finds the letter, No. 35 of process, of 7th June, late William Ainslie, Esq. and John Ainslie the assignation granted of that date by the respondents finds that, in so far as its terms take the respondents needs for full payment of the bills referred to in the to support the prayer of the petition, therefore of No. 1 of process, to the extent prayed for, and decrees to the final determination of this question, appoints days from this date, to lodge a state showing are prepared to establish as due to them, holding account with the respondents upon the same footing at the period of their bankruptcy, for sums the decrees, and to this extent reserves the effect of the act consideration of all other questions raised under it.’

upon the trustees brought an advocacy, which having been No. 353.
to the Jury Roll, the following issue was sent for trial, Mrs a Robertson, as disponee and executrix of Robertson, who had July 13, 1831 the course of the proceedings, being held as pursuer: Robertson v.
Ainslie's
Trustees.

being admitted that the pursuer, Mrs Robertson, is general disposed executrix of the late Alexander Paterson Robertson,— being also admitted, that about the month of November, 1829, on and Co., of which the said Alexander Paterson Robertson sole partner, became insolvent, and that the creditors of the y accepted of a composition of 8s. per pound on their respective being also admitted, that the late William Ainslie, and the defen-Ainslie, were then creditors of the said Company; and that the Alexander Paterson Robertson granted to them the assignation, No.

cess,—

whether the said assignation was granted by the said Alexander Robertson, and accepted by the defenders, John Ainslie, and William Ainslie, or either of them, in consequence or implement rupt stipulation, agreement, or mutual understanding, betwixt Alexander Paterson Robertson and the said William and John or either of them, that the debts then due to the said William Ainslie, or either of them, should be paid in full?"

pursuer led evidence to show that the assignation had been cond from the commencement of the transaction as to the composiwas not a subsequent arrangement, and that at the date of the on, there was as yet no concluded contract between Robertson reditors; maintaining, in law, that although there were no fraud, ssignation might, under the circumstances, be corrupt and ille-that whatever might have been the case had a cautioner engaged contract, the present case was entirely different where the as-were creditors as well as cautioners.

efenders, without leading evidence, answered that here was no fraudulent stipulation; that Messrs Ainslie took the risk of the whole composition to the creditors, which they would have ged to do had the price of grain fallen, and the subsequent as-was, in the circumstances, not contrary to law; that, looking relative back-letter, this was only a stipulation that Messrs Ainslie paid in full in case of there being a reversion, and was a difse from an absolute assignation.

JUSTICE-CLERK, in charging the Jury, observed,—I have no difficulty to the law applicable to this issue. When there is an agreement to a on either under the Bankrupt Act or by private contract, if it be settled he bankrupt and any one creditor, that that creditor is to receive a larger the others, or full payment of his debt, undoubtedly such arrangement is transaction, and no effect can be given to it by any Court. It would

Reparation—Solatium—Road.—Certain road-trustees be made, in the course of which a large heap of stones the footpath and partly on the carriage road, where they out any precaution being taken to warn travellers : a gig stones in the dark, and a person driving it was seriously killed : Held that the road-trustees were liable in damages that they had no personal knowledge of the obstruction, a tractor who was habited and reputed competent for the operation specially charged to be careful ; and pleaded that they were pable negligence of his servants. 2. In assessing the sum account of the death of the son, a boy of ten years of age of the personal injury sustained by the father.

July 18, 1837. JAMES FINDLATER, coal-merchant, Perth, left D of 23d October, 1836, to return to Perth along 1
1st Division. Inchtute. He was driving a gig, in which his so L. President. ten years of age, was along with him. The night was overturned on a large heap of stones which had on the footpath, and partly on the carriage road, 1 vice of the contractor employed by the road-tru placed to mark the spot, and no person was station Findlater was sober, and was driving cautiously at quence of the overturn, he sustained considerable p ring medical treatment for its cure, and his son was that he died in a few days afterwards. Findlater damages against the road-trustees, libelling that th road had been formed by the operation of the road surveyors or contractors, or other person or persons ment of £500, in name of reparation and solatium for the death No. 334.

 on; and £500, in name of damages for injury to himself. The July 19, 1835 s, besides other defences, stated that even if the stones had been Clarke v.
 own, as alleged, it was done without their personal knowledge; Brooks.
 ey had employed a competent contractor, who was specially charged areful; and that the obstruction could only have been occasioned culpable negligence of his servants; but, as the office of trustees atuitous, they pleaded that they were not liable for such culpable ence, which was not imputable to them, as they sufficiently fulfilled luty, provided that the contractor or servant whom alone they iately employed, was habite and repute respectable, and compe-

following issue went to trial before a jury:

being admitted that the defender is treasurer to the trustees on npike-road from Perth to Dundee, through the Carse of Gowrie, hture,

Whether, on or about the 23d day of October, 1835, the pursuer ie late Henry Findlater, his son, while travelling in a gig along d road near the west half-way house, were overturned through the r negligence of the said trustees, or others in their employment, to s, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"

he trial the Lord President overruled the plea above quoted, which t up in defence by the road-trustees, and, on the facts of the case, y found a verdict for the pursuers, assessing the sum due, on ac-of the death of the pursuer's son, at £500; and the sum due on it of the injury to the pursuer himself, at £300. An exception ken to the direction of the Lord President, in reporting which the ngs of the parties will be more fully noticed.

RITCHIE and HILL, W.S.—BELLS and RUTHERFURN, W.S.—Agents.

ATRICK CLARKE and MANDATARY, Pursuers.—D. F. Hope—
A. M'Neill.

No. 335.

WILLIAM BROOKS, Defender.—M'Neill—G. G. Bell.

estment—Reparation.—A case of a special nature, in which a jury July 19, 1835 ed a sum of damages for a wrongous arrestment of certain goods.

1st Division
 Ld. President

J. TAYLOR, S.S.C.—A. PATERSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 336. JAMES BORTHWICK (Manager of North British Insurance Co.)

M'Neill—Whigham.

July 21, 1837.

Borthwick v.
Langmuir.

ALEXANDER LANGMUIR and OTHERS (Ralston's Trustees),

Sol.-Gen. Rutherford—Cowan.

Et e contra.

Insurance—Policy.—Circumstances in which, verdict found that life-insurance was obtained by the misrepresentation or by the undue influence of material facts, by the party insured, or those acting on her behalf.

July 21, 1837.

1st Division.
Ld. President.

On December 3, 1833, the late Mrs Ralston, relict of James Ralston of Warwickhill, transmitted a proposal for a policy of life-insurance on her life, to the North British Insurance Company at Glasgow, through their agents at Kilmarnock. One of these agents had visited her at the time when she signed the usual declaration of good health. She stated herself to be of the age of 60 years, next birthday, and the amount of the proposed insurance was £2500. Both parties subscribed by herself as to her health, and the certificate of the medical attendant and private referee, imported that she was in good health, and that, in reference to her past and present health, the issue of an insurance on her life would not be attended with any unusual hazard. The Insurance Office agreed to enter into the policy, which was issued on 10th December. The premium of £150, 19s. 8d. corresponded to the sum assured, at the rate where there is no unusual hazard to the life of the party. Mrs Ralston died of apoplexy on 2d December 1834. The Insurance Office soon afterwards learnt circumstances respecting the state of Mrs Ralston's health, which induced the payment of the policy. Alexander Langmuir and others, trustees under Mrs Ralston's settlement, raised an action for payment of the policy; and the Insurance Office lodged defences, besides which they raised an action of reduction of the policy. The ground of the defence was that the state of Mrs Ralston's health, at and prior to the issue of the policy, was such as to render her life unusually hazardous; that misrepresentations on this subject had been made to, or important information had been withheld from, the Insurance Office: and that whether this was done fraudulently or not, it must void the policy, by reason of its express terms, and to the implied condition of full disclosure, which was of the essence of the contract.<sup>1</sup>

Defences were lodged in the reduction, and, a record being entered, the following issues went to trial, it being fixed that the Insurance Company should stand as pursuers:—

“Whether the policy of insurance, No. 23 of process, bearing date the 10th of December 1833, is valid and effectual, or whether it is void and of no effect, by reason of its express terms, and to the implied condition of full disclosure, which was of the essence of the contract.”

<sup>1</sup> Forbes and Co. March 9, 1832 (ante, X. 451).

an insurance by the pursuers, of the sum of £2500, on the life of the late Mrs Agnes Ralston of Warwickhill, for a year from the 10th December, 1833, was obtained from the pursuers by the misrepresentation, or by the undue concealment of material facts by Mrs Ralston, or by any one acting on her behalf? Or,

“ Whether, under the said policy, the pursuers are indebted and resting owing to the defenders in the said sum of £2500, or any part thereof, with interest thereon?”

At the trial it appeared, on the pursuer's proof, inter alia, that between the 15th of September, 1833, and December 3, when the proposal for an insurance was transmitted to the office in Edinburgh, Mrs Ralston had required and received the constant attendance of a surgeon, whose visits during that period exceeded thirty in number; that during part of this time she laboured under serious indisposition; that she had been four times bled, besides being repeatedly blistered, and having her head shaved, and having emetics and other medicines administered to her. The surgeon was afraid of a tendency of blood to the head, and on one occasion when he was called in (15th September), as he found that the blood did not follow the lancet freely, he applied nine leeches to the temples, besides blistering on the breast. The visits of the surgeon were frequently prolonged for hours at a time, and repeatedly amounted to five, six, and seven hours together, and on one occasion he was detained all day. Between 3d December and 10th December, when the policy was signed, the surgeon's visits continued, and Mrs Ralston was again bled on 10th December. The same surgeon continued to attend her till January, 1834, when she went to reside in Kilmarnock, after which another surgeon was called in. In that same month the new surgeon found her, on one of his visits, lying in bed insensible. He considered it an attack of apoplexy, and opened a vein; but as she soon became convulsed and foamed at the mouth, he supposed it to be epilepsy. In February, and again in March, she had a fit of falling sickness. This gentleman's attendance continued at intervals till the death of Mrs Ralston on 2d September.

The first mentioned surgeon was the person who had signed the certificate which accompanied the proposal for the policy of insurance. That certificate stated Mrs Ralston to be then “ in perfect health,” and made other statements of a similar tenor. At the trial this surgeon explained that he had considered his signature at the certificate to be a mere matter of form.

The concurrent testimony of three medical gentlemen, Drs MacLagan, Macintosh, and Robertson, who heard the pursuer's evidence led, imported that there was nothing on the face of the declaration and certificates transmitted along with the proposal for the policy, which should have led the Insurance Office to make farther inquiry; that nothing appeared there to lead the Office to believe that Mrs Ralston had laboured

No. 336

July 21, 1834

Borthwick

Langmuir.

No. 336.

July 21, 1837.
 Borthwick v.
 Langmuir.

under such indisposition, as she had been affected with from September, and subsequently, or that she had been under treatment which had now appeared in proof; that it was impossible these things should have been fully explained to the office; that the circumstances were such as to render an insurance on the life of a woman, more than usually hazardous; and that they (the deponents) had signed a certificate of her being in good health, at the time her surgeon's certificate, of that import, was signed. X

The defenders led some evidence which failed to take off the pursuer's proof, and the Jury, after a charge from the Lord, found for the pursuers.

J. NAIRNE, W.S.—G. M'LELLAND, W.S.—Agents.

X The Pursuers having now closed their evidence, the Defenders gave up the case, and the Jury the

APPENDIX.

---

No. I.

OPINION of LORD COCKBURN, in Kerr v. Blair and Others (Earl of Eglinton's Trustees), referred to ante, p. 793.

“ THIS case is of vital importance to the future condition of jury trial in civil causes in this country.

“ This mode of investigating facts was originally<sup>1</sup> introduced with such caution, that no entire cause was allowed to be sent for trial, but only such detached issues as the Court of Session thought ‘expedient.’ If this had been deemed safe, as an ultimate system, there was no reason for altering this provision of the original Act. But it was altered very materially, and by a very marked step, in the very next statute;<sup>2</sup> which declares certain causes to be proper for trial by jury, and accordingly enacts, that these shall be sent to the Jury Court for trial, except in the single event (as I think) of there being legal questions, which, in the opinion of the Court of Session, ought to be determined first. The third Act<sup>3</sup> not only enlarged the description of these cases, but took away the power formerly given to this Court, of abstaining from remitting, in order that supposed questions of law or relevancy might be discussed here. The fourth and last Act<sup>4</sup> confirms these cases as appropriate to trial, and makes it competent to fix the facts, even of consistorial cases, by verdicts.

“ These statutes all demonstrate a steady and progressive confidence in the system of trial by jury, and an increased tendency to have the character of the cases that are to be so disposed of fixed by Parliament. Accordingly, so far as I can discover, no attempt has ever been made till now to get the Court to exercise any discretion as to the fit application of this system to any of these enumerated cases. Wherever a case has been brought within the statutory description, it has always been understood that its course, in so far as the facts were concerned, was determined.

---

<sup>1</sup> 55 Geo. III. c. 42 § 1, 1815.

<sup>3</sup> 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, 1825.

<sup>2</sup> 59 Geo. III. c. 35, § 1, 1819.

<sup>4</sup> 1 Will. IV. c. 69, 1830.

" But the doubt that has now been raised is, whether the statutes fix whatever, as cases, of which the facts, if they are to be investigated at all, are to be investigated by juries? The doubt is, whether it be not competent for the Court to withdraw even the enumerated causes from trial, whenever it may think trial inexpedient?

" The plain result of this is, that it places the extent to which trial is to be practised entirely in the discretion of the Court. It entitles every party to contest the fitness of his particular case for trial; and justifies, and even tempts, a vexatious preliminary discussion on this subject, even in the case of damage—such as that arising from injury to land where the title is in question. Lords Ordinary, instead of being guided by general rules, win the parties by their inflexibility, may order trials, or they may order untried proofs by commission, according as their habits make them view the extent of given subjects familiarly or with dismay. And if a majority of the either Division should recur to the opinion which was held, at no great distance of time, by many most eminent lawyers, that trial by jury is beneficially applicable to no case whatever, the whole system might silently disappear.

" I can find no ground for such a result in the statutes. Not that the intention of the section of the Act of 1819 is so clearly expressed as it might have been, but that the doubt had been anticipated; but that the pursuer's construction, which promotes the undoubted object of the legislature, and is, therefore, the one to be favoured, is, to say the least, as satisfactory as that of the defenders, who would directly to obstruct it.

" The 59 Geo. III. c. 35, § 1, not only specifies what are to be heard by the jury causes, but enacts that, being so, they shall be sent at once to the jury for trial. And the Jury Court is not merely authorised, but is imperatively required to settle an issue or issues, and to try the same by a jury.' The sections seem to me to introduce all the provisions that were thought proper for the disposal of questions of preliminary law or relevancy, in relation to the enumerated causes. The import of them is, that such questions are to be decided by this Court before the remit. But if the case should pass this stage without a remit being made, I am inclined (though I admit that there has been some objection against this) to think that these questions could not afterwards be referred to the province of the Jury Court consisted in merely trying the case.

" And when the first part of the 12th section empowers the Jury Court to send the case back for the discussion of such legal matter as should be decided in trying to settle an issue, it rather appears to me that there is some ground for maintaining that this only relates to the non-enumerated cases. It relates to cases remitted to them as aforesaid; which words may, without any violence, be applied so as to include—not the causes finally disposed of by the three sections—but those immediately preceding the 12th clause, being all the causes, though not enumerated, it was competent for this Court, or for the Admiralty, to remit. It was not unreasonable to give more opportunities of discussing questions in these cases than in the enumerated ones, because they might be more complicated, which was the reason why they were not put on the roll of jury causes. However, this view is certainly not without difficulties.

" But assuming that this first part of the 12th section embraces all causes, ever, the second part, which expressly relates only to causes to which tri beneficially applicable,' stands in a very different situation. The gates may be left very open for points of preliminary law, and yet shut very close against speculations as to the expediency of proofs by commission. It is said that the words, 'in the course of settling an issue or issues,' must be held to comprehend, judicially, the very same things, in every part of the same clause. I am not aware of any necessity for such construction, where there are relative words which give the same expressions different meanings in different places even of the same section. We must give the statute the greatest amount of consistency that we can, upon the whole.

"Now, the attempt to extend this second part of the clause to the enumerated cases, is met by two obstacles, both of which, to my mind, are insurmountable:—1st, I cannot reconcile this construction with the previous positive enactment, that these enumerated cases are proper for trial by jury. To say that a case is 'appropriate for jury trial,' seems to me exactly to say that it is a case to which jury trial is 'beneficially applicable.' Therefore the defender's construction makes the two parts of the Act contradict each other. What the statute should have enacted, according to them, is, that trial by jury was beneficially applicable to no case whatever, unless the Court of Session should think so. Their construction makes the 12th section repeal the first. 2dly, I cannot reconcile this construction with the 13th section, which enacts in express terms (though it be printed parenthetically), that the Court has no power to take proof by commission, by remit, or in presentia, in the enumerated cases. I cannot believe that the statute meant to exclude these modes of proof from the enumerated cases, except on the supposition that it meant that these cases should positively have their facts investigated by jury; because otherwise it virtually debars them from being investigated at all.

"If the case therefore had depended on this statute alone, I should have held, that, the cause being on the catalogue of proper jury cases, and there being no question of law, and the facts being disputed, it was not in the power of the Court to prevent a trial. But the matter is made clearer by the subsequent Act.

"The 6th of Geo. IV. cap. 120, enlarges the description of appropriate jury causes, and compels this Court to send them forward for trial without waiting to discuss any legal question. But due provision is made for the disposal of such matter by a clause which was not noticed at the bar, but seemed to me to be decisive. It is the 33d which introduces a totally new set of regulations upon this subject. Its substance is, that when any legal question, proper to be settled before trial, shall occur in the Jury Court, that Court may either send back to the Court of Session or not, as it shall think proper; and that if sent back, the case shall proceed, quoad the law, as a Court of Session process. But this is only as to the law;—it is as to 'such question of law or relevancy.' There is no indication, but the reverse, of any intention on the part of the legislature to retract its previous description of causes to which trial was beneficially applicable, and leave it to this Court to say to what causes it was appropriate. For the result, in reference to the facts, as stated in the close of the section, is, that if, 'after the determination of such question, there shall remain matter of fact to be ascertained between the parties, the said matter shall be tried by jury, and the parties shall forthwith proceed before the said Jury Court, or one of the Judges thereof, to prepare an issue or issues for trial.' So that the case is taken from the Court of Session in the first instance, because it is held appropriate for trial; and when it is restored to this Court on account of emerging law, the authority of the Court is exhausted as this law is cleared away, and the necessity for trial; if there be settled, revives.

"The Act of 1830,<sup>1</sup> which abolished the Jury Court, declares that which formerly behoved to be tried in that Court, shall thenceforth be tried in the Court of Session. It does not enlarge the catalogue of jury causes; does it abridge it, or warrant any new mode of ascertaining their facts upon whatever necessity there was, under the previous statute, for trying juries.

"I do not consider the case of Leslie as any authority on the point. This precise point, viz. of the competency of withholding a trial on the ground of a commission or a remit was more expedient, was not mooted there. In Gifford's speech, however, in Lady Mary Crawford's case, satisfies me that had been purely a claim of damages, he would have held a trial unavoidable.

"Something has been said, and a good deal more insinuated, with respect to the policy of the system of compelling a court to try any cause by jury, to which a court may think that trial by jury is not beneficially applicable. That is not a judicial consideration. I shall only say, therefore, that if this point ever come before us, I anticipate no difficulty in making up my own mind. Meanwhile, I feel no uneasiness in relying on the experience of England, where there is no other way except by jury in which the common law can determine facts; and where, nevertheless, there are sufficient practical means for trying the trial of really untriable cases."

No. II.

In regard to the note (ante, p. 100, Macrae v. Macrae or Hyndman), I beg leave to mention that the substance of the more detailed opinion of BALGHALY, there noticed, is already given in the opinions of his Lordship, ante, p. 62, and p. 100. The references made by his Lordship are the 2 St. 4, 61; 2 Bankt. 4, 41; and 4 Bankt. 27, 6; 2 Ersk. 5, 59, and 6 (Laird of), March 8, 1639 (8374); 3 Craig, 6, 8, and 9; 3 Bankt. 3, 11, 286; Voet. 28, 1, 40.

No. III.

Jury Trial.—For the purpose of removing certain doubts as to the Bills of Exception, a note, framed by the Dean of Faculty, was transmitted by Lord President to Lord Chief Justice Tindall. That note, with the answer of Lord Chief Justice, are subjoined.

After quoting 55 Geo. III., c. 42, § 6, 7; and 59 Geo. III., c. 35, the note proceeded as follows:—

"It will be observed, that in terms of the 7th sect. of 55 Geo. III., c.

<sup>1</sup> 1 William IV., cap. 69, § 2.

quoted,—one very peculiar as to the form of presenting and preparing an exception,—no reference is made as to evidence or any documents being introduced.

“ It would rather appear that the exception was intended to be simply the objection drawn up at the trial, with the interlocutor directing the trial, and the verdict indorsed thereon.

“ Farther, the clause provides, that if the Division shall allow the said exception, they shall direct another jury to be summoned for the trial of the issue or issues.

“ Hitherto there has not been any rule for inserting the whole evidence in a bill of exceptions, although not required for explanation of the point raised.

“ Thus in the case Ralston v. Rowat, 27th February, 1833, an objection having been taken to the admissibility of a witness on the ground of interest, no other part of the evidence in the trial was set forth in the bill, than the examination in initialibus of that witness, on which the objection was raised and sustained at the trial. That case underwent great discussion on the bench (see 11 Shaw 451 and Fac. Coll. p. 269), the Lord Chief Commissioner sitting as one of the Second Division. The judgment was appealed, and there is a very full opinion of Lord Wynford in the appeal reports for 1833. See Shaw's Supplement, Vol. I. p. 92, July 10, 1833. But not a remark was made on the form of the bill of exceptions as improper, insufficient, or inappropriate.

“ Other similar instances might be stated.

“ If, in every case, the whole evidence must be set forth, two results are dreaded, which will be most unfortunate.

“ 1. That bills of exceptions will practically prove the means of enabling the House of Lords to review the whole cause on the facts.

“ This result is said in the recent work on Jury Trial, pp. 349–51, to have occurred already in the case of Barclay v. Allardyce, by the direction inserted in the judgment.

“ 2. That the point of law which the party desires to raise by the bill of exceptions, and which was decided as a point of law at the trial, will be considered on the bill of exceptions, under the influence of its importance, and bearing on the result in the particular case, and when there is great risk that the mind may be affected by views which ought not to influence the judgment on the point of law.

“ The Court are aware that it has been recently proposed in all cases (or nearly in all cases) to introduce all the evidence into bills of exceptions.

“ It is submitted that there are many classes of cases in which this ought not to be done; and this Memorandum has been submitted, to bring under the review of the Court the points which may arise in many of these cases, and to suggest some questions, on which English practice may be useful and important.

“ The points appear to be,

“ 1. If a witness is rejected solely on account of an objection to the witness, not connected with the cause or matter of the trial,—a general objection—e. g. infancy, relationship, enmity, &c., is it necessary or proper, in the bill of exceptions, to set forth the whole evidence in the trial,—both that given before the rejection of the witness, and after that judgment?

“ 2. Same Question. When a witness is received and an objection of the same sort repelled?

“ 3. Same Question. If evidence is rejected (say a written document),—objected to on grounds of the same character,—e. g. on the want of stamp, authentication

" 4. Same Question. If evidence is received when objected grounds?

" 5. The same Question. When objections, sustained or the cause, or when the grounds of the judgment excepted cause?

" 6. Suppose a particular question is, after objection, always necessary (whether required to understand the objection not)?

" (1.) To set forth the whole evidence of the witness, to put; or only when that evidence must be stated in order to and judgment?

" (2.) Or the whole evidence in the trial, both what was the examination of the witness to whom the question objected?

" 7. Same Question. When a particular line of evidence, ment is objected to?

" 8. If the deposition of a witness, who is dead or unable evidence has been taken on commission, is rejected on general tionship, improperly taken, &c.), is it necessary to set forth it tion so rejected, and even when no reference was made at the the evidence, as affecting the objection, and when its content known to the Judge at the trial?

" 9. If a witness is rejected on a general ground, and no testium arises, or any matter peculiar to the cause, is it necessary evidence which the witness would have given?

" 10. Same Question. If the deposition is received after grounds?

" 11. If a party excepts to a statement of fact, and it is not said that the statement in any way affects the whole evidence?

" 12. If a bill of exceptions is taken, and the trial is set aside?

" 13. Suppose two statements are made, and the first is given, which is then rejected, and the second is not the in such case the exception is taken to the first, or to the second, or to both, or to neither, or to both by the court?

" 14. Is a bill of exceptions taken, and the trial is set aside, except when a bill of exceptions is taken, and the trial is set aside, or by the Judge?

" 15. When the facts in the cause are founded upon in support, or of the judgment pronounced?

remise, that where the law laid down by the Judge to the Jury at the trial of the cause is founded on the general facts of the case, the whole of the evidence given to the Jury at the trial must be stated on the face of the bill of exceptions. This is a general and indeed universal rule. But when the exceptions taken have no reference whatever to any general question arising in the cause, but relate entirely and exclusively to some matter arising collaterally and incidentally in the course of the trial, then, I conceive, it is sufficient to set out the whole of the evidence relating to such matter, upon which the exception is founded.

“ It is obvious, therefore, that where any doubt exists, whether the general evidence in the cause may, or may not, have any bearing on the exception which has been taken, that it will be safer to treat the case as falling within the general rule, and set out the whole of the evidence ; because, on the one hand, the inconvenience suggested in the papers referred to me, of an undue weight being allowed to the evidence which does not support the exception, can never occur in practice, at least in England, the attention of the Court of Appeal being always confined strictly and exclusively to the exception taken at the trial ; and, on the other hand, the statement of the whole evidence, though it may turn out to have been unnecessary, prevents all danger of the cause being sent down again to supply any deficiency in the statement upon the record.

Having made this general remark, I proceed to answer the particular questions proposed to me.

No. 1. In the case put in No. 1, I think it is sufficient to state all the evidence as it was given at the trial, which in any way raises the objection to the witness's competency, and upon which the exception to such witness was founded ; and that it is not necessary to state the whole of the evidence before or after such rejection ; for, in such a case, the Court above cannot go out of the precise exception taken ; but if the witness was properly rejected, must affirm the judgment ; if improperly rejected, must send the cause back to another trial. The instances given in No. 1 are not grounds of incompetency by the English law ; but I can suppose the case of an objection on the ground of infancy, where a question of law might be raised on the construction of Acts of Parliament.

No. 2, No. 3, and No. 4. I think the same answer and upon the same principles to be given to these three questions, assuming, as I do, with respect to No. 4, that the grounds of objection to the evidence are collateral to the cause, and not arising in any manner out of the facts of the cause itself.

No. 5. Generally speaking, in a case falling within the description of No. 5, the whole of the evidence must be stated in the bill of exceptions. But there may be cases under this head, in which it is manifest that some of the evidence given at the trial is altogether unnecessary for the decision of the point of law raised by the bill of exceptions ; and if the Judge whose opinion is excepted against, and the counsel on both sides of the cause, agree to the omission of such facts, I think such facts may be safely and properly left out. Consensus tollit errorem. If, however, the Judge, or either the one or the other counsel, insist that the objection is not intelligible, unless the whole evidence is introduced into the bill ; or that, by the omission of any part, a different colour is given to that which remains, or a different impression will be made by it on the minds of the Judges, the whole must be set out. It may also be observed, that, with such consent as before mentioned, the whole may in many cases be stated more compendiously in the bill of exceptions, than by inserting the detail of the examination and cross-examinations; for very frequently the same fact is proved at a trial in succession repeating nearly the same words; or a single fact by many witnesses to different steps of a transaction from which easy inference. In such, and similar cases, it is obviously a great deal of unnecessary labour to state the result only; as that "trial on the part of the plaintiff, so and so," instead of the detail. And there seems no possible objection to this course with a case mentioned.

No. 6. Where the Judge against whose decision the exception is taken on each side, can agree as to what is requisite to be set out in order to raise the question of law which was excepted to, I think it need not be set out; but where there is any difference of opinion as to the evidence of the witness, to whom the objected question was put (such agreement as aforesaid) the whole of the other evidence must be set forth.

No. 7. The same answer applies to the case where a particular document, or a particular document, is objected to; supposing the case of fact falls within No. 6.

No. 8. Under the circumstance, stated in the query No. 6, the question itself need not be set out; but the whole evidence on which the objection is founded must be stated, as mentioned above in the answer to No. 6.

No. 9. Where the witness is rejected I think it is not necessary to state the evidence he would have given; indeed, I do not see how the witness can be called upon to allow testimony which was not given to be put in. But the object and purpose for which he was called, and the time of calling him, must be set out.

No. 10. When the evidence of the witness is received and an objection is confined to matters collateral, and there is no reference whatever to the evidence given by the witness, or to the cause, I think it unnecessary to state the evidence itself.

No. 11. I think it is necessary, in this case, to set out the evidence; and the necessity appears to be stronger than in the case of No. 10. But as there, so also in this case, if the Judge approves and omits parts of the evidence which are immaterial, or to state it in a compendious manner, I can see no objection; assuming it appears, as to the points excepted against, to enable the Court to give judgment. If in any case there is a doubt as to this latter point, it is to set out the whole evidence.

No. 12. In England, the effect of maintaining exception is to set aside the verdict; the judgment, in that case, being an award of a new trial. The cause is to be tried before another jury.

No. 13. I know of no mode of proceeding in England by which a judgment could be set aside as to that issue only against which the exception is taken. The judgment is general, and goes to the whole, that there is no issue. At the same time, if the other issue was decided to the advantage of the party, it is so manifestly the interest of both to avoid unnecessary expense, that a suggestion from the Court that the parties should agree not to ing on the latter issue, upon the second trial, would instantly be acceded to. But if either party question the propriety of the finding, I do not see that he can be deprived of the opportunity to try it over again.

No. 14 and No. 15. I think there are cases where the whole evidence in a cause is set forth in a bill of exceptions, besides those mentioned in the queries No. 14 and 15; to some of which I have adverted in my answers to the queries Nos. 5 and 6: And it is also expedient to do so, whenever there is a reasonable doubt that a statement very short of the whole may, from circumstances, be insufficient to raise the point for the discussion of the Court above.

(Signed) N. C. TINDAL.*

Bedford Square, 14th Nov. 1836.

No. IV.

Besides other Acts of Sederunt,† the Court, on March 11, 1837, passed an Act, apportioning the duties of certain vacant offices of Clerks of Session, among the remaining Clerks, in terms of 1 Will. IV., c. 69, § 13.

On June 27, 1837, their Lordships passed another Act, "Considering that, during the reign of William IV., and since his decease, before the 24th day of June instant, when QUEEN VICTORIA was proclaimed, there were summonses &c., inhibitions, &c., publications of interdictions, charters, &c., charges to enter heir, &c., suspensions, &c., and other writs and diligences raised or issued, and which were not at all, or not fully, executed and perfected, before the said 24th day of June instant: And seeing there was no interruption in the Royal authority, &c.; Therefore the said Lords, &c., do declare that they will allow and sustain the said summonses and others foresaid, with all that has followed, or may follow thereupon, in like way and manner, and to have that force and effect, as if the same had been perfected and received full effect and execution during the life and reign of our said late sovereign; and that it shall be lawful to execute and further prosecute and follow out all summonses, and others foresaid, in the name of her present Majesty, albeit the said summonses, and others foresaid, have been raised or issued in the name of the late King: And further, in respect that the Court did adjourn over from Thursday the 22d to Tuesday the 27th days of June instant, the Lords declare that the 23d, 24th, 25th, and 26th days of June instant, shall not be numbered as part of the reclaiming days, or of the space assigned to elapse upon any act or order of Court, or in reckoning the year and day in processes that were about to fall asleep."

On July 6, 1837, their Lordships passed another Act, "Considering that the correct style of Bills of Suspension ought to contain a conclusion, drawn from the narrative and reasons of suspension, that the decree and charge or other proceed-

---

* In communicating his opinion to the Lord President of the Court of Session, Lord Chief Justice Tindal says,—“I now send you the opinion which I hold upon the different points mentioned in the printed paper which accompanied your Lordship's letter. It agrees in substance with the opinions of Mr Justice Littledale, Mr Baron Park, Mr Justice Bossanquet, Mr Baron Alderson, and Mr Justice Patteson, with whom I have communicated on the subject.”

† See ante, p. 927, foot-note.

---

ERRATA IN VOL. XV.

- In place of the rubric of Thomson, Dec. 9, 1836, ante, p. 1 given in the General Index, Process X. 2.
In the petition for reducing an upset price, in a process of sale at the foot of p. 499, it is stated that a motion was made for an adjournment in respect that all parties concerned consented. This is a mistake, as it was not in the process of sale that the motion was made.
-

ERRATUM IN VOL. XIV.

- In place of the rubric, p. 1137, § 2, read as follows :—(2. cross-examined one of the pursuer's witnesses, offered evidence made by that witness on cross-examination, by evidence extrajudicially made by him, when not on oath :—July 13, 1836, ante, XIV. 1128), that such proof was

INDEX OF MATTERS

IN

VOLUME XV.

---

ACCOUNTING.

1. A heritable bond stipulated that the rate of interest for the first five years should not exceed 4 per cent; the full legal rate was exigible after that period: the creditor lived for several years after the lapse of that period, and after his death a question arose between his representatives and the debtor, whether the interest had been continued at the rate of 4 per cent: Held, in the circumstances, that the debtor was not liable for more than 4 per cent, in respect, inter alia, that the creditor had, without objection, received an account, and a balance from the debtor, on the footing that the interest continued at that rate, and also that the market rate of interest during the years in dispute, did not exceed 4 per cent. Stocks, June 9, 1837, p. 1095.
2. Circumstances in which, where a summary application was presented to the sheriff, by the proprietor of a newspaper, against a clerk recently in his employment, concluding for immediate restitution of the amount of certain accounts, as uplifted by the clerk without authority;—Held that it was an incompetent proceeding, in respect that the matters in dispute between the parties formed a proper subject for an ordinary action of count and reckoning. Macallan, May 19, 1837, p. 956.

See Plaine, Dec. 3, 1836, p. 194.

See Arrestment, 4.—Interest—Trust, 3.

ACQUIESCENCE.

1. Circumstances which, held to infer acquiescence, and to bar a party, personally exceptione, from claiming a share of a succession of which he was originally in right. Gray, Feb. 7, 1837, p. 494.

See Contract—Homologation—Process, X. 28.

ACT OF GRACE.

- 1.—(1.) A party was convicted under 9 Geo. IV. c. 39, of taking salmon in close-time, and the Justices fined him in £3, besides £1, 3s. of expenses; the sentence ordained “execution to pass hereon by poinding in terms of said act, and by imprisonment in the Jail of A. for the period of two months, unless said sums be sooner paid:”—Held that, although the question was attended with extreme difficulty, the party was entitled, after imprisonment, to the benefit of the Act of Grace.

tion. Id., 2 Col. 20, 207, p. 200.

ACT OF SEDERUNT.

1. March 11, 1837. Apportioning the duties of Clerks of 1 W. IV. c. 69, § 13, p. 1317.
2. June 27, 1837. (1.) Allowing and sustaining all Summ the execution of which was commenced in the reign of perfected before the proclamation of Queen Victoria, to admit of being followed out in the name of the Queen. currency of the reclaiming days, &c., during the period adjourned in consequence of the death of King William,
3. July 6, 1837. Enjoining that Bills of Suspension, in contain a conclusion, that the decree and charge, or ot plained of, should be suspended; followed by a prayer ( sion; under the certification of nullity if the said concl if any other material deviation from the proper style occ

ADJUDICATION.

Where only one creditor raised a summons of adjudic creditors lodged defences:—Held that a record should mon form, before pronouncing any decree of adjudica the grounds for allowing a summary decree, reserving ol mon in any second or posterior adjudication, did no Wotherspoon, July 11, 1837, p. 1268.

See Bankruptcy, 2—Entail, 14, (2.)—Crawford, July 6,

ADMIRALTY. See Jurisdiction, 4.

ADVOCATE (HIS MAJESTY'S). See Title to Pursue, 3, (2.

ADVOCATION. See Process, 17.

AFFIDAVIT. See Bankruptcy, 14.

AGENT AND CLIENT.

1. In an action for payment of an account for conducting Court of Session,—circumstances in which held that ou charged, and not professional services. Bayne, Nov. 16
2. A subject was struck out of a process of ranking and the creditors and common agent, and was afterwards agent as trustee for the postponed creditors in the ran circumstances, that the common agent was not entitled sion of 27 per cent on the price of the subject—particula

AGENT AND CLIENT (Continued).

4. Objection repelled to an auditor's report on an account of expenses of process, that during part of the currency of the account the pursuer's agent had no attorney's certificate. Clyne, May 31, 1837, p. 1051.

See Agent and Principal, 1.—Compensation, 1.—Proof, II. 1, (2, 3.)—Right in Security, 2.—Reparation, 4.—Small Debt Act (2.)—Transaction—Arbitration, 2.—Expenses, 2.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL.

1. A party's agent, by his instructions, sold a lease; the party forwarded to the agent an assignation containing a receipt and discharge for the price, which the agent delivered up to the purchaser on receiving the price:—Held, in a subsequent action by the seller against his agent and the purchaser, that no circumstances of collusion between them were established, sufficient to take off the effect of the written discharge held by the purchaser. Swan, Dec. 13, 1836, p. 251.
2. The trustee on a sequestrated estate held also a commission of factory from a heritable creditor, with full power to uplift and discharge the debt due to him; the trustee made up titles, as such, to the heritable property, sold it, and drew the price; in the dispositions to the purchasers he acknowledged the prices to have been paid him as factor for the heritable creditor: in the books of the estate he charged himself with these prices, but of the same dates entered them on the credit side as paid to the heritable creditor; he, however, did not as factor execute any discharge in favour of the estate, and, in his accounts with the creditor, he stated a certain sum as retained by him to answer the expenses of sale; this sum he applied to his own uses, charging the expenses in his accounts with the estate, which were subsequently audited and passed by the commissioners; having become bankrupt and resigned,—Held, in a competition between the new trustee and the heritable creditor for an outstanding balance of the prices of the properties, that for the sum retained by the former trustee to answer expenses the estate was accountable, and that it must be held as in their hands for the satisfaction of the expenses chargeable against the heritable creditor. Gibson, Nov. 24, 1836, p. 143.
3. Held, in conformity with the case of King v. Shirra, January 23, 1827, that an action against a bank-agent, in his character as such, on account of a bank transaction, in which the agent was alleged to have acted wrongfully, was incompetently laid. Russel and Aitken, May 23, 1837, p. 989.

See Arrestment, 4, 5.—Entail, 12.—Lien—Sale, 2, 3.—Husband and Wife, 6.

ALIMENT—ALIMENTARY FUND.

1. Circumstances in which, held, in a competition upon the arrears of an alimentary annuity, that a first assignation thereof, was preferable to a second, where there was as strong ground for presuming the assignation to have been made for an alimentary debt, in the first case as in the second; and farther, that the first assignee was preferable to the cedent. Waddell, Nov. 26, 1836, p. 151.
2. Circumstances in which the Court awarded aliment at the rate of £60 per annum, on account of a child of 2 years of age residing with its mother. MacEwan, Dec. 22, 1836, p. 302.
3. An heir of entail died without a settlement, and left a widow and five children, all in pupillarity; the free rental of the estate was £384,—Held, in the circumstances, that a sum of £100 per annum should be awarded to the widow, in name of aliment for the heir, and £150 in name of aliment to herself. Jackson, Dec. 24, 1836, p. 313.

See Arrestment, 2.—Husband and Wife, 3.—Factor Loco Tutoris, 1, 5.—Testament, 1.

AMENDMENT OF THE LIBEL. See Process, I.

ANNUITY.

- 1.—(1.) The value of an annuity dependent on lives, when estimated for the purpose of drawing a composition from an obligant whose estates had been

ANNUITY (Continued).

sequestrated, to be calculated as at the date of the sequestration, and at the date of settlement.

(2.) The Northampton tables adopted as the rule of calculation.

(3.) Right to composition not excluded by no claim having been till after the discharge.

(4.) Creditor not bound to deduct value of a heritable security in the bond of annuity over the estate of another co-obligant, with the composition and all other payments, still left the annuity to Ferguson, Nov. 16, 1836, p. 25.

APPEAL. See Process, X. 5.—Corporation, 1, (3.)

APPRENTICE. See Master and Servant, 2.

APPROBATE AND REPROBATE. See Foreign, 1.—Title to Pursue, 7.

ARBITRATION.

1. An arbiter has power to award expenses, without any special clause effect in the submission. Robertson, Dec. 6, 1836, p. 199.

2.—(1.) Where the agent of one of the parties to a submission, impropriate decree-arbital obreptione, and by improper and unfair procedure—the decree is liable to reduction.

(2.) Circumstances in which this rule was applied. Calder, Feb. p. 463.

3. The terms of a decree-arbital were somewhat ambiguous, in defining servitude-right of cutting reeds and rushes within a loch, as combining servitude-right of pasturage on the space between the summer-mary loch and its winter flood-mark: a proof was allowed as to the content of the loch, and rushes, &c., and of the practice in using the servitude-arbitring which, decree was pronounced in terms of the decree—thereby elucidated. Cuninghame, Dec. 20, 1836, p. 295.

See Union Canal Company, Dec. 3, 1836, p. 194.

ARRESTMENT.

1.—(1.) A deposited certain sealed packets, the property of his debtor, in the custody of C, who made them the subject of a multiplepoinding; another creditor of B, claimed, and used arrestments in the hands of C in a competition between A's executor-creditor and D, that D could competently attach the packets subject to the right of pledge or vested in A, for satisfying the debt due to him by B.

(2.) The executor-creditor of A having been confirmed to his property, though not specially to the subject of the fund in medio, and additions having been made to the inventory pending the proceeding specially with reference to the subject of the fund,—Held that, by his action and the additions made thereto, he had a sufficient title and could insist in his claim over the fund. Bridges, Nov. 15, 1836, p. 8.

2. The wife of a retired barrack-officer, living in separation from her husband, had been found entitled, by decree of the Commissaries, to an alimenter yearly out of his pension, which was regularly paid; having arrested her husband's funds in security and for payment of the annuity, the Court refused the arrestments, on the husband's producing a discharge by the wife of sums of anniment already due, together with an assignation in her favor authorizing payment of the £10, and a certificate by the proper office barrack department that this allowance would be made good to her husband. Gregor, Feb. 25, 1837, p. 681.

3. A party died intestate, leaving four next of kin, the creditors of or next of kin used arrestments in the hands of a debtor to the deceased, being now debtor to him (the arrester's) debtor; two of the other next of kin afterwards expede a confirmation, specially including the whole debt due to the deceased, the arrestee then paid the debt to the executor, and obtained a discharge from them:—Held (by a majority) the arrestee was still liable to the arrester, in respect that, by the s

ARRESTMENT (Continued).

- Geo. IV. c. 98, the moveable estate of the deceased vested ipso jure in the surviving next of kin, to the effect of being either assignable or arrestable, though no confirmation had been expedite at the date of such assignation or arrestment. Frith, March 3, 1837, p. 729.
4. The factor on a trust-estate rendered to the trustees an account of charge and discharge, showing a certain balance in his favour, but never gave in a complete state of his intromissions; thereafter a creditor of the factor used arrestments in the hands of the trustees of the sums due to him, and brought an action of furthcoming;—Held, in an advocacy, that there were no termini habiles for giving decree in the process of furthcoming for the balance appearing on the account or to any other amount, until a complete state of the factor's intromissions should be made up; and that the duty of exhibiting such a state was legally incumbent on the creditor. Cunninghame, Feb. 28, 1837, p. 687.
  5. A merchant consigned to a commission-agent a certain quantity of oil for sale and return; the agent sold the oil in his own name on the merchant's account to two different parties; a creditor of the merchant thereafter used arrestments in the hands of the agent, the price of the oil not having been recovered from either of the purchasers at the date thereof—Held, that the arrestments were ineffectual, and that the circumstance of the agent having taken a bill from one of the purchasers, and discounted it prior to the arrestment for his own accommodation, made no difference in regard to the efficacy of the arrestment. Johnston, May 12, 1837, p. 904.
  - 6.—(1.) Where the holder of a fund, due to a third party, possesses a right of retention as against that party, such right is equally available against the arresting creditor of that party.
(2.) Circumstances in which this rule was applied in favour of trustees, holders of a legacy due to a party who involved them in improper litigation, and was subjected in expenses; the trustees being found entitled to retain these expenses out of the legacy, in a question with the legatee's arresting creditors, though part of the expenses was incurred, and the decree for expenses was pronounced, only after the arrestments had been used. Brodie, June 27, 1837, p. 1195.

See Partnership, 1.—Clarke, July 19, 1837, p. 1305.

ASSAULT. See Reparation, 5.—Cessio, 7.

ASSIGNATION. See Alimentary Fund, 1.

ATTESTOR. See Bankruptcy, 3.

ATTORNEY'S CERTIFICATE. See Agent and Client, 3, 4.

AUCTIONEER. See Sale, 3.

AUGMENTATION. See Church—Teinds, 1.

BANKRUPTCY.

1. In an application for a discharge under the 61st section of the Bankrupt Act, Held,
(1.) That contingent creditors must be computed, along with other creditors, in estimating the concurrence of the four-fifths; and,
(2.) That, where a petition was presented, and intimated, before the requisite concurrence was obtained, its original incompetency was not cured, by subsequently obtaining the requisite concurrence: and petition accordingly refused. Gilfillan, Nov. 26, 1837, p. 149.
2. A bankrupt who was in right of certain heritage, died without conveying it to the trustee; the trustee onerously became bound to dispoise the heritage to a third party, and dispoised it, but died without obtaining a special adjudication in his favour; the Court thereafter granted a petition for a special adjudication of the heritage, in favour of the succeeding trustee, to enable him effectually to implement the conveyance by the prior trustee. Beattie, Nov. 29, 1836, p. 157.
3. It was fixed by a final interlocutor, that the bankrupt pursuer of a reduction

BANKRUPTCY (Continued).

could only insist, on finding caution for expenses; he found a caution attester, but the attester became bankrupt during the preparation of the cause: Held that the defender might object, before the Lord Ordinary farther procedure, until a new attester should be found; and that the 11th July, 1828, § 118, did not apply to the case. A. B., Nov. 29 p. 158.

4. A party purchased lands under a ranking and sale, and obtained a discharge and was infeft: after possessing for a considerable number of years he became bankrupt without paying the price, and his estates were sequestrated. A heritable creditor, who was entitled to about one-third of the proceeds of the ranking and sale, presented a bill of suspension and interdict to prevent the bankrupt from conveying the lands to his trustee, and craving that he should be resold under the ranking and sale which was still in dependence. The trustee stated that he kept the accounts of these lands separate from the general estate of the bankrupt, and that he was willing to accept a discharge which should declare the conveyance to be "under the burden of the preferences legally constituted over them."—Bill refused, with exception in respect of the statutory right of the trustee to exact a conveyance which should only transfer to him the bankrupt's right, tantum et tale as it was in the bankrupt. Gordon, Dec. 3, 1836, p. 187.

5. A petition for approval of composition was presented to the Court and required concurrence, as the ranking of the creditors then stood; and afterwards was ranked, and opposed the petition, which was, in consequence, refused by the Lord Ordinary, in the time of session, acting under authority from the Court; before the reclaiming days expired, other creditors ranked, whose concurrence restored the requisite proportion of votes in favour of the petitioner, who presented a reclaiming note against the Lord Ordinary's judgment.—Held,

(1.) That the whole of the creditors, including those who ranked after the Lord Ordinary's judgment, must be computed in estimating the proportion of concurring creditors.

(2.) That no new petition was necessary, as the presentation of the first petition was warranted by the state of the concurrence at its date; and

(3.) That it was competent to the Lord Ordinary to pronounce a judgment refusing the petition, but that such judgment was liable to review by any other judgment of a Lord Ordinary. Nicolson, Dec. 3, 1836, p. 187.

6. Letters of horning were issued against a debtor on 27th February, 1835, on a charge given, which was followed by denunciation in March, the letters of execution being then duly registered and marked; in 1836, a second charge was given on the same letters, and the debtor denounced, when the execution of charge and the denunciation were duly recorded, but the letters were again registered or marked, reference being merely made to them in the execution of horning:—Held, on a petition for sequestration at the instance of the creditor, that the evidence of bankruptcy was not objectionable on the ground of the letters wanting a certificate of registration in 1836. N. Bank, Dec. 20, 1836, p. 289.

7. In granting the petition of a trustee, for confirmation in common form the Court refused another part of the prayer which craved their Lordships approve of a resolution of the creditors authorizing the trustee to come to a private bargain as to the disposal of the bankrupt's stock in trade, on such terms as he might consider beneficial to the estate. Low, Dec. 1836, p. 290.

8. Circumstances in which the Court held that the transactions and dealings of a party, with a bankrupt, were not such as to render him subject to execution by the trustee, under § 32 of the Bankrupt Act, as a person "connected with the bankrupt's business." Nisbet, Jan. 28, 1837, p. 439.

9. Circumstances in which the Court granted a petition for sequestration

BANKRUPTCY (Continued).

bankrupt, though opposed by the trustees under a private trust-deed for the whole creditors, who were vested both in the heritage and moveables of the bankrupt, and had effected partial sales of the moveables:—in respect, inter alia,

(1.) That the creditors who acceded, had done so, under the condition of the bankrupt giving such explanation of his affairs as they should deem satisfactory, and that the petitioning creditors were not satisfied with the explanations given;

(2.) That all the creditors had not acceded; and,

(3.) That, under the private trust, a great deal of litigation was about to ensue respecting alleged preferences by the bankrupt. Lockie, Feb. 14, 1837, p. 547.

10. Where a party, whose estate had been sequestrated under the Bankrupt Act, absconded from the second diet of examination appointed by the sheriff, without taking the oath prescribed by the 33d section of the statute,—Petition for approval of a composition offered by a friend of the bankrupt and agreed to by the creditors, refused as incompetent. Wilkie, Feb. 28, 1837, p. 686.

11. A party was engaged in a trading concern which was wound up in 1819, all the debts being then paid up; in order to pay these, the party borrowed money from his friends; he ceased to be a trader after 1819, but a considerable part of the borrowed money was not paid up, when a creditor, holding a bill dated in 1836, presented a petition for sequestration—Held that the party was not liable to sequestration as a trader. Ogilvie, March 4, 1837, p. 746.

12. A creditor, who was ranked on a sequestrated estate, concurred in discharging the bankrupt on a composition of 3s. per pound, and granted a receipt for the composition on his own debt at that rate, and discharged it; the bankrupt afterwards raised an action against him for payment of a debt due by him to the bankrupt prior to the sequestration, but which was not given up by the bankrupt among the debts due to him; the creditor then raised a reduction of the discharge under the composition contract, and the receipt for the composition on his debt, as having been fraudulently obtained;—Verdict found, in the circumstances, that the discharge and receipt were obtained by fraud, or fraudulent concealment, on the part of the bankrupt. Baillie, March 23, 1837, p. 893.

13.—(1.) The clerk or shopman of a bankrupt was employed by the trustee after sequestration; he made a claim which included arrears of salary incurred prior to sequestration, as well as an allowance for his services since that period; the trustee, with the sanction of the commissioners, paid him a sum of money and obtained a settlement of the claim; Held, that such payment could not be sustained, in so far as it was made on account of wages or services prior to sequestration, and that the sanction of the commissioners did not warrant the trustee in giving a preference, out of the funds of the estate, to an ordinary debt of the bankrupt.

(2.) A bankrupt, with concurrence of his trustee, petitioned for discharge; some of the creditors successfully opposed the petition, and the Court found the bankrupt liable in expenses, and the trustee also liable "qua trustee:" the trustee afterwards resigned, and a new trustee raised an action against him for these expenses, alleging that he had acted fraudulently and in collusion with the bankrupt, in getting up the petition for discharge: Held that the former judgment had not the effect of barring the trust-estate from seeking relief against the ex-trustee, personally, if sufficient grounds existed for subjecting him.

(3.) Where a record was closed, and it appeared necessary for the due administration of justice between the parties, that a farther detail and investigation should be made on one branch of the cause—Remit made to the Lord Ordinary to open up the record in regard thereto, and to receive a more

BANKRUPTCY (Continued).

special and articulate condescendence of the facts in proof of certain collusion alleged.

(4.) Where a trustee erroneously paid sums which were not due, sides debiting him with these sums, the penal interest of 20 per cent them, was claimed from him—Held, that unless he made the pays mala fide, he was not liable in such interest. Maben, June 3, 1 1087.

14. In a competition for the office of interim-factor, and trustee, one competitors, in putting a value, upon oath, on a collateral obligation, ratory to voting, under § 24 of the Bankrupt Act, put a mere im and elusory value, which he knew to be false; he alleged that this was consistent with the practice of others, in like circumstances;—Held: practice, if it existed, was no justification of so gross an abuse, and competitor who had so acted could not be confirmed as trustee in qustration, even although he possessed a preponderance of votes, it after deducting all those on which the false value had been put. June 10, 1837, p. 1107.

15. The trustee on a sequestrated estate held also a commission of factio a heritable creditor, with full power to uplift and discharge the debt him; the trustee made up titles as such to the heritable property, sold drew the price; in the dispositions to the purchasers he acknowledged prices to have been paid him as factor for the heritable creditor: in th of the estate he charged himself with these prices, but of the ~~ent~~ entered them on the credit side as paid to the heritable creditor; b ever, did not as factor execute any discharge in favour of the estate, his accounts with the creditor, he stated a certain sum as retained by answer the expenses of sale; this sum he applied to his own uses, and the expenses in his accounts with the estate, which were subsequently ed and passed by the commissioners; having become bankrupt and r —Held, in a competition between the new trustee and the heritable for an outstanding balance of the prices of the properties, that for retained by the former trustee to answer expenses the estate was a able, and that it must be held as in their hands for the satisfaction of penses chargeable against the heritable creditor. Gibson, Nov. 24, 1 143.

16. A bankrupt and his creditors having agreed to a composition by priv tract, and one of the creditors having become cautioner in the comp and granted composition bills, the bankrupt granted to this creditor a nation of his whole effects, with the view of the creditor operating p to himself, over and above his proportion of the composition sum; that such assignation was illegal, and verdict given accordingly. Re July 13, 1837, p. 1200.

See Annuity.

BASTARD.

- 1.—(1.) Evidence in an action of filiation which held insufficient to warrant pursuer's oath in supplement.

(2.) In such action, the pursuer's sister held not admissible as a except for the purpose of corroborating the testimony of other witne defect of other evidence.

(3.) Circumstances in which additional proof refused to be allowed. Jan. 28, 1837, p. 117.

See Proof II. 2. (2.)

BILL-CHAMBER.

Held, by the whole Court, that "the Act of Sederunt, 6th March does not apply to extracts of decrees for expenses in the Bill Ch Ross, June 30, 1837, p. 1239.

See Process VI. 3.—Cautioner. 7.

BILL OF EXCEPTION: See Queries as to form of Bills of Exception, and Answers by Lord Chief Justice Tindal. Appendix, No. III. p. 1312.—Proof IV. 9, (1.)—Process III.

BILL OF EXCHANGE.

1. A charge was given to the acceptors of a bill of exchange, which had not been acquired by the chargers until after the term of payment, and after the bill was noted for non-payment: in a suspension, the acceptors alleged, that they were not debtors in the bill, and that the chargers were duly made aware of that fact; they recovered documentary evidence, under a diligence, which afforded presumptions, but not conclusive proof, of these averments: Held that, in the circumstances, they were entitled to a proof prout de jure, in respect of the general rule to allow investigation by parole evidence, where there was reason to suspect unfair dealing as to bills of exchange. Macdonald, Dec. 23, 1836, p. 303.

2.—(1.) Parties with whom a bill (repeatedly renewed) was discounted, allowed it to lie over for some months after it became due, without any communication had with the acceptors; at the request of the drawer, who truly had no claim of debt against the acceptors, they delivered up to him the bill; about fifteen months thereafter they recovered possession of it by having recourse to judicial measures, and sued the acceptors for payment of the contents;—Held that the acceptors were not relieved by what had occurred of their liability as such.

(2.) In an action for payment, by the onerous holders of a bill accepted by the executors of a party deceased, as such, no defence that they have no executry funds. Eaton, May 25, 1837, p. 1012.

3. Held that the indorser of a bill of exchange, who does not offer payment thereof to the holder of the bill, has no right to control the holder in the use of diligence against other parties to the bill. Kerr, May 30, 1837, p. 1041.

4. In a bill of suspension of a charge on an acceptance, it was averred that the signature was either a forgery, or, if genuine, had been obtained by gross fraud, but no genuine subscription was produced for comparison—Bill (which the Lord Ordinary had refused) passed on caution. Rannie, May 31, 1837, p. 1049.

5. A party, who was trustee for G. P., granted a promissory-note, bearing to be “for value in trust-account,” but without specifying the trust, and there having been ex post facto added “for Mr P.”—Circumstances in which held that such alteration did not import a vitiation of the bill. Commercial Bank, June 28, 1837, p. 1202.

6. The drawer of a bill of exchange raised action for payment of the contents against an indorsee who had recovered the amount, on the ground of want of onerosity, the statements in the record referring solely to that allegation; on a reference to oath the indorsee deponed to circumstances tending to show his want of bona fides, but not showing want of onerosity;—Held that, whatever might have been the case in another shape of the record, the pursuer having failed to prove the allegation on which the action was rested, the defender fell to be assolizied. Brown, June 29, 1837, p. 1230.

See Foreign, 3.—Oath on Reference—Young, June 27, 1837, p. 1202—Ross, June 29, 1837, p. 1219.

BURGH.

1. The magistrates of a royal burgh, besides their ordinary burgh-court, were in use to hold another weekly court for the decision of cases under 40s. in value, originally constituted by an Act of Council in 1772, and in which a summary form of procedure was established; after the passing of the Act of Sederunt 1825, prescribing a certain form of process for the Scottish-burgh-courts, this court was continued under the old regulations; in 1828, the magistrates by an Act of Council extended its jurisdiction to cases of £5 value:

BURGH (Continued).

Held, in a reduction of a decree in this court for a debt of £5, <sup>1</sup>/<sub>2</sub> incompetent. Mabon, Nov. 16, 1836, p. 19.

2. A town-clerk having been appointed for five years, and the council at the end of that period having elected another person, found, in a supra interdict, that he was not summarily removable, and the council forbidden from carrying the new appointment into effect, without prejudice to the declarator the council might be advised to institute for having it found that the office came to an end by the lapse of the stipulated period. Farish, 1836, p. 107.

3. Questions,

(1.) Whether, at a meeting to which the whole magistrates had been duly summoned, a minority can competently elect a procurator interim, in the place of a party deceased, under the powers of Will. IV. c. 76, § 25.

(2.) Whether, in the event of a combination existing among members of the council, to absent themselves for the purpose of defeating an election, it becomes competent to the minority to elect.

(3.) Where the complement of the council was twenty-one; and one died; and ten were absent; and the provost, who had a casting vote as a deliberative vote, concurred with the ten members present, intimated that his casting vote was given as well as his deliberative vote. Whether this state of the vote, which would have formed an actual majority, even if all the absent members had been present, and dissented, considered less efficacious in consequence of their being merely absent. July 6, 1837, p. 1250.

See Church, 3.—Citation—Trust—Title to Pursue, 4, 8.—Repairs BURIALS (REGISTER OF). See Proof IV., 5 (5).

CARRIER.

A party in Newcastle ordered a puncheon of spirits from a merchant in Edinburgh, who shipped the puncheon on board a steamer plying between Glasgow and Newcastle, and obtained a bill of lading which he transmitted to the purchaser along with an account charging him with price, freight, and duties. The seller, at the same time, drew a bill for the amount, which the purchaser accepted; the puncheon was secured on the deck; during the voyage a storm arose, and the puncheon was thrown overboard, along with a whole of the cargo in the hold, for the purpose of lightening the vessel. The seller immediately afterwards sent another puncheon of spirits to the purchaser at Newcastle, intimating that no farther price was to be charged in so far as the second puncheon exceeded the first in value, which was a small amount; the seller then raised an action against the purchaser's vessel for the value of the first puncheon, alleging it to have been lost by improper stowage, at a trial before a jury,—Direction by the Lord Judge, that the jury should not find the shipowners liable for the loss of the puncheon to the pursuers, because, if, on the one hand, it was a fault of the shipowners, they were liable to the purchaser at Newcastle, whose risk the puncheon was, from the date of shipment; and on the other hand, it was lost by a peril of the sea, the shipowners were not liable for its value to any party whatever. Dunlop, March 21, 1837, p. 1250.

See Proof II. 1.

CAUTIONER.

- 1.—(1.) On the same day on which a bond for £2000, with a discharge, was granted, a party executed a letter of obligation, addressed to the creditor, whereby he guaranteed payment of the bond; the creditor succeeded on the narrative of the bond having been granted, but the not make any reference, in gremio, to the letter :—Held that, in these circumstances, the septennial prescription of 1695, c. 5, did not apply to the letter, though it was pars ejusdem negotii with the bond, because that statute is limited to cautionary obligations which are contained in the same writing with the principal obligation.

* See this direction affirmed. Title to Pursue, 8.

CAUTIONER (Continued).

(2.) Question whether, if the bond had referred in gremio to the letter, as well as the letter to the bond, the statute would have applied. Tait, Dec. 8, 1836, p. 221.

2. Where a cautionary obligation bound three parties, not jointly and severally, but each pro rata only,—Held competent to raise action against two of the co-obligants, for payment of their respective shares, without calling the representatives of the third, who was deceased. M'Arthur, Dec. 15, 1836, p. 270.

3. A party having come under a cautionary obligation, which in its terms and substance bore express reference to certain stipulations contained in a previous minute of agreement between the principal debtor and the creditor—Held to be relieved of the obligation in consequence of the stipulations having been, without his knowledge, contravened through the act of the creditor. Walker, Feb. 10, 1837, p. 526.

4.—(1.) Where the curator bonis of an absent party made an illegal agreement with the person who was heir-presumptive of the absent party, which was to the prejudice of the judicial cautioner of the curator, and this agreement was acted on for a term of years—Held that the cautioner was thereby liberated, in any question with that person.

(2.) Circumstances in which this rule was applied. Lawson, May 17, 1837, p. 930.

5. Where a debtor assigned a life-policy in security of certain advances, and his friend granted a relative guarantee for payment of the premiums, and annual interest on the advances—Held that the sum uplifted by the creditor out of the policy, after the debtor's death, must be imputed, after satisfying the principal of the advances, in extinction of an arrear of interest due on them, and not in payment of any other debt due by the deceased to the creditor. Sandeman, Jan. 26, 1837, p. 416.

6. A party caused a summons to be executed, and inhibition to be used on the dependence ; a preliminary defence was stated that the execution of the summons was irregular, and, after considerable discussion, that defence was sustained, and the party was subjected in expenses ; the party had intimated by letter to the messenger as soon as the objection was taken to his execution, and the messenger had answered, maintaining his execution to be unobjectionable ; the party had also, in the middle of the discussion, intimated directly to the cautioners of the messenger, who took no notice of it :—Held that both the messenger and his cautioners were liable to relieve the party of the expenses of the discussion, and of the expense of the inhibition on the dependence. Collier, Dec. 6, 1836, p. 195.

7. Warrant granted to the clerks to the bills to deliver up to a suspender the bond of caution in the depending process of suspension at his instance, in respect of his producing a new bond of caution, which was reported by the clerks to the bills to be signed by sufficient obligants. Bett, Dec. 24, 1836, p. 313.

See Bankruptcy, 3, 16.

CESSIO.

1. Where a debtor, who was under horning on a bill of exchange, and against whom a sheriff small-debt decree had been taken out, raised a process of cessio, during the vacation of the Court of Session, and made intimation in terms of the statute 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56—Warrant granted by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (after intimating the application) for his personal protection until the third sederunt-day of the ensuing session, but such war-

Cessio (Continued).

- rant not to issue till a bond of caution to attend all diets of lodged with the clerk in terms of section 15 of said statute. Term afterwards prorogated by the Court. Sawers, Nov. 15, 1836.
2. A party raised a summons of cessio and published the requisition in the Edinburgh Gazette, and sent circulars through the post-office to all creditors, besides executing edictal citation against such creditors forth of Scotland: he produced the requisite evidence of this, a petition for personal protection, which he presented within two days of raising his summons: the Court ordered intimation in the minutes also to a creditor named in the petition who had given him a charging, and thereafter, although no opposition was made, and ~~cost~~ amount of the whole debts, was offered; their Lordships superadded, in the mean time, in respect of a doubt as to their jurisdiction, a petition presented before the statutory period of 30 days had expired; and because that question was now pending in a citation, on minutes ordered for the whole Court. Hamilton, Dec. 10, 1836, p. 190.
3. An unopposed cessio, which was raised under 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56, enrolled and pleaded in the Inner House, after the expiration of the period of intimation; the pursuer was personally present in Court; held, and, in the circumstances, expedient, to administer the oath to him without making any remit to the sheriff under the twelfth section of the statute. Hackston, Jan. 24, 1837, p. 411.
4. A petition for interim protection was presented by a party within two days after raising a process of cessio under 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56; ordered by the Court, in respect that this did not prejudice the rights of the party, and, in particular, did not affect the question whether the petition could competently be decided on the merits, before the expiration of the induciae allowed by the statute for bringing the defenders in into Court. Hamilton, Feb. 16, 1837, p. 570.
5. Where a creditor, defender in a process of cessio, raised under 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56, gives in a list of persons whom he alleges to be the pursuer, and who have not received letters of intimation through the post-office, nor been cited.—Held that the pursuer is bound, before the Court, to cite them, and that the notice in the Gazette does not dispense with the necessity of this, but that the creditor-defender will be liable for the expense occasioned by this objection, if the parties in the list are not the pursuer. Renny, March 11, 1837, p. 852.
6. When a process of cessio is raised under 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56, and the statutory induciae expire during vacation—Question whether it is for the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to hear the cause on the merits. Forsyth, May 16, 1837, p. 927.
7. A farm-servant committed a severe personal assault on his fellow-servant for which he was both punished with imprisonment in the criminal court, and subjected in damages in the civil court, for the civil debt, he was imprisoned of above six months, in addition to his penal imprisonment. He was an unmarried man.—Circumstances in which held that he was entitled to the benefit of a decree of cessio, except on condition of his paying to his fellow-servant 2s. per week, out of his wages, amounted to 5s. per week, in money, besides bed and board; but that obligation to such period as he should be himself in the receipt of his wages. Kerr, May, 16, 1837, p. 928.
8. In a process of cessio, raised in the Court of Session, under 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56, an examination of the pursuer took place under a writ of Habeas Corpus ad Satisfaciendum; when the cause was resumed by the Inner House, a question was raised between the parties, whether the pursuer or defenders should, in the first instance, discharge the expense of printing, 1st, The pursuer's state-

CESSIO (Continued).

2d, The pursuer's deposition before the Sheriff. The Court considered the state of affairs to be in the place of the old condescendence, and directed the pursuer to be at the expense of printing it, at least in the first instance. The defenders offered to bear one-half of the expense of printing the pursuer's examination; but the Court directed them to bear the whole expense, in the meantime. Taylor, June 17, 1837, p. 1157.

9.—(1.) An application for cessio was presented to a Sheriff under the recent statute, the name of a certain creditor, who was residing furth of Scotland, not being inserted in the petition,—the Court refused to allow a supplementary action for rectifying the omission, and affirmed the Sheriff's judgment dismissing the petition.

(2.) Question, whether an application for cessio be competent in the Sheriff Court, where there are foreign creditors? Fraser, June 30, 1837, p. 1244.

10. Held that the creditor of the pursuer of a cessio, who has been duly cited as such, is not admissible as a witness in support of the opposition to the cessio (though he has made no appearance as an opposing party), in respect that he is a party, and has an interest in the issue of the process. Kennedy, July 11, 1837, p. 1294.

See Taylor, Feb. 4, 1837, p. 486.

Yeatts, Feb. 16, 1837, p. 571.

Taylor, March 7, 1837, p. 753. July 6, 1837, p. 1254.

Forsyth, May 18, 1837, p. 950.

CHANCERY.

On the demise of the Director of Chancery, the Court made an interim appointment of a Director, in order to prevent any public inconvenience during the interval, prior to the completion of a permanent appointment; and their Lordships directed the interim appointment to be recorded in the books of sederunt. Dundas, Jan 20, 1837, p. 398.

CHURCH.

1. Held, as the sequel of the case reported ante, XIV. p. 509, that the minister of one of the Parliamentary Churches, who, in ignorance of his right to become a contributor to the Ministers' Widows' Fund, had allowed several years to elapse without claiming such right, was liable as a contributor, as at and from the date of his induction, and that, at the rate fixed by the statute for those who have not duly declared their selection of one of the rates prescribed by the statute; and that he was chargeable with interest on the arrears of such rate, all in terms of the statute. Gordon, Nov. 16, 1836, p. 15.

2. Circumstances in which the Court refused to award any augmentation to the minister of a parish, having a stipend of 16 chalders. Minister of Edrom, Dec. 20, 1836, p. 301.

3. A parish contained a royal burgh and a land-ward district; two ministers officiated in the parish; in 1817, the town-council, who were patrons, applied to the Presbytery to revive and institute a third charge within the parish, which had formerly been established by authority of the church-courts; the Presbytery did so, "on condition that the council bind themselves to make up the stipend of the third charge to £200 per annum:" the council agreed to this, and, as patrons, granted repeated presentations to the third charge, and, on the death of one of the ministers holding that charge, they paid £100 as Ann, to the widow, and £100 to the Ministers' Widows' Fund, as a half-year's vacant stipend; the stipend was payable out of the ordinary funds of the burgh; on a subsequent vacancy, the council refused to pay any thing in name of vacant stipend to the Ministers' Widows' Fund:—Held that the endowment of the third pastoral charge was of a permanent nature; that the charge was a benefice in the sense of the statutes relative to the Ministers' Widows' Fund; and that the vacant stipend, which was for half-a-year, being

CHURCH (Continued).

£100, was due to the Fund. Magistrates and Council of Stirling, 1837, p. 657.

4. Circumstances in which the Court refused to award any portion of the second minister of a collegiate charge. Brewster, May 26, 1837, p. 991.
5. The church judicatories of a Dissenting body having pronounced a declaration of the minister of a church in communion out of connexion — Circumstances in which the Court awarded a conjoint possession of the church by alternate diets to the minister, on the one hand, and the judicatories should appoint, on the other, pending a decision whether the minister's incumbency under his agreement with the parish of the church, and his right of possession, had been brought to an end by that sentence. Galbraith, March 10, 1837, p. 808.
6. When a manse, though "capable of being repaired, requires very extensive repairs to render it at all habitable, it is not incompetent to consider what may be necessary to be done, whether by repairs or alterations, to render the manse sufficient and suitable to the circumstances of the benefice, and a competent residence for the Minister of the parish. Michael, May 23, 1837, p. 1020.
7. Held, notwithstanding certain allegations of a contrary custom of the parish, that the principle of assessment for rebuilding a parish church, as fixed in the case of Peterhead, applied to a parish containing a large tract composed of three or four hundred inhabited houses, which were the greater part, on small fees, but had never been erected into a parish. Boydell, June 15, 1837, p. 1148.

See Poor 2, (2).—Trust, 8.

CITATION.

An action was raised before a burgh-court, against a lawyer, who had his writing-office within the burgh, but whose dwelling-house, as of the summons, was without the burgh: the action was accessory to an already depending in the burgh-court, and bore to be raised for the purpose of being conjoined with it. A statute was, soon after, passed, enlarging the jurisdiction of the burgh, so as to include the dwelling-place of the lawyer. Thereafter, he was cited at his dwelling-place, in common form: He was liable to the jurisdiction of the magistrates, and that he was declared. Hunter, March 1, 1837, p. 693.

See Heir and Executor, 1, (2).

CLAUSE. See Fic and Liferent, 2, 3.

CLERK OF SESSION. See Public Officer, 3.—Process X, 23.—A. S., 1837, p. 1317.

COMPANY. See Partnership.

COMPENSATION.

1. A country practitioner was employed to conduct law proceedings for a party resident in Edinburgh, and he communicated with the parish burgh solicitor:—In an action by the solicitor against the country practitioner for payment of an account due to him in reference to other business, pleaded compensation, in respect of the account incurred to himself, that there were no termini habiles for the plea of compensation as in Taylor, Dec. 11, 1836, p. 263.
2. Plea of compensation, depending on special circumstances, repelled. Feb. 16, 1837, p. 586.
3. Circumstances in which a set-off, in name of compensation, was disallowed, excepting to a small extent, as being uninstructed by the admission of the party, and no other evidence being produced. Sibbald, Feb. 17, 1837, p. 1020.

See Bankruptcy, 12.—Partnership, 1.—Executor.

COMPETITION. See Foreign, 4.—Arrestment, 1.—Aliment, 1.

CONDITIO SINE LIBERIS. See Testament, 3, (3).

CONFIRMATION.

1.—1. The creditor of a defunct having obtained decree of constitution, cognitionis causa, raised an edict in the Commissary Court, on February 12th; it was published at the market-cross and parish church, respectively, on 14th and 16th February; notice of the application was published in the Gazette of February 21st; decree, decerning the party executor-creditor, was pronounced on February 26th; the oath, emitted by the creditor, related to the amount of estate left by the defunct, and given up in inventory, and it did not relate to the verity of the debt; sentence of confirmation as executor was pronounced on March 8th: Held that the confirmation was regularly expedite, and was not objectionable, either

(1.) In respect of the oath not having deposed to the verity of the debt, as that is not required by 4 Geo. IV. c. 98; or

(2.) In respect of the lateness of the notice in the Gazette, as the advertisement was duly given, in terms of that statute, and the explanatory A. S. Nov. 12, 1825, § 19, as to the Commissary Court.

2. In granting commission to take the oath of a party applying for confirmation, and who resides in a different commissariat from that in which confirmation is applied for: Held no irregularity to appoint a party to be commissioner who was not commissary clerk, or commissary clerk-depute, of the district in which the oath was to be taken. Greig, March 1, 1837, p. 697.

2. A party died intestate, leaving four next of kin; the creditors of one of the next of kin used arrestments in the hands of a debtor to the deceased, as being now debtor to his (the arrester's) debtor; two of the other next of kin afterwards expedite a confirmation, specially including the whole debt due by the arrestee to the deceased; the arrestee then paid the debt to the confirmed executors, and obtained a discharge from them: Held (by a majority), that the arrestee was still liable to the arrester, in respect that, by the statute 4 Geo. IV. c. 98, the moveable estate of the deceased vested ipso jure in the surviving next of kin, to the effect of being either assignable or arrestable, though no confirmation had been expedite at the date of such assignation or arrestment. Frith, March 3, 1837, p. 729.

See Arrestment, 1.

CONFUSIO.

The ten-pound land of C. was composed of the 10 merk land of C., and the 5 merk land of C., of old extent; the lands lay contiguous, and had been possessed as one undistinguished property for about two centuries: in 1637 a decree of valuation of the 10 merk land of C. had been obtained before the High Court; in a question in 1837 how far that decree was available in a process of locality, where the 10 merk land could not be separately identified,—Held, that, as the blending of the lands had taken place without blame being imputable to any party, the benefit of the decree was not lost; and that, as nothing appeared to take off the presumption, arising from the old extent, that the 10 merk land was two-thirds of the ten pound land, the proprietor of the ten pound land of C. could only be localled on, to the amount of one-third of his land as unvalued, the remaining two-thirds being covered by the decree of valuation. Johnston, June 13, 1837, p. 1125.

See Entail, 8.

CONSIGNATION. See Process, VII.

CONSOLIDATION. See Entail, 13, (3).

CONTRACT.

1. Circumstances in which the rule was applied, that, after a party takes back his carriage from the yard where it has been repaired, and uses it for a considerable time, without objection, he is barred from afterwards refusing to pay the coach-builder's account in respect of alleged insufficiency in the repairs. Clerk, Dec. 13, 1836, p. 253.

2. Certain proprietors having undertaken the formation of a turnpike road through a district in which their lands lay, and having communicated the scheme to a non-resident proprietor of an entailed estate, who had the general approval, and signed the first of a series of bonds granted and borrowed to complete the undertaking, but died before the date of the deed.—Circumstances which, in a question with the other proprietors, do not establish against him an obligation for the whole undertaking, as against his representatives beyond the extent of his share of the bond which he subscribed. Earl of Traquair, Feb. 2, 1837, p. 475.

CONTRACT (Continued).

See Obligation—Poor, 3.—Master and Servant.

CORPORATION.

- 1.—(1.) Adherence, on remit, to the judgment (ante, XIII. 9), of the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons of Glasgow to be a corporation.
- (2.) The adjunction of a penalty for contravention of corporate regulations does not preclude the corporation from the benefit of an interdict.
- (3.) Expenses in House of Lords awarded to the respondent and authority to determine the same. University of Glasgow, March 3, 1836.
2. Circumstances which held not to justify an award of £50 of damages with expenses of process, against a party who had exercised the right of a tailor in violation of the exclusive privileges of a corporation, and in violation of an interdict. Murison, Dec. 2, 1836, p. 179.

COUNCILLOR. See Burgh, 3.

CURATOR BONIS.

- 1.—(1.) Competent for the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, in vacation, to make an interim appointment of a curator bonis to a fatuous party.
- (2.) A party became fatuous who was the partner of a trading company, part of the company stock was heritage, which was feudally vested in individual partners; the curator of the fatuous party took his ward of copartnery, and it became necessary, in order to have the value of the stock paid up, that a conveyance of the heritage, so far as vested in the ward, and also of his share in the moveable stock of the company, should be made; in these circumstances the Court granted authority to the curator to execute the requisite conveyances. Ellis, Dec. 14, 1836, p. 262.
2. A fatuous person, whose family resided in America, was possessor of a property which was partly situated there, and partly consisted of money in the charge of a curator bonis in this country; the family sent a mandate to the curator to transmit the funds in his hands, after which there would be no fund left within Scotland for the provision of the fatuous person; the Court granted authority to transmit the funds, and for recall of the curator by the Court. Dalrymple, March 9, 1837, p. 769.
3. Circumstances in which the Court granted authority to the curator of a fatuous person, to grant a lease of a farm for the period of 19 years. July 6, 1837, p. 1254.

See Cautions, 4.—Factor Loco Tutoris—Lease, 10.—Bissets, Nov. 15, 1837.

DEATHBED DEED.

In an action to have a deed reduced on the head of deathbed, terms of previous settlements which held to show that, at the date of the deed, they were to be held as not subsisting, and as insufficient to support the claim of the heir insisting in the reduction. Clyne, May 12, 1837.

DECLINATURE OF JUDGE. See Process III. 8, (2.)

DECREE BY DEFAULT. See Process X. 9.

DESTINATION. See Entail, 3. 9.—Succession, 2.

DILIGENCE.

1. The individual partners of a company with a descriptive denomination, a cash credit bond to a bank, containing a clause of registration, by which they bound themselves nominatim, the company, and all future partners, the drafts to be made by the manager; a party, who subsequently became a partner, was charged individually by an assignee of the bank, for

DILIGENCE (Continued).

- a balance due on the credit, the letters of horning narrating the terms of the bond, and directing the messenger to charge the individuals therein named, and any other partners of the company,—Held that the charge was competent, though the partner was not named in the letters. Maclean, Dec. 9, 1836, p. 236.
  - 2. A party executing diligence on the regular decree of a competent court cannot be sued for damages, although the decree should be ultimately found to be erroneous, and although steps had been taken at the time of using the diligence for bringing it under reduction. Aitkin, Feb. 25, 1837, p. 683.
- See A. S. June 27, 1837, p. 1317.—Bankruptcy, 6.—Inhibition—Meditatione Fugæ Warrant—Personal Objection—Poinning.

ENTAIL.

- 1.—(1.) A party disposed his lands in liferent to a lady, and in fee to the second son to be procreated of her body, and his issue, whom failing, other heirs; he died two years before the lady's second son was born; the fetters were effectually imposed upon the lady, and the heirs of entail: Held that there was no peculiarity in the case to exempt it from the general rule that the fetters of an entail which are laid upon heirs, do not bind the institute.
- (2.) Held by the Lord Ordinary, and acquiesced in, that the institute under an entail, in pursuing a declarator of freedom from the fetters of the entail, should call the whole heirs of entail as parties. Logan, Dec. 20, 1836, p. 291.
- 2. In a deed of entail certain acts were expressly prohibited, and, inter alia, selling or alienation of the estate; the irritant and resolute clause commenced with a general declaration—"in case the heirs of tailzie shall contravene, or fail in performing any part of the premises"—then went on to specify the prohibited acts—"particularly by neglecting to assume," &c., "or by possessing," &c., and concluded with a repetition of the previous general declaration; in the special enumeration the prohibition against alienation was omitted;—Held, notwithstanding, that the heirs of entail were not entitled to sell and that the prohibition so omitted was protected by the general declaration. Horne, Jan. 17, 1837, p. 372.
- 3. A party executed an entail, and granted procuratory to resign the estate for new infeftment, "to myself, and the heirs-male to be procreate of my body, of my present marriage, and the heirs whatsoever of the bodies of the said heirs-male; whom failing, to the heirs-male to be procreated of my body in any subsequent marriage, and the heirs whatsoever of the bodies of the said heirs-male; whom failing, to E. M., my only daughter, and the heirs-male of her body of her present marriage with C. L., and the heirs whatsoever of the body of the said heirs-male; whom failing, to the heirs-male of the said E. M. in any subsequent marriage, and the heirs whatsoever of the bodies of the said heirs-male; whom failing, to the heirs-female of the said E. M. of her present marriage:" E. M. took the estate, and was succeeded by a son and grandson, descending of the marriage with C. L.; the grandson died, leaving daughters:—Held, that these ladies were called to the succession before the younger brother of their father. Lockhart, Jan. 19, 1837, p. 376.
- 4. In making a remit under 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 42, to persons of skill to report on the value of the lands to be exchambed—Held unnecessary to resort to the intervention of a Lord Ordinary; and a remit made, at once, to inspectors, to report directly to the Court. Boswell, Feb. 7, 1837, p. 490.
- 5. The prohibitory clause in an entail executed in 1664, was thus expressed: "It shall noways be lawful to any of the heirs of taillie and provision above specified, to sell, dispoone, or wadset the lands above written or any part thereof, or any annual rents, or yearly duties to be uplifted furth of the samen, or to set takis for longer space than their own lifetimes, or to contract debt for which the samen may be apprised or adjudged, or to do any other

ENTAIL (Continued).

- fact or deed, in prejudice of the said tailzie and of the persons and their forebears:—Held, that this clause contained an inhibition against frustrating the succession. Rowe, Feb. 8, 1837, p. 42.
6. An application to the Court under the 6th and 7th W. IV. c. 42, rity to sell entailed lands for the purpose of paying the entailor's debt, had been intimated in the newspapers, as provided by the statute, farther appointed the petition to be intimated in the minute-books of the Court for eight days, and granted warrant for serving it on the entailor, not being a descendant of the petitioner's body. Torrill, 1837, p. 506.
7. Where a petition for carrying into effect a private act of Parliament to an entail, has been intimated under the notices required by the Court will not allow its prayer to be altered without ordering a new intimation, in terms of the act. Lockhart, Feb. 9, 1837, p. 498.
- 8.—(1.) A deed of entail reserved power to an heir in possession to dispose of provision in favour of younger children; a bond was granted to the heir, together with a disposition of a corresponding annual rent of the estate, and also a disposition of the lands themselves in security; the children made their right real by infeftment; the bond and deed were afterwards acquired by the next heir in possession, who borrowed the money, and disposed of it in security; the disponee took infeftment under the deed; the heir's embarrassments subsequently led to the sequestration of the rents of his estates and the appointment of a judicial factor; both in regard to the principal sum, and in regard to the interest, the factor had taken place, and that the creditor holding the right of the money was entitled to a preference on the rents of the estate for the interest of the sum lent, in competition with the creditors of the entailor's estate.
- (2.) Terms of a clause in an entail, relative to the obligation of the heir in possession to keep down the annual interest accruing on bonds secured on the estate, which held not to affect the exclusion of the principle of the Welsh, Feb. 11, 1837, p. 537.
9. An entailor settled his estate on his son, and the heirs of his son's certain order; whom failing, on his daughter and the heirs of her certain order; whom failing, on his own nearest heirs of the blood, and their heirs whomsoever; the son died without issue, and a grandson of the entailor, who had a son and daughter—Held that, although the entail was liable to be defeated so soon as the succession should open to the heirs of the entailor, it was a good entail until that contingency should actually happen, and was not in the meantime defeasible at the will of the heir in possession. Mure, Feb. 16, 1837, p. 581.
- 10.—(1.) A deed of entail contained procuratory to resign, for the heirs of tailzie, "under the conditions, provisions, declarations, reservations following," viz. a provision excluding heirs-portioners, a declaration on the heirs to bear the family name and arms (which injunction coupled with a resolutive clause applicable to it alone), a prohibition against altering the succession; a declaration that the whole heirs should hold under no title except the entail; and a clause containing prohibition against effecting sales, or contracting debts, or doing any other deed, civil or criminal, whereby the lands might be evicted; this clause was limited by an instant clause, declaring that if any heir or heirs should do the contrary of the provision above set forth, or shall do any deed, or indirectly, whereby the order of succession above specified may be in any way altered, innovated, or changed, then, and in any of the said cases, every such act and deed should be null and void: a resolutive clause, which was directed against "the person so contravening in any of the particulars above specified:—Held that, as there was a series of provisions preceding the irritant clause, and as entails ought to be strictly construed, the term "provision," in the irritant clause, could apply to only one of the preceding provisions; that it was uncertain to which one of them it did apply; and that the several prohibitions against sales and against debts, not being duly fenced, the entail was ineffectual.

ENTAIL (Continued).

(2.) Although all the prohibitions were complete—Decree pronounced (in respect of a defect in the irritant clause), declaring that the heir in possession might sell the lands or borrow on them, or gratuitously alienate them, without thereby incurring any species of liability to the substitute heirs. Speid, Feb. 21, 1837, p. 618.

11. Held that no improvement-expenditure by an heir of entail is chargeable under 10 G. III., c. 51, against the succeeding heirs, if the expenditure was made while the entail remained unrecorded. Paget, Feb. 24, 1837, p. 667.

12. Certain substitute-heirs of entail, in India, executed a power of attorney, for giving their consent to a bill for selling part of the entailed estate; they authorized their mandatary "to appear before the Lords' committees, to whom the bill may be referred, and also before the committee of the House of Commons, &c., and then and there to signify and give the consent:" the power of attorney did not reach this country until after the bill had passed into an act, containing a clause that none of its provisions should take effect until the consent of the heirs "to this act" shall be declared "before the Court of Session" by a deed executed, or to be executed:—Held that the consent authorized by the power of attorney, being in a different form from that required by the act, the requirements of the act were not satisfied, and that the Court could not interpose their authority until consents were obtained in precise conformity with the act. Milliken Napier, March 4, 1837, p. 745.

13.—(1.) The resolute clause in an entail declared that heirs contravening "shall, for themselves, ipso facto, forfeit," &c.; and it was made lawful for the next heir, "albeit descended of the contravener's own body, to purge and obtain declarators upon the contravention:" the son of the heir in possession raised a declarator of irritancy, libelling (inter alia) upon an act of contravention, committed by making up titles in fee-simple, in place of making them up under the entail:—Held, that the statute 1685, c. 22, has not declared that such a contravention shall forfeit the contravener's descendants, as well as himself, without reference to the terms of each particular entail, as to the effect of contraventions; that, in this instance, such contravention would not forfeit the pursuer's right; and that he accordingly had a good title to pursue.

(2.) Terms of a clause in a bond of tailzie, under which, held, that the entailer had effectually bound himself and his heirs to possess the lands under no title but the entail.

(3.) An ancestor of the entailer, being infest in the dominium directum of lands held of the Crown, onerously acquired the dominium utile of these lands in 1708, under a conveyance containing a procuratory of resignation ad remanentiam, and a precept of sasine, neither of which he executed; his descendants renewed the infestment under the Crown, and continued to enjoy full possession, and to exercise all acts of property in the lands for more than 40 years, but without executing the procuratory or precept: in 1765, the entailer, who was already infest under the Crown, took infestment under the above precept, and afterwards executed an entail, in the form of a procuratory of resignation:—Held

(1.) That consolidation of the dominium utile with the dominium directum had taken place prior to the execution of the precept of sasine in 1765, and that that was an unmeaning act of the entailer, which did not split these two estates; and,

(2.) That the act of a substitute-heir in making up a title in fee-

ENTAIL (Continued).

simple to the dominium utile of the lands, and selling thereby of contravention, inferring forfeiture of the estate.

(4.) Circumstances in which various sales of portions of the estate were found to have been made.

(5.) Decree pronounced in an action directed solely against possession, declaring that he had forfeited the entailed estate; that was now, and in all time coming, void and extinct; that the lands, rents, had devolved on and accreeed to the next heir from and of citation in the declarator, free and disburdened of every act done granted in contravention of the entail, as fully as if the contravention had been in possession; but reserving all questions with regard to the effect of heritable securities granted to creditors by the contravention. March 2, 1837, p. 711.

14.—(1.) An entailor disposed his lands to himself in liferent, and to his fee, whom failing, to a series of substitute heirs of entail, including descendants of his body, but also collateral relations; the strict deed showed that the entailor considered the institute to be such the term "heirs of entail;" the irritant and resolutive clauses provided "the heirs descending of my body, or any of the other heirs of tail mentioned shall contravene, &c., the person or persons so contravening shall forfeit, &c.:"—Held, by a majority of the Whole Court, that they did not apply to the institute, although he was, in one sense, an "heir of the body" of the entailor, because, both in respect of the strictness applicable to entails, and also in respect of the sense in which the words were actually used in the deed, they applied to no heirs but heirs of entail; and such words could not be extended to include the institute, clearly it might appear that the entailor had supposed them to be included him.

(2.) Question,

(1.) On the assumption that the prohibition against altering of succession was not imposed on the institute, but that it was duly fenced, against sales or debts, were imposed on him, is it for a creditor to adjudge the fee of the entailed estate in payment of debt? or

(2.) Failing this, is it competent to adjudge the debtor's altering the order of succession, and thereby set aside the entail. March 11, 1837, p. 837.

15.—(1.) A substitute-heir, under a recorded entail, made up a title simple as heir of line to the entailor, and was infeft: during a period of years this infeftment remained on the record, after which it was the instance of the next substitute-heir, who also insisted in a declaration of irritancy against the first-mentioned heir: the first-mentioned heir resumed the name and arms of the entailor, and made up a complete title under the entail; he also lodged a minute in process offering to find ample and sufficient caution and security, to the effect of protecting his estate against his debts or deeds, contracted or executed prior to the completion of his feudal title under the entail:—Held, that the title which had been committed was purgeable; and interlocutor of assolvendo in the defender, in hoc statu, from the conclusion of the action, and finding that the defender, should have right at any time to show, by declarator, or other competent process, that the necessity for the continuance of caution no longer existed.

(2.) A substitute-heir under an entail which was recorded, but which had been feudalised, served himself heir of line to the entailor, and was infeft-simple, the next substitute reduced the infeftment as in contravention of the entail.

ENTAIL (Continued).

the entail; the first heir then took up the unexecuted procuratory of resignation, in the deed of entail, by service as heir of entail and provision; he expedite a charter of resignation, and was infest under all the fetters of the entail:—Held that the entailed estate was liable for the debts and deeds of the first heir, contracted or done prior to his completing a feudal title under the entail; but was not liable for subsequent debts or deeds. Abernethy, June 20, 1837, p. 1167.

See Homologation—Outlawry—Factor Loco Tutoris, 1.—Process X. 6.—Trust, 14.

ERASURE. See Writ.

ERRATA. See p. 1318.

EXCAMBION. See Lease, 2.

EXCLUSIVE PRIVILEGE.

Circumstances which held not to justify an award of £50 of damages, alongst with expenses of process, against a party who had exercised the trade of a tailor in violation of the exclusive privileges of a corporation, and in contravention of an interdict. Murison, Dec. 2, 1836, p. 179.

See Corporation.

EXECUTOR.

In a competition among the creditors of a party deceased,—held that the executor nominate, who was himself a creditor, not having been cited, or otherwise interpellated by legal diligence on the part of any of the creditors, within six months from the party's death, and not until he had himself expedite confirmation as executor, was entitled to a preference over the executry funds for such debts as he could instruct to have been justly owing to himself by the defunct, and to impute or retain in payment thereof, any part of the funds actually in his hands prior to diligence being used, or a judicial claim made at the instance of the other creditors, in so far as he could not be shown to have renounced such legal preference by acts or omissions of his own. Macleod, May 30, 1837, p. 1043.

See Bill of Exchange, 2, (2.)—Confirmation, 2.—Succession, 1.—Settlement, 1.

EXECUTOR-CREDITOR. See Arrestment, 1.—Confirmation, 1.—Foreign, 4.—Heir and Executor.

EXPENSES.

1. The pursuer of an action of damages for wrongous apprehension, held, in the circumstances of the case not entitled to expenses, though he had obtained a verdict for one shilling damages. Inch, Nov. 24, 1836, p. 126.

2.—(1.) Defenders in a cause, who were professional men, having been examined by the pursuer as havers—held not entitled, pendente processu, to claim expenses for time and trouble in searching out documents, &c., but their claim reserved till the issue of the cause.

(2.) Opinion intimated that the case would have been different had the claim been for travelling expenses. M'Gill, Dec. 2, 1836, p. 178.

3. A party against whom decree passed in the sheriff court, raised an action of relief, and wrote to the defender in that action, that he did not mean to take the original process to advocation, unless the defender intimated his wish that it should be done; the defender intimated no such wish; the party, nevertheless, took the original process to advocation, and, being unsuccessful, was subjected in expenses,—Held, that the defender in the action of relief, was not liable for the expenses of the advocation, though liable in relief quoad ultra. Mack, Dec. 16, 1836, p. 272.

4. Competent to award the expenses of the inferior court to the respondent in an advocation, though he has not only brought no counter-advocation, but has lodged no note of additional pleas, in the advocation brought by his opponent. Gammell, Dec. 9, 1836, p. 233.

5. A pursuer refused a sum which was tendered, in name of damages, before he raised his action, and which was again tendered in the defences; a record was made up, and issues were prepared, after which the pursuer accepted the sum.

EXPENSES (Continued).

that had been offered;—Held that the defender was entitled to in respect that the whole litigation would have been saved, if it had been timeously accepted by the pursuer. A. B., Dec. 23, 1836, p. 693.

6. Circumstances in which, held to be proved that a coach-parcel, a process and title-deeds, was duly delivered at the office of one of the parties in the process; and, having been mislaid for several years owing to the negligence of that agent, or some party for whom he was responsible, he was liable for the expenses of certain processes thereby occasioned. W. v. W., March 1, 1837, p. 693.

7. Circumstances in which the House of Lords ordered the expenses of the parties, each of whom had been served heir to a person deceased out of the estate of the deceased, and at the same time made a rule for the propinquity of the parties respectively to the deceased. W. v. W., July 7, 1837, p. 754.

8. Held, by the whole Court, that "the Act of Sederunt, 6th May 1836, does not apply to extracts of decrees for expenses in the Bill of Exchange." Ross, June 30, 1837, p. 1238.

See Minto, June 8, 1837, p. 1094.—Gifford, July 6, 1837, p. 1254.

See Agent and Client, 4.—Arbitration, 1.—Bankruptcy, 3.—Case of Corporation—Husband and Wife, 4.—Reparation, 1.—Factor Loco Tutoris, 4, (2).—Process, III. 10. X. 21.

EXTRINSIC OR INTRINSIC. See Oath on Reference, 2.—Proof III.

FACILITY AND CONVENIENCE. See Minor.

FACTOR LOCO TUTORIS.

1. A girl of five years of age was presumptive heiress of entail worth £2000 per annum, in which the heir in possession was a widow sixty-seven years; the pupil was wholly destitute;—the Court gave power to her factor loco tutoris, to conclude an agreement with an insurance office, whereby, in consideration of an annuity of £200 per annum (for her suitable maintenance and education) during the joint lives of herself and the heir in possession, security was to be granted over the entailed estate, for an annuity of £238, 7s. payable to the pupil for the pupil's lifetime, after her accession to the estate. Miller, Nov. 14, 1836, p. 147.

2. Authority granted to the factor loco tutoris of a pupil to make up titles to heritage, in respect that both the pupil's superior and the superior required this to be done. Dykes, Nov. 29, 1836, p. 156.

3. A factor loco tutoris having been appointed by the Court to a pupil, on application of the mother, without intimation being made to the pupil's agnates;—The appointment recalled, as originally granted without the part of the Court. Lownds, Dec. 10, 1836, p. 244.

4.—(1). A factor loco tutoris invested funds in heritable bonds, took to himself "as factor loco tutoris, or to his successors in office, or to their assignees;" infirmament passed in favour of him "as factor loco tutoris, or to his successors in office, or to their assignees;" he died, and the minor petitioned for an appointment of a new factor, with power to uplift the funds so invested, and to grant the necessary conveyances, of the securities, "and, if necessary for that purpose, a renewal in his name, as factor loco tutoris, of the investitures on which the securities were held;"—Held, that the factor should be appointed with powers only, leaving him to make up his titles as he should be bound to do.

(2.) Expenses of opposing the prayer for unusual powers all paid out of the funds of the minors.

(3.) Under a petition to appoint A. B. as factor, "or any other person your Lordships may think proper;" appointment made of a different person without ordering fresh intimation of the petition. Hay, March 1, 1837, p. 850.

See Judicial Factor, 2.

5. Circumstances in which authority was granted to a factor loco

FACTOR LOCO TUTORIS (Continued).

borrow £100, and grant security for the same, over the heritable subjects under his management as factor loco tutoris, and to apply the amount in payment of advances which he had necessarily incurred for the maintenance of the minors. Agnew, June 8, 1837, p. 1094.

6. Where a pupil, resident in England, was possessed of a heritable estate in Scotland, and all the next of kin were resident abroad; the Court, in the circumstances and on the application of his mother and the trustees and guardians under an English settlement of his deceased father, appointed a factor loco tutoris, after the usual intimation on the walls and in the minute-book.—Wight, June 27, 1837, p. 1197.

7. Circumstances in which authority to a factrix loco tutoris to grant a feu-right refused. Thomson, March 10, 1837, p. 807.

8. Circumstances in which the Court granted authority to a factor loco tutoris to complete the pupil's title as heir to an entailed estate, and to certain superiorities, in which the pupil's interest required him to be in a condition to give immediate entry to the vassals. M'Dougall, July 7, 1837, p. 1255.

See Curator bonis.

FACULTY. See Settlement, 2.

FATUOUS PARTY. See Curator Bonis—Title to Pursue, 6.—Trust, 9.

FEE AND LIFERENT.

1. Where the liferenter of certain bank stock died before the period at which a dividend became payable—Held that his creditors could not attach the dividend by their diligence, though its amount had been declared, and the term of payment fixed by the bank, in the ordinary course of the bank management, prior to the liferenter's decease. Thomson, Nov. 18, 1836, p. 32.

2. A testator left one son and two daughters; the son was insolvent, and the testator conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, directing them to pay an alimentary annuity to the son; the conveyance contained a clause "excepting always the liferent use and possession of the house in M., &c., now occupied by myself, and which I hereby give and bequeath to my said son, in liferent, during all the days of his life, if he choose to fix his permanent residence at M., he being always bound to pay my said trustees the sum of £20 of yearly rent therefor; as also excepting the household furniture, &c., which are hereby given and bequeathed to my said son, in liferent, so long as he shall continue to reside in the said house at M., and which shall thereafter, or upon my said son dying without lawful issue of his body, then belong to my daughters, Mrs S. and Mrs K. equally between them in fee:" the children of either of these daughters, predeceasing the son, were to take their mother's share: the son had no issue up to the period when one of his creditors used diligence for attaching the furniture; a bill of suspension and interdict was presented by the daughters;—Bill passed, in respect that the fee of the furniture was not in the son, but in the trustees. M'Millan, May 13, 1837, p. 916.

3.—(1.) A testator conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, who were directed to pay over the free annual proceeds of it to his three unmarried sisters, and the survivor of them; and "after the death of the said three sisters, and the survivor of them, and, of course, of the termination of their respective liferents, I hereby direct my said trustees to make payment to my six nephews and nieces after named, or to the children of such of them as may have deceased before that time, of the several sums of money hereinafter specified; viz. to A. W. the sum of £1500 sterling, &c.; which six legacies shall bear interest from the first term, after the termination of the liferent hereby provided to my three sisters, and the survivor of them;" A. W. survived the testator, and two of the sisters, but predeceased the third sister, and left no issue:—Held that the legacy of £1500 had vested in him on the death of the testator, and was effectually assignable by him, during his life, or attachable by his executor-creditor, after his death.—Observed by the Lord Ordinary, that, "when a legacy is left to one person in liferent, and another

FEE AND LIFE RENT (Continued).

In fee, the subsistence of the life rent does not prevent the fee from passing to the death of the testator; and the rule appears to be the same where the fee is conveyed by the testator to trustees, with directions to pay to one person during his life, and the capital to another, at the death. At least, this is the rule when there is a destination of the fee to an individual simply, and no ulterior substitutions which require to be kept up for the benefit of those substitutes."

(2.) A testator had three unmarried sisters who survived his three married sisters who predeceased him, leaving issue; he directed (under a settlement of his whole estate containing powers of sale) that the annual proceeds to the three unmarried sisters, and the survivor of them after the death of my said three sisters, and the survivor of the trustees were directed to pay certain legacies, and, "after the payment of said several legacies" they were directed "to pay over the whole of my estate" to three nephews specified; by a subsequent codicil, as to the residue, was recalled, and "in lieu and place of the said I direct the said residue to be paid over by my said trustees to the said three unmarried sisters, accordingly, who survived the testator, vested right in one-sixth of the residue, along with the three sons of the three married sisters deceased; and that they had effectually taken these shares by their respective settlements. Maxwell, May 25, 18

See Reputed Ownership.

FIDUCIARY DUTIES. See Poor, I, (4).

FILIATION. See Bastard.

FISHING. See Property, I.—Salmon Fishing.

FOREIGN.

1. A Scotsman died resident in India, after having executed, whilst in Scotland, a settlement in the English form; he left some heritable estate in Scotland the settlement did not effectually convey, and a much larger movable estate which was effectually conveyed by it; Held, that reference was to be made to the law of England to determine whether the settlor intended to put the heir-at-law to his election, and to deprive him of his benefit under the will if he took up the Scottish heritage as heir-at-law, also as to the import and effect of the will in other respects; and the court was pronounced in terms of the opinion of English counsel. Campbell, 1836, p. 310.

2. A foreign decree, founded on for execution in this country, affords no prima facie evidence of the truth and justice of the claim of the pursuer, and is to be impugned on cause shown by the defender. Southgate, Feb. 1837, p. 507.

3.—(1.) In a suspension by a Scottish Banking Company of a charter of a bill drawn by them on an English Bank in favour of a party.—Circumstances in which, in conformity to the law of England, and on remit to English counsel, the Scottish company found in favour of the contents of the bill to the onerous holders.

(2.) On such remit being made, parties not allowed to submit evidence either oral or written, to the counsel. Aberdeen Banking Company, 1837, p. 1052.

4. A party domiciled in England died there intestate; a banking company in Scotland then owed him a certain balance which by desire of his relatives was transmitted to England to be paid to his legal representatives; a creditor of the deceased having obtained letters of administration, and payment of the money in question from the party to whom it had been transmitted; thereafter a Scotch creditor obtained decree-dative in execution of his claim against the said banking company.

FOREIGN (Continued).

and raised action against the bank for second payment of the money :—Held that the bank was not bound to pay a second time to the Scotch creditor, the prior payment having been valid as made in England, the proper forum of distribution, regularly and in bona fide. Hutchison, June 9, 1837, p. 1100.

See Process IV.—Marriage, 1.—Jurisdiction, 4.—Cessio, 9, (2.)

FORFEITURE. See Outlawry—Entail, 13, (5), 15.

FRAUD.

In a reduction of a bond, on the ground, inter alia, of the bond having been impetrated from one of the granters while he was in a state of blindness, and without it having been read over to him, averments as to the alleged impetration which held not such as to infer reduction. Ker, May 23, 1837, p. 983.

See Agent and Principal, 1.

FUGITATION. See Outlawry.

GENERAL CHARGE. See Passive Titles.

GUARANTEE. See Cautioner.

HARBOUR. See Poor, 2, (1).

HEIR AND EXECUTOR.

(1.) The purchaser of a parcel of lands granted a personal bond for part of the price, and at a subsequent period his heir granted a bond of corroboration to the heir of the seller :—Held competent for executors creditors of the seller to insist in a reduction of the bond of corroboration in so far as it was erroneously granted to the heir.

(2.) Circumstances in which held not to be a sufficient objection on the part of the purchaser's representative that in this action and a relative multiple-poining, representatives of the seller who were abroad were only cited edictally. Thomson, June 14, 1837, p. 1133.

HEIRS-PORCIONERS.

Where a heritable subject was the property of four heirs pro indiviso, and three of them raised, against the fourth, a summons of declarator that the subject was incapable of division, and that it was necessary and proper to sell it and divide the price, the Court, although no opposition was made, directed a proof to be taken as to the necessity or propriety of the sale ; and, after a proof, that the subject was incapable of division, the Court found and declared that it must be sold for division of the price ; and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to allow a proof of the value of the subject, and to proceed as should be just. Bryden, Feb. 4, 1837, p. 486.

See Entail, 9.

HOMOLOGATION.

Circumstances in which the plea was repelled, that a deed of entail had been homologated by the heir-at-law. Macrae, Nov. 22, 1836, p. 54.

See Accounting, 1.—Acquiescence—Contract, 1.—Lease, 6.—Teinds, 1.—Partnership, 4.—Right in Security, 1.—Process I., 2.

HORNING. See Bankruptcy, 6.—Partnership, 3.—Outlawry—Master and Servant, 2.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

1. A military officer, by his marriage-contract, bound himself to provide his wife, in the event of his predecease, with an annuity, payable to the widows of officers from a certain fund to which he was a subscriber, which annuity was, by the regulations of the fund, subject to reduction by the directors on a falling off of funds, and to suspension on the second marriage of the widow :—

(1.) Terms which held to import that the widow was not entitled to have made up to her by her husband's representatives, a deficiency arising from reduction by the directors, but was entitled to have so made up to her its failure consequent on a second marriage.

(2.) Question, whether extrajudicial correspondence could be referred to in explanation of the terms of a marriage-contract. Forlong, Nov. 24, 1836, p. 126.

2. Terms and provisions of a postnuptial contract and subsequent deed of settlement by the husband with consent of the wife, which held not a power of revocation by the husband on the death of the wife, that certain legacies contained in the deeds had become ineffectual by her predecease. Anderson, Jan. 27, 1837, p. 435.

HUSBAND AND WIFE (Continued).

3. A woman, having obtained decree of divorce against her husband, a conclusion for suitable aliment: she had a bond of annuity for £40, but she alleged this to be inadequate, as he possessed considerable property; he averred that he was in a state of utter destitution, and she failed to prove the subject:—Held, in respect of her so declining, there were no grounds established, hoc statu, for awarding further aliment. Craigie, March 11, 1837, p. 836.

4. A surviving husband found not entitled to state as a debt against the estate of his deceased wife, the expenses incurred by him in resisting certain reduction of deeds by his deceased wife, raised after her death; he was partially successful in the litigation; but found entitled to the expenses incurred in opposing a process for having her cognate. Currie, May 31, 1837, p. 1047.

5. A trust having been constituted by a woman before her marriage of a marriage-contract, whereby the jus mariti was excluded, in relation to her own heritable property, and for her behoof exclusively, no rights being created by the trust in favour of third parties, and it being irrevocable,—Held that such trust was not revocable during the life of the grantor, with consent of her husband; but that it might be revoked on the death of the husband, the cause being then removed. Anderson, June 2, 1837, p. 1073.

6. Held that goods furnished to the wife of a party who was absent from the country, the wife being in charge of her husband's business during his absence, were to be considered as furnished to the party himself. James, June 15, 1837, p. 1151.

See Marriage—Marriage-Contract—Oath on Reference, 1.—Arrears

HYPOTHEC, LANDLORD'S. See Lease.

HYPOTHEC, LAW-AGENT'S. See Right in Security, 2.

INFAMIA JURIS. See Proof IV. 2, (2).

INHIBITION.

1. A party raised an action concluding to have the defender (who resided in the country) ordained to make up titles to two heritable subjects and convey the same, and also for expenses of process; he used inhibition on the dependence, and covered all the heritage of the defender; immediate notice of the diligence was made to the defender's agents; no appearance was made to the action, and, some months after decree was pronounced, the defender having sold some of his own heritage, incurred an expense of about £100, in consequence of the purchaser having made a search of the records and discovered the inhibition; the defender had never before the inhibition restricted to the two subjects which he was bound to do by the pursuer, but this was immediately done on his application in a subsequent action at the defender's instance, that he had no damages against the pursuer for the use of the diligence, in respect of the inhibition laid on in common form, and was restricted as soon as the defender was made aware of it to be so. Macleod, Dec. 13, 1836, p. 248.

2. A petition for recall of inhibition used on the dependence of an action refused of consent, a simultaneous arrangement being entered into between the parties for a discharge of the inhibition, while the other party was in the country for a certain sum; a judgment on the merits was thereafter pronounced by the Lord Ordinary in favour of the party using the diligence, against the other party; a reclaiming note was presented; about six months subsequent to the charge above-mentioned, new letters of inhibition were raised on the dependence,—Held that the use of the last diligence was a departure from the usual course of law, and was not to be sustained.

INHIBITION (Continued).

the good faith of the previous transaction, and also that there was no change of circumstances to justify the use thereof; and the same accordingly recalled. Earl of Caithness, March 4, 1837, p. 749.

INSURANCE.

Circumstances in which, verdict found that a policy of life-insurance was obtained by the misrepresentation or by the undue concealment of material facts, by the party insured, or those acting on her behalf. Borthwick, July 21, 1837, p. 1306.

See Cautioner, 5.—Factor loco tutoris, 1.—Process III., 8, (1).

INTEREST.

In an accounting between over-paying and under-paying heritors, under an interim locality,—Held, that the over-paying heritors were entitled to interest on their over-payments from the heritors under-paying. Buchanan and Others, Nov. 15, 1836, p. 7.

See Bankruptcy, 13, (4.)—Cautioner, 5.—Church, 1.—Right in Security, 1, 2.—Entail, 8, (2.)

INTEREST (of witness.) See Proof II., 5., IV., 5, (3.)

INTERIM POSSESSION. See Church, 5.—Bankruptcy, 13, (4.)

INTESTATE SUCCESSION. See Succession, 1.

IRRITANCY. See Entail.

ISSUE. See Process III.

JOINT STOCK COMPANY. See Partnership.

JOINT PROPERTY. See Heirs-Portioners.

JUDICIAL ADMISSION. See Compensation, 3.—Proof, III.

JUDICIAL EXAMINATION. See Bankruptcy, 8, 10.—Marriage, 2, (2.)—Process X., 15, (2.)

JUDICIAL FACTOR.

1. A judicial factor having been appointed "with the usual powers," the Court refused to authorize and ordain him, on the application of parties interested, to make appearance in a depending process against the estate, in respect it was already competent to him to do so, if he should deem it expedient; reserving to him to apply to the Court for an enlargement of his powers, if he should find it necessary and be so advised. Mackintosh's Trustees, Dec. 18, 1836, p. 255.

2. A petition prayed the Court to appoint a party, as judicial factor on a trust-estate, or (in common form) "to do otherwise in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem proper;" appearance was made to oppose the appointment, and to suggest another nominee;—Held competent for the Court, with consent of both parties, to appoint a third person to the office, without requiring any new or amended petition to be presented, or any farther intimation being made. Wilson, Jan. 26, 1837, p. 421. See Factor Loco Tutoris, 4, (3.)

3. Circumstances in which power given to a judicial factor on a sequestrated trust-estate, to enter and receive vassals, and to grant charters, precepts of clare constat, and all other writs and deeds necessary for that purpose. Milne, June 10, 1837, p. 1104.

JUDICIAL REMIT. See Proof.

JUDICIAL SALE. See Heirs-Portioners.

JURISDICTION.

1. Circumstances in which the Court held a bill of suspension of diligence for levying an assessment of statute-labour conversion-money an incompetent proceeding; and accordingly refused the bill. Ewing, Jan. 26, 1837, p. 419.

2. A party was convicted under 9 Geo. IV. c. 39, of taking salmon in close-time, and the Justices fined him in £3, besides £1, 3s. of expenses; the sentence ordained "execution to pass hereon by pointing in terms of said act, and by imprisonment in the jail of A. for the period of two months, unless said sums be sooner paid:"—Held that, although the question was attended with extreme difficulty, the party was entitled, after imprisonment, to the benefit of the Act of Grace. Robertson, Feb. 16, 1837, p. 572.

JURISDICTION (Continued).

3. An action was raised before a burgh-court, against a law-agent, who had a writing-office within the burgh, but whose dwelling-house, at the time of the summons, was without the burgh: the action was accessory to a writ of habeas corpus ready depending in the burgh-court, and bore to be raised for the purpose of being conjoined with it: a statute was, soon after, passed, enlarging the jurisdiction of the burgh, so as to include the dwelling-house of the law-agent; thereafter, he was cited at his dwelling-place, in common form: He was hable to the jurisdiction of the magistrates, and that he was so held by Hunter, March 1, 1837, p. 603.

4. A party, domiciled in England, contracted a maritime debt, to the amount of £14, for ship-furnishings made in Leith by a ship-chandler (the ship-chandler used arrestments in the hands of a debtor residing in Edinburgh) to found jurisdiction, and raised an action for payment of the sum before the Court of Session:—Question, whether such action, the sum being £25, was competent in that Court, or ought to have been brought, in the instance, before the Sheriff (of Edinburgh) in respect of the provisions of Stat. 1 W. IV. c. 69, § 21 and 22, although the debtor resided in Scotland. Morrison, July 11, 1837, p. 1293.

See Burgh, 1—Process X., 30, (2.)

JURY TRIAL. See Process, 111.—Nuisance, 2, 3.—Public Officer, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

JUSTICE OF PEACE. See Reparation, 6.—School—Small Debt Act—1830, (2, 4.)

KIRK SESSION. See Trust, 8.

LANDLORD AND TENANT. See Lease.

LEASE.

1. Circumstances in which held, that, certain furniture brought into a house by the tenant, who was tortuously withholding it against the landlord, and pending legal proceedings to recover it, was not subject to the landlord's hypothec, though no intimation was made to him, by the landlord, of the furniture, pending the claim. Jaffray, Nov. 18, 1836, p. 43.

- 2.—(1.) Circumstances in which held, that, notwithstanding a certain lease of possession, and also of rent, during the currency of a lease for years, the lease had not been renounced, but still subsisted.

(2.) Circumstances in which held, that sufficient real evidence of a contract of excambion between a landlord and tenant relative to a considerable portion of certain subjects, which were held under a lease for years, so that the tenant enjoyed a right of lease in the portion at the excambion, which was good against a purchaser of the landlord's interest. Kennedy, Nov. 22, 1836, p. 102.

3. Terms of a clause in articles of lease drawn up by the landlord, under which it was held that a tenant was entitled to the value of improvements of a permanent nature on the farm, dwelling house, &c. as instructed by a valuation made at his entry, and another valuation to be made by the articles of lease, at his removal. Gamme, 1836, p. 233.

- 4.—(1.) A lease of a pottery, and certain premises including a park, &c. was granted, for twenty one years, "with the privilege to the tenant to dig for clay and sagger clay within the said park or enclosure, for the purpose of the foresaid pottery."—Held that the tenant had no right to dig for clay for making bricks excepting so far as required for the purpose of the pottery.

(2.) Circumstances in which, where the tenant of a pottery had manufactured a quantity of the clay into bricks, and, on the expiration of the lease, the value of the bricks, had been allowed to remove them—held liable to his landlord in the value of the clay from which the bricks were manufactured. Gordon, Feb. 14, 1837, p. 549.

LEASE (Continued).

5. The tenant of a farm under a lease for 21 years, became entitled, by the terms of his lease, to claim deduction of rent on account of the landlord's resuming possession of a considerable part of the farm, at an early period of the lease, and also to make a claim on account of meliorations made by him (the tenant): he continued to pay the full original rent without deduction, during the whole lease, and, at leaving the farm, granted a bill for the balance of the last year's rent on that footing; he made no claim for about three years afterwards, at which date his whole claim and interest amounted to nearly £900:—Held, in the special circumstances, that, though there was strong ground for supposing that his claim had been satisfied, during the currency of the lease, as the landlord alleged, yet, as there was no legal evidence of this, it must be sustained. Hallyburton, March 7, 1837, p. 750.
6. A landlord let premises to a tenant for nineteen years, "to be used for the purpose of bleaching, dyeing, or printing, and any other operations connected with bleaching, dyeing, or printing, or for agriculture:" the tenant let the premises at an advance of rent, to sub-tenants: in an action against the landlord, the tenant, and the sub-tenants, for interdict, alleging that the operations of the sub-tenants amounted to nuisance, the landlord lodged separate defences, stating that the operations of the sub-tenants did no injury to the water, or, at all events, if any injury occasionally happened, it arose from the fault of the sub-tenants, for which he was not responsible; the tenant also lodged separate defences, stating that if any nuisance was committed, it was without authority from him: an issue was taken for the landlord and tenant, separate from that for the sub-tenants, viz. "Whether the landlord or tenant, by themselves or another, or others authorized by them, did wrongfully pollute and spoil the water," &c.: at the trial the Judge directed the jury, that, even if nuisance was proved against the sub-tenants, still as there was nothing but the lease to connect the landlord and the tenant therewith, there was no ground in law for holding that they, or either of them, had authorized, or were answerable for that nuisance; a verdict was found for the defenders: Held, by a majority, under a bill of exceptions, that the charge was erroneous; and that, besides the act of granting the lease, the tenor of the landlord's defences, alleging the water to have sustained no injury, was a ground in law for holding him to have authorized the nuisance, if there was a nuisance; and that, in the circumstances, the case of the tenant could not be separated from that of the landlord, and that a new trial should be granted as to both. Dunn, March 11, 1837, p. 853.
7. Under a lease of premises situated on a stream, declaring that they were to be used "for the purpose of bleaching, dyeing, or printing, and any other operations connected with bleaching, dyeing, or printing," if the tenant establish a dyework which creates a nuisance to the injury of the proprietors or tenants of inferior proprietors, such operations held (by the Judge presiding at a jury trial) not to be authorized by the lease, so as to render the landlord responsible for the damage thereby occasioned. Collins, April 14–19, 1837, p. 895.
8. A proprietor granted a lease of a mill and mill-lands to a tenant, his heirs and assignees, for a period of 99 years; the lease empowered the tenant "to erect dams for collecting the water" in certain lands, "he always paying damages to the tenants and possessors of the adjacent lands occasioned thereby:" the tenant erected a dam of great extent, and afterwards assigned away the lease; some time after the new tenant was in possession, the embankment of the dam gave way, and the water rushing out, occasioned extensive injury to some inferior property; the parties injured raised an action of damages against the tenant, and also against the representative of the grantor incoming tenant at Whitsunday, and retains possession of the farm till the crop is reaped, so that his right is current to many important effects at Whitsunday. St p. 1059.

10. The curator bonis on the estate of a fatuous party, ob men of skill, bearing that under certain current leases as stipulated, and also specifying what was the fair rent; the report stated that in one of the leases a four-shift rotation would be more beneficial to the estate than a five-shift rotation, and the curator petitioned for authority to reduce the rents, for each lease, to the sum specified in the report, and to convert one of the farms to a five-shift rotation, or to accept leases: after special service on the presumptive heir, a curator of the fatuous party, besides the usual intimation of the petition. Macgregor, June 7, 1837, p. 1092.

11. Circumstances in which the Court granted authority to a fatuous person, to grant a lease of a farm for the period of years. Hunter, Nov. 26, 1837, p. 1254.

See Meditatione Fugæ Warrant.—Nuisance, 2, 3.—Pre-nial.

LEGACY.

Where a father was indebted in the sum of £1000 to his creditor, and left a legacy of £1000, which was only to be paid in the event of a certain claim then pending—Held, that the legacy being to impute in satisfaction of the debt, but was meant to be of success, over and above the debt. Hunter, Nov. 26, 1837, p. 1254.

See Fee and Liferent, 3.—Settlement—Testament—Procurator, 2.

LIEN.

Certain goods having been shipped in a carrying vessel, their arrival at the port of destination, in the warehouse agent—Circumstances in which held, in a question with the agent had no right of lien over the goods for the general balance of the shippers had intended to consign them, but which was interrupted, in consequence of which no delivery was ever received. Hunter, Nov. 26, 1837, p. 1254.

[ANSE. See Church, 6.

MARRIAGE.

1. In a declarator of legitimacy by a child born of a connexion in Scotland, against the representatives of her father deceased, who subsequently contracted a regular marriage in England, and after having had children by this marriage, became domiciled, and died in Scotland, his wife continuing to live in England;—Held,

(1st,) That the English marriage was no bar to an action proceeding on the allegation of a marriage effectually, though irregularly, constituted by the law of Scotland, and might be put an end to by proof of such Scotch marriage;

(2d,) That it was not incumbent on the pursuer to call the English wife as a party to the process;

(3d,) That, in the circumstances of the case, the pursuer had failed to establish a marriage between her parents. Wright, March 7, 1837, p. 767.

2.—(1.) In a declarator of marriage, certain facts and circumstances being set forth as implying a course of courtship with a view to marriage, and as equivalent to a promise of marriage, and subsequent copula being averred: a proof pro ut de jure allowed to both parties before answer as to the relevancy of the pursuer's averments.

(2.) In such action, the Lord Ordinary, in pronouncing an interlocutor on the relevancy, had inter alia allowed the defender to be judicially examined: this interlocutor being recalled in general terms—Held that it was still open to allow the judicial examination. Harvie, May 20, 1837, p. 964.

3.—(1.) In an action for declarator of marriage with an alternative conclusion for damages as for seduction—Proof which held insufficient to support such alternative conclusion.

(2.) Observed that, to support such conclusion, the summons ought to contain a particular statement as to seductive arts having been used. Stewart, June 27, 1837, p. 1198.

See Husband and Wife—Marriage-Contract.

MARRIAGE-CONTRACT.

1. A father, infeft in certain lands, became a party to the marriage-contract of his son, J. B. jun. and disposed these lands to him under various real burdens; the son also undertook several personal obligations; the contract contained this clause:—"If there be a son or sons, or son and daughter, or sons and daughters of this marriage, and alive at the dissolution thereof, in that event the said J. B. junior, obliges him and his aforesaid to give and dispose to that son, or these sons, the just and equal half of the said lands of Benthall, to take effect immediately after his own decease, and to do no deed in hurt or prejudice of this obligation, only he is to have liberty to divide the same amongst the children of this marriage, if more than one son, as he shall think fit, or his children deserve:" this obligation was not recited in the sasine of J. B. junior; he contracted debts to a greater amount apparently than the value of the estate, and granted real securities over it, after which he conveyed it in trust, with powers of sale, for the purpose of satisfying his debts, "so far as the price of the property will go:" the trustees sold the lands, and afterwards J. B. junior, predeceased his wife, leaving two sons, who raised a reduction of the heritable securities, and of the sale of the estate, contending that their right to one half of the lands, under the contract of marriage, could not be defeated by any act of their father, his creditors, or his trustees, and insisting in ulterior conclusions of personal liability against the trustees:—Held, that the pursuers were entitled to challenge any bonds or other deeds executed gratuitously or fraudulently by their father in prejudice of the obligation in the marriage-contract, but not to compete with the onerous creditors of their father, or to challenge his onerous deeds. Browning, May 25, 1837, p. 999.

MARRIAGE-CONTRACT (Continued).

2. Terms of an antenuptial contract which held to import that the husband conveyed to the husband as tocher, but sub modo, was vested in the representatives of the predeceasing wife. Cameron, June 28, 1837, p. 611. See Husband and Wife, 1, (2.) 2, 5.—Prescription (Long) 2—The

MASTER AND SERVANT.

1.—(1.) The proprietor of two spinning mills hired his workers for a year; in the middle of a term he threatened a female worker, who had been employed at one of the mills, to go and work at that which was a half mile more distant from her home; the kind of work and wages at both mills were the same, and the proprietor offered to establish practice of transferring workers from one mill to the other at the proprietor's discretion:—Held, that the worker's objections to such change were neither imaginary nor capricious, and that she was bound to submit to it; and worker assuaged accordingly from the proprietor, to have her compelled to serve out the year, as she had bound herself to him.

(2.) Question whether the master's application was, in the circumstances, conceived in competent terms. Anderson, Jan. 24, 1837, p. 611.

2. An apprentice and his cautioner presented a bill of suspension of execution on the registered indenture of apprenticeship, alleging, that the apprentice had left his master, it was only in consequence of having outrageously assaulted him, and having failed to instruct him, as bound by the contract of indenture to do: the master denied these allegations:—Bill passed, without caution or execution, respect that, while the parties were directly at variance on the case, the apprentice had already found caution for the due fulfilment of the contract of indenture, by means of the cautioner who signed the bill, and was now a party in the suspension. Munro, July 7, 1837, p. 611. See Bankruptcy 13 (1)—Process, X. 20.

MEDITIONE FUGIE WARRANT.

(1.) In an action of damages for wrongful imprisonment by an estate against the trustee thereof under a voluntary trust of lands, and agents employed by him, where it appeared, inter alia, that the trustee applied for warrant to incarcerate the pursuer as in mortgage, and found security not only for certain arrears and current rents, but also for prospective rents under a lease having fifteen years to run—Held the caution was irregular.

(2.) In such action—Verdict for the pursuer, with £200 damages; the principal defender, the jury finding for the other two defenders. March 17, 1837, p. 882.

MESSENGER-AT-ARMS. See Cautioner, 6—Proof, IV. 2, (4.)

MINISTERS' WIDOWS' FUND. See Church, 1, 3.

MINOR.

In an action to reduce certain bonds and a bill of exchange, on the ground of fraud and circumvention, and minority and lesion—Verdict in favour of the pursuer on the second of those grounds. Dempster, Dec. 30 and 31, 1837, p. 364.

See Factor Loco Tutoris—Curator Bonus—Prescription (Long), Pursu, 1.

MORA. See Prescription (Quinquennial).

MULTIPLEPOINDING. See Process, VII.

NOBILE OFFICIUM. See Chancery—A. S. June 27, 1837, p. 1317.

NUISANCE.

1. Held that the erection of a great slaughter-house in the suburban neighbourhood of a city would be a nuisance, notwithstanding that the owner used very great precautions for preventing any thing offensive

NUISANCE (Continued).

sight, smell, or cleanliness: and that the experiment, whether the slaughter-house could be erected and conducted without committing a nuisance, ought not to be permitted, in respect that such experiment could not be thoroughly made, without great, and perhaps irreparable, injury, to neighbouring property. Swinton, March 9, 1837, p. 775.

2.—(1.) An inferior heritor complained of a dye-work on the grounds of a superior heritor, as creating a nuisance to the stream, which flowed through both their properties, and he raised an action of interdict; a jury trial followed, at which a verdict was found for the superior heritor, and a bill of exceptions to the charge of the presiding Judge was presented:—Held, that there are primary and secondary uses of a running stream; that its use in supporting animal life in man and beast is primary, and should not be sacrificed to its use for manufactures, which is secondary only; and, in respect that the Judge, in charging the jury, had not duly attended to this distinction, and had otherwise given too large and indefinite latitude to the right of a superior heritor to pollute a stream for manufacturing purposes—bill of exceptions sustained against the charge, and new trial allowed.

(2.) Terms of the direction to the jury which was, on these grounds, held exceptionable.

(3.) Circumstances in which, held, that “if the water was still fitted for all common uses, and all the uses to which it had hitherto been applied, the pursuer was not entitled, in order to put down the works of the defenders, to suggest some peculiar use not actually existing, such as that of bleaching and finishing, for which alone the said water might be unfitted; and, therefore, that on this ground of unfitness for bleaching and finishing, considered by itself, the pursuer was not entitled to a verdict.” Dann, March 11, 1837, p. 853.

3.—(1.) In action concluding solely for damages, and under an issue whether certain operations of the defenders have been “to the nuisance of the pursuer, and to his loss, injury, and damage,” unless he prove “damage,” he is not entitled to a verdict.

(2.) Rule for determining questions of nuisance in respect of operations by a superior heritor on a stream, complained of by parties below, entitled to the use of the stream. Collins, April 14–19, 1837, p. 895.

See Lease, 6, 7.

OATH ON REFERENCE.

1. Circumstances in which a lady, claiming £1000 from her late father's trustees, as a debt due by her father under a verbal promise (whereon her marriage had followed), was allowed to found, as a circumstance of evidence, upon an oath of reference which had been emitted by her father, in an action at her husband's instance against him and his trustees, for payment of the said sum of £1000. Hunter, Nov. 26, 1836, p. 159.

2.—(1.) The acceptor of a bill of exchange referred to the oath of an indorsee whether he had paid value or not to the indorser: the indorsee deponed that he had paid value, and that he did so “partly in money, partly in professional services, and partly” in agreeing to grant a license to the indorser, for using a certain patent-manufacture invented by the indorsee:—Held that the oath was negative of the reference, and that no part of this statement was extrinsic, because “the point referred, being, value or not? it was of no consequence whether the value was of one kind or another; for example, whether it was given in money, in goods, or in services.”

(2.) Observed, that if the suspender wished to have a fuller explanation as to the services rendered, it was his business to have examined the charger more minutely than he did. Young, Feb. 24, 1837, p. 664.

OBLIGATION.

Obligation in which the co-obligants were held liable singuli in solidum. Darlington, Dec. 6, 1836, p. 187.

See Contract—Prescription (Long), 2.

OUTLAWRY.

Criminal letters, containing a charge of murder, were raised against who was infest, in fee-simple, in a land estate; before citation, he a disposition of the estate, ex facie absolute, in favour of a friend who a trustee for his behoof, and who was immediately infest; the party was afterwards "decerned and adjudged to be an outlaw and fug his Majesty's laws," and ordained to be put to the horn (all in con by sentence of the Court of Justiciary, "for his contempt and in not appearing this day and place, in the hour of cause, to have the law for the crime of murder, as mentioned in the said criminal this sentence was followed by denunciation at the horn, as a rebely duly recorded: the party lived abroad for many years, and died in the interval, by a formal deed, he directed his trustee to extoch entail in favour of his (the party's) only son, whom failing, his only and he farther directed his estate to be burdened with a provision in favour of the daughter: the trustee executed the requisite deed, ed infestment on them in the party's life, and, after his death, appl Court in his own name, and obtained a warrant to record the ent was done: the son of the outlaw raised a reduction of the whole deeds, especially the entail and the application to the Court to be Held, by the whole Court unanimously, that the deeds were anchs at his instance, and that the entail was duly recorded; a majest Judges being of opinion,

(1.) That "the consequences of a denunciation on a horning a ferent from those of fugitation in the criminal Court, or in any re severe, with the exception of the distinctions introduced by exp or, in one or two instances, rendered necessary, either from the forms of procedure in the civil and the criminal Courts, or from obbl of expediency and justice;"

(2.) That the fee of the heritage remained in the outlaw: and,

(3.) That "the outlaw retained every power of disposing of his which could be exercised without prejudice to the rights of those w have an interest in his single or liferent escheat:"—

And the remaining four Judges, holding, on the one hand, that th fee of the heritage remained in the outlaw, yet, as he was "civ and "had lost the law of the land," and "could claim no privilege under it," he was not in a capacity to perform the acta legitima making a deed of entail, and therefore any such deed, executed by outlawry, would be unavailing; but, holding (along with several of Judges), on the other hand, that in respect of the ex facie absolute tion and infestment, prior to outlawry, the subsequent deed of ent ex facie absolute dispoice was valid, at least against this pursuer, challengeable, so far as regarded the form of the title, and it not be vant reason of reduction that the deed was conformable to the wish outlaw.

Question raised, and opposite opinions expressed, whether, if th had possessed no power of disposing the fee of his heritage, the en have been effectually made by a party who was truly his trustee, under directions received from him during his outlawry. Macrae, 1836, p. 51.

PACTUM ILLICITUM. See Bankruptcy, 16.

PARISH REGISTER OF BURIALS. See Proof, II. 5 (5.)

PARTITION. See Heirs-Portioners.

PARTNERSHIP.

1. A tradesman disposed certain premises and machinery absolutely to a virtual partner of a company, under a back-bond declaring the conve be in security of advances made and to be made by the dispoice; were made by the company to the tradesman, for repayment of

PARTNERSHIP (Continued).

- partner sold the subjects; a creditor of the tradesman having used arrestments in the hands of the partner, individually, and of the company:—Held, in an action of forthcoming, that the arrestees were entitled to retain the price of the property sold, in liquidation of advances made by the company. Wood, Nov. 15, 1836, p. 12.
2. Objection to the instance in an action, repelled, that the summons was raised in name of a company firm, without mention of the individual partners. Thomson, Nov. 30, 1836, p. 173.
3. The individual partners of a company with a descriptive denomination, granted a cash credit bond to a bank, containing a clause of registration, whereby they bound themselves nominatim, the company, and all future partners, for the drafts to be made by the manager; a party, who subsequently became a partner, was charged individually by an assignee of the bank, for payment of a balance due on the credit, the letters of horning narrating the terms of the bond, and directing the messenger to charge the individuals therein named, and any other partners of the company,—Held that the charge was competent, though the partner was not named in the letters. Maclean, Dec. 9, 1836, p. 236.
4. In a question between a joint-stock company, constituted by Act of Parliament, and two shareholders, certain stipulations entered into prior to the passing of the act, and subsequently recognised by the parties as existing,—Held to be binding and effectual, though not embodied in the act. Wishaw, and Coltness Railway Company, March 1, 1837, p. 703.
- 5.—(1.) In an action by the directors of a joint stock company against the other partners for relief of advances made and engagements contracted for behoof of the company—Circumstances in which the following defences were repelled:—
- (1st,) That the partners were only liable inter se to the amount of the shares severally subscribed by them;
- (2d,) That the directors had no right to begin business or power to bind the partners till the whole capital had been subscribed for and secured;
- (3d,) That their power to borrow money was expressly limited by a certain clause of the contract of copartnership, the provision in which they had violated. Macalister, June 2, 1837, p. 1061.
6. Special case involving a question whether certain funds belonged to the estate of a company, or to the private estate of an individual member of the company. Allan, June 2, 1837, p. 1058.
- See Curator Bonis, 1 (2)—Poor, 1.

PASSIVE TITLES.

Where the next of kin of a deceased resided partly within the kingdom and partly without, a creditor of the deceased raised letters of general charge, and a summons of constitution, which were signeted and executed on the same day, against those of the next of kin who were without the kingdom; after the lapse of 20 days, the charge and the summons were both executed on the same day against those within the kingdom; the summons was not called in Court until after the induciæ of the charge and of the summons had expired against all the next of kin,—Held that this form of procedure was regular, and objection repelled that the summons had been executed against part of the next of kin, before the charge had been given to the rest. Lyell, Nov. 18, 1836, p. 41.

PATENT, (INFRINGEMENT OF). See Process, X. 33.

PAYMENT. See Agent and Principal, 1.—Lease, 5.

PERSONAL OBJECTION.

Circumstances in which the Court held, that a party who unduly impetrated from one of the creditors of an insolvent, an assignation to his debt, was barred from founding on that assignation in applying for an interdict of a poinding of effects of the insolvent, at the instance of that creditor. Railway 1837, p. 487.

PERSONAL OBJECTION (Continued).

See Acquiescence—Bankruptcy, 14—Contract, 1—Prescription Quin nial.

PROTECTION. See Cessio Bonorum, 1, 4.

PLEDGE.

A, deposited certain sealed packets, the property of his debtor, B, in custody of C, who made them the subject of a multiplepoinding; another creditor of B, claimed and used arrestments in the hands of C, in a competition between A's executor-creditor and D, that D could competently attach the packets subject to the right of pledge or retention in A, for satisfying the debt due to him by B. Bridges, Nov. 15, 1837.

POINDING.

A charge of horning was given in March, 1833—Held competent thereon in April, 1836, without giving any new charge. Kerr, 1837, p. 1041.

See Prescription Quinquennial.

POLICE ASSESSMENT. See Title to Pursue, 4, 8.

POLICY OF INSURANCE. See Insurance—Cautioner, 5—Factor Loss To Poor.

1. A society, consisting of the members of the bakers' trade in a burgh, established chiefly for providing for the support of poor members who were entitled to certain specified rates of allowance, having a mill for grinding flour to themselves and the public, at which their members bound to grind all their grain, and the profits of which, in the first place, appropriated to the support of the poor members, plus being declared applicable "to the use of the society"—Held to be "a purely charitable institution, the funds of which were in no respect contribution for the poor" of the burgh under an assessment for the burgh, but that they were only assessable "in so far as there were rents accruing from the mill, or other property or trade belonging to the burgh, over and above the usual allowances granted to poor and aged men, divisible among the members, or applicable to the purposes of the society generally." Question, whether an assessment may validly be imposed on the burgh or company as such, or only upon individual persons. Bakers of Paisley, Dec. 6, 1836, p. 200.

2.—(1.) The grantees of a public harbour not liable in poor rates on the profits thereof, customary or statutory, in so far as they were applied to the maintaining and improving the harbour.

(2.) A duty on goods imported for the support of the clergy not subject to assessment.

(3.) The rents of buildings erected by money borrowed under authority, which rents were appropriated by the statute exclusively to the purposes of the harbour, not liable to be rated, but a rate submitted on an estimated rent of the soil distinct from the buildings.

(4.) Feudal duties not a subject of assessment. Heritors and Kirk-South Leith, Nov. 12 1833, p. 204.

3. Certain lands having been disjoined by Act of Parliament from a parsonage, and having been annexed to the royalty of the city, and to the city burdens, and, inter alia, to assessment for the poor therein—Instances in which held that the owners and occupiers of such lands, and buildings thereon, were not relieved from their previous liability for contributions for the poor of their original parish, but that the magistrates and council of the city were bound to relieve these parties of the whole of their contributions from the common good of the city. Burns, May 17, 1837, p. 1041.

POOR'S ROLL.

A party petitioned for the benefit of the poor's roll, in order to lodge

POOR'S ROLL (Continued).

a multiplepoinding where there were above 100 competing claimants; he had not made intimation "to the adverse party," in terms of A. S. June 16, 1819, prior to emitting his declaration before the minister and elders, having been prevented from doing so, by the expense it would occasion: the Court, in the circumstances, ordained intimation of the petition on the walls and in the minute-book, and notice to the raiser of the multiplepoinding. Grassie, Nov. 24, 1836, p. 116.

POSSESSION. See Interim Possession—Property, 1, 3, 4.

PRESCRIPTION TRIENNIAL.

Circumstances in which the Court sustained the plea of triennial prescription, and found an oath of party, and relative state of debt, negative of the reference. Fyfe, June 27, 1837, p. 1188.

—— (QUINQUENNIAL).

The sheep belonging to an outgoing tenant, were acquired by the incoming tenant for a price which was applied partly in paying the rent due to the landlord, who had used sequestration, and partly in paying a debt due to the outgoing tenant's poinding creditor; the proceedings under which this transaction was completed, were partly judicial, and partly extrajudicial; for seventeen years the outgoing tenant acquiesced in the transaction; thereafter, a creditor of his arrested in the hands of the incoming tenant, and attempted to set aside the proceedings, and make the incoming tenant pay the price of the sheep over again to him: Held that the quinquennial prescription applied, and that the arrester, being in no better situation than the common debtor, was barred from challenging the proceedings, in respect of the mora which had occurred. Adie, May 31, 1837, p. 1045.

—— SEPTENNIAL. See Cautioner, 1.

—— (VICENNIAL).

(1.) Found that the act 1617, c. 13, establishes an absolute protection of retours against challenge by parties alleging themselves to be the true heirs after the lapse of twenty years.

(2.) Circumstances ineffectual to prevent the currency of the prescription. Neilson, Jan. 17, 1837, p. 365.

—— (LONG).

1. A decree of certification and reduction, contra non producta, was pronounced in 1786, rescinding a disposition and sasine of certain lands, which was followed by a decree of reduction-improbation of the same titles, in 1788, pronounced after the production had been satisfied; both decrees were taken, in absence, against an undefended pupil; after more than 40 years had elapsed, during which time the pursuers of these decrees, and their onerous disponees, possessed the lands, the representatives of the pupil, now deceased, raised a reduction of the decrees, and of all the subsequent conveyances of the lands: the defenders produced the decrees, and pleaded that they formed a title to exclude: Held, by the whole Court,

(1.) That as the decrees affected the titles of a heritable estate, minorities were to be deducted in computing the years of prescription against the pursuers; and,

(2.) That if, after deducting minorities, the long prescription had not run upon the decrees in absence, these decrees did not technically form a title to exclude; but Observed that nevertheless, this did "not necessarily imply the instant recal of the decrees, or place the defenders exactly in the same situation as if they had never been pronounced;" but that the lapse of time, combined with other circumstances, might form a plea of personal exception against the pursuers, or might "have a most important effect in determining that general question of which the pursuers necessarily undertook to make out the affirmative, viz. whether, in the whole circumstances, the decree ought or ought not to be reduced;" and that "the lapse of time might affect the question of onus probandi, in regard to the facts, on the ascertainment of which, the ultimate reduction of the decrees might depend." Sinclair, 1837, p. 786.

PRESCRIPTION (LONG) (Continued).

2. Under a post-nuptial contract in 1754, the husband "bound himself to convey and settle the fee of the lands of Kirkcaldie to and in favour of male to be procreated betwixt him and his present spouse; whom the heir-male to be procreate of his body, in any subsequent marriage failing, to the heir-female to be procreate of this or any other male eldest always succeeding without division;" the contract contained no mention of the lands, and no procuratory or precept; the husband was seised in the lands, in fee-simple; he died in 1776, leaving one son and two daughters; the son immediately executed a trust-disposition of the lands, in full powers of sale, chiefly for the purpose of paying his father's debts, and an obligation to re-convey "to him, his heirs or assignees," the lands sold (or the balance of price if the lands were sold), after the debts were fulfilled; the trustees, as empowered by the trust-deed, conveyed the lands to the son as nearest and lawful heir to his father: they then retained the lands for 10 years, after which, their whole advances being paid, they re-disposed the lands to the son, with a procuratory of resignation remanentiam, for consolidating their right of property, with the right of reversion remaining in the son, and extinguishing the trust, which was accordingly; the son died, without a settlement, in 1834:—Held, that the right of the son, under the obligation in the marriage-contract, was unlimited with his right as nearest and lawful heir of his father to the old investiture of the lands, his possession under the latter character infer the prescription of that obligation; and that the obligation being in force, the eldest sister's representative had now right to the whole; the exclusion of the younger sister. Ogilvy, May 26, 1837, p. 107.

See Property, 1.

PRESUMED DONATION. See Legacy.

——— INTENTION. See Legacy.

——— PAYMENT. See Agent and Principal, 1.—Lease, 3.

——— REVOCATION. See Testament, 1.

PRINCIPAL and AGENT. See Agent and Principal.

PRISONER. See Jurisdiction, 2.—Cessio, 7.

PROCESS.—1. SUMMONS.

- 1.—(1.) A summons of damages was raised against magistrates of a burgh on account of alleged misconduct in regard to legal procedure of a criminal nature; the summons did not contain the words "maliciously and without probable cause," and the magistrates claimed the protection of the (43 Geo. III. c. 141; 9 Geo. IV. c. 29; and 11 Geo. IV. and 1 V. c. 37) limiting their liability to twopence of damages:—Held that the summons was not entitled under such a summons to take an issue containing the words "maliciously and without probable cause."

(2.) Terms of a summons to which this rule was applied.

(3.) Question, whether, if a summons contains an allegation of malice as cannot be true without the existence of malice and the want of probable cause, but does not contain these precise words themselves, an issue of malice is objectionable as disconform to the summons, if such issue contain the words. Anderson, Feb. 3, 1837, p. 481.

2. The second year of the reign of Geo. IV. ended on Jan. 28, 1822: A summons for payment of an account, raised in name of Geo. IV., bore in the margin to be "given under our signet, at Edinburgh, the 27th day of January, in the second year of our reign, 1823;" it also bore this marking, "Jan. 1823," in the handwriting of the under-keeper of the signet; a note, dated "twenty-seventh day of January, eighteen hundred and twenty-three years," was indorsed on the summons, citing the defender to the ty-fifth day of February next to come:" peremptory defences were lodged denying the debt, and not objecting to the regularity of the summons; and various procedure followed, at long intervals, during a space of above 10 years, after which the defender objected that the summons was a nullity, in respect of a fundamental error in the date of signeting, as the year of the King's reign was stated to be the "second," whereas the year of grace was stated to be 1823:—Held that, if a summons bore one distinct date, in reference to the King's reign, or the year of grace, an error in the other date did not necessarily amount to a nullity, though it might occasion ambiguity, and found a dilatory plea, if timefully stated; that, in the whole circumstances, the defender had recognised the summons as bearing the date of Jan. 27, 1823, as its true date, and that he was now barred from recurring to any objection in reference to the date. Henry, Feb. 25, 1837, p. 676.

PROCESS.—I. SUMMONS (Continued).

3. A party raised a reduction of a sale and feudal investiture of lands, libelling the title of heir of entail under a certain deed; the action concluded for declarator that the lands still formed part of a trust-estate, left by the maker of the entail, under a separate deed of trust, and also for accounting to the trust-estate; an objection being taken to the title, the pursuer proposed to insist, not as heir of entail, but as beneficiary under the trust-deed, and alleged that enough appeared ex facie of the summons to show that the heir of entail was also the beneficiary under the trust-deed: action dismissed, in respect there was no sufficient title libelled, and motion refused for leave to amend the libel. Ross, March 9, 1837, p. 780.

4.—(1.) In an action of damages before an inferior court for assault and judicial slander, in which the slander was not libelled as a separate and substantive ground of damage, but only as an aggravation of the assault,—Held, in an advocacy, that such mode of libelling the slander was not competent.

(2.) In such action the judicial slander was libelled as having taken place in an action depending before the Magistrates of Glasgow, when the action appeared to have been before the Magistrates of Gorbals, and the libel was not amended to suit the state of the fact,—Observed that this was an additional reason for holding the charge of slander to be incompetent. Thom, June 9, 1837, p. 1098.

See Bill of Exchange, 6.—Partnership, 2.—A. S. June 27, 1837, p. 1317.

II. CLOSING AND OPENING RECORD.

1. Circumstances in which the Court refused to allow a record to be opened up, and a plea in law to be added, which had been incidentally adverted to by one of the Judges at an advising in the Inner-House. Thomson, Nov. 18, 1836, p. 82.

2. In an action of declarator and legitimacy, the record had been closed, a proof led, and an interlocutor in favour of the defenders pronounced by the Lord Ordinary; the pursuer having reclaimed, tendered at the advising, as additional documentary evidence, certain letters which had been all along in her possession, but which she stated to have been carelessly put up with other papers, and only recently brought under the notice of her agent;—The Court refused to allow production of the letters. Wright, Dec. 10, 1836, p. 242.

3. In an action of reduction where the Lord Ordinary had found that an alternative conclusion for relief could not be maintained, because there was no plea in law applicable to it, the Court recalled this finding, and remitted to his Lordship, with power to receive a new plea, although the record was closed. Scott, May 13, 1837, p. 924.

4. Circumstances in which the Court recalled the interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary, making avizandum with a process, preparatory to closing the record; and remitted to his Lordship to allow a farther revision of papers, and to grant any diligence which might be necessary for that object. Campbell, Feb. 25, 1837, p. 679.

See Act of Grace, 1, (2.)—Bankruptcy, 13, (3.)

PROCESS III. JURY TRIAL.

1. A cause was set down for trial by a special jury, but a sufficient number of special jurors failed to attend on the day appointed, there being only three, however, in attendance; the defenders, who had applied for a jury, insisted that the trial should be delayed, while the pursuers sat in terms of the 55 Gen. III. c. 42, § 28—held,

(1.) That the Court had no power to grant a tales.

(2.) That the pursuers were not entitled to expenses. Mull Spence, Nov. 17, 1836, p. 30.

2. In the reduction of a settlement, two issues went before the jury, 1st, Whether the deed was not the deed of the deceased? and, 2d, Whether the fact and the deed was fraudulently impetrated to his lesion? the jury returned a verdict on both issues:—Opinion intimated, that there was no material difference between the issues, and that if the evidence would have warranted a verdict on the second issue, supposing the deceased to be merely factive, it warranted such a verdict a fortiori if it showed him to have been of such incapacity as to justify a verdict on the first issue also. Geour, Dec. 13, 1836, p. 245.

- 3.—(1.) Where certain facts of importance were admitted on the one side, and proved by evidence in process, but certain other facts were denied by the Court, looking to the nature of the matters in dispute between the parties, it appointed such farther proof as might be offered on either side to be taken.

(2.) Question, whether, since the union of the Jury Court with the Court of Session, it be competent to reclaim against an interlocutor of the Court of Ordinary, remitting a cause for trial by jury. Buchanan, Dec. 17, 1836.

4. On a motion for a new trial, on the ground of the jury having been improperly sworn, and having misconducted themselves, proof allowed of the facts by witnesses other than the jurymen, but the proof held not to be sufficient. McWur, Dec. 20, 1836, p. 299.

- 5.—(1.) A merchant made advances on a shipment of coffee to the owners of the coffee, and some years afterwards, alleging that the coffee had been sold at Malta, and that the proceeds did not reimburse him for his advances, he raised an action for the balance against the owners; the owners, alleging that he was consignee and commission-agent in regard to the coffee, and that in his duty as such, he raised an action against him for the difference between the amount of his advances and the value of the coffee as shipped; the Court pronounced conjoining the actions, and a separate issue was made in each, whether the defender in each action respectively, was liable; by agreement of parties, and with the sanction of the Court, the two cases were tried as one cause, before the same jury, the plaintiff's counsel being conducted, and the evidence being adduced, in reference to the agreement: the merchant, in leading his evidence, tendered a document purporting to be dated at "Malta, 22d August, 1826," and to be an account of the sales and charges and nett proceeds of coffee, sold on his account, and at the end of it the signature of a third party, confessedly not the merchant, but which third party, residing abroad, had refused to be examined as a witness: the owners objected to the admission of the document, but the presiding Judge admitted it, and directed the jury to rely on it as evidence of the sales therein set forth: the jury returned a verdict, in each action, finding for the merchant and against the owners who presented a bill of exception—Held,

(1.) That the document was inadmissible, in respect, inter alia, that it was not proved to relate to the coffee in question; that it was not proved who the third party was who signed it, or how he was connected with the transaction; and that it was not proved how, when, or by whom the particulars of the document were filled up;

(2.) That, as the reception of the document was important

PROCESS.—III. JURY TRIAL (Continued).

ence to both verdicts ; and also, as the two actions had been blended by the form of trial ; both verdicts must be set aside.

(2.) Observed, that, if the presiding Judge, during the progress of the trial, allows an inadmissible document to be received and read in the meantime, reserving its effect when he should come to charge the jury, it is very doubtful whether a subsequent charge, directing the jury to discard it absolutely from their minds, would have the effect of saving the trial from being vitiated by its having once been laid before the jury. Muir, Feb. 11, 1837, p. 540.

6. Circumstances in which the Court dismissed an action of damages, under A. S. 29th November, 1825, § 47, in respect that it had not been insisted in for above 12 months after the issues were adjusted, and no satisfactory explanation of the delay was given. Calder, Feb. 16, 1837, p. 570.
7. Held, that in the causes which are enumerated as appropriate to jury trial, by 59 Geo. III. c. 35, and the other statutes regulating such mode of trial, where the action concludes for damages only, the Court have no power to take proof by commission, on remit, or in presentia, but must remit all such cases to be tried by jury. Kerr, March 10, 1837, p. 784.
- 8.—(1.) In a reduction by an insurance office of a submission and decret-arbitral, whereby it was found that certain insured machinery destroyed by fire had not been over-valued, it was averred, as one of the reasons of reduction, that the insurance was fraudulently effected by the defender with the intention of destroying the property by fire and obtaining an exorbitant sum from the office ; a corresponding issue was granted, “ Whether the insurance was effected by the defender on a fraudulent over-valuation of the machinery with the intention of destroying the same by fire ? ” and a verdict was returned, finding on this issue that the insurance was effected on a fraudulent over-valuation of the machinery, but not with the intention of destroying the same by fire—Held that this was in substance a verdict for the defender, and that the pursuers had failed to establish their reason of reduction.
(2.) Where, from connexion with one of the parties, so many Judges of one Division of the Court successively declined, that a quorum could not be had, the declinatures were overruled. Hercules Insurance Company, March 10, 1837, p. 800.
9. A verdict will not be set aside as against evidence, when there has been contrary evidence, although the Court may be disposed to differ from the jury as to the effect thereof. M’Whir, March 11, 1837, p. 873.
10. In the reduction of a service, the deposition of an aged witness was taken to lie in retentis, both parties attending, and the witness being cross-examined ; after a judgment by the Court of Session on the proof, including this deposition, the cause was taken to appeal, the judgment was recalled, and a remit was made directing a trial of the propinquity of the competitors ; the witness was still alive, and his faculties were entire, but he was unable, through age and infirmity, to attend at the trial ;—Held that the deposition could not be laid before the jury, in respect that a new examination of the witness, with a view to the jury trial, should have taken place on commission, and under written interrogatories, as prescribed by A. S. 29th November, 1825, § 28. Watson, March 7, 1837, p. 783.
11. It is not admissible for an opening counsel to make a statement to the jury, of a fact which he could not be allowed to prove, in respect of its not being in the record. Falconer, March 23, 1837, p. 891.
12. In an application for a new trial on the grounds of the verdict being contrary to law and to evidence, and of excess of damages—Circumstances in which the Court refused the application, and allowed the pursuer his expenses, but subject to modification, though he had conducted his pleading properly throughout. Hallam, May 18, 1837, p. 950.
13. No reclaiming note being presented within 10 days after an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary settling an issue—an alteration in the issue of inserting a sum of interest in addition to a principal sum therein (the alleged error not being a clerical mistake), held to be incorrect without consent of parties, although the issue had not been signed by Williamson's Executors, June 27, 1837, p. 1201.

PROCESS.—III. JURY TRIAL (Continued).

14. In a question as to the marches of a farm in the island of Jura pursuer had given notice of trial at Inverary, the Court on the application changed the place of trial to Glasgow. Campbell, Jan. p. 1272.

See Queries as to form of Bills of Exception; and Answers by Justice Tindal; Appendix, No. III., p. 1312.—Process I. (2).—Proof, IV. 9, (1).—Reparation—Stewart, Dec. 8, 1836, Sheriff, Nov. 24, 1836, p. 115.

IV. JUDGMENTS, INTERIM-DECREES, &c.

In a cause before the Court of Session, a lady, the wife of an Englishman, found entitled to legitim, her right thereto not having been expressed in her marriage-contract, which was framed in England; the decree having been affirmed on appeal, and an interlocutor pronouncing the judgment of the House of Lords, the lady and her husband applied for decree for an interim payment; this application was opposed by the husband, who had resisted her claim of legitim, on the ground of the defect in the proceedings in the Court of Chancery, instituted with a view to the contract, and have a clause inserted excluding the lady from the decree. The Court granted interim decree. Chaudes, Nov. 19, 1836, p. 48.

See Foreign, 2.

V. RECLAIMING NOTE.

1. Held unnecessary, in respect of A. S. 11th July, 1828, § 77, a copy of the summons in a process of multiplepoinding, to a reclaimer presented by one of the claimants. A B, Feb. 2, 1837, p. 168.
2. Terms of the prayer of a reclaiming note in an advocation, which applied to the expenses of the Court of Session, and not of the inferior Court, Nov. 24, 1836, p. 117.

See A. S., June 27, 1837, p. 1317.—Process III., 3, (2.) 13.—Bankruptcy, 5, (3.)—Goodhall, Nov. 12, 1836, p. 1.

VI. ADVOCATION.

1. Terms of the prayer of a reclaiming note in an advocation, which applied to the expenses of the Court of Session, and not of the inferior Court, Nov. 24, 1836, p. 117.
2. The defender in a summary process declined the jurisdiction of the Court, and presented a bill of advocation, which was passed: the respondent presented a petition to the Inner-House for warrant to set aside the bill, on the ground that the bill was not presented on the reasons summarily on the passed bill, but, after some discussion, the petition was refused.—Opinion of the whole judges intimated by the Lord President to have been that the prayer of the petition could not be granted consistently with the existing forms of process. White, 1836, p. 312.
- 3.—(1.) A bill of advocation of the final judgment of a sheriff was presented on the 13th August; a certificate, that the letters were not expedited, was obtained on the 3d September:—Held that the letters of advocation, subsequently presented, were irregular, being without a warrant, as the bill had fallen; action therefore dismissed.

(2.) Terms of a certificate of non-expede letters, which were presented to identify the individual bill of advocation at which the letters were to strike, notwithstanding an allegation that it described it differently.

(3.) Question, whether the mere lapse of 10 days, after the presentation of a bill of advocation, without expediting the letters, caused the bill to whether the 10 days are reckoned from the date when the bill is "issued, or in a state to be issued, by the clerk to the bills to the complainer's agent;" or whether the bill does not fall till a certificate be obtained from the signet office that the letters have not been expedite. Scott, May 26, 1837, p. 1035.

PROCESS.—VI. ADVOCATION (Continued).

4. Where a sheriff's interlocutor allows a proof merely scripto vel juramento, an advocacy under 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 40, is incompetent. Hamilton, June 10, 1837, p. 1105.

5. A party having applied by petition to a sheriff to decern and ordain certain other parties to do a certain act, and the sheriff, after answers had been given in to the petition, but without making up a record, having pronounced an interlocutor containing findings whereby a foundation was laid for determining on the prayer for decerniture, and the petitioner having immediately brought an advocacy of this judgment;—Held that such advocacy was incompetent, the judgment not exhausting the prayer of the petition. Cameron, June 29, 1837, p. 1220.

See Expenses, 4.

VII. MULTIPLEPOINDING.

Circumstances in which a petition, by a claimant on a riding interest in a multiplepoinding, to have the fund in medio consigned, and the raisers interdicted from withdrawing it from the jurisdiction of the Court, refused. British Linen Company, Dec. 24, 1836, p. 356.

See V., 1.

VIII. RANKING AND SALE.

After great avizandum has been made with the process of sale, in a ranking and sale, and a memorial and abstract have been prepared—Question whether it be regular or competent to remit the process of sale to the Lord Ordinary, before whom the ranking remains, in order to determine if certain lands are included in the summons of ranking and sale, and if so, should be struck out of it; or whether this should be done by an incidental petition to have them struck out of the summons. Mackenzie, Dec. 10, 1836, p. 241.

See Agent and Client, 2.—Bankruptcy, 4.—Lease, 9.

IX. SUSPENSION.

1. Bill of suspension refused as informal, there being no conclusion for suspension of the charge. Maclaren, Nov. 19, 1836, p. 51.

2. A bill of suspension having been objected to as informal, on the ground of there being no conclusion for suspension; and the suspender having applied to the Lord Ordinary on the bills, to allow an amendment supplying this defect: Held, that such amendment was incompetent. Davidson, Dec. 8, 1836, p. 226.

3. In a bill of suspension of a charge on an acceptance, it was averred that the signature was either a forgery, or, if genuine, had been obtained by gross fraud, but no genuine subscription was produced for comparison—Bill (which the Lord Ordinary had refused) passed on caution. Rannie, May 31, 1837, p. 1049.

4. Warrant granted to the clerks to the bills to deliver up to a suspender the bond of caution in the depending process of suspension at his instance, in respect of his producing a new bond of caution, which was reported by the clerks to the bills to be signed by sufficient obligants. Bett, Dec. 24, 1836, p. 313.

5. A bill of suspension was presented containing no formal conclusion for suspension of the charge, but merely a prayer for letters of suspension in common form; the bill though objected to as incompetent, was passed, and letters expedite which contained a regular conclusion to have the charge suspended; the competency of the letters, as disconform to their warrant, was objected to; it having appeared that in practice a considerable discrepancy in the style of bills of suspension prevailed;—The objection repelled, in respect of the discrepancy in the practice; but observed, that in correct style a bill should contain a distinct conclusion, drawn from the narrative and grounds of sus-

2. Circumstances in which in an action of divorce the following interlocutor:—"Remit to the Sheriff's commission proof on the part of the defender, and the conjunct to both parties; and in respect of the special circumstance on the poor's roll, and having executed a disposition in favour of the defender or her agent, recommend to the Sheriff to make an order by which the proof may be taken at the expense of bringing any witnesses from a distance; be reported by the third sederunt day in January next rant for letters of diligence against witnesses and havers. 1836, p. 235.
3. In an action of declarator and legitimacy, the record haled, and an interlocutor in favour of the defenders pro Ordinary; the pursuer having reclaimed, tendered at additional documentary evidence, certain letters which had possession, but which she stated to have been careless papers, and only recently brought under the notice of her refused to allow production of the letters. Wright, Dec.
4. Where a cautionary obligation bound three parties, not but each pro rata, only,—Held competent to raise actio co-obligants, for payment of their respective shares, with representatives of the third, who was deceased. M'Arthur 270.
5. Three declarators were conjoined, and a unanimous judgment, which disposed of the whole merits of one of the Lord President, in granting a petition for leave to appeal, without leave, where the whole merits were exhausted, although a remit was made to the Lord with the other two declarators in the conjoined process 1837, p. 417.
6. In an application for carrying through an excambion of 6 and 7 W. IV. c. 42—Observed by the Court, at order was unnecessary to order service upon any of the heirs were sufficiently certiorated of the application, under the required by the statute. Go well, Jan. 27, 1837, p. 42.
7. Mutual actions of count and back were raised when

PROCESS.—X. MISCELLANEOUS (Continued).

8. A party having brought an action of count and reckoning and payment, the defender in which raised an action of relief against certain other parties,—Held incompetent to conjoin the two processes. Gray, Feb. 7, 1837, p. 494.
9. An action of removing, under A. S. December 14, 1756, was raised in the Sheriff-Court of Fife; after defences and replies were lodged, the Sheriff, on 3d March, “appointed the defender against the 10th March current to give in a condescendence,” &c.: the 10th of March was a Court-day, and, the cause being in the roll, the Sheriff “having heard parties’ procurators, in respect the defender has failed to obtemper the order in the preceding interlocutor of 3d March current, held him as confessed, and decerned against him in terms of the libel:” the defender raised a reduction, in respect the decree was pronounced before any default was committed:—Held, after an enquiry into the practice of the Sheriff-courts, which was not uniform, that no default was incurred until after the expiry of the 10th day of March, against which the condescendence was ordered; and that the decree must be reduced, although pronounced according to the practice of the Sheriff-Court of Fife.
(2.) The first reason of reduction libelled was that “the decree was disconform to the warrants upon which the same proceeded:” in the record, the tenor of the interlocutors was stated, and the above plea was included in the pleas in law; held, that it was competent so to state them under a libel thus framed, in respect the decree of 10th March referred in gremio to the tenor of the interlocutor of 3d March, as one of its chief warrants, and was disconform to the tenor thereof. Hog, Feb. 11, 1837, p. 532.
10. In an action against certain trustees to reduce, inter alia, a conveyance of the trust-property in favour of one of the trustees who had re-sold it to a third party, a plea, inter alia, was stated in defence, to the effect that the action was barred by the disposition to the third party, which was not brought under reduction, and that the disponee ought to have been called as a defender; another plea being, that the pursuers were not entitled to reduce the deeds called for except to the effect of entering into an accounting with the defenders—Held, after a discussion on the defences, that it was unnecessary hoc statu to dispose of the first defence in question, and that, in reference to the other, the defenders were not bound to lodge a state of their accounts before condescending. Philp, Feb. 18, 1837, p. 617.
11. The factor on a trust-estate rendered to the trustees an account of charge and discharge, showing a certain balance in his favour, but never gave in a complete state of his intromissions; thereafter a creditor of the factor used arrestments in the hands of the trustees of the sums due to him, and brought an action of furthcoming;—Held, in an advocacy, that there were no termini habiles for giving decree in the process of furthcoming for the balance appearing on the account or to any other amount, until a complete state of the factor’s intromissions should be made up; and that the duty of exhibiting such a state was legally incumbent on the creditor. Cunninghame, Feb. 28, 1837, p. 687.
12. The pursuers of an action, which had fallen asleep, raised a summons of wakening and transference, which was called so late in the Winter Session as to make it impossible, in the regular course, for the process to be proceeded in, till the ensuing Session; a petition was presented immediately after the calling, for warrant to enrol the process of wakening in the regulation roll, and obtain decree of transference, and in the principal cause for warrant to the Lord Ordinary to pronounce decree of constitution in terms of the libel:—Held that such application was incompetent, notwithstanding certain grounds which were alleged to render the necessary delay very prejudicial to the pursuers. Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, March 1, 1837, p. 701.
- 13.—(1.) It is competent for the sheriffs authorized to take proofs in consistorial cases, or for the Lords Ordinary to appoint the proof to be taken in the country in any case they shall think proper.

anem, by the proprietor of a newspaper, against a clerk's employment, concluding for immediate restitution of the accounts, as uplifted by the clerk without authority ;—He competent proceeding, in respect that the matters in parties formed a proper subject for an ordinary action of Macellan, May 19, 1837, p. 956.

17. In a reduction of a bond, on the ground, inter alia, been impetrated from one of the granters while he was absent, and without it having been read over to him, averring impetration which held not such as to infer reduction. p. 983.
18. Reduction an incompetent mode of reviewing interloper court disposing of the cause and allowing expenses, that been modified and decerned for, and the decree not law Broom, May 23, 1837, p. 977.
19. Opinion by a majority of the whole Court that a reduction the pursuer of an action before the Justices of the Peace extracted judgment in his favour, though not to the extent desired himself entitled, and of all the previous proceedings, a conclusion for the full amount which he claimed, was in the plea was not excluded by the production having been done by the pursuer himself), and judgment on a decree by the Lord Ordinary without the objection having been made, May 20, 1837, p. 958.
20. A master presented a petition to the Justices of the Peace his servant's desertion, and craving warrant to apprehend him, and, on proof of the desertion, craving warrant to find caution to return to his service; the servant was after some procedure, warrant of imprisonment was granted the master, by minute lodged in process, abandoned the warrant of imprisonment; the servant raised a reduction of the decree. Held, that, as the decree could be put to execution without the reduction was a competent form of review though no exception. Jack, March 11, 1837, p. 833.
21. In a reduction of certain decrees for expenses, which were for moderate sums, and for which the parties had been bound to pay, the reduction was competent. Held, that, as the decree could be put to execution without the reduction was a competent form of review though no exception. Jack, March 11, 1837, p. 833.

PROCESS.—X. MISCELLANEOUS (Continued).

and decree of removing thereby obtained, upon which a charge of removing was given—Bill of suspension passed, on juratory caution, as prayed for. Dick, Dec. 14, 1836, p. 256.

23. Circumstances in which the Court found, that a petition by the Lord Advocate (stating that a depute-clerk of Session had collected fees, without authority, and contrary to express statute, and praying the Court to find that he was not entitled to appropriate the fees, and to ordain him to account for, and consign them, subject to the directions of the Court; and also praying the Court to regulate the business of the office in which this levying of fees had occurred, so as to carry out the enactments of 1 Will. IV. c. 69, § 13, and place the business of the office on a proper footing), was informal and incompetent, in so far as it was of the nature of a petition and complaint; and was unnecessary, in so far as it was a mere information to the Court, in respect that a memorial had been previously laid before the Court by the Lord Advocate, on which the Court were to proceed forthwith in carrying out the enactments of the statute. Murray (Lord Advocate), June 22, 1837, p. 1184.
24. The drawer of a bill of exchange raised action for payment of the contents against an indorsee who had recovered the amount, on the ground of want of onerosity, the statements in the record referring solely to that allegation; on a reference to oath the indorsee deponed to circumstances tending to show his want of bona fides, but not showing want of onerosity;—Held that, whatever might have been the case in another shape of the record, the pursuer having failed to prove the allegation on which the action was rested, the defender fell to be assoilzied. Brown, June 29, 1837, p. 1230.
25. Witnesses to the laws and practice of sailing, such as captains in the navy, &c., allowed to be in Court while evidence was leading of the facts as to the bearing of which they were to speak, but not during the speeches of counsel. Potts, March 15, 1837, p. 879.
26. A party petitioned for the benefit of the poor's roll, in order to lodge a claim in a multiplepinding where there were above 100 competing claimants; he had not made intimation "to the adverse party," in terms of A. S. June 16, 1819, prior to emitting his declaration before the minister and elders, having been prevented from doing so, by the expense it would occasion: the Court, in the circumstances, ordained intimation of the petition on the walls and in the minute-book, and notice to the raiser of the multiplepinding. Grassie, Nov. 24, 1836, p. 116.
- 27.—(1.) Where certain facts of importance were admitted on the record or proved by evidence in process, but certain other facts were disputed, the Court, looking to the nature of the matters in dispute between the parties, appointed such farther proof as might be offered on either side to be taken by commission.
(2.) Question, whether, since the union of the Jury Court with the Court of Session, it be competent to reclaim against an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, remitting a cause for trial by jury. Buchanan, Dec. 17, 1836, p. 286.
28. Where a remit had been made by a sheriff to a person of skill, in which the parties acquiesced, though without expressly consenting, and afterwards had the referee examined as to the meaning of his report;—Held that they were precluded from afterwards entering upon a proof of the facts which were the subject of the remit. Wilson, Feb. 10, 1837, p. 523.
29. Where a party to a process executes a private trust disposition for behoof of creditors, held unnecessary to delay the advising of the process until intimation should be made to the trustee. Hunter, March 1, 1837, p. 693.
- 30.—(1.) Circumstances in which questions of law decided before sending a jury cause to trial.
(2.) In an action of damages for wrongous imprisonment, on the ground of the alleged illegality of certain proceedings under the Combination Act, which incarcerated, not in virtue of the original conviction of Justice from the Justice of Peace clerk containing lead, June 10, 1837, p. 1113.

31. In an action originally before an inferior Court for of certain goods, on the allegation that they were of of the quality of the goods having been taken and c was still in the inferior Court, and the goods having ally sold;—Held that in considering the proof, the r to be taken into account, and that no investigat competently gone into. Ferguson, June 30, 1837, 1
32. Where only one creditor raised a summons of adj creditors lodged defences:—Held that a record shou mon form, before pronouncing any decree of adjudica grounds for allowing a summary decree, reserving ob in any second or posterior adjudication, did not appl spoon, July 11, 1837, p. 1268.
33. A patentee raised an action of damages on account o of patent; after a condescendence and answers we an order of inspection of the defender's works, by pe der alleged that his manufacture involved a secret pr would be lost, if inspection was allowed:—Held, 'I be allowed, or else any patent might be infringed w pronounced for giving inspection of the works and i ties, to certain viewers, at the sight of the Sheriff works in actual operation, so as to enable the view the approaching trial; the viewers being warned no formation which they might acquire through that it purpose of so giving evidence. Russell, July 11, 18 See Act of Grace, 1—Bankruptcy, 1, 5, 13, (2.) (3). —Bill Chamber—Cautioner, 7—Entail, 1, (2.) A. S., p. 1317—Factor loco tutoris, 3, 4, (3.)— Factor, 2—Marriage, 1, 2, (2.)—Nuisance, 3 3, 6—Title to Pursue, 3—Jurisdiction.

PROOF.—I. WRITTEN.

Where a contract is proved scripto, held (at a Jun and is in reference to the interests of a third

PROOF.—II. PAROLE (Continued).

garding the footing on which the parties stood in relation to each other; and having held personal conversation with the pursuer's sister in reference to some of the disputed facts; and having repeatedly sanctioned the pursuer's communicating with her parents, respecting the nature of their mutual intercourse, while he enjoined the strictest secrecy as to all others.

(2.) Circumstances in which an objection to a witness, on the head of agency, was repelled by the Lord Ordinary, and the interlocutor was acquiesced in.

(3.) The pursuer of a declarator of marriage got up from her agent at his office, the papers forming the evidence of her claim; the defender was waiting for her in the street, near the office, and he got these papers from her, on giving her a note containing the conditions on which he so obtained them: in a subsequent declarator, the pursuer alleged, with some probability, that this note was one of those documents destroyed by the defender; the parties were at issue as to the conditions specified in the note: in the new declarator, the pursuer employed a different agent;—Held competent, in the circumstances, for the pursuer to ask her former agent "on what ground, or for what purpose, she requested him to give up the documents to her." Craigie, Jan. 18, 1837, p. 379.

2.—(1.) In an action of proving the tenor of a will, a witness was examined in Jamaica, having previously made affidavit as to the subject-matter of his examination—Held that this was no objection to the admissibility of his evidence.

(2.) Question, whether in such action the natural brother of a legatee under the will, not a party to the cause, is an admissible witness? Forrester, Feb. 28, 1837, p. 690.

3. Witnesses to the laws and practice of sailing, such as captains in the navy, &c., allowed to be in Court while evidence was leading of the facts as to the bearing of which they were to speak, but not during the speeches of counsel. Potts, March 15, 1837, p. 879.

4. In a question as to the delivery of a coach-parcel, pending between the coach-proprietor, and the party to whom the parcel was addressed, held that the evidence of the coach-porter, who was charged with the delivery of the parcel, was not inadmissible on the ground of interest, though the coach-proprietor had not discharged him of liability in case the parcel was not duly delivered by him; and, therefore, after the porter's death, evidence allowed to be adduced by the coach-proprietor of what the porter had stated on the subject. Hunter, March 1, 1837, p. 693.

5. Held that a creditor of the pursuer of a cessio, who has been duly cited as such, is not admissible as a witness in support of the opposition to the cessio (though he has made no appearance as an opposing party), in respect that he is a party, and has an interest in the issue of the process. Kennedy, July 11, 1837, p. 1294.

See Bastard—Proof, IV. 2, (2, 3.)

PROOF.—III. CONFESSION OR ADMISSION OF PARTY.

In an action for payment of the balance of a debt originally constituted by bill which had been delivered up, the debtor having judicially admitted circumstances sufficient to establish that the balance had not been paid—Held that such admission could not be effectually qualified by the statement of counter-claims of which no other evidence was produced. Murray, June 14, 1837, p. 1141.

See Bankruptcy, 8.—Compensation, 3.—Judicial Examination.

PROOF.—IV. MISCELLANEOUS.

1. In an action against the underwriters of a policy of insurance for loss sustained at sea on the goods insured, where the defence was, that the pursuers had misrepresented the class of the vessel, a record having been closed and an issue prepared,—Diligence at the instance of the defenders refused to recover correspondence between the pursuers and the shippers of the goods, posterior messenger, signed the execution of intimation of his deprivation of his office, allowed to be called as a witness in execution; but observed that his evidence required to be proved. Aitchison, Dec. 28, 1836, p. 360.

3. Where a remit had been made by a sheriff to a party, parties acquiesced, though without expressly consent the referee examined as to the meaning of his report precluded from afterwards entering upon a proof of the subject of the remit. Wilson, Feb. 10, 1837, p. 528.

4. Circumstances in which, held to be proved that a process and title-deeds, was duly delivered at the end of the process; and, having been mislaid for several years, the agent, or some party for whom he was liable for the expense of certain processes thereon, was liable for the expense of certain processes thereon. March 1, 1837, p. 793.

5.—(1.) A party, in regular form, expedite a general service was unopposed; the service was afterwards brought by a competitor who had expedite a general service some time before was sent to a jury to try the party's propinquity tendered the deposition of a witness who had been dead and was now dead; the competitor objected to its being admitted, that the deposition was emitted post litem motam, the service being previously expedite; and also in respect that under an ex parte proceeding; the presiding judge refused to admit, under a bill of exceptions, that the deposition was admitted, in respect that the service, at which it had been expedite the witness had died before the jury trial.

(2.) Terms of a remit from the House of Lords, held, not to affect the general rule, that, in defending a claim, it is competent to found on the deposition of any witness named at the service, who has since died.

(3.) Where, according to the pedigree of the claimant is the executor of the deceased—Held (under a bill of exceptions given at the trial) that she is inadmissible to prove interest. Observed that such relationship affected the through age and infirmity, to attend at the trial ;—Held that the deposition could not be laid before the jury, in respect that a new examination of the witness, with a view to the jury trial, should have taken place on commission, and under written interrogatories, as prescribed by A. S. 29th November, 1825, § 28.

PROOF.—IV. MISCELLANEOUS (Continued).

(5.) An extract from a register of burials of an entry made in 1800, which stated “ eighty years ” as the age of a person then buried, was founded on in a reduction of a service ; that age was a circumstance vitally affecting the service ; the defender offered to prove that the register was loosely and inaccurately kept, particularly in and about the year 1800, and that the person who then kept the register was since dead ; the presiding judge refused to admit the evidence, Observing that it was at best immaterial, as the extract was not good evidence of the age, but merely of the burial of the party ; and his Lordship repeated that observation in charging the jury :—Held, under a bill of exceptions, that the evidence ought to have gone to the jury, as it could not be known what effect the extract had on their minds, or how far that effect was successfully counteracted by the observations of the judge. Watson, March 7, 1837, p. 783.

6. What weight to be given to the evidence of men of skill in a question as to the boundary of a river and an estuary. M’Whir, March 11, 1837, p. 873.

7.—(1.) It is competent for the sheriffs authorized to take proofs in consistorial cases, or for the Lords Ordinary to appoint the proof to be taken in the country in any case they shall think proper.

(2.) Circumstances in which the Lord Ordinary allowed a consistorial proof to proceed in the country. Jamieson, March 10, 1837, p. 805.

8.—(1.) In a reduction of the verdict of a Jury, obtained in a competition of brieves, as erroneous and contrary to the evidence, the Court, reviewing the whole evidence led before the inquest, found that the verdict could not be maintained.

(2.) In such reduction no particular effect is to be given to the verdict of the inquest, but the Court have the power of reviewing the case on the merits of the evidence on both sides, and decided accordingly. Gifford, Feb. 17, 1839, p. 592.

9. In a reduction of a deed on the ground that the instrumentary witnesses neither saw the granter subscribe, nor heard him acknowledge his subscription, one of the instrumentary witnesses, A, swore that the granter had not subscribed when he (A) signed, and that he neither saw the granter subscribe nor heard him acknowledge his subscription ; the other instrumentary witness was tendered, but held inadmissible ; there was other evidence before the jury, intended to support the alleged ground of reduction ; the jury found for the pursuer, and a bill of exceptions was taken, in respect that the presiding judge “ did direct the jury, in point of law, that if they believed the witness A, in point of fact, though a suspicious witness to the execution of the deed, they ought to find a verdict for the pursuer : ”—Held,

(1.) That the Court must take the tenor of the direction, precisely as stated in the bill of exceptions.

(2.) That the direction, there stated, imported that it was the duty of the jury to find a verdict for the pursuer, if they believed the witness A, even though they disregarded all the other evidence in the case.

(3.) That this direction was not well founded in the law of Scotland, it being a general rule that a pursuer cannot prove his case by a single witness, and there being nothing in the nature of this action to raise an exception to that general rule. Observed, that, where an exception is taken against one portion of a charge, it is important that every other part of the charge (though not excepted against) should be given in the bill of exceptions, so far as necessary to bring before the Court the true import of the portion excepted against, such as it was actually given to the jury. Cleland, July 6, 1837, p. 1246.

(2.) In a supplicatio reduction or a decree of suspension, a messenger, signed the execution of intimation of sist, but deprived of his office, allowed to be called as a witness execution; but observed that his evidence required to be cleared. Aitchison, Dec. 28, 1836, p. 360.

3. Where a remit had been made by a sheriff to a person parties acquiesced, though without expressly consenting the referee examined as to the meaning of his report;—precluded from afterwards entering upon a proof of the subject of the remit. Wilson, Feb. 10, 1837, p. 523.

4. Circumstances in which, held to be proved that a copy of a process and title-deeds, was duly delivered at the office in the process; and, having been mislaid for several years, the agent of that agent, or some party for whom he was responsible, was liable for the expense of certain processes thereby. March 1, 1837, p. 793.

5.—(1.) A party, in regular form, expedite a general service was unopposed; the service was afterwards brought on by a competitor who had expedite a general service some time before; the issue was sent to a jury to try the party's propinquity; the competitor tendered the deposition of a witness who had been examined and was now dead; the competitor objected to its admission, that the deposition was emitted post litem motam, his deposition being previously expedite; and also in respect that it was taken under an ex parte proceeding; the presiding judge rejected the deposition. Held, under a bill of exceptions, that the deposition ought to be admitted, in respect that the service, at which it had been emitted, the witness had died before the jury trial.

(2.) Terms of a remit from the House of Lords, and held, not to affect the general rule, that, in defending a party, it is competent to found on the deposition of any examined at the service, who has since died.

(3.) Where, according to the pedigree of the claimant is the executor of the deceased—Held (under a bill of exceptions) that she is inadmissible as a witness. Observed that such relationships affected the...

PROOF.—IV. MISCELLANEOUS (Continued).

through age and infirmity, to attend at the trial ;—Held that the deposition could not be laid before the jury, in respect that a new examination of the witness, with a view to the jury trial, should have taken place on commission, and under written interrogatories, as prescribed by A. S. 29th November, 1825, § 28.

(5.) An extract from a register of burials of an entry made in 1800, which stated “ eighty years ” as the age of a person then buried, was founded on in a reduction of a service ; that age was a circumstance vitally affecting the service ; the defender offered to prove that the register was loosely and inaccurately kept, particularly in and about the year 1800, and that the person who then kept the register was since dead ; the presiding judge refused to admit the evidence, Observing that it was at best immaterial, as the extract was not good evidence of the age, but merely of the burial of the party ; and his Lordship repeated that observation in charging the jury :—Held, under a bill of exceptions, that the evidence ought to have gone to the jury, as it could not be known what effect the extract had on their minds, or how far that effect was successfully counteracted by the observations of the judge. Watson, March 7, 1837, p. 783.

6. What weight to be given to the evidence of men of skill in a question as to the boundary of a river and an estuary. M’Whir, March 11, 1837, p. 873.

7.—(1.) It is competent for the sheriffs authorized to take proofs in consistorial cases, or for the Lords Ordinary to appoint the proof to be taken in the country in any case they shall think proper.

(2.) Circumstances in which the Lord Ordinary allowed a consistorial proof to proceed in the country. Jamieson, March 10, 1837, p. 805.

8.—(1.) In a reduction of the verdict of a Jury, obtained in a competition of brieves, as erroneous and contrary to the evidence, the Court, reviewing the whole evidence led before the inquest, found that the verdict could not be maintained.

(2.) In such reduction no particular effect is to be given to the verdict of the inquest, but the Court have the power of reviewing the case on the merits of the evidence on both sides, and decided accordingly. Gifford, Feb. 17, 1839, p. 592.

9. In a reduction of a deed on the ground that the instrumentary witnesses neither saw the granter subscribe, nor heard him acknowledge his subscription, one of the instrumentary witnesses, A, swore that the granter had not subscribed when he (A) signed, and that he neither saw the granter subscribe nor heard him acknowledge his subscription ; the other instrumentary witness was tendered, but held inadmissible ; there was other evidence before the jury, intended to support the alleged ground of reduction ; the jury found for the pursuer, and a bill of exceptions was taken, in respect that the presiding judge “ did direct the jury, in point of law, that if they believed the witness A, in point of fact, though a suspicious witness to the execution of the deed, they ought to find a verdict for the pursuer : ”—Held,

(1.) That the Court must take the tenor of the direction, precisely as stated in the bill of exceptions.

(2.) That the direction, there stated, imported that it was the duty of the jury to find a verdict for the pursuer, if they believed the witness A, even though they disregarded all the other evidence in the case.

(3.) That this direction was not well founded in the law of Scotland, it being a general rule that a pursuer cannot prove his case by a single witness, and there being nothing in the nature of this action to raise an exception to that general rule. Observed, that, where an exception is taken against one portion of a charge, it is important that every other part of the charge (though not excepted against) should be given in the bill of exceptions, so far as necessary to bring before the Court the true import of the portion excepted against, such as it was actually given to the jury. Cleland, July 6, 1837, p. 1246.

PROOF.—IV. MISCELLANEOUS (Continued).

10. A patentee raised an action of damages on account of an alleged infringement of patent; after a condescendence and answers were lodged, for an order of inspection of the defender's works, by persons of the defender alleged that his manufacture involved a secret process, the which would be lost, if inspection was allowed:—Held, That inspection must be allowed, or else any patent might be infringed with impunity, and order pronounced for giving inspection of the works and machinery to both parties, to certain viewers, at the sight of the Sheriff, and for the works in actual operation, so as to enable the viewers to give evidence at the approaching trial: the viewers being warned not to use any information which they might acquire through that inspection, except for the purpose of so giving evidence. Russell, July 11, 1837, p. 1270.

See Agent and Principal, 1.—Arbitration, 3.—Bill of Exchange, 1, 2, 3.—Oath on Reference—Process II. 2, III. 3 (1.), 4, 5, VI. 4, X. 2, 13, 32.—Trust, 10.

PROPERTY.

1. A loch was surrounded by the lands of two co-terminous proprietors; the title of one proprietor contained the lands "with woods, fishing, and pertinents;" the disposition in favour of the other only contained "with woods, commonities, &c., and hail other pertinents;" and his charter of confirmation specially reserved to him (the superior) and his assigns certain services, "with hunting, hawking, fishing, fowling, &c. went;" promiscuous possession of the right of fishing in the loch, and boats on it, was enjoyed by both proprietors:—Held that the first was not entitled to obtain from the sheriff an interdict against fishing by the second, in respect that he had produced no exclusive title to fishing; that he had not had exclusive possession; and that, as the question regarded trout-fishing, which naturally belonged to the proprietor of the river, the possession of the second proprietor was referable to a title, notwithstanding the limited reservation of a personal nature, in the superior. Macdonald, Dec. 14, 1836, p. 259.

2. Circumstances in which the Court held that certain lands in Orkney were not held by feudal tenure. Rendall, Dec. 15, 1836, p. 265.

3. The proprietor of an estate on the sea-coast, was infeft in the lands, parts, pendicles, and pertinents, he raised a declarator of his sole and exclusive right to the whole shell-sand, wreck, or seaware on the above lands, and concluded for interdict prohibiting certain parties from taking away any part thereof; he averred that he and his predecessors had constant, peaceable, and uninterrupted possession and use of the shell-sand, past the memory of man, which was never interfered with, until late years; the defenders pleaded, that, in respect his titles did not express grant of the shore, nor describe his lands as bounded by the sea, he had not condescended upon any title in virtue of which to prescribe possession to the sea-shore, or to the shell-sand, &c. as accessorial right: Held that the plea should be repelled, and the pursuer's title sustained. Macalister, Feb. 7, 1837, p. 490.

4.—(1.) Circumstances in which the rule was applied, that a party, having a bounding-title, cannot, by possession, acquire the property of adjoining lands, the face of his title.

(2.) Observed, that, if one of the boundaries, in a bounding-title, be an unappropriated sea-shore, a party might, as there was no intervening party, have extended his boundary towards the sea, without violation of any one's title. Suttie, May 26, 1837, p. 1037.

See Entail, 15, (2.)—Heirs-Portioners—Lease, 6, 7, 8—Nuisance—

PROVISION TO WIVES AND CHILDREN.

1. Terms of a marriage-contract in regard to provisions to the children of the marriage, which, held not to exclude a power of distribution by the father; and circumstances in which a preference in favour of certain of the children was sustained. Ponton, Feb. 14, 1837, p. 554.
- 2.—(1.) Where a father, by his settlement, did not make his younger children creditors of his, for their provisions, but legatees merely,—Held that the children were not within the remedy of the statute 1661, c. 24.
(2.) Where provisions in favour of younger children were not payable, either as to principal or interest, until after the father's death, and were revocable at his pleasure,—Held that the children were merely legatees, and not creditors of their father; and that there was nothing in the structure of the settlement to prevent the ordinary rules of construction, on this point, from applying. Waugh, July 7, 1837, p. 1256.

See Aliment, 2, 3.—Entail, 8.—Marriage Contract, 1.—Settlement, 2.—Testament.

PUBLIC OFFICER.

1. A town-clerk having been appointed for five years, and the council at the end of that period having elected another person, found, in a suspension and interdict, that he was not summarily removable, and the council interdicted from carrying the new appointment into effect, without prejudice to any declarator the council might be advised to institute for having it found that the office came to an end by the lapse of the stipulated period. Farish, Nov. 22, 1836, p. 107.
2. In an application at the instance of a town-clerk, acting as clerk of the police court, to have a party who had been appointed to the latter office by the Police Commissioners for the town, interdicted from discharging its duties,—Circumstances in which interdict granted, and bill of suspension passed to try the question as to the right of appointment. Anderson, March 11, 1837, p. 875.
3. Question whether a depute-clerk of Session, whose assistant clerk has died without being replaced, and who has performed the duties of the assistant clerk, is entitled, without the interposition of the authority of the Court, and notwithstanding the provisions of 50 Geo. III. c. 112, § 16, to levy and appropriate those fees, which his assistant, if surviving, would have levied. Murray (Lord Advocate), June 22, 1837, p. 1184.

See Burgh, 3—Reparation, 2—A. S. March 11, 1837, p. 1317.

PUBLIC RECORD. See Proof IV., 5, (5.)—Entail, 15, (2.)

PUPIL. See Factor Loco Tutoris—Minor—Prescription (Long) 1—Title to Pursue, 1—Tutor.

RANKING AND SALE. See Process VIII.

REAL INJURY. See Cessio 7—Reparation, 5.

RECEIPT. See Writ.

RECORD, OR REGISTER OF BURIALS. See Proof IV., 5, (5.)

REDUCTION-IMPROBATION. See Prescription (Long) 1.

RELATIONSHIP. See Proof, II.—IV., 5, (3.)

RELIEF.

A party caused a summons to be executed, and inhibition to be used on the dependence; a preliminary defence was stated that the execution of the summons was irregular, and, after considerable discussion, that defence was sustained, and the party was subjected in expenses; the party had intimated by letter to the messenger as soon as the objection was taken to his execution, and the messenger had answered, maintaining his execution to be unobjectionable; the party had also, in the middle of the discussion, intimated directly to the cautioners of the messenger, who took no notice of it:—Held that both the messenger and his cautioners were liable to relieve the party of the expenses of the discussion, and of the expense of the inhibition on the dependence. Collier, Dec. 6, 1836, p. 195.

See Expenses, 3—Partnership, 5—Superior and Vassal, 2.

REMOVING. See Act of Grace, 2, (3.)

REPARATION.

1. A dispute, about a frivolous subject, arose between two referees, one of them, who was a man in a low rank of life, got into a passion, and alleged that the other was a partial judge or a partial fellow, and alleged that he had acted as a partial judge; that referee raised an action of damages for the statements were made "falsely, wickedly, maliciously, and caltly" that they had been widely propagated through the country; and the referee and feelings were deeply injured; and concluding for £100; and solatium; no proof of propagation of the statements was adduced; injury was proved to have resulted from the use of the words:—In the circumstances, that the defender ought to be absolved, and not found entitled to expenses. Grant, Feb. 15, 1837, p. 558.
2. An act of Parliament was passed for carrying into effect certain improvements in the city of Edinburgh, and, inter alia, for levelling a street within the line thereof; by an operation on this street the pavement was raised in front of one of the shops:—Held that a claim for damages at the instance of the proprietor of the shop was competent against the Commissioners of the act, although there was no provision in it for compensation in such cases:—The alleged damage was consequential on the operation authorized by the act. Strachan, Feb. 21, 1837, p. 687.
3. A party executing diligence on the regular decree of a competent court, not be sued for damages, although the decree should be ultimately found erroneous, and although steps had been taken at the time of the execution for bringing it under reduction. Aldin, Feb. 25, 1837, p. 688.
4. In an action of damages against a country practitioner for posting a libelous notice to a client of the firm of which he was a partner, and making certain statements regarding a business transaction of the firm, by the defender to be calumnious, and having refused him personal satisfaction therefor—Verdict for the pursuer with £500 damages. Russell, 1837, p. 684.
5. Circumstances in which a sum of £20 was awarded in name of solatium for a personal assault, committed under the influence of provocation. Falconer, March 23, 1837, p. 891.
6. In an action of damages for wrongful imprisonment, on the ground of the alleged illegality of certain proceedings under the Combination Act, which had been previously the subject of a bill of suspension and liberation of the pursuer before the Court of Justiciary,—Held,
  - (1.) That it was not relevant to infer damages that the petition was presented to the Justices, under which the proceedings originated, referred only to the Act of Parliament authorizing the complaint;
  - (2.) That it was not relevant to infer damages that neither the petition nor the warrant bore any date, the warrant being signed following thereon having a date affixed to it;
  - (3.) That it was relevant to infer damages against those responsible therefor that the pursuer was apprehended and brought before the Justices in virtue of a warrant granted by only one Justice;
  - (4.) That it was relevant to infer such damages that the pursuer was incarcerated, not in virtue of the original conviction, but of a letter from the Justice of Peace-clerk containing a copy thereof.
 Lead, June 10, 1837, p. 1112.
7. Question as to the liability of the owners of a vessel beyond the cargo through collision with it. Potts, March 15, 1837, p. 879.

See Cession, 7.—Entail, 10. (2.)—Expenses, 1.—Inhibition, 1.—Standalone Fugate Warrant—Road Trustees.

REPRESENTATION. See Passive Title.

REPUTED OWNERSHIP.

The liferenter of furniture does not, by possession of it in virtue of his liferent, subject it to the diligence of his creditors, on the ground of reputed ownership.—Question whether a creditor, whose debt was contracted before the debtor's possession of the moveables began, can found on the reputed ownership of these moveables, as a ground for attaching them, although he had not contracted on the faith of such ownership. M'Millan, May 13, 1837, p. 916.

RES JUDICATA. See Bankruptcy, 13, (2.)—Process, X., 30, (2. 1.)—Reparation, 6.

RETENTION. See Executor—Arrestment, 6—Lien—Partnership, 1.

RETOUR. See Prescription Vicennial—Service.

REVOCATION. See Husband and Wife, 2.

RIGHT IN SECURITY.

1. A heritable bond stipulated that the rate of interest for the first five years should not exceed 4 per cent; the full legal rate was exigible after that period: the creditor lived for several years after the lapse of that period, and after his death a question arose between his representatives and the debtor, whether the interest had been continued at the rate of 4 per cent: Held, in the circumstances, that the debtor was not liable for more than 4 per cent, in respect, inter alia, that the creditor had, without objection, received an account, and a balance from the debtor, on the footing that the interest continued at that rate, and also that the market rate of interest during the years in dispute, did not exceed 4 per cent. Stocks, June 9, 1837, p. 1095.

2. In a ranking and sale a competition arose between the third and last heritable creditor, and a party who both claimed a hypothec over the titles, as law-agent of the debtor, and had also paid certain interests on the two prior heritable debts, and been assigned by the prior creditors to their rights; that party had acted as law-agent of the postponed heritable creditor, in making his loan, and also as agent of the debtor, borrowing the loan:—Held that, in the special circumstances, the law-agent was barred from competing with the heritable creditor, in respect, inter alia, that the law-agent had been aware, at the time when the loan was made, that no mere stranger would have lent money on the lands after the former two securities; that it was by means of the agent's personal acquaintance with the creditor that the creditor was induced to enter into the loan; that almost the whole loan was applied in retiring obligations in which the agent was bound jointly with the debtor who borrowed the money, or in paying debt due by the borrower to the agent; and that, at the date of the loan, the agent had been paying, for several years, the annual interests on prior heritable debt, and had also a considerable business-account due to himself by the borrower, whose title-deeds were in his hands, neither of which facts was communicated by him to the lender. Wilson, June 29, 1837, p. 1211.

3. A creditor (A.) whose right was secured by disposition and sasine, conveyed this security to B. who was infest; in this conveyance and in the sasine, several erasures occurred; in a competition on the rents of the estate affected by the security, another creditor (C.) whose right was posterior to that of A. objected to the right of B. on account of the erasures, and otherwise, but did not impeach the real security of A.;—Held, that it was jus tertii to C. to take such objections, while the right of A. was unimpeachable, and, therefore, B. preferred in the competition, without deciding as to the effect of the erasures. Proctor, June 29, 1837, p. 1219.

See Entail, 8.—Cautioner, 1, 5.—Partnership, 1.—Trust, 4.

RIVER. See Nuisance, 1, 3.—Proof IV., 6.—Salmon-Fishings.

ROAD, ROAD-TRUSTEES, &c.

1. In an action of damages by the tacksmen of a toll-bar, against the road-trustees, for wrongfully shutting up one of four roads, after letting the toll-duties thereon to him,—Verdict for the pursuer, and damages assessed at £30. Murray, March 21, 1837, p. 890.

ROAD, ROAD-TRUSTEES, &amp;c. (Continued).

2. Certain road-trustees directed an operation to be made, in the which a large heap of stones was laid down partly on the footpath and on the carriage road, where they were left all night, without any notice being taken to warn travellers; a gig was overturned by these stones in the dark, and a person driving it was seriously injured, and his son was killed. Held that the road trustees were liable in damages, though they all claimed that they had no personal knowledge of the obstruction, and had employed a tractor who was habited and reputed competent for the operation, and had been specially charged to be careful; and pleaded that they were not liable for the culpable negligence of his servants.

(2.) In assessing the sums due, £500 awarded on account of the injury to the son, a boy of ten years of age; and £300 on account of the injury sustained by the father. Findlater, July 18, 1837, p. 1304.

See Contract, 2.—Jurisdiction, 1.

ROUP. See Sale, 3.—Sarine, 1.

SALE.

1. Trustees were directed, after the lapse of a specified period, to sell certain lands to sale, and to bind the representatives of the trust in a warrandice; the sale did not take place at the time appointed, delay having been interposed chiefly at the instance of one of the trustees; in an action to have this trustee ordained to concur in a sale, the Court found that the trustees were bound to proceed immediately to expose the lands in terms of the trust-deed; thereafter articles of roup were approved of by the Court, containing a clause of warrandice in terms thereof; objections having been made by intending purchasers to the sufficiency of the title to the lands, and not without foundation,—Held, that the lands must be exposed to sale on the conditions as to warrandice in the articles of roup, and that it was competent in the circumstances to take measures, by declarator or otherwise, removing the objections to the title. Darling, Feb. 24, 1837, p. 671.

2. A party in Liverpool received an order from a merchant in Glasgow to chase for him a certain quantity of oil of a particular description; he made a purchase of oil accordingly, and advised his correspondent that he secured for him the quantity required, but thereafter in executing it he limited this quantity to a half, as appearing in the invoice transmitted to Glasgow; the merchant having declined the purchase altogether;—Held, that the circumstances which held insufficient to bind him to take the reduced quantity. Richardson, May 18, 1837, p. 952.

3. An auctioneer was employed by a party to sell his furniture under an agreement that it should be sold at the sight of the party and the price of the articles forthwith handed over to him; the sale took place according to the course of which a creditor of the party used arrestments in the hands of the auctioneer; at this juncture part of the prices of the articles sold by the auctioneer was handed over to the party's clerk, part (to the extent of £20) was in the hands of the auctioneer, and part had not been received from the purchaser; the auctioneer thereafter presented a petition to the sheriff praying to be appointed party prohibited from delivering the furniture of which the prices had not been paid, or receiving the money, and for warrant to the clerk of Court to take possession of the effects, deliver the same, and receive the prices;—Held, in an advocacy, that the auctioneer was not entitled to insist for such prohibition and warrant. Adam, June 29, 1837, p. 1223.

See Lease, 9.—Trust, 11.

SALMON-FISHING.

Verdict finding that certain parties had wrongfully fished for salmon in the Frith of Cromarty, with stake-nets, &c., in respect that the position of the nets was in a situation prohibited by statute. Mackenzie, March 25, 1837, p. 891.

SASINE.

1. Three parcels of land, the property of one party, which had long been let under separate leases, were sold by public roup, in separate lots, to the same purchaser; they were conveyed to the purchaser in one disposition, which described them seriatim by distinctive names and boundaries, declaring the whole to be held feu, for payment of 3s. yearly of feu-duty, and doubling the same on the entry of heirs:—Held that, as they were naturally contiguous, and had always been held by one tenure, under one superior, and by one vassal, they formed but one feudal tenement, and that infestment of the whole parcels of land might effectually be taken by delivery of earth and stone upon any one of them.

(2). Terms of a clause in an instrument of sasine, which referred to a disposition, containing, first, three parcels of land held feu, and second, a burgage subject, under which clause it was held, that the infestment in the lands “first above disposed,” being given on the ground of the lands “first above described,” was infestment in the whole lands held feu; these being the lands first disposed or described, in contradistinction to the subject held burgage which was last disposed; and that the infestment was not restricted to the first of the three parcels of contiguous land, held feu, and forming one feudal tenement. Grant, Feb. 16, 1837, p. 563.

SCHOOL.

Where the heritors of a parish had raised the maximum salary and divided it among three masters—Circumstances in which held that the justices of peace had not exceeded their powers, under the Schoolmasters' Act, in granting the accommodations of schoolhouse, &c., to the successor of the original parochial schoolmaster, notwithstanding the provision in § 11, that in such case the heritors are “exempted from the obligation of providing schoolhouses, &c. for the teachers among whom the salary is to be divided in the manner foresaid;” and Observed that this exemption only applies to the case of the teachers other than the successor of the original or proper parochial schoolmaster. Heritors and Magistrates of Annan, Feb. 21, 1837, p. 645.

See Trust, 8.

SEA-SHORE. See Property, 3, 4, (2).

SEDUCTION. See Marriage, 3.

SEQUESTRATION. See Bankruptcy.

SEMI-PLENA PROBATIO. See Bastard.

SERVICE.

(1.) In a reduction of the verdict of a Jury, obtained in a competition of brieves, as erroneous and contrary to the evidence, the Court, reviewing the whole evidence led before the inquest, found that the verdict could not be maintained.

(2.) In such reduction no particular effect is to be given to the verdict of the inquest, but the Court have the power of reviewing the case on the merits of the evidence on both sides, and deciding accordingly. Gifford, Feb. 17, 1837, p. 592.

See Proof IV., 5.—Prescription Vicennial.

SESSION, (CLERK OF). See Public Officer, 3.

SETTLEMENT.

1.—(1.) A holograph will, after leaving certain special legacies, contained the following clauses:—“Any money left after paying all expenses, I wish may be laid out on charities. I leave and bequeath to A. B. £200, with power to see this will executed:”—Held, that the provision in favour of charities was not void through uncertainty, the term “charities” being sufficiently expressive of the objects of her bounty, and it being held that a power of selecting and distributing among them was conferred upon A. B. according to the true intent and meaning of the will.

(2.) A direction being given, that certain plate and furniture, &c., “be divided equally," without specifying among whom—Held, in the instances, by the Lord Ordinary, and acquiesced in, that the division be equally among the next of kin of the deceased. Dundas, Jan. 1 p. 427.

SETTLEMENT (Continued).

- 2.—(1.) A testatrix made a provision in her settlement "for payment daughter, in liferent, for her liferent use alienably, and to her children such proportions as she may appoint, and failing thereof, equally among them as shall survive me, share and share alike, in fee, the sum of 6s. 8d.;" nine children survived their grandmother, the testatrix, but these predeceased their mother, without issue; their mother, in exercise of the faculty, executed a deed of distribution, allotting the sum of various proportions, among six of the surviving children, and the balance due to the seventh;—Held,

(1.) That immediately on the death of the testatrix, a jus quæritur in each of the nine children then alive, to some share of the sum, their mother could not deprive them.

(2.) That the omission to allot any share on account of the two who predeceased their mother, and which would have fallen to their representatives, rendered the deed of appointment disconform to the will of the testatrix.

(3.) That the deed of appointment being thus disconform, must be set aside.—Observed that it was competent to any one of all the children to object that the deed of appointment was invalid, although the will was tested, not on the failure to allot a share to the child objecting, but to one of the other children.—Question, whether the allotment of a share to any of the children would have been equally fatal to the appointment, with the total failure to allot any share at all. Watt, 17, 1837, p. 586.

See Entail, 3—Fee and Liferent, 2, 3—Foreign, 1—Writ—Testamentary—Trust.

SHERIFF-COURT (Reclaiming Petition). See Process X., 22.

SHIP. See Carrier—Reparation, 7.

SLANDER.

- 1.—(1.) A party having lodged a claim for enrolment as a voter, was returned irrelevant matter accusing of "culpable and wilful mis-statement giving evidence at the previous registration," two persons who thereupon severally brought actions of damages against the party.—Held, that a case of privileged slander, in which the pursuer must prove malice.

(2.) Verdict for the defender. Gray, July 12, 1837, p. 1496.

See Reparation, 1.

SMALL DEBT ACT.

- 1.—(1.) The creditor in an account indorsed it over to a party, who sued for and recovered the contents in a Justice of Peace Small Debt in a reduction of the Justices' decree, on an averment that the Justice "maliciously committed the most apparent iniquity," defence sustains the facts alleged were not such as to infer malice or oppression on the part of the Justices, without which being established, the decree could not be opened up.

(2.) Opinion intimated, that, under the 6 Geo. IV. c. 48, a legatee, holding a bona fide assignation to a debt, was entitled to follow up the claim in the Justice of Peace Court and follow up the claim. 1 26, 1837, p. 422.

STAMP. See Act of Grace, 2 (1)—Writ, 2 (2).

STIPEND. See Church—Confusion—Interest—Superior and Vassal, 2.

SUBMISSION. See Arbitration.

SUCCESSION.

1. A testator who had no heir or next of kin, conveyed his whole estate, both real and moveable, to trustees who were also named executors; per given to sell "all or any part" of the heritage, which power the trustees were required to exercise; the purposes of the trust were to be declared in a separate writing, and that writing specified a variety of legacies to be paid; the debts and legacies more than exhausted the moveables left by the testator; after selling the heritage, and paying all debts and legacies, a considerable residue remained unappropriated—Held by the Lord Ordinary, and acquiesced in, that this residue, consisting of the proceeds of the heritage, could not be intromitted with by the trustees, qua executors, but only as trust-disponees, and that they had no claim on any part of it qua executors, under 1617, c. 14; but that the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, being now in right of the crown, as ultimus hæres, ought to be preferred. Finnie, Nov. 30, 1836, p. 165.

SUCCESSION (Continued).

2. A party in an entail of his lands destined them to the "eldest son" of his first, second, and third daughters seriatim, in the order of their seniority; then to the "second son" of each seriatim, and then to the "heirs male" of his "first, second, and third daughters in the same order of succession,"—Held, that, under the last destination, after the first and second sons of the three daughters had failed, the heir-male of the eldest, though a fourth son, took before any heir-male of the second daughter posterior to her second son.

(2.) Observed that, under destinations similar to the first two, the party entitled to the character of first or second son, is the person holding that character when the succession opens to that branch of the destination, though not possessed of it at the date of the granter's death. Shepherd, Dec. 1, 1836, p. 173.

See Entail, 3—Expenses, 7—Fee and Liferent, 1, 3.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL.

1. In an action against a vassal's representative, at the instance of two parties holding by one title a right of superiority jointly, pro indiviso, concluding inter alia to have the defender ordained to enter with them;—Held that such conclusion was competent, and inferred no multiplication of superiors. Cargill, Jan. 21, 1837, p. 408.
2. Terms of a feu-charter which held not to import an obligation on the superior to relieve the vassal from augmentations of stipend. Hope, July 11, 1837, p. 1288.

See Entail, 13, (3.)—Judicial Factor, 3—Factor Loco Tutoris, 2, 7, 8—Property, 1.

SUSPENSION. See Process, IX.—A. S. July 6, 1837, p. 1318.

TEINDS.

1. In a process of augmentation, a rental was given in, stating the lands of one of the heritors at a certain value, and the heritor was held as confessed, upon which rental the augmentation was granted: Found that this rental did not necessarily form the rule according to which the heritor must be localled upon, but that he was entitled to have the true value of his lands ascertained in the process of locality. E. of Moray, Nov. 12, 1836, p. 2.
2. Circumstances in which the Court pronounced a judgment, finding that a certain document, if not affected by a plea of dereliction, might be approved of as a valuation of the teinds, led before the sub-commissioners in the presbytery of Forfar, of as early a date as 4th and 12th June, 1627. Earl of Airlie, Dec. 7, 1836, p. 211.
3. Circumstances in which the Court approved a valuation of teinds led before the sub-commissioners in the Presbytery of Perth, who were appointed under the High Commission of 1627; Holding,

(1.) That though dated as late as 1635, the report was not objectionable either on account of the certification in the proclamation by the High Commission, dated March 15, 1633, or the issuing of the new Commission of 1633, but might competently thereafter be signed and approved of.

(2.) That there was reasonable evidence of the valuation having been ac-portion of the cumulo teind effeiring to the lands of 1837, p. 1120.

5. The ten-pound land of C. was composed of the 10 merk land of C., of old extent; the lands lay continued as one undistinguished property for about two centuries; a decree of valuation of the 10 merk land of C. had been made by the High Court; in a question in 1837 how far that decree applied to the locality, where the 10 merk land could not be located, —Held, that, as the blending of the lands had taken place long before the decree, the benefit of the decree was as nothing appeared to take off the presumption, arising from the fact, that the 10 merk land was two-thirds of the ten pound land of C. could only be localised on, one-third of his land as unvalued, the remaining two-thirds of the land being valued. Johnston, June 13, 1837, p. 1125.
6. After a proof on both sides, a decree of valuation of the lands of C. by the High Commission, in 1697; the heritor was plaintiff and his tacksmen were defenders; the minister of the parish, as stipendiary, was not called:—Held, that, in respect of the decree having been called as a party, the decree was liable to reduction on the ground of non-appearing minister, though no fraud or collusion was proved. Simpson, June 20, 1837, p. 114.
7. The titular of the parsonage teinds of a parish was also the proprietor of the lands within the parish: he feued out the lands and teinds to a cumulo feu-duty; the minister of the parish, as stipendiary, had always levied them himself: in a subsequent question, the minister gave up a proven rental, including both parsonage and lands, and the Court modified a stipend, without distinction between these two classes of teinds, which apparently affected both of them; in the locality, the above-mentioned vassal was entitled to 15s. 5d. of stipend, exhausting the whole parsonage and lands; by a process of valuation the respective proportions of the parsonage teind were fixed at 11s. 10½d. for parsonage, and 4s. 5½d. for vicarage; the vassal fell into arrears of the cumulo feu-duty, and raised an action for the amount, deducting the annual stipend.

TESTAMENT.

1. A lady, advanced in life, and possessed of considerable estate, executed a deed narrating that she had acquired by purchase the whole life interest right of certain bank stock which her father, by his settlement, had destined to be enjoyed equally by her and a brother, now bankrupt, and by the survivor of them: and she conveyed the said life interest right to her brother, as an alimentary provision, in the event of her death without having assigned the same in prejudice of that conveyance: in the following month, she executed a general settlement of her whole estate, "dispensing with the generality hereof, and declaring the same to be as valid and effectual as if every sum and subject belonging to me had been herein specially made over:" this settlement was in favour of her brother's children, and it appointed him sole trustee and executor: she died in a few months afterwards: Held (in a question between her brother's children, after his decease, and certain alimentary creditors of his) that the special alimentary provision in his favour was not meant to be revoked by the general settlement in favour of his children. Thomson, Nov. 18, 1836, p. 32.
2. A testator, who died abroad, left certain special legacies which were administered by his executors, along with the rest of his estate, as a cumulo fund, during a considerable period which was requisite for extricating the settlement, and realizing the estate: the special legatees claimed and obtained a share of accumulations of interest, and profits accruing on the cumulo fund, proportioned to the amount of their legacies, as compared with the rest of the cumulo fund:—Held, that a share of the expenses of administering the cumulo fund should be laid on them in the same proportion, and that, in the special circumstances, it should not be laid on the residuary legatee. Trustees of Mrs F. B. Macalister, Nov. 30, 1836, p. 170.
3. Terms of a trust-deed of settlement, according to which held,
  - (1.) That certain annuities provided by the deed, were not to be burdened, on a deficiency of funds, with the interest of two special legacies.
  - (2.) That certain residuary legacies were not so vested in the legatees as to enable them effectually to dispose thereof.
  - (3.) That the children of a residuary legatee who had predeceased the term of payment had right to the legacy as conditional institutes. Pearson, Dec. 16, 1836, p. 275.
4. A testator appointed his trustees at the expiry of fourteen years from his decease, to dispose of certain lands, and divide the proceeds among his surviving children, the shares of those predeceasing without issue, accreting to the survivors equally; the deed provided "that the shares falling to each should not be liable to be affected by their debts or deeds, while in the hands of the trustees, and should only be liable to such contingencies after the same is actually paid over and discharged;" shortly after expiry of the term, three sons and three daughters of the testator then surviving, the trustees, with consent of the sons, entered into a minute of sale, whereby they bound themselves, on payment of the price, to dispose the lands to the daughters, the entry being at Martinmas following; some days thereafter one of the sons died, having, previous to the date of the minute, disposed his right of succession to his sisters;—Held that the share of the price or value of the lands accruing to the deceased had not vested in him at the date of his death, so as to be carried by the disposition to his sisters, but that it accreted equally to them and their two brothers. Wilkie, Jan. 27, 1837, p. 430.

See Settlement—Succession—Legacy—Trust.

TITLE TO PURSUE.

- 1.—(1.) An action of damages for personal injury sustained by a pupil, was raised in a Sheriff Court at the instance of the pupil nominatim, with concurrence of his father, as his administrator-at-law, and also at the instance of the father nominatim, as such administrator; the conclusion was for payment of damages and expenses to the pupil nominatim; the Sheriff dismissed the action, as defective in the instance;—Held, in an advocacy, that the was erroneous, and remit made to the Sheriff to proceed in the case be just.

TITHE TO PURSUE (Continued).

(2.) Opinion by the Lord Ordinary, that though "a pupil, by no persona standi in judicio, yet as soon as his tutor or administrator in the action, the defect of his nonage is supplied, because there is insisting who has a persona standi." Keith, Nov. 24, 1836, p. 11.

2. It was fixed by a final interlocutor, that the bankrupt pursuer of could only insist, on finding caution for expenses: he found a and attester, but the attester became bankrupt during the preparatory cause: Held that the defender might object, before the Lord Ordinary further procedure, until a new attester should be found; and that 11th July, 1828, § 118, did not apply to the case. A. B., Nov. p. 158.

3.—(1.) Under the statutes of 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 112, and 3 and c. 69, the Commissioners of Woods and Forests have no title to production of a royal grant of an office of chamberlain and collector of dietary revenues of the Crown.

(2.) The Lord Advocate has no title, without a special warrant sign-manual, to institute an action regarding the patrimonial of Crown.

(3.) Such action not validated by a royal warrant of ratification subsequently obtained.

(4.) Circumstances in which a preliminary defence of want of reduction held not to be foreclosed, notwithstanding the early production and pleading on the merits. King's Advocate, Dec. p. 314.

4. Commissioners under a Burgh Police Act having authorised the a certain sum out of the funds under their management in liquidation expenses of opposing a bill in Parliament, and having imposed an for the current year, proceeding on consideration of an estimate prices of the preceding year, in which this sum was included, rate payers having brought an action for setting aside the resolution of the Commissioners as in violation of the statute, and for having them pay back the sums so voted away by them into the funds of the police burgh, and also to have them interdicted from including the any assessment to be imposed or levied by them—Held that the police burgh had no such direct or indirect interest as to entitle them to insist in such suits. Erving, Jan. 19, 1837, p. 389.

5. A party raised a reclamation of a sacred feudal investiture of land the title of heretofore and under a certain deed; the action for declaration that the lands still formed part of a trust-estate, left by the testator, under a separate deed of trust, and also for accounting to the estate, an objection being taken to the title, the pursuer proposed not as heretofore, but as beneficiary under the trust deed, and a decree appeared ex facie of the summons to show that the heretofore also the beneficiary under the trust-deed action dismissed, in respect was no sufficient title, and motion refused for leave to amend. Ross, March 9, 1837, p. 780.

6. An heir of title left two sons and three daughters; his eldest son, he had executed a bond of provision in favour of his younger daughters, alleging that the bond was ultra vires of their father, and that the effect of altering the succession of their father's brother, was to reduce the bond, or at least to have it declared void, as it was paid out of the rents of their father's brother's estate, and he assigned to him, and kept up as a debt against the next heir; concluded also for the appointment of a curator to the fatuous brother of the pursuers, and for an order on him to concur in the action; a curator was appointed, who adopted the declaratory, but refused to adopt the reductive conclusions; the youngest son objected that the pursuers had no title to insist, their interest as presumptive-executors being merely contingent on surviving their fatuous brother, and they being wholly superseded by the appearance of that person and his curator: Held, that, though the interest of the pursuers was contingent they had a good title to pursue those conclusions which were not adopted by the fatuous person and his curator. Viscountess of Strathallan, May 23, 1837, p. 971.

TITLE TO PURSUE (Continued).

7. The pursuer and defender, in a process of reduction, ultimately derived right to a heritable subject from a common author; the defender was in possession; assuming the common author to have been in the right of the subject, and duly infeft therein, the pursuer had a title to insist; but such assumption would have been contrary to the fact:—Held competent for the defender, though deriving right from the common author, to maintain possession, by founding on the defects in the common author's right, to the effect of cutting off the pursuer's title to insist; and judgment pronounced accordingly. Irving, May 25, 1837, p. 993.

8.—(1.) Held under a local statute, in conformity with Ewing, Jan. 19, 1837, that residents in a city liable in police assessments, had no sufficient title to complain of resolutions of the Commissioners of Police authorizing a certain appropriation of the funds alleged to be illegal; and that parties who, besides being rate-payers, were the minority of the Board of Commissioners on occasion of passing these resolutions, but whose character as such was not expressly set forth, were in no better situation as to title.

(2.) Question, whether the minority of the Board, if their character as such were properly set forth, would have a good title to complain of the resolutions of the majority in regard to the matter in dispute? Morrison, June 13, 1837, p. 1128.

9. A party in Newcastle ordered a puncheon of spirits from a dealer in Edinburgh, who shipped the puncheon on board a steamer plying from Leith to Newcastle, and transmitted a bill of lading to the purchaser, along with an account charging him with price, freight, and insurance; the seller, at the same time, drew a bill for the amount, which the purchaser accepted: the puncheon was lost during the voyage; the seller afterwards sent a second puncheon, of rather greater value, to the purchaser, and charged him only with the price of the second puncheon, which he intimated was to replace the first; the seller then raised an action against the shipowners, libelling that the first puncheon had been lost through improper stowage, and that he had "undertaken by his agreement, and was answerable to the purchaser for the safe delivery of the said puncheon:" the purchaser deponed, as a witness, "that the said puncheon was to be safely delivered on the quay at Newcastle before he was to consider it as his property;"—Held, that, by the contract of parties, as proved scripto, the first puncheon, when shipped, as above, at Leith, became the property of the purchaser, constructively delivered to him, and was at his risk during the voyage; that the fact of its being at his risk, and understood to be so, was confirmed by his having directed an insurance to be effected on it, and accepted a bill for the amount; that the oath afterwards emitted by him, pending the action, did not take off the effect of this proof as to the party at whose risk the puncheon actually was; and therefore, that, as the puncheon was lost to the owner (the purchaser), and not to the seller, the seller had no title to pursue for the value of it. Dunlop, June 30, 1837, p. 1232.

See Bankruptcy, 3.—Deathbed Deed—Entail, 13, (1.)—Property, 3—Trust, 8, (2.)—Heir and Executor—Partnership, 2.

TOWN-CLERK. See Public Officer, 1, 3.

TRANSACTION.

Three parties having entered into an agreement compromising their claims to the succession of a relative deceased, and a reduction been brought by one of the parties on the ground that she was threatened, and was led into it in ignorance of her rights, and, in consequence of erroneous advice from her professional agent, who was also agent for other parties;—Circumstances in which held that grounds of reduction had not been established, and Observed that a transaction or arrangement involving doubtful rights was of all agreements the most difficult to set aside. Nov. 22, 1836, p. 112.

TROUT-FISHING. See Property, I.

TRUST.

1. A testator who had no heir or next of kin, conveyed his whole heritable and moveable, to trustees who were also named executors, and was given to sell "all or any part" of the heritage, which power they were required to exercise; the purposes of the trust were to be declared in a separate writing, and that writing specified a variety of legacies to the debts and legacies more than exhausted the moveables left by the testator; after selling the heritage, and paying all debts and legacies, a considerable residue remained unappropriated—Held by the Lord Ordinary, that this residue, consisting of the proceeds of the sale, could not be intromitted with by the trustees, qua executors, but was to be held in trust for the testator's creditors, and that they had no claim on any part of it qua creditors under 1617, c. 14; but that the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, now in right of the crown, as ultimus heres, ought to be preferred. Nov. 30, 1836, p. 165.
2. The residue of an estate conveyed by trust-deed was declared to belong to A on the occurrence of a certain event, the deed likewise specifying a sum of £2000 to be invested on heritable security, in the hands of the trustees, to A in life, and her children in fee; the necessary expenses of management were to be defrayed out of the trust funds; A assigned her claim to the residue of the estate; thereafter the event in question occurred, and certain expenses were subsequently incurred necessary for keeping up of the trust and the management of the special provision that these expenses fell to be deducted from the residue payable to the assignee; sum allowed to be reserved by the trustees to meet the future expenses of management. Laurel and Company's Assignees, Nov. 24, 1836, p. 158.
3. Circumstances in which the grantor of a trust-conveyance for behoof of his creditors held not entitled to insist against his trustees in an action of reduction. Martin, Dec. 8, 1836, p. 227.
4. Trustees under a settlement bought lands to be entailed, but delaying the entail, and, in the mean time, took the conveyances in their own favour; the party who, by the trust deed, was made first heir of entail entered into the natural possession of the lands, and, after some years, an onerous condition and assignation for behoof of his creditors, a ward became insane, his disponent, in the mean time, had entered into possession, in a bill of suspension and interdict at the instance of the ward, the disponent, the Court, in the circumstances, refused in the bill to prohibit him from uplifting the rents, but passed the bill to try the question. Dalrymple, Dec. 23, 1836, p. 306.
- 5.—(1.) A trust held not to have been evacuated by the death of one of the deponents or another from the country, and the bankruptcy of the managing trustee, though a curator bonis had been thereafter appointed by the Court at the instance of parties beneficially interested.
(2.) Circumstances in which held that certain provisions only subjected to a power conferred on trustees of regulating their investment and disposition; and that that power, though for a long time neglected to be exercised, had not become inoperative. Cowan, Jan. 20, 1837, p. 398.

TRUST (Continued).

6. Circumstances in which, where a trustee infest, had come under large advances and obligations for the truster, and had advertised part of the lands for sale, in virtue of powers in the trust-deed—the Court, on caution, passed a bill of suspension and interdict at the instance of parties who alleged that the land in question had been sold to them by the truster, that they had already consigned a large portion of the price, that the trustee was participant in the sale, and that his security and relief was fully provided for; at the same time that their Lordships refused to grant any interim interdict. Ker, Jan. 27, 1837, p. 425.
7. Construction under the terms of a testamentary trust-deed, of the “necessary charges” to be deducted from the annual proceeds of the trust-estate, before the residue could be held to be “free rents,” divisible as directed by the deed. Morrison, Feb. 15, 1837, p. 560.
- 8.—(1.) A trust-donation was vested in the corporation of the town council of a royal burgh, on condition that they were to apply the annual dividends “in the support and maintenance, from time to time, of schools” in the burgh, taught on the Madras System: the council made an agreement with the several kirk-sessions in the burgh, binding themselves and their successors to pay over the dividends, equally among the kirk-sessions, each of whom, on the other hand, became bound annually to lodge with the council a written vidimus, “showing definitely that the dividend was to be strictly applied in the promotion of the system of education proposed by the donor, and accompanied by an obligation binding the kirk-session to apply the same accordingly:” it was declared that, so long as each kirk-session did so, “and satisfied the town council” that the obligation was carried into practical execution, it should have right to its share of the dividend, but should forfeit such right, on failure to fulfil these conditions: provision was made for admitting members of the town council to the annual examination of the schools, “to satisfy themselves of the bona fide and legitimate application of the dividend,” and that this was done “strictly in terms of the deed of donation:” the town council of a succeeding year refused to sanction this agreement—Held that the agreement was not ultra vires of the preceding town council; that it was no devolution of the trust, but a judicious mode of carrying it into practical execution; and that it was a valid contract, binding on the town council, so long as duly implemented by the kirk-sessions.
 (2.) An action was raised by one contracting party to enforce implement of a contract against the other; the defenders alleged that the pursuers were a kirk-session only quoad sacra, and had no title to pursue;—Objection repelled. Forbes, Feb. 21, 1837, p. 628.
9. Trustees were directed, after the lapse of a specified period, to expose certain lands to sale, and to bind the representatives of the truster in absolute warrandice; the sale did not take place at the time appointed, delays having been interposed chiefly at the instance of one of the trustees; in an action to have this trustee ordained to concur in a sale, the Court found that the trustees were bound to proceed immediately to expose the lands in terms of the trust-deed; thereafter articles of roup were approved of by the Court containing a clause of warrandice in terms thereof; objections having been stated by intending purchasers to the sufficiency of the title to the lands, which were not without foundation,—Held, that the lands must be exposed to sale, under the conditions as to warrandice in the articles of roup, and that it was incompetent in the circumstances to take measures, by declarator or otherwise, for removing the objections to the title. Darling, Feb. 24, 1837, p. 672.
10. Where a trust-settlement was conceived in favour of the trustees, and the survivor of them; and one of two surviving trustees became insane; the Court granted authority to the other trustee to wind up the trust, with the full powers conferred on the trustees, or survivor, but only on condition of his finding caution. Fraser, March 1, 1837, p. 692.

TRUST (Continued).

- 11.—(1.) In a declarator of trust to which the Act 1696, c. 25, is applicable is competent to prove trust by writings under the hand of the purporting an acknowledgment or admission of trust, although not a formal bond of trust.
(2.) Evidence which held sufficient to prove that certain properties to which were taken wholly in name of one individual, was held to the extent of a half, in trust.
(3.) Opinion intimated, that, in a declarator of trust it is not necessary to prove the constitution of a trust ab initio, but that proof of an existing trust will support a conclusion for declarator of trust. M'Farlane, 1837, p. 978.
12. Question whether, in special circumstances, a private sale by trust of one of their own number, was not reducible. Browning, May 2, 1837, p. 999.
13. Under a post-nuptial contract in 1754, the husband "bound himself to convey and settle the fee of the lands of Kirkbuddo to and in favour of the male to be procreated betwixt him and his present spouse; whom if the heir-male to be procreate of his body, in any subsequent marriage failing, to the heir-female to be procreate of this or any other marriage, the eldest always succeeding without division:" the contract contained no mention of the lands, and no procuratory or precept; the husband was put in possession of the lands, in fee-simple; he died in 1776, leaving one son and two daughters; the son immediately executed a trust-disposition of the lands, in pursuance of the powers of sale, chiefly for the purpose of paying his father's debts, and under an obligation to re-convey "to him, his heirs or assignees," the lands were sold (or the balance of price if the lands were sold), after the trust was fulfilled; the trustees, as empowered by the trust-deed, conveyed the lands to the son as nearest and lawful heir to his father: they then conveyed the lands, base, under the precept in the trust disposition, and possessed the lands for 10 years, after which, their whole advances being paid, they re-disposed of the lands to the son, with a procuratory of resignation in remanentiam, for consolidating their right of property, with the right of the son, and extinguishing the trust, which was accordingly done; the son died, without a settlement, in 1834:—Held, that the right of the son, under the obligation in the marriage-contract, was unlimited with his right as nearest and lawful heir of his father under the old investiture of the lands, his possession under the latter character infer the prescription of that obligation; and that the obligation being in force, the eldest sister's representative had now right to the whole of the lands, to the exclusion of the younger sister. Ogilvy, May 26, 1837, p. 1027.
14. A party executed an entail of heritable property and at the same time conveyed to trustees certain other heritable and moveable property: the trust-deed provided that, after fulfilling the primary purposes of the trust, the trustees should invest the funds in the purchase of lands, which they were to dispose to and in favour of the heir of entail in possession at the time of the death of the testator and who should have attained majority, and to the other heirs of entail in order, under the burden of subsisting annuities and provisions; the testator died two months after attaining majority, leaving an infant child—Held, that on the majority of the first heir succeeding, a right vested in him and the other heirs to obtain from the trustees an effectual denuding and discharge of all lands which might have been purchased with the trust-funds, and that they were entitled to the whole interest and proceeds of the lands principal should be invested, and that no farther accumulation for investment could take place. Stewart, June 16, 1837, p. 1153.
15. A trust was constituted in a post nuptial contract in favour of the wife, who was deaf and dumb, but sui juris, and the heirs of the marriage; the

TRUST (Continued).

died, and the only heir of the marriage passed the years of majority; Held, although there was no provision in the deed for the trustees denuding in the event which occurred, yet as the widow and the heir had in themselves the entire right to the trust-property, they were entitled to discharge the trust, and require the trustees to denude. Craigie, June 17, 1837, p. 1157.

16. Terms and provisions of a trust-deed of settlement, which held not sufficient to import a postponement of the vesting and payment of the residue of the trust-estate in unlimited fee-simple, beyond the death of a liferentrix and the majority of the residuary legatees. Tait, July 11, 1837, p. 1273.

See Bankruptcy, 9.—Bill of Exchange, 2, (2.)—Fee and Liferent, 2, 3.—Succession—Outlawry—Process X., 29.

TRUSTEE. See Bankruptcy—Trust.

TUTOR.

A party while in an infirm state of health having been served tutor-at-law to his infant nephew, and having two years afterwards applied by petition to be relieved of his office, on the ground of his health having become still more infirm, the other relatives of the pupil making no opposition, the Court allowed the tutor to renounce, and appointed a factor loco tutoris. Munnoch, July 7, 1837, p. 1267.

See Title to Pursue, 1.

UDAL.

Circumstances in which held that a party who had been, for several years, in possession of udal lands, had no title to them, and consequently that the right of a disponee to whom he sold them must be set aside at the instance of the heir of the last proprietor. Rendall, June 15, 1837, p. 1145.

See Property, 2.

ULTIMUS HÆRES. See Succession, 1.

VALUATION. See Teinds.

VERBAL SLANDER. See Reparation, 1, 4—Slander.

VERDICT. See Process III.

VESTING. See Fee and Liferent—Testament, 3, 4.—Trust, 5, 13, 14, 16.

WAKENING. See Process X., 12.—A. S., June 27, 1837, p. 1317.

WITNESS. See Bastard—Proof II.

WRIT.

1. A settlement of a heritable estate was made by three relative deeds—(1.) a deed of entail, containing a disposition to certain heirs, “whom failing, to any persons to be named by the entailer, in any nomination to be executed by him at any time of his life;” (2.) a relative deed of nomination of heirs, in the form of a probative writ, which excluded the nearest heir, and declared the order of heirs who were called, but contained no dispositive words; and (3.) a trust-disposition for certain temporary purposes, under burden of which, the other two deeds were granted: These deeds were all executed on the same day, and a duplicate of each deed was executed at the same time; the testing clause of each deed specially referred to the simultaneous execution of the duplicate, and vice versa; there were numerous erasures and superinductions in the deeds and duplicates, but, with two immaterial exceptions, no erasure occurred in the same place of both the deed and its duplicate, the deed being entire wherever the duplicate was erased, and vice versa; no notice of the erasures was taken in the testing clause of any of the deeds or duplicates; Held, in a reduction,

(1.) That the deeds were, in the circumstances, unchallengeable; and

(2.) That the combined effect of the disposition in the entail, and of the relative deed of nomination of heirs, was, to form an effectual conveyance in favour of these heirs, just as if they had been originally inserted in the entail. Earl of Strathmore, Feb. 1, 1837, p. 449.

- 2.—(1.) A holograph acknowledgment in these terms, “Received from A. B.

WRIT (Continued.)

£186, (Signed) C. D."—imports in dubio the constitution of a debt, general obligation to repay.

(2.) The above acknowledgment, though unstamped, along with circumstances held to establish resting owing. Allan, June 13, 181130.

3. In a reduction of a deed on the ground that the instrumentary witness neither saw the granter subscribe, nor heard him acknowledge his subscription, one of the instrumentary witnesses, A, swore that the granter had subscribed when he (A) signed, and that he neither saw the granter subscribe nor heard him acknowledge his subscription; the other instrumentary witness was tendered, but held inadmissible; there was other evidence to the jury, intended to support the alleged ground of reduction; the jury for the pursuer, and a bill of exceptions was taken, in respect that the siding judge "did direct the jury, in point of law, that if they believe witness A, in point of fact, though a suspicious witness to the execution of the deed, they ought to find a verdict for the pursuer:"—Held,

(1.) That the Court must take the tenor of the direction, precisely as stated in the bill of exceptions.

(2.) That the direction, there stated, imported that it was the duty of the jury to find a verdict for the pursuer, if they believed the witness A, though they disregarded all the other evidence in the case.

(3.) That this direction was not well founded in the law of Scotland, being a general rule that a pursuer cannot prove his case by a single witness, and there being nothing in the nature of this action to raise an exception to that general rule. Observed, that, where an exception is taken against a portion of a charge, it is important that every other part of the charge (if not excepted against) should be given in the bill of exceptions, so far as necessary to bring before the Court the true import of the portion excepted against, such as it was actually given to the jury. Cleland, July 6, 1846.

See Fraud—Right in Security, 3.

WRONGFUL IMPRISONMENT. See Process X., 30.—Reparations, n. 6.

